es; it is to no less than eternal glory. The world think it strange to see the believer abridge himself in the delights of sin, their common pursuits and eager graspings after gains, or honors, or pleasures of sense; but they know not the infinite gain that he hath made, in that he hath exchanged this dross for down-weight of pure gold. The world see what the Christian leaves, but they see not what he comes to, what his new purchase is, in another place; they see what he suffers, but not what he expects, and shall attain as the end of those sufferings, which shall shortly end. But he, knowing well upon what conditions all these things run, may well say, Non magna relinquo magna sequor—How small is what I forsake, how great that which I follow after!

It is glory, eternal glory, his eternal glory, true, real glory. All here that is so named, is no more than a name, a shadow of glory; it can not endure the balance, but is found too light, as was said of a great monarch, Dan. v.; and even many principalities and provinces, put into the scale one after another, still add no weight: yea, possibly, as a late political writer wittily observes of a certain monarch, “the more kingdoms you cast in, the scale is still the lighter.” Men are naturally desirous after glory, and gape after it; but they are naturally ignorant of the true nature and place of it: they seek it where it is not, and, as Solomon says of riches, set their hearts on that which is not, Prov. xxiii. 5—hath no subsistence or reality. But the glory above, is true, real glory, and bears weight, and so bears aright the name of glory, the term for which in the Hebrew [Kebud] signifies weight; and the apostle's expression seems to allude to that sense: speaking of this same glory to come, he calls it a far more excellent weight of glory. 2 Cor. iv. 17. It weighs down all labor and sufferings in the way, so far, as that they are not once worth the speaking of in respect of it. It is the hyperbole καθ' υπερβολην εις υπερβολην. Other glory is over-spoken, but this glory is over-glorious to be duly spoken: it exceeds and rises above all that can be spoken of it.

Eternal.] Oh, that adds much! Men would have more reason so to affect and pursue the glory of the present world, such as it is, if it were lasting, if it stayed with them when they have caught it, and they stayed with it to enjoy it. But how soon do they part! They pass away, and the glory passes away, both as smoke. Our life itself is as a vapor. And as for all the pomp and magnificence of those that have the greatest outward glory, and make the fairest show, it is but a show, a pageant that goes through the street, and is seen no more. But this hath length of days with it—eternal glory. Oh, a thought of that swallows up all the grandeur of the world, and the noise of reckoning years and ages. Had one man continued, from the creation to the end of the world, at the top of earthly dignity and glory, admired by all, yet, at the end, everlasting oblivion being the close, what a nothing were it to eternal glory! But, alas! we can not be brought to believe, and deeply to take the impression of eternity; and this is our undoing.

By Jesus Christ.] Your portion, while out of him, was eternal shame and misery, but by him, it is even all glory. And this hath in it likewise an evidence of the greatness of this glory; it can be no small estate, which the blood of the Son of God was let out to purchase.

His glory.] It is that which he gives, and gives as his choicest of all, to his chosen, his children. And if there be anything here that hath delight or worth, in the things which he gives in common even to his enemies; if there be such a world and such a variety of good things for them that hate him, oh, how excellent must those things be which he hath reserved for his friends, for those he loves, and causes to love him!

As it is his gift, so it is indeed himself; the beholding and enjoying of himself. This we can not now conceive. But, oh, that blessed day when the soul shall be full of God, shall be satisfied and ravished with full vision! Should we not admire that such a condition is provided for man, wretched, sinful man? Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that thou visitest him? Psalm viii. 3. And is it provided for me, as wretched as any who are left and fallen short of this glory, a base worm taken out of the mire, and washed in the blood of Christ, and within a while set to shine in glory without sin! Oh, the wonder of this! How should it excite us to praise, when we think of such a one there, who will bring us up in the way to this crown! How will this hope sweeten the short sufferings of this life! And death itself, which is otherwise the bitterest in itself, is most of all sweetened by this, as being nearest it, and setting us into it. What though thou art poor, diseased, and despised here? Oh, consider what is there, how worthy the affection, worthy the earnest eye and fixed look of an heir of this glory! What can he either desire or fear, whose heart is thus deeply fixed? Who would refuse this other clause, to suffer a while, a little while, anything outward or inward which he thinks fit? How soon shall all this be overpast, and then overpaid in the very entry, at the beginning of this glory that shall never end!

VER. 11. To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

THEY know little of their own wants and emptiness, who are not much in prayer; and they know little of the greatness and goodness of God, who are not much in praises. The humble Christian hath a heart in some measure framed to both. He hath within him the best schoolmaster, who teaches him how to pray, and how to praise, and makes him delight in the exercise of them both.

The apostle, having added prayer to his doctrine, adds here, you see, praise to his prayer. To him be glory and dominion for ever.

The living praises of God spring from much holy affection, and that affection springs from a Divine light in the understanding. So says the psalmist: Sing ye praises with understanding, or, you that have understanding. Psalm xlvii. 7. It is a spiritual knowledge of God, that sets the soul in tune for his praises, and therefore the most can bear no part in this song: they mistune it quite, through their ignorance of God, and unacquaintance with him. Praise is unseemly in the mouth of fools: they spoil and mistune it.

Observe, 1. The thing ascribed. 2. The term or endurance of it. The former is expressed in two words: glory, and power. Glory, that is, the shining forth of his dignity, the knowledge and acknowledgment of it by his creatures; that his excellency may be confessed and praised, his name exalted; that service and homage may be done to him. Which all add nothing to him, for how can that be? But as it is the duty of such creatures as he hath fitted for it, to render praise to him, so it is their happiness. All created things, indeed, declare and speak his glory: the heavens sound it forth, and the earth and sea resound and echo it back. But his reasonable creatures hath he peculiarly framed, both to take notice of his glory in all the rest, and to return it from and for all the rest, in a more express and lively way.

And in this lower world, it is man alone that is made capable of observing the glory of God, and of offering him praises. He expresses it well, who calls man the world's high priest: all the creatures bring their oblations of praise to him, to offer up for them and for himself, and for whose use and comfort they are made. The light and motion of the heavens, and all the variety of creatures below them, speak this to man: He that made us and you, and made us for you, is great, and wise, and worthy to be praised. And you are better able to say this than we; therefore praise him on our behalf and on your own. Oh! he is great and mighty, he is the Lord our Maker.

Power here expresses not only ability, but authority and royal sovereignty; that, as he can do all things, he rules and governs all things, is King of all the world, Lord paramount. All hold their crowns of him, and the shields of the earth belong unto God; he is greatly to be exalted, Psalm xlvii. 9. He disposeth of states and kingdoms at his pleasure, establisheth or changeth, turns and overturns, as seems him good; and hath not only might, but right to do so. He is the Most High, ruling in the kingdoms of the children of men, and giving them to whomsoever he will, Daniel iv. 32, pouring contempt upon princes when they contemn his power.

The term of this glory is for ever. Even in the short life of man, men who are raised very high in place and popular esteem may, and often do, outlive their own glory. But the glory of God lasteth as long as himself, for he is unchangeable: his throne is for ever, and his wrath for ever, and his mercy for ever; and therefore his glory for ever.

Reflection 1. Is it not to be lamented, that he is so little glorified and praised? that the earth, being so full of his goodness, is so empty of his praise from them who enjoy and live upon it?

How far are the greatest part from making this their great work, to exalt God, and ascribe power and glory to his name! So far, that all their ways are his dishonor: they seek to advance and raise themselves, to serve their own lusts and pleasures, while they are altogether mindless of his glory. Yea, the apostle's complaint holds good against us all; we are seeking our own things, and none the things of the Lord Jesus Christ. Phil. ii. 21. It is true, some exceptions there are; but, as his meaning is, they are so few, that they are, as it were, drowned and smothered in the crowd of self-seekers, so that they appear not. After all the judgments of God upon us, how do luxury and excess, uncleanness, and all kinds of profaneness, still out-dare the very light of the gospel, and the rule of holiness shining in it! Scarcely anything is a matter of common shame and scorn, but the power of godliness; turning indeed our true glory into shame, and glorying in that which is indeed our shame. Holiness is not only our truest glory, but that wherein the ever-glorious God doth especially glory. He hath made known himself particularly by that name, The holy God; and the express style of his glorious praises uttered by seraphims, is, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory. Isa. vi. 3.

Instead of sanctifying and glorifying this holy name, how doth the language of hell, oaths and curses, abound in our streets and houses! How is that blessed name, which angels are blessing and praising, abused by base worms! Again, notwithstanding all the mercies multiplied upon us in this land, where are our praises, our songs of deliverance, our ascribing glory and power to our God, who hath prevented us with loving kindness and tender mercies; hath removed the strokes of his hand, and made cities and villages populous again, that were left desolate without inhabitants?

Oh, why do we not stir up our hearts, and one another, to extol the name of our God, and say, Give unto the Lord glory and strength; give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name? Have we not seen the pride and glory of all flesh stained and abased? Were there ever affairs and times that more discovered the folly and weakness of men, and the wisdom and power of God? Oh, that our hearts were set to magnify him, according to that word so often repeated in Psalm cvii. Oh! that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, for his wonderful works to the children of men!

Reflection 2. But what wonder is it that the Lord loses the revenue of his praises at the hands of the common ungodly world, when even his own people fall so far behind it as usually they do? The dead can not praise him; but that they whom he hath quickened by his Spirit, should yet be so surprised with deadness and dulness as to this exercise of exalting God, this is very strange. For help of this, take the three following directions:—

Direction 1. We should seek after a fit temper, and labor to have our hearts brought to a due disposition for his praises. And in this view, [1.] See that they be spiritual. All spiritual services require that, but this service most, as being indeed the most spiritual of all. Affection to the things of this earth, draws down the soul, and makes it so low set, that it can not rise to the height of a song of praise; and thus, if we observed ourselves, we should find that when we let our hearts fall and entangle themselves in any inferior desires and delights, as they are unfitted generally for holy things, so, especially for the praises of our holy God. Creature-loves debase the soul, and turn it to earth, and praise is altogether heavenly.

[2.] Seek a heart purified from self-love, and possessed with the love of God. The heart which is ruled by its own interest is scarcely ever content, still subject to new disquiet. Self is a vexing thing, for all things do not readily suit our humors and wills, and the least touch that is wrong to a selfish mind distempers it, and disrelishes all the good things about it. A childish condition it is, if crossed but in a toy, to throw away all. Whence are our frequent frettings and grumbings, and why is it that we can drown a hundred high favors in one little displeasure, so that still our finger is upon that string, and there is more malcontent and repining for one little cross, than praises for all the mercies we have received? Is not this evidently from the self-love that abounds in us? Whereas, were the love of God predominant in us, we should love his doings and disposals, and bless his name in all. Whatsoever were his will, would, in that view, be amiable and sweet to us, however in itself harsh and unpleasant. Thus should we say in all: This is the will and the hand of my Father, who doth all things wisely and well: blessed be his name!

The soul thus framed, would praise in the deeps of troubles: not only in outward afflictions, but in the saddest inward condition, it would be still extolling God, and saying, However he deal with me, he is worthy to be loved and praised. He is great and holy, he is good and gracious; and whatsoever be his way and thoughts toward me, I wish him glory. If he will be pleased to give me light and refreshment, blessed be he; and if he will have me to be in darkness again, blessed be he, glory to his name! Yea, what though he should utterly reject me, is he not for that to be accounted infinitely merciful in the saving of others? Must he cease to be praiseworthy for my sake? If he condemn, yet he is to be praised, being merciful to so many others; yea, even in so dealing with me, he is to be praised, for in that he is just.

Thus would pure love reason for him, and render praise to him. But our ordinary way is most untoward and unbeseeming his creatures, even the best of them, much more such worms as we are; that things must rather be to our mind than his, and we must either have all our will, or else, for our part, he shall have none of his praises.

[3.] Labor for that which on these two will follow, a fixed heart. If it be refined from creature-love, and self-love, spirituality and love of God will fix it; and then shall it be fit to praise, which an unstable, uncomposed heart can never be, any more than an instrument can be harmonious and fit to play on, that hath loose pins, still slipping and letting down the strings, pins that never fasten. And thus are the most: they can not fix to divine thoughts, to consider God, to behold and admire his excellency and goodness, and his free love. Oh, that happy word of David, worthy to be twice repeated! When shall we say it? O God, my heart is fixed: well might he add, I will sing and give praise. Psalm lvii. 7. Oh, that we would pray much that he would fix our hearts, and then, he having fixed them, we should praise him much.

Direct. II. If any due disposition be once attained for praises, then must the heart, so disposed, be set to study the matter of praises.

And 1. Study the infinite excellency of God in himself; of which, though we know little, yet this we know, and should consider it, that it is far beyond what all the creatures and all his works are able to testify of him; that he transcends all we can speak, or hear, or know of him. 2. Look on him in his works. Can we behold the vast heavens above, or the firm earth beneath us, or all the variety of his works in both, without holy wonder excited in us, and that stirring us up to sing praises? Oh, his greatness, and might, and wisdom shining in these! Lord, how manifest are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all. Psalm civ. 24. But above all, that work, that marvel of his works, the sending of his Son forth of his bosom. This is the mystery which the apostles do so much magnify in their writings, which is so much magnified in this epistle, and which forms the chief incentive to the ascription of praise with which it closes. This praise looks particularly back to the style in the prayer, The God of all grace, who hath called us to his eternal glory by Jesus Christ. So many other mercies are not to be forgotten, but chiefly is he to be praised for that choicest of mercies. To his glory, who hath called us to his glory. Then, look through the work of saving his chosen, so redeemed by the blood of his Son. His maintaining his own work in them against all surrounding enemies and oppositions, the advancing of it in the midst of them, and even by means of those oppositions, and bringing them safe to glory; that perfecting and establishment, as in the foregoing words. It is this which so affects the apostle in the very entry of this epistle, that there he must break forth into praise: Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, chap. i. 3. He begins there in praise, and here he ends in it, and so encloses all within that divine circle. And as we should consider these things in general, so should we also reflect on his particular dealing with us, his good providence both in spirituals and temporals. Would we search, oh, what a surcharge of innumerable mercies should each of us find! And were we better acquainted with the holy Scriptures, had we more our delight in them, they would acquaint us better with all these things, and give us light to see them, and warm our hearts, and excite them to his praises, who is the God of all our mercies.

Direct. III. The heart being somewhat disposed to praise, and then studying the matter of it, should be applied actually to render praise. And in order to this, we must be careful, 1. To aim at God in all, which is continued praise; to eye his glory in everything, and chiefly to desire that, as our great end, that his name may be exalted. This is the excellent way indeed. Whereas most are either wholly for their self-ends, or often squinting out to them. That soul is most noble, which singly and fixedly aims at exalting God, and seeks to have this stamp on all it speaks and does, and desires: All to the greater glory of my God. 2. To abound in the express and solemn return of praise this way. To him be glory, not a customary dead saying of it over, as is usual with us, but the heart offering it up. What is so pure and high as this exercise, the praises of ever-glorious Deity? What is heaven but these? And were it not best, as we can, to begin it here, and long to be there, where it shall never end? To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

VER. 12. By Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you (as I suppose), I have written briefly, exhorting, and testifying that this is the true grace of God where-in ye stand.

VER. 13. The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus, my son.

VER. 14. Greet ye one another with a kiss of charity. Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus. Amen.

This is a kind of postscript, and contains a testimony of the bearer, and the apostolic form of saluting. Withal, the apostle expresses the measure of his writing, that it was brief, and the end of it, that it was to testify the true grace of God. And this is, indeed, the end of our preaching, and we ought each to seek it by the word, and by mutual exhortations; and sometimes a few words may avail much to this purpose, to our hearty establishment in the faith. And not only are we to believe, but to remember that we have the best of it; that there is truth in our hopes, and they shall not deceive us. They are no fancy, as the world thinks, but the true grace of God; yea, when all things else shall vanish, their truth shall most appear in their full accomplishment.

The entertainment and increase of Christian love, of due esteem one of another, and affection one to another, is no matter of empty compliment, but is the very stamp and badge of Jesus Christ upon his followers; it is, therefore, most carefully to be preserved entire, and unhappy are they that do by any means willingly break it. Oh, let us beware of doing so, and follow peace, even when it seems to fly from us!

This peace that is the portion of those in Christ, is indeed within them, and with God. But through him, it is likewise one with another, and in that notion it is to be desired and wished jointly with the other.

They that are in Christ are the only children and heirs of true peace. Others may dream of it, and have a false peace for a time, and wicked men may wish it to themselves and one another; but it is a most vain hope, and will come to naught. But to wish it to them that are in Christ hath good ground; for all solid peace is founded on him, and flows from him. Now, the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your hearts and minds, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

MEDITATIONS,

CRITICAL AND PRACTICAL,

ON PSALMS IV., XXXII., AND CXXX.

TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN OF ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON, BY THE REV. DR. PHILIP DODDRIDGE, MEDITATIONS ON PSALM IV.

TITLE, To the chief Musician on Neginoth, a Psalm of David.

MANY of the calamities of good men look like miseries, which yet, on the whole, appear to have conduced greatly to their happiness; witness the many prayers which they poured out in those calamities, the many seasonable and shining deliverances which succeeded them, and the many hymns of praise they sang to God their deliverer; so that they seem to have been cast into the fire on purpose that the odor of their graces might diffuse itself abroad.

The seventy Greek interpreters seem to have read the word which we render to the chief musician, something different from the reading of our present Hebrew copy, i. e. Lemenetz, instead of Lemenetzoth; and therefore they render it, εις τελος, as the Latin does, in finem, to the end. Whence the Greek and Latin fathers imagined, that all the psalms which bear this inscription refer to the Messiah, the great end and the accomplishment of all things; a sentiment which was rather pious than judicious, and led them often to wrest several passages in the psalms by violent and unnatural glosses. Yet I would not morosely reject all interpretations of that kind, seeing the apostles themselves apply to Christ many passages out of the psalms and other books of the Old Testament, which, if we had not been assured of it by their authority, we should hardly have imagined to have had any reference to him. Nor is it probable that they enumerated all the predictions of the Messiah which are to be found in the prophetic writings, but only a very small part of them, while they often assure us that all the sacred writers principally centre in him. And it is certain the passage out of this psalm, which Austin, and some others, suppose to refer to Christ, may be applied to him without any force upon the expression: O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory *into shame? And what follows they explain with the same reference: Know that the Lord has in a wonderful manner separated his Holy One unto himself. Others, however, render the title in a different manner (Victori) to the conqueror. Moderns translate it praecentori, or praefecto musicae, to the chief musician, or him who presided over the band of musicians, which after all seems the most natural interpretation. The word Neginoth, which is sometimes rendered stringed instruments, did no doubt signify instruments of music which were struck to give their sound, as Nehiloth, in the title of Psalm v. seems, though not without some little irregularity in the etymology, to signify instruments of wind music. The psalm was written by David, as a summary of the prayer he had poured out before God, when some exceeding great affliction seemed to besiege him on every side, whether it was the persecution of Saul, or the conspiracy of Absalom his son.

VER. 1. Hear me when I call, O God of my righteousness! Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress, have mercy upon me and hear my prayer.

Hear me.] Behold the sanctuary to which this good man betook himself, in all the afflictions of his life; a sanctuary which therefore he sets off, by accumulating a variety of expressive titles all to the same purpose, Psalm xviii. 1: My rock, my fortress, my strength, my deliverer, my buckler, &c. He is indeed a place of refuge to his children; and therefore, as Solomon expresses it, Prov. xiv. 26, In the fear of the Lord is a strong confidence. There seems something of an enigma in that expression—confidence in fear, yet the thing itself is most true. And again, Prov. xviii. 10, The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe. And they who know not this Refuge are miserable; and when any danger arises, they run hither and thither, as Anto-ninus beautifully expresses it, μνιάων ἐπιτορευων διαδρομαίς, "They fly and flutter they know not whither." The life of man upon earth is a warfare; and it is much better, in the midst of enemies and dangers, to be acquainted with one fortress than with many inns. He that knows how to pray, may be pressed, but can not be overwhelmed.*

* They read it gravi corde, as expressive of the stupidity of heart which the rejecting of Christ and his gospel manifests.

Hear me, O Lord, hear my prayer.] He did not think it enough to have said this once, but he redoubled it. He who prays indeed, is seriously engaged in the matter; and not only seriously, but vehemently too, and urges the address, because he himself is urged by his necessities and difficulties, and the ardent motion of his own desire and affection. And let it be observed, that these are the only prayers that mount on high, and offer a kind of grateful violence to Heaven. Nor does the Divine goodness grant anything with greater readiness and delight, than the blessings which seem, if I may be allowed the expression, to be forced out and extorted by the most fervent prayer. So that Tertullian used to say, that "when we pray eagerly, we do as it were combine in a resolute band, and lay siege to God himself."† These are the perpetual sacrifices in the temple of God (θυσίαι λογικαί), rational victims; prayers and intermingled vows, flowing from an upright and pure heart. But he who presents his petitions coldly seems to bespeak a denial: for is it to be wondered at, that we do not prevail on God to hear our prayers, when we hardly hear them ourselves while we offer them? How can we suppose that such devotions should penetrate heaven, or ascend up to it? How should they ascend, when they do not so much as go forth from our own bosoms, but, like wretched abortives, die in the very birth! But why do I say that they do not go out from the inward recesses of our bosoms! Alas! they are only formed on the surface of our lips, and they expire there, quite different from what Homer ascribes to his wise and eloquent Ulysses, when he says,

Ὅσα τε μέγαν ἐκ σ' θεός ἴει.

Forth from his breast he poured a mighty cry.

Thou God of my righteousness.] q. d. O God, who art righteous thyself, and art the patron of my righteousness, of my righteous cause and of my righteous life. For it is necessary that both should concur, if we desire to address our prayers to God with any confidence; not that, depending upon this righteousness, we should seek the Divine aid and favor as a matter of just debt; for then, as the apostle argues, it were no more of grace. Rom. xi. 6. Our prophet is certainly very far from boasting of his merits; for here he so mentions his righteousness, as at the same time to cast himself upon the Divine mercy; Have mercy upon me, exercise thy propitious clemency toward me. And this is indeed the genuine temper of one who truly prays with sincerity and humility. For polluted hands are an abomination to the Lord, and he hates the heart that is puffed up; he beholds the proud afar off, as the celebrated parable of the Pharisee and publican, Luke xviii., is (you know) intended to teach us. Thou art not a God that hast pleasure in wickedness. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me. But the righteous Lord loveth righteousness, and his countenance beholds the upright. Whereas the words of the wicked, when he prays, are but as a fan, or as a bellows, to blow up the Divine displeasure into a flame; for how can he appease God who does not at all please him, or how can he please who is indeed himself displeased with God, and who utterly disregards his pure laws, and that holiness which is so dear to him?

* Premi potest, non potest opprimi.

† Precantes veluti stipato agmine Deum obsidere.

Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress.] I have often experienced both the riches of thy bounty, and the power of thy hand; and I derive confidence thence, because thou art immutable, and canst never be wearied by rescuing thy servants from the dangers that surround them. The examples we have heard of Divine aid granted to others in their distress should animate us; as David recollected, Psalm xxii. 4: Our fathers trusted in thee, they trusted in thee, and thou didst deliver them. But our own personal experiences are later and nearer, and he who treasures them up in his memory, not only thereby expresses his gratitude to God, but wisely consults his own interest; for he enjoys all those benefits of the Divine favor twice, or rather as often as he needs and pleases to renew the enjoyment of them; and he not only supports his faith in new dangers, by surveying God's former interpositions, but by laying them open before God in humble prayer, he more earnestly implores, and more effectually obtains new ones. By a secret kind of magnetism, he draws one benefit by another; he calls out, and as it were allures the Divine favor by itself.

Thou hast enlarged me.] The redeemed of the Lord may especially say so, in reference to that grand and principal deliverance by which they are snatched from the borders of hell, from the jaws of eternal death. The remembrance of so great salvation may well excite songs of perpetual praise, to be ascribed Deo liberatori, to God the deliverer; and by this deliverance, so much more illustrious than any of the rest, they may be encouraged in the confidence of faith, to urge and hope for the aids of his saving arm in every other exigence.

One thing more may be observed here, but it is so very obvious that I shall only just mention it, as what needs not be much inculcated, That he who has not been accustomed to prayer when the pleasant gales of prosperity have been breathing upon him, will have little skill and confidence in applying himself to it, when the storms of adversity arise ; as Xenophon well observed in the person of Cyrus.*

VER. 2. O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into shame? How long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? Selah.

JUSTLY may we admire the force and the speed with which prayer flies up to heaven, and brings down answers thence, ἅμα ἔπος ἅμα ἔργον, no sooner said than done ; if not as to the accomplishment of the thing itself, which perhaps may be more opportune in some future hour, yet, at least, in clear, firm hope, and strong confidence, sent from above into a praying soul. Prayer soars above the violence and impiety of men, and with a swift wing commits itself to Heaven, with happy omen, if I may allude to what the learned tell us of the augury of the ancients, which I shall not minutely discuss. fervent prayers stretch forth a strong, wide-extended wing, and while the birds of night hover beneath, they mount aloft and point out, as it were, the proper seats to which we should aspire. For certainly there is nothing that cuts the air so swiftly, nothing that takes so sublime, so happy, and so auspicious a flight as prayer, which bears the soul on its pinions, and leaves far behind all the dangers, and even the delights of this low world of ours. Behold this holy man, who just before was crying to God in the midst of distress, and with urgent importunity entreating that he might be heard, now, as if he were already possessed of all he had asked, taking upon him boldly to rebuke his enemies, how highly soever they were exalted, and how potent soever they might be even in the royal palace.

O ye sons of men.] The Hebrew phrase here used, Bene Isch, properly speaking, signifies noble men and great men, as persons of plebeian rank are called Bene Adam: † q. d. Whoever you are, and however illustrious by birth, or inflated with pride, or perhaps formidable on both accounts, your greatness is false, and when it is most blown up, is most likely to burst. That is a sound and stable degree of honor to which God has destined his servants, whom you insult and deride. The height of your honor and vanishing glory, from the exaltation of which you look down upon me, will, if you desire I should speak the truth, only render your future fall more grievous and fatal, which he whose destruction you seek with such insatiable rage, sees indeed, but does not wish ; nay, he rather wishes that this misery may be averted from you, and that by a return to the exercise of your right mind, it may be totally prevented : and therefore he gives you this admonition, lest, while you are deriding him, unexpected destruction should come upon you, and your laughter should prove of the Sardonic kind, which nothing can quiet till it end in death. You have indeed great strength and deep counsel, but these things are only the blandishments of your ruin, and the splendid prelude to that misery which is hovering over you. You have spent time enough, and, alas ! how much more than enough, in giving chase to such vanities ; at last regard the man who, in the most disinterested manner, admonishes you of the most important truths.

How long will ye turn my glory into shame.] The Septuagint appears to have read these words something different from our copies, but the sense is nevertheless much the same ;* and though the psalmist, in the affair which he had in view, speaks only of a few, the words themselves have such an expressive dignity, and are in truth so unhappily extensive, that without doing any the least violence to them, they may be considered as an admonition to all mankind. O ye sons of men, how long will ye love vanity and lies ? For, indeed, what are all those things which we foolish mortals pursue with such contention and ardor of spirit, but as an ancient expresses it, “ trifles that are like but the shadow of smoke ?” † But we are to speak of this hereafter. In the mean time, let us attend to the words before us, How long will ye turn my glory into shame ? The things which are the brightest ornaments of human nature, and which alone constitute its very glory, are holiness, piety, and faith ; and these are treated as if they were the most despicable and ignominious things in the whole world. Among Christians, or those who are called by that name, it is the greatest of all scandal to be a Christian indeed. We have long since lost the true names of things ; candid simplicity of manners is despised as rusticity ; lively religion is called the delirious dream of superstitious notions ; and gentleness, dulness, and stupidity : while pride has usurped the name of magnanimity, and craft that of wisdom. Thus we turn true glory into shame, and shame into glory. And because few are able to discern what tends to their eternal happiness, they squander away the whole day of this short life in pursuing and catching at the false and fictitious forms of it ; yea, they seek a lie, lying vanity. And they who heap up riches seem to be wise both to themselves and others ; but oh, how far from it, and with how base a lie do they impose upon themselves ! For these riches are spent upon gratifying their palate, and ministering in other respects to their luxury. Into how foul a gulf do they throw what they have labored so eagerly to gain ! Or if they hoard up their wealth, how soon do they pass over

* Παρά τῶν θεῶν πρακτικώτερος ἂν εἴη. ὡς περ καὶ παρ ἀνθρώπων, ὡς μὴ, ἢ πότε ἐν ἀποροῖς εἴη, τότε κολακέου ἀλλ' ὅτε πράττει, τότε μάλοσα τὸν θεῶν μέννται.

† Accordingly, the Latin renders it, not filiū hominum, but filiū virorum.

* They render it ὡς ποτε βαρυσκάρδιοι, “ How long are ye slow of heart.” And the Latins, Usque quo gravi corde. Instead of Kebudi lekelesseh, they read Kebudi leklessi.

† Φλόδες ἅπαντα καὶ καρποῦ σκία.

the property to their heirs! Men hunt after fame and vain glory, and, when they seem to have caught it, feed upon air, and become the slaves of all, even the meanest, for a thing of naught. And as for pleasure, who is so senseless as not to know how deceitful a lie it proves at last? It drives men into a weak phrensy, to run after the most trifling objects of pursuit, which fly from them like bees, who, if they are taken, yield but a drop of honey, and repay the spoil of it with a painful sting; a sting which, alas, reaches the very heart. Religion is a high sublime thing, royal, unconquerable, unwearied; but pleasure is low, servile, weak, and withering. Religion is neither attended by sickly disgust in the enjoyment, nor by bitter repentance in the reflection; but what the world calls pleasure is attended by both. Hear, my young friend, hear the Divine voice of celestial wisdom calling you with fervent affection and a loud cry, from the trackless ways of error and precipices of misery. How long, does she say, how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? He that seeks me, shall not be wearied in running hither and thither, but shall find me sitting at his door and waiting admittance; and he who finds me needs seek nothing else, unless he be one whom a life of real happiness can not satisfy. Oh, that the indefatigable labor and industry with which men pursue flattering and uncertain enjoyments may stir up your minds to exert at least an equal diligence in this sublime and most blessed pursuit! For if, as St. Chrysostom speaks, it may seem indecent for me to press you further to such an attachment to these objects as they require, it will be a lovely thing to give it without further solicitation. But to proceed,

How long will you love vanity, and seek after leasing.] Can any one deny that this is the character of almost everything that is to be found in human life? Should a man proclaim this in every company with a loud voice, he would soon pass for a lunatic; but certainly, he might reproach them with the general madness which reigns among mankind, not only among the vulgar that he meets with in the streets, but the philosophers disputing in the school, the counsellors pleading in our courts of judicature, yea, the senators and nobles that sit in the most august assembly. And oh, how happy are they, of whatever order, whom the hand of God draws out of the crowd, and turns their minds from these various lying and transitory vanities, to the pursuit of true and lasting good! Happy they whom he, by a wonderful interposition of grace in their favor, sets apart as dear to himself. Which leads to the 3d verse.

VER. 3. But know, that the Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself: the Lord will hear me when I call unto him.

THE prophet hath this great support both of his faith and of his kingdom, the immutable and unshaken decree of the supreme and universal king, and it is the firm establishment of David's infinitely greater Son in his throne and kingdom, I will declare the decree. Psalm ii. 7. In this verse, and there, we may most properly understand it of both; more immediately of David as the type, but chiefly, and in its consummate sense, as referring to Christ the Lord, and having its full end and accomplishment in his endless and eternal kingdom. He is, by way of eminence, God's holy one, holy, and harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners. And those, whoever they are, who endeavor to oppose themselves to the Divine purposes, betray the most desperate madness, and on whatever strength or counsel they depend in the enterprise, like waves dashed against the solid rock, they shall be broken in pieces, by what they vainly attempt to break. And on this basis does the whole safety of the whole church rest, and that of all God's saints, of all those whom he sets apart for himself, and (as the form of the original here has been thought to imply) wonderfully separates, as his peculiar people and treasure, the sacred charge of Christ the great shepherd and bishop of souls, which all the powers of earth and the gates of hell shall in vain attempt to wrest from him. And this is the confidence on which believers should repose themselves. They never trust to themselves or their own strength or virtues, but they often redouble that cry, Thou, Lord, art my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer. Psalm xviii. 2. And Psalm xxxiv. 8, Blessed, O Lord, is the man who trusteth in thee, who must previously and necessarily despair first of himself, as considered in himself alone, as the great apostle says, When I am weak, then am I strongest of all, 2 Cor. xii. 10; according to that lively and just expression, "Faith which is endangered in security, in secure in danger."*

The psalmist adds, The Lord will hear me when I call. From the Divine decree and favor, he promises not to himself an entire freedom from all and every attempt of his enemies, but assures himself that God will be present in the midst of his calamities, present and propitious; not to the indolent and drowsy soul, but to that which solicits his assistance by prayer. And this is the determination of every godly man, whom the Lord has set apart for himself, that he will call upon God without ceasing, and that if any unusual difficulty arise, he will call upon him more fervently. Hence it appears, how entirely all our safety depends upon prayer. Yet, all our prayers, and those of the whole church, are sustained by those prayers of our great king and priest; as Augustine says in reference to that known story in the Evangelists, Because the waves rise, the ship may be tossed, but because Christ prays, it can not be sunk.†

* Fides quæ in securitate periclitatur, in periculis secura est.

† Quia insurgunt fluctus, potest turbari navicula, sed quia Christus orat, non potest mergi.

VER. 4. Stand in awe and sin not : commune with your own heart on your bed, and be still. Selah.

OH most friendly counsel which is here offered to enemies! This is indeed overcoming hatred and injury with the very best of favors; by far the most noble kind of victory. A sublime and heavenly mind, like the upper region of the world, is not only itself always calm and serene, as being inaccessible to every breath of injury and turbulent impression, but it also continually sheds down its benign influences without distinction on all below it, on the evil and the good, the just and the unjust. Stand in awe: the Hebrew and Greek have it, be ye moved; and as this emotion may arise either from anger, fear, or any other affection of the mind, the Septuagint renders it, be angry and sin not, a maxim which St. Paul finding to his purpose, inserts in his epistle to the Ephesians, ch. iv. 26. Nevertheless, the author of this psalm here seems apparently to demand their fear rather than their anger; and accordingly, the Targum explains it, fear him. i. e. God, and sin not: Kimchi—fear the Lord who has chosen me king, and Abenezra—fear God and despise not my glory, for that great king will require the derision at the hand of the deriders.

The passions are the inmost wheels of this machine which we call man, whose motions all the rest of the life follows, and all the errors of this career of ours proceed from their irregularity. Of so great importance is it that every one rightly determine what he should desire, and hope, and fear. And from the time that man lost the ingenuousness of his disposition, and became like a wild ass-colt, the use of fear is become very great. It is true that they who are born again, and who really are the sons of God, are especially led by the sweet and noble energy of this Divine principle, and therefore it is the saying of the beloved apostle, that perfect love, or charity, casteth out fear. 1 John iv. 18. But as the generality of mankind are either entirely destitute of this Divine love, or possess it only in a very low and imperfect degree, so it is certain, that with regard to him whose heart is most entirely fired with this celestial flame, we may understand the words as signifying, that in such a one this great and fervent love does indeed cast out all despairings and diffident fears, but not that of a pious and reverential awe. Alas! most of us, under the pretence of avoiding a servile terror, perversely shake off the bonds of holy and ingenuous fear, and become obstinate and self-willed; whereas, when we look into the word of God we shall find the holiest men there tremble in the Divine presence, and sometimes acknowledge even greater horror of mind. My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments. Psalm cxix. 120. Destruction from God was a terror to me, and because of his excellency I could not endure. Job xxxi. 23. In this sense, as David declares, The fear of the Lord is clean, and endureth for ever, Psalm xix. 9, endures in the most happy agreement with perfect love. Nor is it to remain only in spirits that inhabit flesh, but in all the angelic choirs, pure and happy as they are. Nay, the profound reverence of that eternal and tremendous majesty flourishes and reigns most of all there; for in proportion to the degree in which the knowledge is clearer, and vision more distinct, are the veneration and the fear more deep and humble. How reasonable then must it be, that mortal men, beset with sore temptations and dangers, should, as Hezekiah expresseth it, walk softly and tremble before that infinite Majesty, at whose voice the earth is shaken, and at whose rebuke the pillars of heaven are moved. With great propriety did one of the ancients say, "Fear is the first swaddling band of new-born wisdom,"* or, as the Scripture expresses it, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. It is observed that the original word there made use of, signifies both the beginning and the top; and in both senses it is most true. The author just mentioned admirably says, "Do they call such a one unlearned? It is the only wisdom I know, to fear God; it is the beginning of wisdom and the end of all discourse, as Solomon describes it: it is indeed the τὸ πᾶν the whole matter, the whole concern of man, and it is all in all—fear God."† And elsewhere he adds, "This fear is most salutary to men, but at the same time most rare, superlatively so."‡ And once more, "It is," says he, "the greatest of all good things, to fear God; and the ungodly, in falling from it, shall not be permitted long to continue in the abuse of his own folly."|| Well, therefore, is it here added, sin not. This fear is the water of the sanctuary, to quench all the flames of concupiscence. This, says Bernard, is the arrow that strikes through all the desires of the flesh. Hence arose Abraham's fear and apprehension among strangers: Surely, says he, the fear of God is not in this place. Gen. xx. 11.

But in order to produce this fear, it is necessary that we should have right conceptions of God; that nothing impure can please him, because he is holiness itself; that nothing secret can be concealed from him, because he is light; nor can any sinner surely be mad enough to hope he shall escape the long hand of this righteous Judge and supreme King, whose power is immense, and who can not be a respector of persons. What evil, then,

* Ὁ φόβος πρῶτον τῆς σοφίας σπάργανον. GREG. NAZ.

† Ἀπειθεύον ἄνομοι; μίαν σοφίαν οἶδια, τὸ φοβεῖσθαι Θεὸν· ἀρχὴ τε γὰρ σοφίας, φόβος Κυρίου· καὶ τέλος λόγον, τὸ πᾶν ἄκουε, ἔφη Σολομών, τον Θεὸν φοβοῦ.—GREG. NAZ. OR. 28.

‡ Φόβος δι' Θεοῦ, ἀνθρώπων σωτήριος, σπάνιος δὲ, σπανιώτατος.

|| Ἀγαθὸν μὴ μέγιστον εὐλαβεῖσθαι Θεὸν ὅτι ἀσεβῆς ἔκπεσόν σὺ πολλὸν χρόνον τῇ ἑαυτοῦ μορῇ καταχρήσεται.

can escape with impunity? Thou, O Lord, thou only art to be feared, and who can stand before thee when once thou art angry? Psalm lxxvi. 7.

Commune with your own heart.] Or, as some render it, examine yourselves. Oh, how few do this! Men live abroad, and are indeed strangers at home: the great mark of human madness, to delight in speaking and hearing of what concerns others, “While no individual will attempt to descend into himself.”* Yet this faculty, which we call reflection, is the peculiar privilege of human nature; and to be borne on wholly by external objects, is indeed brutal. And oh, what heaps of disorder, what odious filthiness must there necessarily be in a breast which is never looked into and cleansed out! Dear youths, if, amid all your other studies, you do not learn to converse and commune with your own selves, whatever you know, or rather, whatever you imagine you know, I would not purchase it at the expense of a straw.

On your bed.] Or, as some would render it, in your secret chambers, when free from the noise of the world, and hurries of their daily business. An ancient said, “The reflections of the night are deepest.”† And it has been observed, that David, in the nineteenth Psalm, ascribes speech to the day, and wisdom to the silent night. It is an excellent advice of Pythagoras, and the verses that contain it do indeed deserve to be called golden, that “We should not allow ourselves to go to sleep, till we have seriously revolved the actions of the day, and asked ourselves, ‘What have I done amiss? What good have I done, or neglected to do?’ that so we may reprove ourselves for what has been wrong, and take the comfort of what has been as it ought.”‡

And be still.] This refers not so much to the tongue, as to the mind: for what does an external silence signify, if the inward affections be turbulent? A sedate and composed mind is necessary in order to know ourselves and to know God, as it is hinted in Psalm xlvi. Be still and know that I am God. Such wisdom both deserves and demands a vacant soul: it will not, as it were, thrust itself into a corner, nor inhabit a polluted or unquiet breast. God was not in the whirlwind, nor in the fire, but in the still small voice. 1 Kings xix. 12. The Holy Spirit is peaceful and pacific, but wicked men are turbulent and stormy, driven like the sea, whose waves are tossed about, and throw up continually mire and dirt. Impurity is the inseparable attendant of this inquietude: but the wisdom that is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, ἀγνή, εἰρα εἰσυχνη, pacific, James iii. 17; and in that blessed country to which it teaches us to aspire, there is the most perfect and everlasting cohabitation of purity and peace.

VER. 5. Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, and put your trust in the Lord.

THE mind of man is earthly, I say, οἶος νῦν βροτοὶ εἶσι: as mortals now are entangled in the folds of flesh and sense, it knows not how to rise to things celestial and divine: and when it is stimulated with some sense of the eternal Deity, and the worship due to him, it generally slides into some lighter offices and external rites, how carelessly soever performed, and there it rests. But God is a spirit, and requires to be worshipped in spirit and in truth. And the solemn visible sacrifices, when instituted by the command of him the great Invisible, are to be presented by every pious person with all humble and obedient regard; yet, the chief labor is to be employed on the pure, sublime worship and obedience of the mind. The heathen philosophers objected to the primitive Christians, that they did not sacrifice; to which some of the early apologists reply thus: “The Former and Parent of the whole universe has no need of incense and of blood. The greatest sacrifice we can present to him, is to know who has stretched out the heavens, who has laid the foundations of the earth, who has gathered the waters into the hollow of the sea, and divided the light from the darkness, who has formed the whole animal world and the human species, and who governs them all by his nod; and acknowledging him such an immense and omnipotent being, to lift up pure and holy hands to him.”* And the truth of this sentiment has generally prevailed throughout all ages: even in the Jewish church, while the obligation to sacrifice did yet continue, with all the laborious institution of external worship, holiness, and righteousness, and integrity of heart and life, were acknowledged to be the most essential parts of religion, though, alas! while all confessed it in words, there were very few that set themselves seriously to perform it. Hence arose the necessity of inculcating this lesson so frequently, Psalm l., Isaiah i., xxix., &c.

* Athenagoras.

* Ut nemo in sese tentat descendere, nemo.

† Βαθυτέραι γὰρ νυκτος ὄψεις.

‡ The original, with Mr. Rowe’s translation and paraphrase, is as follows:—

Μὴ δ’ ὕπνον μαλακοῦσιν ἐπ’ ὀμμασι προσέδεσθαι,

Περὶ τῶν ἡμερῶν ἔργων τρίς ἕκαστον ἐπεθεῖν.

Πῆ παρῆβην; τί δ’ ἔρεξα; τί μοι ὄσον οὐκ ἐπέδεσθαι;

Δρῆζόμενος δ’ ἀπο πρωτοῦ ἐπέβην καὶ μετέπειτα,

Δεινὰ μὲν ἐκπρήξας, ἐπιπλήροσθε χρυσά ὄρα, ἴερπον.

“Let not the stealing god of sleep surprise,

Nor creep in slumbers on thy weary eyes,

Ere every action of the former day

Strictly thou dost and righteously survey.

With reverence at thy own tribunal stand,

And answer justly to thy own demand,

Where have I been? In what have I transgressed?

What good or ill has this day’s life expressed?

Where have I failed in what I ought to do?

In what to God, to man, or to myself I owe?

Inquire severe, whate’er from first to last,

From morning’s dawn till evening’s gloom has past.

If evil were thy deeds, repenting mourn,

And let thy soul with strong remorse be torn.

If good, the good with peace of mind repay,

And to thy secret self with pleasure say,

‘Rejoice, my heart, for all went well to-day.’”

And what is there taught at large, is here hinted in this short clause. Since the temple has been demolished, and the priests with their sacrifices have ceased, the Jews themselves have instituted, in the place of this, the offering of the lip, with the commemoration only of ancient sacrifice, persuaded that this would be equally effectual, and have appointed three daily lessons, calling him who diligently recites them, a son of eternal life.

Offer the sacrifices of righteousness.] It is no improbable conjecture of some commentators, that David here refers to the confidence and boast of some of Saul's courtiers in those sacrifices and that solemn worship from which their envy had perhaps banished him. It is certainly much easier to sacrifice a ram or a bullock, than to slay anger or ambition; easier, indeed, to heap up whole hecatombs of animals, than to resign one brutal affection or concupiscence; yea, easier to present all our goods, than ourselves as living sacrifices, though that is undoubtedly our reasonable service. The Mosaic sacrifices, though instituted by God, borrowed all their value from that Evening Victim which was to be slain in the end of the world, who was himself the sacrifice and the altar, and the one only High Priest, after the order of Melchizedec; who yet instituted a perpetual succession of those who should be a royal priesthood, the whole series of which priests, in their succeeding generations, are daily offering to God, the Father of spirits, the pure and spiritual sacrifice of righteousness, most acceptable to him, as passing through the hand of that great High Priest, who incessantly ministers in that high and holy sanctuary. As Bernard excellently speaks,* "Nothing, Lord, that is thine can suffice me without thyself, nor can anything that is mine without myself, be pleasing to thee." And St. Augustine,† "Let thy fire entirely consume me, so that nothing of me may remain to myself." And this one holocaust comprehends all the sacrifices of righteousness; the understanding, the love, all the affections and faculties of the soul, and organs of our bodies: all our words, actions, and thoughts, prayers and vows, hymns and thanksgivings, piety, modesty, charity, and the whole choir of virtues, exercised in a diligent and harmonious observance of all his precepts. These are victims and perfumes of incense worthy so pure a Deity, who eats not the flesh of bulls, nor drinks the blood of goats; who, if he were hungry, would not ask us, since all the beasts of the forest are his, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. Offer unto God thanksgiving, and pay thy vows unto the Most High. For he that offereth praise glorifies him, and to him that orders his conversation aright, will he show the salvation of God.

* Nec mihi tua sufficiunt sine te, nec tibi placet mea sine me.

† Totum me consumat ignis tuus, nihil mei remaneat mihi.

Even the heathen philosophers and poets saw and taught, that these sacrifices of a pious mind were most fit for a rational worshipper, and must be most fit for God, to whom they are addressed. "Strange indeed would it be," says Socrates, "if the gods should look to the gift and sacrifice, and not the soul." And passages of Horace* and Persius† to this purpose are so well known, that they need not be repeated. The language of the son of Sirach is also agreeable to it, Eccles. xxxv. 1-3: He that keepeth the law, bringeth offerings enough; he that taketh heed to the commandment, offereth a peace-offering. He that requiteth a good turn, offereth fine flour; and he that gives alms, sacrificeth praise. To depart from wickedness is a thing pleasing to the Lord, and to forsake unrighteousness is a propitiation.

And put your trust in the Lord.] This very trust with which the mind reposes itself upon God, is both the great consolation of a good man, and the great sacrifice of piety and righteousness. The faith of Abraham was a sacrifice much dearer to God, not only than the ram which he actually offered, but even than his dearest son whom he had brought to the altar. He was strung in faith, says the apostle, and so he gave glory to God. And again, only they who offer the sacrifice of righteousness can rely upon him with a true and solid confidence. Not that these sacrifices, though the choicest and best of all, can pretend to any merit, but because they are the most genuine signs and most certain seals of a soul in covenant with God. So that there is indeed a mutual signing; God offering the dearest pledges of his favor to us, and we, in like manner, as is most fit, rendering all that we have, and all that we are, to him, with the most humble and grateful heart. And certainly this union and perpetual, undivided friendship, is the true eubouia of the holy soul; that temperature which alone can give it solid tranquillity and felicity, as it follows presently after in this Psalm.

VER. 6. There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.

THE psalmist now returns to himself and his own affairs, and having sufficiently admonished his enemies concerning the true and only good, enforces his exhortation by his example, that if they thought fit, they might follow it (for this is the most efficacious manner of teaching); but if they would not, that he might at least enjoy the benefit of his own counsel, and wrapping himself up in his own happiness, might, from that eminence, look down upon all the vain and wretched pursuits of the mad vulgar. Like drunken men, they

* Immunis aram si tetigit manus;
Non sumptuosâ blandior hostiâ,
Mollibit aversos Penates
Farre pio, et saliente micâ.

† Compositum jus fasque animi, sanctosque recessus Mentis, et incoctum generoso pectus honesto.
Hæc cedo ut admoveam templis, et farre litabo.

reel and stagger from place to place; they often fall down upon their face, and strike and dash themselves against what they desired to embrace. Through all their life, with an unstable pace, they catch at flying forms of good; and after all their falls and their bruises, they cry out again and again, Who will show us any good? And when they behold any new species or shadow of it, they immediately run to it. Nay, perhaps so light and various are they in their pursuit, they return again to that in which they had been frequently deceived, and which they had as often abandoned. Rabbi Solomon paraphrases the words thus: "When Israel saw the nations prosperous, he said, 'Who will show us a like prosperity?' But David says, 'Envy them not; we have a sublimer prosperity in the light of thy Divine countenance.'"—"That is good," says the great philosopher of the schools, "which all pursue." The various affections and desires of the mind are as the pulse and natural respiration; but certain internal principles, which, not inwrought by nature, are afterward received and deeply engraved upon the heart, are the springs of that motion: our different opinions of different things do nevertheless all meet in this—that we would see good. But they who select, from the various objects that present themselves, a suitable, complete, and substantial good, and who, neglecting everything else, bend all their pursuits to that, are the only wise and happy men.

This, the psalmist professes he did, and freely invites all that pleased, to join and take a part with him in these desires and pursuits, well-knowing that the happiness was abundantly sufficient for many, for all that would apply themselves to it, and such as could not at all be diminished by being imparted for it was indeed the αὐτάρκες καλῶν, the self-sufficient and all-sufficient good, which was one of the titles that some of the wiser heathens gave their Jupiter. But he of whom we speak is the living and the true God; nor is there any other good whatsoever adequate to the human mind. And what we say of his infinite sufficiency, is most aptly signified by this adumbration which the psalmist uses,—I say, by the adumbration of light, nor do I think fit to correct it as an incongruous expression, for light is indeed as it were the shadow of God, and that fulness of supreme good which is in him, is in some degree shadowed out by light, which entirely illustrates, with the full stream of its rays, all who behold it, and is not broken into little fragments, to be sparingly distributed to each. Many seek many things; they pursue any good, with uncertain and ignorant desires; but we have fixed upon the one petition we should insist upon, for in this one is all, Lord, lift up the light of thy countenance upon us. Oh rich, grand, and incomparable desire! Without this, all the proudest palaces of monarchs are gloomy caverns, dark as hell, and all the riches of all the earth mere indigence. This is the proper light of the intellectual world, and it puts gladness into the heart, as it follows.

VER. 7. Thou hast put gladness into my heart more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased.

Gladness into my heart.] To which the gross delights of earthly things can not reach: they stick as it were before the threshold. Corn and wine are only the refreshment of these mean, frail, earthly bodies, and the support of this corporeal and terrene life, but have nothing συγγενής, congenial with, and a-kin to the heaven-born spirit. It is said indeed that bread strengtheneth man's heart, and wine makes it glad; but the heart there spoken of, is that which is the spring of animal life and natural spirit: whereas, to that heart which holds the preference in human nature, which may therefore be called the ἡγεμονικῆ, the governing part, there is nothing which gives light and gladness, beneath the eternal father of lights and of spirits. He cherishes the languishing soul with the rays of his love, and satisfies it with the consolations of his Spirit, as with a kind of heavenly nectar or nepenthe, that, while it confides in his safety, lays all its cares and fears asleep, and lulls it into deep peace, and calm, sweet repose; without which, if the mind be a little agitated, no gentle breeze of harmony, no melody of birds or harp, can bring on the pleasing slumber, during which, nevertheless, the heart awakes. Oh, happy man, who betakes his whole soul to God, and does not only choose him above all, but in the place of all, waiting only on him! Happy man, who, having been chosen by him with preventing love, and unmerited benignity, embraces his ample, all-sufficient creator for his inheritance and his wealth, often repeating with sacred transport, Deus meus et omnia! My God and my all! This is the man that has enough; and therefore, to allude to the words of the poet, "he is not disquieted by the raging of the sea, nor any severity of the seasons, whatever stars may rise and set."*

God fixes his gracious dwelling in the pure and holy soul which has learned to despise the vanity of riches, and makes it calm in the midst of hurries, and secure in the deepest solitudes. And not merely to find, but even to seek after God, is better to such a soul, inexpressibly better, than to possess the richest treasure, the most extensive empire, or to have all the variety of sensual pleasures waiting upon its back.

I remember to have read of some military officers, who crossing the Nile, in the same boat with the two Macarii of Egypt, said to them, in allusion to their name, "You are indeed happy, who laugh at the world." "Yes,"

* Neque Tumultuosum sollicitat mare,
Nec sævus Arcturi cadentis Impetus, aut orientis hædi.—HORN., lib. 2, OD. 1.

said they, "it is evident that we are happy, not merely in name, but in reality, but you are unhappy whom the world derides, as poor creatures whom it sees entangled in its snares."

St. Augustine also quotes from Politian, a similar example of a Pretorian soldier, who walking out with his comrade, found in a cottage into which he accidentally came, a book containing the life of the hermit Anthony, and when he had read a little of it, looking upon his friend, said, "At what are we taking so much pains to arrive? What do we seek? For what do we go through the fatigues of a military life? The highest of our hopes at court must be, to share some extraordinary degree of the emperor's favor. And how frail and dangerous a situation is that! And through how many other previous dangers must we pass to it! And how soon will all the advantages we can hope from it be over! But I may this moment, if I please, become the friend and favorite of God." And he had no sooner uttered these words, than they both resolved upon quitting the world, that they might give up all the remainder of their days to religion.

Holy men in former ages did wonders in conquering the world and themselves; but we, unhappy, degenerate, and drowsy creatures as we are, blush to hear that they did what we can not or will not do. We are, indeed, inclined to disbelieve the facts, and rather choose to deny their virtues than to confess our own indolence and cowardice.

MEDITATIONS ON PSALM XXXII.

VER. 1. Blessed is the man whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.

OH, the pure, the overflowing, the incomparably sweet fountain of scripture!

"Hence light we draw, and fill the sacred cup"*— whereas the springs of philosophy in human affairs are not very clear, and in Divine, they are quite turbid and muddy; which one of the greatest orators and philosophers among them all, freely confesses. "I think," says he, "we are not only blind to true wisdom, but are very dull and slow of apprehension even in those things which seem to be discerned and understood."† Nor is this to be wondered at; for there would be little difference between things human and Divine, if the dim eye of our reason were sufficient to discover their secrets. One of the ancients excellently says, "If you examine things ever so accurately, you will never be able to discover them if God keeps them veiled."‡

* Hinc lucem haurire est, et pocula sacra.

† Mihi non modò ad sapientiam cæci videntur, sed ad ea ipsa, quæ aliqua ex parte cerni videntur, hebetes et obtusi.—SENECA.

‡ Ἄλλ' οὐ γὰρ ἀνὰ τὰ θεῖα κρύπτοντος Θεοῦ

Μαθοῖς ἀν' οὐδ' εἰ πάντ' ἐπέλθοις σκοπῶν.—SOPHOCLES.

It would be a vain and ridiculous labor, to light up a great number of lanterns and torches, and go out and look for the sun in the night; but when the appointed hour of the morning comes, he arises, as if of his own accord and freely manifests himself, by his own lustre, to every beholder. The wisest of the heathens undertook to find out the Supreme Being and the supreme good; but wandering through the devious ways of multiplied errors, they could attain to neither. Nor was it the least of their errors, that they sought them as two different things, when it is most certain that both are united in one; for it is the only and ultimate happiness of man, to be united to that first and Supreme being and good, from which he drew his original. But since there has so sad a distance and disagreement arisen between God and man, by our deplorable apostacy from him, there could not be the least hope of attaining that union, did not infinite goodness and mercy propose the full and free pardon of our offences: so that the true determination of this grand question about happiness, is evidently that, blessed and happy is that man whose transgression is forgiven, and whose sin is covered. Innocence was the first means of obtaining happiness, which, being once violated, the only plank that can save us after our shipwreck, is remission and repentance; which two things, the whole Scripture assures us, that the Divine wisdom has so connected, as with an adamant band. And this psalm now before us is a signal declaration of it, which, since it inculcates so grand a topic of religion, κρίσιον δόξαν, may well be styled as it is, Maschil, a lesson of instruction. For, as St. Augustine well observes, "That is instruction indeed, which teaches us that man is not saved by the merits of his works, but by the grace of God."*

Blessed.] Or, O blessed man, or, Oh, the felicities of that man!—to denote the most supreme and perfect blessedness.† He only has attained to complete felicity, whose numerous debts are all remitted, though, far from being able to pay them, he could not so much as reckon them up. And blessed is he that knows it, as the proverb is, "No man is happy but he who thinks himself so."‡

The man whose iniquity is forgiven.] As the word is nesevi, it might be rendered, Blessed is the man who is eased of the heavy burden of his sin. A burden, indeed, too heavy for the strongest man upon earth; a burden so dreadfully great, that God's angels are not able to stand under it; for many of the chief of them were pressed down to hell by it, and can rise no more. But though no giant on earth or in heaven could bear it, a LAMB subjected himself to it. But it was a

* Quæ intelligitur non meritis operum, sed Dei gratiâ hominem liberari.

† As the Elephant, to denote its vast bulk, is spoken of in the plural number, Behemoth.

‡ Non est beatus qui se non putat.

Lamb without blemish and without spot, burdened with no load of his own sin, nor stained with the least spot of pollution. The Lamb of God, the Son of God, who is himself God, is he, ὁ αἶρων τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου, who takes away all the sins of the world, as one sin: taking the burden upon himself, he bears it and carries it away.

Covered.] That sinners may more clearly apprehend, and more easily and firmly believe a thing which seems so difficult to admit, as the free and full remission of sin, it is painted out by various beautiful expressions and figures in the sacred Scriptures: washing, cleansing, blotting out, scattering like a cloud, entirely forgetting, casting into the bottom of the sea, and here, by that of taking away and covering, and by that phrase which explains both, of not imputing them. And this expression of covering them, is with great propriety added to the former phrase of lightening the sinner of the burden of them, that there may be no fear of their returning again, or coming into sight, since God has not only taken the heavy load from our shoulders, but for ever hidden it from his own eyes, and the veil of mercy has taken it away; that great covering of Divine love, which is large enough to overspread so many and so great offences. Thus it does, as it were, turn away the penetrating eye of his justice, which the most secret inquiry could not elude, did not he himself in pity voluntarily avert it.

But you well know what is our propitiatory, what the covering of the mercy-seat, even Jesus, who was typified by that Caporeth in the Temple, which the Septuagint render ἰασηριον ἐπιθεμα, a propitiatory covering: by which title our great Redeemer is marked out, Rom. iii. 25, as the same Hebrew word, Capfar, signifies both to cover and to expiate.* But that the thing may be more evident and certain, the thought is repeated again in the second verse.

VER. 2. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile.

ABEN-EZRA paraphrases it, Of whose sins God does not think, does not regard them, so as to bring them into judgment, reckoning them as if they were not; οὐ μὴ λογιζεσθαι, does not count or calculate them, or charge them to account; does not require for them the debt of punishment. To us the remission is entirely free, our Sponser having taken upon him the whole business of paying the ransom. His suffering is our impunity, his bond our freedom, and his chastisement our peace; and therefore the prophet says, The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed. Distracted creatures that we are, to indulge in those sins which brought death upon our dear Redeemer, and to be so cold in our affections to that Redeemer who died for those sins!

* It is observed, the Hebrew word Eschol haccopher, which some render a cluster of camphire, Cant. i. 14, may, with a little variation in the reading (i. e. reading it Ish col haccopher), be rendered a man of all kinds of redemption, or of all expiation. So the Targum interprets it by expiation. And by the way, some assert that this psalm used to be sung on the day of expiation.

This weighty sentence, of itself so admirable, Paul renders yet more illustrious, by inserting it into his reasonings on the topic of justification, Rom. iv. 6, as a celebrated testimony of that great article of our faith. "David," says he, "thus describeth the blessedness of that man, saying, Blessed is he whose iniquities are forgiven." So that this is David's opinion concerning true happiness: he says not, Blessed are those who rule over kingdoms, blessed are those generals who are renowned for their martial bravery and success, though he himself had both these titles to boast of. It is not the encomiums of the greatest multitudes, nor the breath of popular applause, nor any other degree of human honor, which entitles a man to this character. It is not said, Blessed is he who ploughs many thousand acres of land, or who has heaped together mountains of gold and silver; nor, Blessed is he who has married a beautiful and rich woman, or (which in his age, or even now in those eastern countries, might be the case), he who was possessed of many such; nor, Blessed is he who understands the secrets of nature, or even the mysteries of religion; but, Oh, happy man whose sins are pardoned, and to whom the Lord does not impute iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile, whose breast is full, not of feigned repentance, but of a fervent love of holiness, and hatred of sin. This makes life happy, nay, absolutely blessed. But alas! when we inculcate these things, we sing to the deaf. The ignorance and folly of mankind will not cease to pronounce the proud and the covetous happy, and those who triumph in successful wickedness, and who, in chase of these lying shadows of happiness, destroy their days, and their years, and their souls.

"Alas," says the wise Roman, "how little do some who thirst most impatiently after glory, know what it is, or where it is to be sought!"* which is equally applicable to that true calm and serenity of mind which indeed all pursue, but yet few are able to attain. But as for us who enjoy the celestial instruction of this sacred volume, if we are ignorant of it, our ignorance is quite inexcusable, obstinate, and affected, since we are wilfully blind in the clearest and most refulgent light. This points out that good which can completely fill all the most extended capacities of the human soul, and which we generally seek for in vain on all sides, catching at it where it is not to be found, but ever neglecting it where alone it is. But is it then possible at once to be solidly and completely happy? You have not merely the ideas of it, but the thing itself, not only clearly pointed out, but most freely offered, with divine munificence; so that if you do not obstinately reject the offer, it must be your own. And this happiness consists in returning to the favor and friendship of God, who most mercifully grants us the free pardon of all our sins, if we do, with unfeigned repentance and a heart free of all guile, not only humbly confess and lament them, but entirely forsake, and with implacable hatred for ever renounce them, ὦ μάκαρ εὐδόμενον τε καὶ ἄβιος. All the names, all the variety of felicities, bliss, and happiness, are accumulated on that man who has known this change of the right hand of the Most High,* on whom this bright day of expiation and pardon has beamed. He easily looks down from on high on all the empty titles and false images of earthly happiness, and when he is bereaved of them all, yea, and beset on every side with what the world calls misfortunes and afflictions, ceases not to be happy. In sorrow he is joyful, in poverty rich, and in chains free: when he seems buried deep, so that not one ray of the sun can reach him, he is surrounded with radiant lustre; when overwhelmed with ignominy, he glories; and in death itself, he lives, he conquers, he triumphs. What can be heavy to that man who is eased of the intolerable burden of sin? How animated was that saying of Luther, "Smite, Lord, smite, for thou hast absolved me from my sins."† Whose anger should he fear who knows that God is propitious to him, that Supreme King, whose wrath is indeed the messenger of death, but the light of his countenance is life; who gladdens by the rays of his favor, and by one smile disperses the darkest cloud, and calms the most turbulent tempest?

* Quam ignorat homines gloriæ cupidi, quæ ea sit, aut quemadmodum petenda.—SENECA.

But we must now observe the complication of a two-fold, in constituting this felicity: for we have two things here connected, as conspiring to make the person spoken of blessed; the free remission of sin, and the inward purification of the heart. In whose spirit there is no guile. This simplicity, ἀρελότης, is a most excellent part of purity, opposed to all wickedness and arts of deceit; and in common speech, that which is simple and has no foreign mixture, is called pure. Pardon presents us as just and innocent before our Judge; and that sanctity is not to be regarded as constituting any part of our justifying righteousness before God, nor as only the condition or sign of our felicity, but is truly and properly a part of it. Purity is the accomplishment of our felicity, begun on earth, and to be consummated in heaven; that purity, I say, which is begun here, and shall there be consummated. But if any one think he can divide these two things, which the hand of God has joined by so inseparable a bond, it is a vain dream. Nay, by attempting to separate these two parts of happiness, he will in fact only exclude himself from the whole. Jesus, our victorious Savior, has snatched us from the jaws of eternal death; but, to be delivered from the cruel tyranny and bonds of sin and to be brought into the blessed liberty of the sons of God, was another essential part of our redemption, and if any one does not embrace this with equal alacrity and delight as the other benefit, he is a wretched slave of the most mean and ignoble spirit, and being equally unworthy of both parts of this stupendous deliverance, he will justly forfeit and lose both. And this is the epidemical Antinomianism of the Christian world, because they who labor under it have nothing but the name of Christians: they gladly hear of the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls, while they are averse to the doctrine of holiness and repentance. It is a disagreeable message, a hard saying, and who can bear it! But oh, the incomparable charms of holiness! It is to be desired, not only for the sake of other benefits which come in its train, but especially for itself: so that he who is not transported with a most ardent love of it, is blind, and deserves to be thrust into the mill, to tread that uncomfortable round, and to grind there; deserves to be a slave for ever, since he knows not how to use liberty when offered to him. Shall the Stoic say, "The servant of philosophy is truly free,"* and shall we scruple to assert the same concerning pure religion, and evangelical holiness? Now this freedom from guile, this fair simplicity, of which the psalmist speaks, is deservedly reckoned among the chief endowments of a pure soul, and is here named instead of all the rest, as nothing is more like to that God who inspects the very heart, in nothing do we so much resemble him; and therefore, it is most agreeable to him, because most like unto him. He is the most simple of all beings, and is indeed truth itself, and therefore, He desires truth in the inward parts, and hates a heart and a heart, as the Hebrew phrase is to express those that are double-hearted. And how much our blessed Redeemer esteems this simplicity, we may learn from the earnestness with which he inculcates it upon his disciples, that they should be simple as doves. Matt. x. 16. We may learn it also from the honorable testimony he bears to this character in Nathanael, when he pronounces him, John i. 47, an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile. And especially from his own perfect example, as it is said of him, 1 Peter ii. 22, He did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. Perhaps the psalmist might the more willingly mention this virtue, as he reflected with penitential distress on this crafty and cruel attempt of covering that adultery which he had committed, with the veil of murder. But

* Alluding to Psalm lxxvii. 10, where the Vulgate renders Seuith, change, mutatio dextræ Excelsi; and several other Versions nearly agree with it.

† Feri, Domine, feri; nam à peccatis absolvisti me.

* Qui philosophiæ inservit, est verè liber.

nowever that was, it is certain that this guileless sincerity of heart holds the first rank in the graces that attend true repentance. It may be sometimes our duty to open our sins to men, by an ingenuous confession; but it is always our duty to do it to God, who promises to cover them only on this condition, that we do sincerely uncover them ourselves. But if we affect that which is his part, he will, to our unspeakable damage, do that which he had assigned to us. If we hide them, he will bring them into open light, and will discuss and examine each with the greater severity: "He," says Ambrose, "who burdens himself, makes his error so much the lighter."* "In proportion to the degree," says Tertullian,† "in which you are unwilling to spare yourself, God will spare you." But what madness is it to attempt to conceal any action from him, from whom, as Thales wisely declares, "you can not so much as conceal a thought?"‡ But not now to insist upon the impossibility of a concealment, a wise man would not wish to cover his wounds and his disease from that physician, from whose skilful hand he might otherwise receive healing; and this is what the psalmist presently after, for our instruction, confesses.

VER. 3. When I kept silence, my bones waxed old, through my roaring all the day long.

WHILE he suppressed the ingenuous voice of confession, the continually increasing weight of his calamity extorted from him a voice of roaring; "While I would not speak as it became a guilty man, I was compelled even to bellow like a beast."|| Nevertheless, this wild roaring did not move the divine compassion, nor atone his displeasure.

VER. 4. For day and night thine hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer.

HITHERTO that voice was wanting, to which the bowels of the Father always echo back, the voice of a son full of reverence, and ready to confess his errors; without which, cries and lamentations in misery are no more regarded in the sight of God, than the howling of dogs, according to that expression of Hosea, vii. 14, They have not cried to me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds. A dog howls when he is hungry, or when he is lashed; but from a son, when he is chastened, acknowledgments of his fault, and deprecations of his father's displeasure, are expected; and when the son thus acknowledges his offence, and entreats for pardon, it is the part of a compassionate father to forgive, and to spare. Nor do we indeed confess our offences to our Father, as if he were

* Allevat errores ille qui se onerat.

† Quantum tibi non peperceris, tantum tibi parcat Deus.

‡ Ὁν οὐ λαμβάνεις οὐδὲ διανούμενος.

|| Dum nolui loqui ut hominem reum decet, mugire coactus sum ut brutum.

not perfectly acquainted with them, but we fly to him who requires we should repent, that he may not show us by punishment, those things which we shun showing to him by confession. "I confessed unto the Lord," says Augustine, "to whom all the abyss of my sin and misery lay open: so that if I did not confess whatever was hidden in my heart, I should not hide myself from him, but him from me."*

Thy hand was heavy upon me.] That hand, which, when pressing, is so heavy, when raising, is so sweet and powerful, Psalm xxxvii. 24, and when scattering its blessings, so full and so ample. Psalm civ. 28; cxlv. 16. He would not at first be humbled by the confession of his iniquity, and therefore he is humbled by the weight of the hand of God. Oh, powerful hand! beyond all comparison more grievous than any other hand to press down, and more powerful to raise up! He who suppresses his sins without confessing them,

Vulnus alit venis, et cæco carpitur igne:
"Conceals an inward wound, and burns with secret fire."

Under the appearance of sparing, he is indeed cruel to himself; when he has drunk down iniquity, and keeps it within, and it is not covered by the Divine forgiveness, it is like a poison which consumes the marrow in the midst of his bones, and dries up the vital moisture. It may perhaps occasion more present pain, to draw out the point of the weapon which sticks in the flesh; but to neglect it, will occasion greater danger and more future torment. Nor will the dart fall out by his running hither and thither, but on the contrary, as the poet expresses it with respect to the wounded deer, it fixes deeper and deeper.*

But the only healing herb that the sinner can find, is true repentance and humble confession; not that which acknowledges sin in a few slight words, when it has hardly looked upon it and known it, but that which proceeds from a previous true and vivid compunction of soul, and is inseparably attended by renovation and purity of heart and life; and so, as comprehending this, it is sometimes put for the whole of repentance. 1 John i. 9. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. And so in the Psalm before us.

VER. 5. I acknowledged my sin unto Thee, and my iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Selah.

TRUE and genuine repentance hath eyes, as it were, on both sides, πρὸς καὶ ὀπίσω βλέπει: it looks back on sins already committed, to

* Et tibi, Domine, cujus oculus nuda abyssus, quid occultum esset in me si non confiterer, non me tibi absconderem, sed te mihi.

† ——— Illa fugâ sylvas saltusque peragrat Dyctæos, hæret læteri lethalis arundo.

ament them: it looks forward, and humbly resolves no more to commit what it has lamented. And each of these is expressed by each of the words by which repentance is signified, μεταμέλεια and μετάνοία; which words are therefore used promiscuously, both by the sacred writers and by others, so that the received difference between them seems to me to have little foundation. For Phavorinus interprets the word μετάνοία, an anguish of soul under the consciousness of having acted a foolish and absurd part; and the Latin has the same signification, if we will admit the judgment of Gellius, who seems to have been a very accurate critic in affairs of that nature. He observes, "We are said to repent of things, whether our own actions, or those of others which have been performed by our advice or instigation, which do afterward displease us, so that we change our judgment concerning them."* But we will wave all further concern about words; the thing itself demands our greatest attention. I entirely agree with him who said, "I had rather feel the inward working of repentance, than know the most accurate description and definition of it."† Yet how averse sinners are to this free though useful and salutary confession of sin, abundantly appears from this example of so great a man as the psalmist, when taken in this unhappy snare; for he confesses that he lay long as senseless and stupid in that quagmire into which he was fallen, and that it was with difficulty that he was as it were racked into a confession, by such exquisite tortures both of body and mind. On the other hand, the gracious readiness of the Father of mercies to grant pardon, is so much the more evident, as on the first word of confession that he uttered, or rather the first purpose that he formed in his mind, immediately the pardon, the full and free pardon, came down signed, as in the court of heaven. I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest. O admirable clemency! It requires nothing but that the offender should plead guilty, and this not that it may more freely punish, but more liberally forgive. He requires that we should condemn ourselves, that so he may absolve us.

VER. 6. For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee, in a time when thou mayest be found: surely, in the floods of great waters, they shall not come nigh unto him.

THIS is the joyful message, this is the great doctrine of the gospel, which opens the first door of hope to sinners; that God is capable of being appeased, yea, that he is actually appeased; that he freely offers peace and favor to those who have deserted him when they return to his obedience; that he runs forth to meet them and to receive them with a most affectionate embrace; and having so importunately entreated our return, will not despise those who are treading back with prayers and tears the fatal path which their folly had chosen. This is what we so frequently read in Scripture, that the Lord is gracious and very merciful, slow to anger, and ready to pardon. If he were not such, who could dare approach him? But seeing he is such a God, who should refuse or delay his return? Surely, every rational and pious mind will, without delay, invoke so gentle and mild a Lord; will pray to him while he is exorable, or, as the Hebrew expresses it, in a time of finding. For he who promises pardon, does not promise to-morrow. There are the tempora findi, certain times in which he may be spoken with, and a certain appointed day of pardon and of grace, which if a man by stupid perverseness despise, or by sloth neglect, surely he is justly overwhelmed with eternal night and misery, and must necessarily perish by the deluge of Divine wrath; since he has contemned and derided that Ark of salvation which was prepared, and in which whoever enters into it shall be safe, while the world is perishing. Though all be one unbounded sea, a sea without shore, yet, as it is here said, the greatest inundation, the floods of deep waters shall not come nigh unto him. This, the psalmist exhorts those that have experienced it, to teach, and determines himself so to retain it with deep attention and firm faith in his own mind, as in the following verse.

* Pœnitere tum dicere solemus, cum quæ ipsi fecimus, aut quæ de nostra voluntate nostroque consilio facta sunt, ea nobis post incipiunt displicere, sententiamque in iis nostram demutamus.

† Malo sentire compunctionem, quam scire ejus definitionem. Thom. à Kempis, l. i., c. 1.

Ver. 7. Thou art my hiding place.] Thou hast been, and wilt ever be so. Thou hast surrounded, and thou wilt surround me, with songs of deliverance; even me who was so surrounded with clamors of sin. Where he further intimates, that songs of praise are perpetually to be offered to God our deliverer. And that these faithful admonitions and counsels may meet with greater attention and regard, he offers himself to us as a most benevolent teacher and leader.

Ver. 8, 9, 10, 11. I will instruct thee, and teach thee in the way in which thou shalt go, &c.] See to it only, that thou be tractable, and dost not with brutal obstinacy and fierceness repel this friendly and wise counsel, as capable of being governed only by violence, like a mule or unbroken horse, which must be held in by bit and bridle. Such indeed are the greatest part of men, whom the philosophers with great severity, but with too much justice, called βουγενῆ ἀνέμφορα, "Wild bulls with human faces."

But it is added, as the sum of all admonition, and the great axiom most worthy of regard, that Many sorrows shall be to the wicked [the Septuagint render it *many are the scourges of the sinner], but mercy shall embrace those that hope in the Lord. And the Psalm concludes with this as the burden of it, Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous, and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart.

* Πολλὰι μαστιγες ἀμαρτωλοῦ.

Truly, my dear friends,* I have nothing further to wish for myself or you, than that we may heartily believe these things; for then it would be impossible that we should not with open arms embrace true religion, and clasp it to our hearts, since nature teaches every one to desire happiness, and to flee from misery. So that Epicurus himself would teach us to lay hold on joy and pleasure, as the τό πρῶτον δίκαιον, or first and proper good. This, therefore, let us lay down as a certain principle, and ever adhere to it, that we may not, like brute beasts, remain in subjection to the flesh; that safety, and joy and all happiness are the property of him who is possessed of virtue, and that all virtue is comprehended in true piety. And let us remember what the prophet adds (according to the Greek translator†), as the necessary consequence of this principle, that to the wicked there can be no joy.

MEDITATIONS ON PSALM CXXX.

VER. 1. Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord.

It is undoubtedly both a useful and a pleasant employment, to observe the emotions of great and heroic minds in great and arduous affairs: but that mind only is truly great, and superior to the whole world, which does in the most placid manner subject itself to God, securely casting all its burdens and cares upon him, in all the uncertain alterations of human affairs, looking at his hand, and fixing its regards upon that alone. Such the royal prophet David declares himself everywhere to have been, and nowhere more evidently than in this Psalm, which seems to have been composed by him. He lifts up his head amid surrounding waves, and directing his face and his voice to Heaven, he says, Out of the depths, O Lord, do I cry unto thee. For so I would render it, as he does not seem to express a past fact, but as the Hebrew idiom imports, a prayer which he was now actually presenting.

Out of the depths.] Being as it were immersed and overwhelmed in an abyss of misery and calamities. It is indeed the native lot of man, to be born to trouble, as it is for the sparks (the children of the coal, as the original expression signifies) to fly upward. Life and grief are congenial;‡ but men who are born again, seem, as in a redoubled proportion, to be twice born to trouble; with so many and so great evils are they as it were laden, beyond all other men, and that to such a degree, that they may seem sometimes to be oppressed with them. And if any think this is strange, surely as the apostle expresses it, he can not see afar off, μωσαίσει; at best, he only looks at the surfaces of things, and can not penetrate far into those depths. For even the philosophers themselves, untaught by Divine revelation, investigated admirable reasons for such dispensations of Providence, and undertook in this respect boldly to plead the cause of God. "God," says the Roman sage, "loves his own people truly, but he loves them severely! As the manner in which fathers express their love to their children is generally very different from that of mothers; they order them to be called up early to their studies and suffer them not to be idle in those days, when their usual business is interrupted, but sometimes put them on laboring till the sweat flows down, and sometimes by their discipline excite their tears: while the mother fondles them in her bosom, keeps them in the shade, and knows not how to consent, that they should weep, or grieve, or labor. God bears the heart of a father to good men, and there is strength rather than tenderness in his love; they are therefore exercised with labors, sorrows, and losses, that they may grow robust; whereas, were they to be fattened by luxurious fare and indulged in indolence, they would not only sink under fatigues, but be burdened with their own unwieldy bulk."* Presently after, he quotes a remarkable saying of Demetrius the Cynic,† to this purpose, "He seems to be the unhappiest of mankind, who has never been exercised with adversity, as he can not have had an opportunity of trying the strength of his mind." To wish to pass life without it, is to be ignorant of one part of nature, so that I may pronounce thee to be miserable, if thou hast never been miserable. If thou hast passed through life without ever struggling with an enemy, no one, not even thou thyself, can know whether thou art able to make any resistance: whereas in afflictions, we experience not so much what our own strength is, as what is the strength of God in us, and what the aid of divine grace is, which often bears us up under them to a surprising degree, and makes us joyful by a happy exit; so that we shall be able to say, My God, my strength, and my deliverer. Thus the church becomes

* Verè suos amat et severè Deus. Multo aliter patres, aliter matres indulgent: illi liberos ad studia obeunda maturè excitari jubent, feriatis quoque diebus non patiuntur otiosos, et sæpe sudorem illis, et interdum lachrymas excutiant: at matres fovere in sinu, in umbra, continere volunt; nunquam flere, nunquam tristari, nunquam laborare. Patrium habet Deus adversus bonos viros animus, et illos fortibus, amat; et operibus, doloribus, ac damnis exagitantur, ut verum colligant robur. Languent per inertiam saginata: nec labore tantum, sed et mole, et ipso sui evenere deficient.—SENECA.

† Nihil mihi videtur infelicius eo, cui nihil unquam evenit adversi; non licuit illi se experiri.

* The word Juvenes, or my dear youths, occurs here and in several other places, as these lectures were delivered to a society of young theological students; but it did not seem necessary to make the translation so exactly literal.

† Οὐκ ἔστι χαίρειν τοῖς δαίθεσι.

‡ Ὡς ἀρα συγγαθῆς ἐστὶ λύπη καὶ βίος.

conspicuous in the midst of the flames, like the burning bush, through the good-will of Him that dwelt in it. And when it seems to be overwhelmed with waters, God brings it out of them cleansed and beautified—mergas profundo, pulchrior exiit; he plunges it in the deep, and it rises fairer than before.

We will not here maintain that paradox of the stoics, that Evils which happen to good men, are not to be called evils at all; which, however, is capable of a very good sense, since religion teaches us that the greatest evils are changed, and work together for good, which comes about to the same thing, and perhaps was the true meaning of the stoics. Banishment and poverty are indeed evils in one sense, that is, they have something hard and grievous in them; but when they fall on a good and brave man, they seem to lay aside the malignity of their nature, and become tame and gentle. The very sharpness of them excites and exercises virtue: by exciting, they increase it, so that the root of faith shoots the stronger, and fixes the deeper, and thereby adds new strength to fortitude and patience. And, as we see in this example before us, affliction does by a happy kind of necessity drive the soul to confess its sin, to flee as it were to seek its refuge under the wing of the Divine goodness, and to fix its hope upon God. And this is certainly one great advantage which the pious soul gains by adversity, that it calls away the affections from earth and earthly things, or rather tears them away, when obstinately adhering to them. "It is necessary that they suffer such hardships as these," as one expresses it,* "lest they should love this inconvenient stable, in which they now are obliged to lodge, as if it were their own house!"† It is necessary that they should perceive that they are strangers and foreigners upon earth, that they may more frequently, and with more ardent desire, groan after that better country, and often repeat it, οἶκος φίλος, οἶκος ἀριστος, Dear home! most desirable home! The children and heirs of the kingdom must be weaned by wormwood, lest they should be so enchanted by the allurements of the flesh, and the poisonous sweetness of secular enjoyments, as to barter away the true and pure joy of their blessed hope, for this false, polluted, and deadly joy; and lest, dissolved in pleasure, the heaven-born soul should be broken under the yoke of this pernicious flesh, the root of so many passions.‡ Lastly, we see how much vigor and vehemence affliction adds to prayer; for the divine psalmist, the deeper he sinks, cries to God in so much the louder accents—Out of the depths have I cried.

This prayer contains those precious virtues which, in a grateful temperature, render every prayer acceptable to God—faith, fervor, and humility. Faith, in that he prays out of the deeps; fervor, in that he cries, and both again expressed in the next word; faith, as in the midst of surrounding calamities he does not despair of redress; fervor, as he urges it with repeated importunity, and the same word uttered again and again. And to complete all, humility expresses itself in what follows, where he speaks as one that felt himself sinking, as one who was plunged in a sea of iniquities, as well as calamities; and acknowledges he was so overwhelmed with them, as to be unable to stand, unless supported by pure mercy and grace. If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, who shall stand? Thus, here again, faith manifests itself more clearly, together with its kindred affections of hope and charity, which, like three graces, join their hands, and by an inseparable union support each other. You have faith in the fourth verse, There is forgiveness with thee; hope in the fifth, I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope; charity in the seventh and eighth, where he does in a most benevolent manner invite all Israel to a communion of the same faith and hope, and, in order to confirm them more abundantly, does in a most animated manner proclaim the riches of the Divine benignity. Such is the composition of this excellent prayer, which thus compounded, like a pillar of aromatic smoke from myrrh, frankincense, and every other most fragrant perfume, ascends grateful to the throne of God. And this you may take instead of the analysis of the remaining verses, which to handle by a more minute dissection of words, and to clothe in the trite phrases of the schools, to speak freely, would be as barren and useless as it is easy and puerile. And indeed I can not but form the same judgment of the common way of catching at a multitude of observations from any scripture, and of pressing it with violence, as if remarks were to be estimated by number rather than weight, propriety, and use. But here let every one follow his own genius and taste; for we are willing to give the liberty we take. Veniam damus petimusque vicissim.

* Expedi omnino ut hic dura experiantur, ne stabilium ament pro domo sua.

† Σαρξ ὄλη, παθεῶν ῥιζα πολυχιθεῶν.

Out of the depths.] Oh, the immortal power of Divine faith, which lives and breathes in the midst of the waves, in which it may be plunged, but can not be sunk under any of the hugest billows: but raises itself, and the soul in which it resides, and emerges and swims above all, φελλός ὡς ἀβάπτιστος; (like cork which will still be above water), having this in common with that Divine love of which Solomon speaks in his Song, that many waters can not quench it. Whatever great things the stoics may speak of their wise men, and whatever all philosophy may say of fortitude, it is Divine faith that truly and heartily performs all, by which the good man, though stripped of every help and comfort, wraps himself up, as it were, not in his own virtue and strength, but in that of God; and hence it is that he can not be conquered by any tyranny, by any threatenings, by any calamities of life, by any fear of death, for he leans upon Omnipotence. The Lord, says he, is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? Let war arise, let the enemy measure out his tents against me, I, says Faith, am secure under the shadow of the Most High, and embracing him, I will fear nothing.

You have here the psalmist crying with confidence out of the deeps. Behold also the prophet Jonah indeed, and, as we say, literally, in the deeps, and in circumstances which might have greater efficacy to shake his faith than the sea itself, than the bowels of the fish, or any other depth into which he might be cast, as he was not entirely free from blame, but had the intermingling guilt of his own perverseness; yet, among all these discouragements, his faith is not swallowed up: I have cried unto thee in my distress, and from the very belly of hell. Thou hast cast me into the deep, and all thy waves were going over me, so that I might truly say, I am cast out from thy sight; yet at the same time I said, I will look again toward the temple of thy holiness. I went down to the root and cavern of the mountains; the abyss surrounded me; yet when my soul was thus overwhelmed within me, I remembered the Lord. You have, among others, an excellent example of faith in David, 1 Sam. xxx., when the invading enemy had burnt Ziklag, and carried the women captive, and the people, in the madness of their rage and grief, speak of stoning David himself; yet, besieged with all these miseries, he strengthens himself in the Lord his God. Nor can anything have greater depth and strength than that expression of Job, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: not only when fainting and dying, but while expiring, as it were, of the wound which I had received from the hand of God himself, yet will I hope for life and salvation from that very hand which has given me death, and in the jaws of death would send out this last word with the last breath, and with my departing soul, Destroy not, O Lord, one that trusteth in thee.

Nor is this confidence of a pious soul, an opinion fluctuating among the waves, or a light conjecture that it shall raise its head above them, but a certain, firm, and infallible assurance. That is a vulgar and weak word of comfort, "To-morrow may be better than to-day."* But the language of Divine faith is stronger and firmer, even when deep calls unto deep, and most certainly determines that it will not be in vain; and therefore, in the forty-second Psalm, not dubious and trembling, but with a steady voice, he silences all the noisy tumults of an agitated mind, and says, Repose thyself on God, for I shall still praise him, or, as it may be rendered, I am going to praise him: q. d. Amid all those tempests which rage about me, I am thinking of that hymn of praise which I shall pay to him for my deliverance, and for the happy exit out of all my sorrows. Though at present we have nothing in sight but darkness, and whirlwinds, and rocks, and the raging, foaming sea, let the skill and power of the Great Pilot be opposed to all these. And what the psalmist says elsewhere of sailors, may evidently be applied to those who go down into the sea; they gain this by their dangers, that they see the works of this Great Pilot in the abyss, and contemplate his wonders in the deep. And he who gives himself up to his care, and fixes his eye and hope wholly on him, though he be, or rather seem to be, shipwrecked, and lose all his goods, yet, if he does not make shipwreck of faith, he loses nothing that is properly his own. Nay, when he is swallowed up in the abyss of death, he does not perish, but swims through it to the further shore of eternity, where he finds a banquet, a palace prepared for him, and a kingdom that can not be moved, but remains to endless ages.

* Ταχ' ἀδύριον ἕσσει' ἄμενον.

I cried.] Prayer is the natural and genuine voice of the children of God; and as the Latin word oratio properly signifies articulate speech, as it distinguishes man from other animals, so, in this other signification, it expresses that by which the godly are distinguished from the rest of mankind: it is the proper idiom of the citizens of heaven. Others may recite some words of prayer, but they do not pray; as parrots and other birds, by the industry of their teacher, may learn to imitate human voices, yet they do not speak; there is something wanting in all their most skilful chattering, which is the very thing that is also wanting in the language of most that are said to pray, and that is, mind and meaning, affections correspondent to the words, or rather, to which the words may conform as to their original cause, and of which they may be the true index and sign. The spirit of this world knows not how to pray, nor does a spirit of adoption and liberty know how to forbear praying—the spirit of adoption, says the apostle, by which we cry Abba, Father. Nor can they who are newborn by that Spirit, live without frequent prayer. Prayer is to them, as the natural and necessary respiration of that new and Divine life, as Lam. iii. 56, Turn not away from my breathing: the Hebrew word there made use of, leruhethi, properly signifies the vital respiration of animals. Yet, notwithstanding all this, what we said above is true, and evidently appears from the passage before us, that affliction often adds vigor to prayers, how lively and assiduous soever they may have been before. Let it be so, that prayer is the natural language of believing souls, by which they daily address their heavenly Father, yet, when they are pressed with an uncommon pain or danger, it is no less natural that this voice should be louder than ordinary, and should be raised into a cry. It is indeed the breath of faith and heavenly affections, and when they are vehemently pressed by any burden, and almost expiring under it, they breathe quicker than before, and with greater effort. Thus, they who have been used to the greatest heights of daily devotion, yet, in surrounding calamities, pray more fervently and more frequently than ordinary. And this is to be numbered among the chief benefits attending afflictions and it would surely be well worth our while to experience all the hardest pressures of them, if we may gain this; that the languor, and sloth, and stupidity, into which our minds and our souls are ready insensibly to sink while all is calm and serene about us, may be happily shaken off by something which the world may call an unhappy event; that some more violent gust of wind may fan the sacred flame that seems almost extinguished, and blow it up into greater ardor. It will be happy for us, that, with the psalmist, we should sometimes sink in deep waters, that so we, who in prosperity do but whisper or mutter out our prayers, may from the depths cry aloud unto God. Oh, how frequently and how ardently did David pray in the deserts and the caves, and it is he who here cries out of the deep, and perhaps these deep recesses are those from which he was now crying; but when secure amid the ease and delights of the court, and walking at leisure on his house-top, he was tempted by his own wandering eyes, and having intermitted the fervor of prayer, burned with impure fires. Our vows are cruel to ourselves, if they demand nothing but gentle zephyrs, and flowery fields, and calm repose, as the lot of our life; for these pleasant things often prove the most dangerous enemies to our nobler and dearer life.

Oh! how true is that saying, that "faith is safe when in danger, and in danger when secure; and prayer is fervent in straits, but in joyful and prosperous circumstances, if not quite cold and dead, at least lukewarm." Oh, happy straits, if they hinder the mind from flowing forth upon earthly objects, and mingling itself with the mire; if they favor our correspondence with heaven, and quicken our love to celestial objects, without which, what we call life, may more properly deserve the name of death!

VER. 2. Lord, hear my voice; let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.

WE see that he was not only in earnest, which comparatively few that pray are, but that his desires were vehement, and kindled into a flame, which is the case of yet fewer. The smoke of the incense will not rise to heaven, unless it be kindled on the altar; and hence it is that a great part of our prayers vanish like an empty sound, and are dissipated in the air. Nor is it wonderful, as we have elsewhere observed, that those petitions do not ascend, which hardly go out, which go not forth from the depth of the breast, and therefore they rise not on high, but are born and die upon the lips. How should they live, when they have no principle of life, neither the constancy of faith, nor the love of zeal? And if he who asks timorously, much more he that asks with cold indifference, may seem to bespeak a denial.

It is not the much speaking and the vain repetition, condemned in the gospel, to redouble the same words again and again, provided it be not from want of care and affection, but if, on the contrary, it proceeds from the vehemence and exuberance of it. The great apostle tells us, that he besought the Lord thrice; and the Lord of the apostle, and our Lord, prayed in the garden again and again, speaking the same words. He that pours out his words, inattentive to what he is about, seems to me to pray long, if he utters but two sentences; though his words be ever so few and well chosen, yet is he himself foolish and verbose. For what can be more foolish than the empty noise even of the best words, when they express nothing of the mind? But he who continues long in prayer, and urges the same petitions again and again, bursting out from the fervor of an influenced breast, he, truly, prays in a vivid and solid manner, and in a manner most acceptable to God; and what Fabius says of his orator, may with great propriety be applied to him, Pectus est, quod disertum facit, et vis mentis: It is the heart, and the energy of the mind, that make a man truly eloquent.

Hear me.] The great Author of nature and of all things does nothing in vain. He instituted not this law, and, if I may so express it, art of praying, as a vain and insignificant thing, but endows it with a wonderful efficacy for producing the greatest and happiest consequences. He would have it to be the key by which all the treasures of heaven should be opened. He has constructed it as a powerful machine, by which we may, with easy and present labor, remove from us the most dire and unhappy machinations of our enemy, and may with equal ease draw to ourselves what is most propitious and advantageous. Heaven and earth, and all the elements, obey and minister to the hands which are often lifted up to heaven in earnest prayer. Yea, all works, and which is yet more and greater, all the words of God obey it. Well known in the sacred Scriptures are the examples of Moses and Joshua, and that which James (ch. v. 17), particularly mentions of Elijah, whom he expressly calls ὑποταθῆς, a man subject to like infirmities with ourselves, that he might illustrate the admirable force of prayer, by the common and human weakness of the person by whom it was offered. And that Christian legion under Antoninus is well known and justly celebrated, which, for the singular ardor and efficacy of its prayers, obtained the name of κεραυνόβηλος, the thundering legion.

It is true, indeed, that our desires and our hearts are open to God, when our tongues are entirely silent, and that he has a paternal regard to all our concerns; nor do we utter our petitions to him, as if he were ignorant or negligent of our necessities and desires, for we well know that he sees and hears everything, παντ' ἑφορᾷ καὶ ἰπακούει. It is also true, that his counsels are all fixed and immovable. But it can by no means be inferred from these premises, that the business of prayer is vain and needless. And if any one would represent these things as superseding prayer, surely he deceives himself, and by all his reasonings would make out nothing, unless it were to convict himself of a vast ingratitude to the Divine munificence, and a most shameful unworthiness of so excellent a gift.

Ought not this intercourse of men with God by prayer to be most reverently and gratefully received and cultivated by all, and numbered among the chief favors of the Divine nature, and the chief dignities of the human nature? And truly this, as much as anything that can be imagined, is a lamentable argument of the stupidity of man in this fallen state, that such an honor is so little regarded. Opportunities of conversing with nobles or princes of the earth are rare and short; and if a man of inferior station be admitted to such a favor, he glories in it, as if he were raised to heaven; though they are but images made of the same clay with himself, and only set upon a basis a little higher than the rest. But the liberty of daily and free converse with the King of heaven is neglected for every trifle, and indeed is counted as nothing, though his very aspect alone fills so many myriads of blessed spirits above with full and perpetual felicity.

Again, is it not most reasonable to acknowledge, by this spiritual sacrifice of prayer, his infinite power and goodness, and that most providential care by which he governs all human affairs? And when our very being and life depend upon him, and all the comfort and happiness of life, how congruous is it to exhibit this sign and token of his holding us by the hand, and of our being borne up by him! Again, what sweeter lenitive of all those miseries with which mortal life so continually abounds, can be invented, than this, to pour out all our care and trouble into his bosom, as that of a most faithful friend and affectionate father? Then does the good man lay himself down to sleep with sweet composure in the midst of waves and storms, when he has lulled all the cares and sorrows of his heart to sleep, by pouring out his prayer to God. And once more, how pleasant is it, that these benefits, which are of so great a value both on their own account and that of the Divine benignity whence they come, should be delivered into our hands, marked, as it were, with this grateful inscription, That they have been obtained by prayer!

Hear, O Lord.] It is certain that the greater part of men, as they babble out vain, languid, and inefficacious prayers, most unworthy the ear of the blessed God, so they seem in some degree to set a just estimate upon them, neither hoping for any success from them, nor indeed seeming to be at all solicitous about it, but committing them to the wind, as vain words, which in truth they are. But far be it from a wise and pious man, that he should so foolishly and coldly trifle in so serious an affair: his prayer has a certain tendency and scope, at which he aims with assiduous and repeated desires, and doth not only pray that he may pray, but that he may obtain an answer: and as he firmly believes that it may be obtained, so he firmly, and constantly, and eagerly urges his petition, that he may not flatter himself with an empty hope. For it can not be that any pious and reasonable desire should be directed toward the throne of God in vain, since he has been pleased to assume it among his titles, that he is a God hearing prayer. And certainly though the good man does not always obtain the very thing that he asks, yet, pure and right petitions never ascend in vain; but he who presents them, either obtains the thing he asks, or receives, instead of what is pleasing, what is truly profitable, and instead of the things that he wishes for, those that are upon the whole the fittest and best, and that in the fittest and best time. Therefore, the vehemence of prayer is to be tempered with patience and long suffering expectation. We often put ourselves, as it were, out of breath with the eagerness of speaking, and are presently weary, if we do not immediately obtain our request. Our prayers are often like those of the damsel who danced before Herod, I will that thou presently give me this or that. Whereas, he that prays fervently, urges this, that God would make haste to help him; but in the meantime, as he believes, he will not make haste, nor will he suffer, if the delay be ever so long, that a speech like that of the impious king of Israel should escape him, This evil is of the Lord, and why should I wait for the Lord any longer? 2 Kings vi. 33.

But oh, how necessary is it, that souls worshipping so pure a God, should be purged from all the earthly dregs of impure affections! Most true is that oracle of the psalmist, If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer. The hands must be washed in innocence, before they can be lifted up to him with acceptance. Draw near to God, says the Apostle James, and he will draw near to you; but in order to this, he subjoins, Cleanse your hands, ye sinners, and purify your hearts, ye hypocrites, or ye double-minded, who are the impurest of all. These things we only briefly suggest; but I beseech you, my dear charge, that ye embrace this Divine study, that you labor to obtain this sacred art, which is the best and only way of being enriched with all the most valuable blessings, even those of a celestial origin and tendency. O think it is nothing unpleasant, nothing low and contemptible, to which you are now invited: on the contrary, there is nothing more delightful, nothing more sublime, than to meditate upon heavenly objects, to converse with God, and thence to imbibe a contempt of this low and transitory world, to be raised above all perishing enjoyments, and to taste the prelibations of that celestial life itself.

But how accurately soever the precepts of this Divine oratory may be delivered, none will effectually receive them, unless they are taught the skill by God himself. We must pray that we may be able to pray, and draw as it were from that superior academy that faculty of pure and pious speech which flies as with a swift, ready, and natural motion to heaven whence it came, and brings down with it the most precious gifts into the bosom of the person that utters it. And by the way, it is a most certain truth, that the greatest blessings are much more easily obtained from the great God, who is so munificent in his gifts, than others of a meaner nature; so that it were an argument of a low and abject mind, not to ask something noble and excellent. Covet earnestly the best gifts, in this sense. If we ask only things of a low and trifling nature, unworthy such a giver, he may answer as a prince did, "These are not royal gifts," οὐ βασιλικὸν τὸ δῶρον: but if we ask those things that are most precious and valuable, grace and glory, there will be no room to fear that denial, οὐκ ἀνθρώπινον τὸ λήμμα, "It is not fit for a man to receive it." If you who are evil know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more your heavenly Father! Surely, he is goodness itself, and he gives only what is good; and the better those things are that we ask, the more freely and cheerfully does he bestow them. And you know Luke, repeating the same speech, expresses it by saying, He shall give the Holy Spirit to them that ask it; than which, nothing more noble can be either desired or bestowed.

VER. 3. If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand!

AMONG all the virtues which are necessary to offer up our prayers with acceptance, none ascend with greater velocity, and rise higher, than that very humility which causes them, as it were, to descend the deepest of all; nor is there any more indubitable argument of humility, than a conscience which groans under the burden of its own sin and guilt amid all the abyss of calamities, crying especially from this depth. And thus we see the psalmist, while he involves all other evils, how great soever they might be, under one common title, fixed upon this, to expatiate upon it at large. If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, &c. Thus, if any one desires to mount more readily and more favorably from the depth of calamity, let him cry from this depth of profound humility, and plead a penitent sense of sin. For though of all imaginable depths, that of sin be the most remote from the most high and most holy God, yet, the depths of the humble soul, depressed under the weight of sin, is nearest of all to the deep bowels of Divine mercy; so that the words of the psalmist may not improperly be accommodated to this, though in a sense something different from that which in their connexion they bear, Deep calls unto deep, and by an harmonious kind of antiphony, if I may be allowed the expression, they do most musically answer to each other.

One might have been ready, perhaps, to imagine, from the vehemence with which he begins his address, and from his groanings as it were so thick and so short, that he was a somewhat bold petitioner, and that he had some confidence in himself, seeing that he presumed to knock so often and so loud at the door of divine mercy. But what he here adds plainly shows that this was far from being the case: "Hear me, O, Lord, hear me: and I urge the request because necessity presses urgently upon me. Not that I am, or judge myself to be one who can merit thine assistance, but that I stand in such need of it, that if it be not granted me, I must perish. So far am I from being or appearing to myself worthy of thy help, that behold I am overwhelmed with sin more than with sorrows. It is free mercy that I invoke, and I beseech thee, that in order to thy hearing the voice of my prayer, thou wouldst not hearken to the cry of my sins. Wash away the one, that thou mayst graciously smile upon the other. For, if thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, who shall stand? Intimating that if he were drawn out of the other depths, yet if his sins continued unremitted, he could find no place on which to stand; yea, if it were possible for him in that case to flee away and hide himself, yet he would rather plunge himself into those depths again, and would rather be buried and lost in floods of the greatest calamities, than meet the more dreadful flame of the divine anger and indignation.

But this humble acknowledgment of his own unworthiness and pollution, is so far from being inconsistent with the pious confidence of prayer, that it is not only congruous, but even congenial to it, and inseparable from it, so as to be most agreeable to that great King whom it addresses. Humility and contrition of heart are often thought by men to be the mark of a low and abject mind, and as such are often despised by them: but nothing is more honorable in the sight of God. "He," says Augustine,* "will bow down his ear, if thou dost not lift up thy neck." There is certainly no more efficacious method of supplicating and obtaining grace, than to do it, if I may so speak, sub forma pauperis, confessing and pleading our poverty. He finds the most easy access in the court of heaven, who meets the most frequent repulses on earth. Nay, if I may so express myself, the heavenly court sits and resides in him. The two chief temples and palaces of the great King, are that προσάγιόν, thrice holy place in the third heaven and the humble and contrite heart upon earth. The best manner of praying, therefore, is that which is made up of faith, fear, and humility. By the equal libration of these wings, the soul mounts on high, while that of fear does not sink too low, nor that of confidence rise too high.* By these, we are daily and early to soar to God; and care must be taken that these wings of the soul be not dragged down by excess, nor scorched by lust, nor clogged and glued together, as it were, by covetousness, or any other terrene and viscid affection. But let us now a little more particularly see what this confession of the prophet was.

* Inclinat aures Deum, si tu non erigis cervicem.

If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand? An uninstructed and incautious reader might perhaps imagine that the psalmist was here seeking for refuge in a crowd, and desirous of sheltering himself under the common lot of human nature; at least, that he would endeavor to find some low excuse for himself, in the mention of its universal degeneracy. But the design of the sacred writer is far different from this. He confesses that whatever he, or any other person, on a transient and inattentive glance, may imagine of his innocence, yet, when the eye of the mind is directed inward in a serious and fixed manner, then he sees the sum and bulk of his sins to be so immensely great that he is even struck into astonishment by it; so that he finds himself beset, as it were, on every side with armed troops, which cut off all possibility of escape, otherwise than by flying to divine mercy and to the freedom of pardoning grace. He perceives himself unable to bear the examination of an awakened conscience, exercising itself in impartial self-reflection; and arguing thence, how much less he would be able to endure the penetrating eye and strict scrutiny of the divine Justice, he cries out, in horror and trembling, under an apprehension of it, If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, &c. He sees himself overwhelmed with crimes, held at bay, as it were, by his sins on every side, which roar around him like so many savage creatures just ready to devour him. And he that does not see this to be his own case, is either almost blind, or lives abroad, and never descends into his own breast. Gross offences alone strike the eye of our fellow-creatures: but when we seriously consider that we have to do with an All-seeing Judge, who looks at once through every covering, and sees the most secret recesses of our hearts, who considers not only what may be concealed from men, but even what is concealed from ourselves, so as most clearly to discover every the least stain and speck of our inmost soul, and whose infinite holiness must also abhor it; is it possible that any one should be so infatuated as, in such a view, still to retain a false and foolish conceit of his own innocence? It can not be doubted that they who daily and accurately survey themselves and their own hearts, though they may indeed escape many of those evils which the generality of mankind, who live as it were by chance, fall into, yet, in consequence of that very care and study, see so much the more clearly their own impurity, and contract a greater abhorrence of themselves, and a more reverential dread of the divine judgments. And it is certain that the holier any one is, the viler will he be in his own eyes, and I may also add, the viler he is in his own eyes, the more dear, precious, and honorable, will he be in the sight of God. But where is the heart, yea, I may say, where is the forehead of the generality of mankind, who boast of it as if it were some great matter to be free from the infamy of the most atrocious crimes? Have they not continually the reward of this their egregious virtue? "I have not committed murder and robbery—You are not gibbeted for the food of crows and ravens."* But they who bring the whole of their conduct, their deeds and their words, the glances of their eye, and all the inward workings of their affections, and examine them by the pure and strait rule of the divine law, so as to perceive how many and how great errors attend every most cautious day; and they who feel how wavering and weak their faith is, how lukewarm at least, if not cold, their piety and charity, how ardent their love of this world still continues, how untamed the flesh, how unguarded the senses, how unbridled the affections, how attentive their hearts to trifles, while in prayer so light and so wandering; they, I say, who perceive and reflect on this, with what poignant grief, with what overwhelming shame must they be seized, and how earnestly and how justly will they cry out, If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, who could stand?

If thou shouldst mark.] If thou shouldst inquire and scrutinize, and then shouldst retain and impute (for the Hebrew word imports both): if thou shouldst inquire, thou wouldst find something of iniquity in the most righteous of mankind; and when thou hast found it, if thou shouldst retain it, and call him to an account for it, he could by no means free himself of the charge, or expiate the crime. Inquiring, thou wouldst easily find iniquity; but he by the most diligent inquiry will be able to discover no ransom, and therefore will be unable to stand, will have no place on which to set his foot, but will fall by the irresistible judgments of thy law, and the sentence of thy justice.

There have been great disputes one way and another, about the merit of good works; but I truly think they who have laboriously engaged in them, have been very idly, though very eagerly employed about nothing, since the more sober of the schoolmen themselves acknowledge there can be no such thing as meriting from the blessed God, in the human, or to speak more accurately, in any created nature whatsoever: nay, so far from any possibility of merit, there can be no room for reward any otherwise than of the sovereign pleasure and gracious kindness of God; and the more ancient writers, when they use the word merit, mean nothing by it but a certain correlate to that reward which God both promises and bestows of mere grace and benignity. Otherwise, in order to constitute what is properly called merit, many things must concur, which no man in his senses will presume to attribute to human works, though ever so excellent; particularly that the thing done must not previously be matter of debt, and that it be entire, or our own act, unassisted by foreign aid; it must also be perfectly good, and it must bear an adequate proportion to the reward claimed in consequence of it. If all these things do not concur, the act can not possibly amount to merit. Whereas I think no one will venture to assert that any one of these can take place in any human action whatever. But why should I enlarge here, when one single circumstance overthrows all those titles: the most righteous of mankind would not be able to stand, if his works were weighed in the balance of strict justice; how much less then could they deserve that immense glory which is now in question! Nor is this to be denied only concerning the unbeliever and the sinner, but concerning the righteous and pious believer, who is not only free from all the guilt of his former impinence and rebellion, but endowed with the gift of the Spirit. The interrogation here expresses the most vehement negation, and signifies that no mortal, in whatever degree he is placed, if he be called to the strict examination of Divine justice, without daily and repeated forgiveness, could be able to keep his standing and much less could he arise to that glorious height. "That merit," says Bernard, "on which my hope relies, consists in these three things; the love of adoption, the truth of the promise, and the power of its performance."* This is the threefold cord which can not be broken.

* Oratio timida cœlum non attingit: temeraria resiliit, et viâ suâ frangitur.—BERNARD.

* Furtum non feci—Non pascis in cruce corvos.

VER. 4. But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

THIS is the genuine method of Divine grace: it first demands a mind void of all confidence in itself, that so it may be filled with a pure and entire trust in God. For though that blind self-confidence which is so natural to us, be flatulent and empty, yet while it possesses the mind, it is as it were blown up by it; and that swelling breaks off everything more solid, and prevents its access even when it seems to surround us on every side. Yea, it seems that the riches and magnificence of Divine grace can not with so much decency communicate itself, when it is, as it were, straitened by the receiver; for since it is so great as to be able to fill everything, it requires a free and ample space in which to dilate itself. He who in the first original of the new-born world brought all things out of nothing acts like himself in the regeneration and restoration of mankind to holiness. The Holy Spirit finds nothing but Tohu va Bohu, nothing but what is without form and void; and whoever of mankind perceives and acknowledges this to be his case, may be assured that the Spirit of God already begins to move upon him to impregnate the face of the abyss; and then it is said concerning them, Let there be light, and there is light, even that light by which they see themselves unformed and dark, and destitute of everything that is good. It is a great sign of a soul beginning to emerge from its misery, to give up every hope of emerging from it, except that one which arises from free mercy alone. And in this sense, it may truly be said, as it is by the poet,

* Meritum, cui innititur spes mea, tribus hisce constat, charitate adoptionis, veritate promissionis, et potestate, redditionis.

Una salus miseris nullam sperare salutem:

"The wretched find no safety but despair—"

i. e., in themselves, in their own righteousness or innocence, their own industry in fulfilling the law, or any expiation they can make for the breach of it. And what the apostle says of his own danger, may, properly enough, be applied to a confession of the soul, pressed under the burden of its own guilt. We had received the sentence of death in ourselves, that we might not trust in ourselves, but in God who raises the dead. 2 Cor. i. 9. For the exclamation before us bears a remarkable resemblance to that expression, If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquity, O Lord, who could stand? But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared. He who from justice found not any ground upon which he might stand, finds in mercy a place from which he may rise again. And this is the remedy of all our grief and distress, and in this sense we must be sick that we may recover, and must die that we may live. Grace exerts its power, where nature and art, and all the excellency and strength of human nature, fail; nor does any soul celebrate the Divine benignity more signally than those who are snatched as it were out of the flames when they are beginning to seize them, and being rescued from the very jaws of hell, return to life again, and breathe in the land of the living.

That trite distinction of sin into mortal and venial, which is so common among the schoolmen, is not only vain and destitute of all support from the word of God, but is indeed very faulty, and far from being itself

venial, well deserves to be exploded as mortal, for that malignant influence which it has upon the morals of men. If the most open danger of the Divine displeasure and of eternal death, can not hinder the bold race of men from rushing on headlong to every crime,* and breaking all the barriers of duty which God has prescribed them, will it not add great licentiousness to all the crowd and tumult of headstrong desires, when some sins are said to be by their own nature, and in the whole kind of them, free from the condemning sentence of the Divine law? But what I here oppose, is this; give me the holiest man upon earth, the man who above all others stands at the remotest distance, both in the affections of his mind and in the conduct of his life, from those sins which they acknowledge as mortal, will he not deeply feel his need of daily forgiveness, from the multiplied pollutions of his daily infirmities? He truly accounts no sin little, which is committed against the great and ever-blessed God, nor any pardon little, which he knows to proceed from his infinite grace. Nor will he promise himself the pardon of the least fault which he indulges: nor will he despair of obtaining a pardon of the greatest for which he is truly penitent. And this is the law of grace. The poet said with a great deal of justice, "That no sinner is absolved by himself," because he is as it were turned informer against himself.† Yet, in another sense, the sinner is absolved by that very self accusation, and sorrowing for his sins, is freed from the guilt of them. For it is not by any means to be conceived that any one can return into favor with God, unless he return to God; nor that any one can return to God, unless he renounce every sin: which if he does, they are all entirely forgiven, and those which he eagerly desires to cast behind his back, shall never rise up to condemn him to his face, before the tribunal of the Divine justice. This sentiment runs through all the evangelical discourses of the prophets, by which, as so many heralds, they call a rebellious people to return to the allegiance of God, their supreme King: Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings. Yea, the very Fountain of Grace, the Lord of the prophets, who is himself the great author and the sum of the gospel doctrine, as soon as ever he came forth to publish this grace, said, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Nor can any mind that is not fallen into utter madness and complete distraction, dream of a pardon, how ample and glorious soever, to be imparted to a sinner who will not repent or return. Nor indeed can it be so much as wished. For how unworthy would it be of the Divine Majesty and Wisdom, to throw away such precious graces on those who so obstinately despise them! But there is for- givenness with thee—which is added with the utmost propriety; with him there is a treasure of mercy laid up, to be imparted most freely and richly to every humble sinner that applies to him for it. Nor is the dispensing of grace in this way at all inconsistent with the richness and freeness of it, since the greatest sins, the most aggravated crimes, are absolutely forgiven, without any penalty or fine whatsoever imposed upon the offender, yet, on this most reasonable and happy condition, that they who are thus received into the Divine favor should express their grateful acknowledgments for it, by love, obedience, and sanctity of life. Neither is this forgiveness the less free and gracious, because Jesus Christ, as our surety and redeemer, has paid the price of it, having been appointed for and destined to this great and arduous work by the Father. For what does that great Father of mercies herein, but, in order to our complete discharge, by one certain, and ever-to-be-admired way, satisfy himself of his own, by fasting his only begotten Son to the cross? The repository of this treasure is opened, the whole price is poured out at once, that great price of redemption, more precious than all the treasures, than all the mines of gold in the world, or even the whole world itself. But they who anxiously debate the point, whether God could simply and absolutely pardon sin without any price, do but trifle; for whatever may be supposed concerning that, who is there that will deny that this way of the salvation of men which God has chosen, is so full of stupendous mystery, and so illustrious, if I may so speak, for that trine and to us most benign aspect of wisdom, justice, and mercy, that nothing can be thought of more worthy the Divine Majesty, nothing sweeter, nothing more munificent with respect to unworthy man? So that, it will appear, Athanasius speaks very prudently when he says, "We ought not in this matter so much to consider the absolute power of God, as what is most advantageous to man, and what most worthy of the Divine Being."*

It was fit that our wise Creator should give us a law, and that law was both useful and pleasant to those who would carefully observe it; but when once violated, there would necessarily arise a fatal enmity between the law and the transgressors of it, an enmity which would continually become progressive, and gather new strength in the progress. But as for our obstinacy, what is it more than πρός κεντρα λακκίζειν, to kick against the pricks? The law is inviolably safe in its own sanctity, dignity, and immortality; but we, by striving against it, what do we gain but iniquity, disgrace, and death? So that if there were no umpire to interpose, there would be no hope, but that the whole human

* Audax omnia perpeti
Gens humana, ruit per vetitum nefas.—HORACE.
† Se indice nemo nocens absolvitur.

* Οὐκ οὐδὸς δεῖ ἐν τούτῳ πραγμᾶτι τὸ ἀπλῶς τοῦ θεοῦ ὑπάγειν λογίζεσθαι, ὡς τοῖς ἀνθρώποις λυσitelεσπρον καὶ πανυ γε δμῶς Θεοσπεπέστρον.

kind should perish. But that blessed and efficacious Intercessor came from on high ; and certainly he was himself a Divine person, who could compose such a controversy, and who joining, by an indissoluble union, his infinitely better with our miserable and mortal nature, did so, by a most wonderful method, render to the law all its accuracy of obedience, and to us, though guilty, impunity. And having thus made peace, that concord might afterward continue and prevail, he animates all who partake of this blessed peace, by his own new, pure, and Divine Spirit, that they might not only be engaged sincerely to endeavor to observe diligently the sacred precepts of the law, but might love them, and cordially embrace them. At the same time, he hath tempered the severity of the law toward all those that are received into favor, that their diligent, pious, and affectionate observance of the law, though not entirely complete, should, by our indulgent Father, be most graciously accepted, even as if it were perfect. And so the honor of the Divine Legislator is secure among men, and his peace descends upon them ; and this is what our text observes, There is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

It is well known, that the fear of God is commonly used in Scripture to signify, not only the whole of his worship, but all pious affections whatsoever, and consequently the whole of true religion. And some translate the expression here, that thou mayest be reverently worshipped ; and it is thus used with the greatest propriety. I speak of that fear which is so far from denoting the servile, hostile dread and terror which some might think of, that, on the contrary, it entirely excludes it, being properly a reverence tempered with love. Yet I do not think that we are to exclude all dread of punishment and vindictive justice under the name of a servile and disingenuous fear ; nay, I apprehend such a fear to be very necessary even to those who most ardently love, as long as they live in the flesh, in order to tame and rein in the petulance of it ; yea, love itself places fear as a kind of bit and bridle to the flesh. Psalm cxix. 128, My flesh trembles for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments. Heb. xii. ult., Let us serve God with reverence and godly fear, for our God is a consuming fire. This is the fear which is called the beginning of wisdom, and which is marked with other very high titles of honor in the sacred Scriptures ; without which, we can neither conceive the beginning of divine worship and true piety, nor pursue the improvement of it.

As this holy and pure fear is the compendium and summary of religion, so this pardon and free remission of sins is the great foundation and support of that fear and religion. As the whole human race is defiled with sin, the despair of pardon would entirely drive us away from God, and precluding all ways of returning, would plunge the offender headlong into eternal banishment and eternal hatred.

With thee is forgiveness, that thou mayest be feared ; that men may not dread thee and flee thee as an inexorable judge and enemy, but may reverence, love, and serve thee, as a mild and gracious Lord, as a most merciful and loving father. And this is that joyful message of the gospel, to which sinners run, as soon as they hear and understand it, prostrating themselves with all humility at the feet of so mild a Lord and so gracious a king. "For no one," as Ambrose says, "will think of repenting, but he who hopes for indulgence."* This merciful God calls back to his favor, those who are as if were flying from it, saying, Return, ye apostates and rebels, and I will pardon and heal your backslidings. And they, as if their bowels sounded to the unison note of mercy, with reciprocal penitence and love, answer, Behold we come unto thee, for thou art Jehovah our God. And this is what the great messenger and author of our salvation preached and set forth : Repent, says he, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. You are not now pursued by wrath and vengeance, threatening utterly to extirpate you and cut you off, but the kingdom of heaven, the dispensation of love, mercy, and grace, opens its bosom to embrace you, and freely offers you the full pardon of all your former obstinacy and rebellion. Behold the compassionate father meeting that prodigal son who had so basely run from him, while yet afar off on his return, and, instead of chiding and upbraiding him, burying not only all his sins, but even his very confession, as in a deluge of love, amidst the tenderest embraces, kisses, and tears. Make me to hear, says David, the voice of joy and gladness, that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. By that lamentable fall, he had as it were dashed himself against the rock of Divine justice, so that all his bones were broken ; but what a voice of joy and gladness is that which should restore full soundness and strength to bones which had thus been crushed and shattered to pieces ! Surely, it is no other voice than that so often used by our Savior in the gospel, Son, be of good cheer ; thy sins are forgiven thee. That was the grace, softer than oil, sweeter than roses, which flowed from his lips into the sinner's wounds, and which being poured into the contrite heart, not only heals, but blesses it, yea, and marks it out for eternal blessedness. But alas ! the greater part of sinners sleep in their misery, and though their distempers are mortal, feel them not. It is therefore no great wonder, that this grace, this precious, this invaluable remedy, is despised by them. But oh, how sweet is the voice of pardon to a soul groaning under the burden of sin !

* Nemo meditabitur pœnitentiam, nisi qui speraverit indulgentiam.

—*Quale per aestum
Dulcis aquæ saliente sitim restinguere rivo :*
“ Sweet as the living stream to summer thirst.”

But, as one well expresses it, “He that has never known discomfort, knows not what consolation means. Men of this world, entangled in the cares of life and in its crimes, insensible of misery, attend not to mercy.”* But if any who imagine themselves partakers of this forgiveness, do not at the same time feel their hearts struck with a pious fear of the divine majesty, let them know that their joys are all self-invented dreams, since it is for this very end that there is forgiveness with God even that he may be feared.

In the remainder of this psalm, the author asserts his confidence in God, and labors to confirm and establish that of all true believers.

VER. 5. I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope.

VER. 6. My soul waiteth for the Lord, more than they that watch for the morning; I say, more than they that watch for the morning.

VER. 7. Let Israel hope in the Lord, for with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption.

VER. 8. And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

I wait for the Lord.] With thee is mercy. They who heartily believe this, are drawn by that sweet and amiable force of desire, to be partakers of it. And certainly, there is no true faith in the doctrine of salvation, unless it be attended with this magnetic force by which it draws the soul to God. One would think it were impossible, where this effect is not produced, that there should be so much as an historical faith; and surely it is contrary to, and inconsistent with, the rational nature, to see so desirable and excellent a good laid down before us, and freely offered, without running most freely to embrace it with open arms, and an ardent impetuosity of soul.

The faith therefore, of vulgar and merely nominal Christians, is quite dead, and deserves not the name of faith at all. I mean, that which is not sufficient to excite them earnestly to desire and expect that divine grace in which they say they believe. True and lively faith is the eye of the inner man, which beholds an infinitely amiable God, the lucid and perpetual fountain of grace, and is by the view immediately kindled into most fervent love. That divine light which is sent from heaven into the soul, is the vehicle of heat too, and, by its ardent rays, presently sets the heart on fire: the flame rises sublime, and bears all the affections of the mind with it, toward that consummate beauty which it renders visible.

When a philosopher was asked, why that which is fair attracts our love, he answered, “It is the question of a blind man,” τῷ φλάσιν ἰσώτημα. Well then might the psalmist, when he had been contemplating the divine goodness, represent himself as quite transported with its charms: g. d. “It is nothing earthly, nothing mortal, that is the object of my wish; my soul hangs on the Lord alone. It thirsts for thee, and till it arrives at the enjoyment of thee, it will still be waiting. Hasten, Lord, to support and comfort me, for I am sick with love; nor is there anything in heaven or earth beside thee, O Lord, which can satiate or delight this soul of mine, pierced through, as it were, with this sacred passion. And though I am, and feel myself to be, most unworthy of loving thee, or of hoping ever to enjoy thee, yet my meanness and vileness, even when compared with thine immense majesty and sublimity, do not so much deter me, as thy boundless clemency and goodness, added to thy truth, while I have thy word of promise before mine eyes for my support, sustain me and animate my courage. Therefore, while my love and desires are most ardent, I will nevertheless expect and wait with inward patience and perseverance; and though a heart which loves like mine must find a delay grievous, yet unshaken hope shall alleviate that sickness of the soul. Just as they that watch for the morning, however they may be afflicted with the darkness and coldness of the night, are constantly supported with the assured hope that the dawn will come, and the day arise in all its glory.”

* Quisquis autem desolationem non novit, nec consolationem agnoscere potest. Homine seculi negotiis et flagitiis implicati, dum miseriam non sentiunt, misericordiam non attendunt.—BERNARD.

Nor does the psalmist envy others their share in those felicities which arise from love and hope; on the contrary, with a cheerful and liberal mind, he invites all to this immense ocean of riches, which is not shut up, but free to all. Let Israel hope in the Lord. And, lest the confluence of such vast numbers should suggest any fears of straitness and want, he confidently declares that there is wealth enough, and more than enough, to supply all their necessities: For with the Lord, says he, there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption; grace rich and copious enough to support all sinners, and to forgive all sins; and all that apply to it shall infallibly find that he redeems Israel from all his iniquities. The eye of faith is by no means evil, but bright and sparkling with unbounded charity: it wishes all good to all, and above all, wishes them a beatific union with the supreme and infinite Good. As in that kingdom of glory there is no malignity, no envy, because there can be no straitness, but, according to that emphatical saying of our blessed Savior, There are many mansions,—there is boundless space, and the seats of pious souls are not marked out in any narrow boundaries, but in an ample court; so even in the previous kingdom and banquet of grace, our heavenly father’s house is magnificent, both on account of its amplitude, and the rich provision which it contains.

Let me beseech you, therefore, strictly to examine your own souls. Inquire what it is that they chiefly wish, hope, and desire; whether they give chase as it were to every painted fly; whether, forsaking the fountain of living waters, they are digging for themselves cisterns of clay, and those leaky too, with great and unprofitable labor. O! wretched deceitfulness of every earthly hope, which mocks and deludes us so much the more in proportion to the extravagance of its promises! Blessed are they, and only they, who fix their eyes and their souls above, and say with the psalmist, Lord, I wait on thee, my soul does wait, and in thy word do I trust; and, as elsewhere, And now, Lord, what wait I for? My hope is in thee. Happy they who have quitted all those low desires and pursuits, which are unworthy of a generous and immortal spirit, and have fixed their love on one; whose heart and hopes are set upon that one, in whom all things excellent meet and centre. A cheerful joy always shines on their face; nor do their cheeks glow with the shame of repulse and disappointment. While we are wandering hither and thither in the vicious and perplexed pursuit of flattering objects, what frequent lamentations, what fond complaints of delusive fortune, and that tragical outcry, ὁ ὁ τραυματιστὸν ἐπιθύνων, of grievous and painful wounds! What crowds of fears and cares divide the mind, and hurry it, now one way, and now another! But when we fix our hope and our hearts on the only support, on the only true and all-sufficient good, all is safe, and the soul treads firm while the whole globe trembles. Let external things be borne this way or that, there is peace within; nor, when all methods have been examined, can any other be found for the establishment of the mind, than that it should lay all its stress upon the one immoveable and immutable rock.

A FRAGMENT ON PART OF THE EIGHTH PSALM.

THAT which it is needful and competent for us to know concerning God, he hath been pleased to reveal; and our most excellent and happy employment in this world, is, to learn it.

The third verse of this Psalm affords us clearly the doctrine of the creation. That part in the psalmist's eye, the heavens, being the highest and largest of the visible world, surrounding and containing all the rest, is mentioned; the work of thy fingers, importing the curious embellishments of them; the moon and stars which thou hast ordained—placed them in their orbits, and set them a-going, and appointed them the periods and revolutions which they observe. So, the same hand hath fetched all other things out of the same nothing, as we have it in the beginning of this Book, In the beginning God created, &c. And it is therefore to be believed, because we find it there. Can the Worker, and his operation, be discovered by strength of reason? Certainly, they who have been of most confessed and famous ability in that way, have been partly of another mind; and we see it reduced to its truest principle, Hebrews xi. 4: By faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear. Yet this we may boldly affirm, that there is not only nothing in sound reason crossing it, but that all the cavils alleged against it are most weak of themselves; and there be many things in nature that plead strongly for it, which we may, yea, ought to take notice of.

The continual turnings and changes of things, the passing of one thing to another, the destruction of some things, and the production of others, and the general decaying of all, the very heavens waxing old as a garment, declare that the whole frame is mutable and corruptible, and therefore not from eternity, but terminable in its beginning.

There is in this a very strong appearance of the beginning of the world and of time being according to the sacred history we have of it, and which faith receives; that there are not any records nor any memoirs or history of time, or things, producible in the world, that go higher up, no, nor any human histories that go near so high. Now, if there were thousands of ages before, whence is so deep a silence of what passed in them?

They who can conceive it, may take this reason into consideration, that if the world had been from eternity, then, certainly, the number of revolutions would be infinite; now, to that which is so, nothing can be added; so that it were impossible there could be any new days or years, &c. But, above all dispute, we believe it upon His word, who by his word gave all things a being. The whole Trinity, as in all things without, they are together equally concerned, so in that first and great work of making all things.

As by the Father, so by the word were all things made, and the Spirit moved upon the face of the deep: BARAH ELOHIM—Trinity in unity, created.

It is most vain to inquire why the world was not created sooner, in tempore; yea, it is nonsense, for the same question might equally be moved whensoever the world had been made, though it had lasted now millions of years; still there would have been an eternity preceding, wherein it was not: and time itself was concreated. Nor was there any pre-existent unformed matter. It is a poor, shallow conceit, that any such thing was needful to the Almighty. It is even a monstrous, absurd conceit, that any such thing was possible, and destroys itself; for if this framed world could not have a being from eternity, much less frameless matter; so, of necessity, all things were made of nothing, received a being from the Infinite Being, as the spring of all being. His hands stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth. His fingers set them all in this sweet and admirable order, in a beautiful frame.

Now these expressions are suited to our reach, but the truth is, his finger and his whole hand are all one, and his hand is his word. Psalm xxxiii. 6; Gen. i. 3. And his word is his all-powerful and eternal will; that is the breath of his mouth, and his stretched-out arm. He said, that is, he willed it, and it was so. When as yet there was no man nor angel, no heaven nor earth, no time nor being, but the alone blessed Trinity, eternally self-happy, upon the simple act of his absolute will came forth this whole frame, out of the womb of Omnipotence. And this is that certain truth which we believe under the name of creation.

This supposed, it is very easy to conceive, yea, it is impossible to question it, that it had been as easy for THAT Power to have brought forth all in complete perfection at one instant, as to have divided the work into six days. And as we can not think it easier, so we can not but think it better, since he chose, yea, because he chose it, as for that reason better. Well may his will be sufficient cause why that way of his production of all things was better, seeing that his will was purely the cause of the production and being of all.

But in part we may observe some advantage in that way, that he made so many days' work of it, and proceeded by degrees to bring it to perfection; that we might the more clearly perceive, and more distinctly consider, the greatness and excellency of the work, and the wise contrivance of it in its several parts and progress, which we could not so well comprehend altogether. Now, we consider him as first framing one great mass, and then proceeding to beautify it, first with that which is indeed the first beautifier of all things, light, and then ordered the successive interchange of it with its opposite, darkness, that sets it off and makes its beauty appear the more, giving them their terms in day and night; then proportioning and dividing the rooms of the great house into upper and lower, according to his model and design; then decorating them with rich furniture, and providing all kinds of store in great variety and abundance. And thus, having first prepared all, having built, beautified, and replenished so stately a palace, then framed he the guest for whom he intended it, and whom he appointed to dwell in it. Then he said, Let us make man after our image. Thus, the work of itself, and the order of it, and all the parts, carry on them his name who formed them. How do his power, and wisdom, and goodness, appear in them! And yet how little do we see and observe it! It shines bright in all his works, but we are blind; we look on them, and see him not! Oh, what a childish, trifling thing is man in all his ways, till he learns to remark God in all, and to have his soul upon all occasions musing and admiring, and sweetly losing itself in God, that immense sea of excellencies! What a bottomless wonder is that Power, from which, by a simple act of will, issued forth all being! This vast fabric, and all things in it, he willed they should be, and where never anything was, there appeared, on a sudden, heaven and earth: the earth settled upon his word, so that it can not be moved, and enriched with such a variety of plants, and flowers, and fruits growing forth, and springs and mines within the bowels of it; the seas fitted for navigation, together with the multitudes of creatures in it, small and great, and the impetuosity of it, yet confined and forced to roll in its channel, so that it can not go forth; the small sands giving check to the great waters. Oh, how strong and large that Hand, which without help expands the heavens as a curtain! Look up and see, consider their height and roundness, such a glorious canopy set with such sparkling diamonds: then think how swift their motion, and yet imperceivable to us, no motion here below comparable, and yet they seem not to stir at all. And in all, their great Lord and ours so conspicuous! And yet who looks on them with such an eye as to behold him, as David here, When I consider thy heavens, the work, &c.! He is admirable in all: the very lowest and smallest creatures have their wonders of Divine wisdom in their frame, more than we are able to think. Magnus in minimis: He is great in the least of his works. The smallest flies, how strange the fashioning of the organs of life and use in so little room! The man who is still in search of wisdom will find a school and a lesson in all places, and see everywhere the greatness and goodness of his God. If he walk forth in the evening, when this lower world is clothed with the dark mantle of the night, yet still he can look upward to the pavement of the throne of God, and think how glorious it is on the other side, when the moon and stars make this side, even in the night, so beautiful. And this of David's, looks like a night meditation by the view of moon and stars. Thy heavens, these thy works so glorious—thou, therefore, infinitely more glorious; then can I not but increase in wonder, that, dwelling above these heavens, thou regardest so poor a worm as man creeping on this earth.

What is man! "Enosh," weak, mortal man; and "Ben-Adam," the son of earth, the earthly man. David was taught so to look on his mean part and low condition, and on his better part, as follows, ver. 5. as a sort of divinity being freely conferred upon him.

Thus men should learn to view themselves in this twofold light. By the grace of God I am that I am, saith St. Paul. Truly man is a wretched and proud creature, a bundle of vanity and vileness; and yet he thinks himself some great matter while God is hid from him, and he is ignorant of HIS greatness.

No discourse or reasoning will humble the foolish heart of man ; though he be even of the most worthless and basest sort of men, and hath in this condition nothing but what is despicable, yet he flatters himself with some fancy or other, some imagined advantage that swells him. He can not be truly vile in his own eyes till they look up to the excellency of God, and return from that down upon himself. Then he is forced to bow, and fall low, and abhor himself in dust and ashes. Once he was wise and powerful, or some way deserving (as he thought) to be respected ; but now the glory and sublimity of God make him to be as nothing in his own eyes. What is man ! David, a great and a good man, a king and a prophet, and yet a man, viewing and comparing himself with his own eyes, in respect of the great King of all the world, he cries out, What is man, that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that thou visitest him ? These words deserve to be considered. Thou mindest him in all these things, the works above him, even in the framing of these heavens, the moon and the stars, designing his good ; thou makest all attend and serve him. It is not an empty visiting of him, but thou seest all his necessities and providest for them. He sets his heart on man, and all his delights are with the sons of men. Prov. viii. 31.

But above all visits, that visit is to be remarked and admired, when the Eternal Word, by whom this world was made, came down, and was made flesh ; came from his glorious palace, from the bosom of the Father, to visit man in that deep and profound abyss of misery into which he was fallen, and to lift him out of it, and cleanse, and clothe, and dignify him ; came to make the slaves of Satan sons of God. And the psalmist points at Christ, as the following words are applied, Heb. ii. 9. This is a descending indeed, which the angels are still prying into, looking into for the bottom, and can not see it, for it hath none. Oh, that Christ should be disregarded, and his love slighted ! He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. John i. 10. He, the same who became like unto us, and united our flesh to his blessed Deity, did give a being to all things, and by him all things consist. Colossians i. 17.

Our Head and Savior is no less than the mighty power, Creator of the world. He who is our flesh, he who had his arms wrapped up in swaddling-clothes, and afterward stretched upon the cross, he it was who stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundation of the earth. The weight of the love of so great a King should press us low. And then, the persuasion of his almighty power assures us of complete redemption ; for our salvation is in a sure and strong hand. We have a mighty Redeemer : Thy Maker is thy husband, the Lord of hosts is his name, and thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth shall he be called.

When I behold, says the psalmist.

The carnal mind sees God in nothing, not even in spiritual things, his word and ordinances. The spiritual mind sees him in everything, even in natural things, in looking on the heavens and the earth, and all the creatures—THY heavens ; sees all in that notion, in their relation to God as his work, and in them his glory appearing ; stands in awe, fearing to abuse his creatures and his favors to dishonor. The day is thine, and the night also is thine ; therefore ought not I to forget thee through the day, nor in the night.

All that I use, and all that I have, is not mine, but thine, and therefore all shall be for THEE ; thou art my aim and scope in all. Therefore God quarrels with his people, because they had forgotten this. Hos. ii. 8, &c. The most are strangers to these thoughts ; they can eat, drink, and sleep, lie down and rise up, and pass one day after another, without one reverend or affectionate thought of God. They may give him a formal good-morrow, and then farewell for all the day long ; they offer up their prayers (as they speak), and think they have done enough, and that afterward their hearts may go whither they will, provided they escape grosser sins ; they never check themselves in wandering from God all the day, if they fall not into some deep mire.

But even they who are somewhat more mindful of God, and see him in his works, and consider them so as to observe him in them, yet are very faulty in thinking of him seldom, and in the slightness of such thoughts ; they are not deep in them. We do not accustom ourselves to walk with God, to a continued and delightful converse with him, to be still with him. We can turn our eyes no way but he is visible and legible ; and if he were our delight, and his name sweet to us, we should eye that more in everything, than the things themselves.

The heart will readily espy and take hold of every small occasion of remembering that which it loves. That which carries any impression of the person on whom the affection is set is more looked upon on that side, and in that reference, than any other.

Certainly, were God the choice of our hearts, our natural use and enjoyment of things would not relish so much with us, nor take us up so much, as the viewing of him in them all. In our affairs and our refreshments, in company and apart, in the beholding of heaven and earth, and all that is round about us, our eye would be most on HIM whom our soul loveth. What a pity, and what a shame is it, that we who profess ourselves to be his children, and even they who truly are so, should so little mind our Father and his greatness and glory, who is continually minding us and our good ! It is indeed a double standing wonder in the world which he hath made, that God should take so much notice of man, and man should take so little notice of God.

Were this known truth of the creation wisely improved, we should find much in it that we commonly observe not, at least that we use not. This one thing, surely, it might gain upon us, to fear his displeasure who is so great, and so powerful, who hath the whole host of heaven, and the great army of all creatures, at his command.

What he commands they must obey; for he commanded and they were made: they have their being from his command. How quickly can he crush those who proudly rebel against him! How easily can he shake them to pieces, the greatest and the strongest of them! He poureth contempt upon princes. Yea, what are they? Base potsherds of earth striving with their Maker, though somewhat bigger than others, yet as easily broken by his sceptre. O you that, after all warnings, dare walk on in your wicked ways, in drunkenness, or swearing, or any secret heart wickedness, you know not who is your party; the great God, the Former of all things. Who would not fear thee, O King of nations? You who do not fear him are in a fearful estate. Learn to know him, and seek unto him. Seek the Lord, and ye shall live. Seek him who hath the seven stars, and Orion; who turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night. Amcs v. 8.

There is in this a strong ground of spiritual confidence, both for the church's concernment and our own in every state. This first work of God rightly looked on, answers all the difficulties of the greatest works we can expect at his hands. Let Zion's enemies grow to their highest, they can not rise so high as to be above this Almighty God, who framed the heavens. Let the church be brought to the lowest depths of distress, yet can not she fall so low, but his everlasting arm is long enough to reach her, and draw her out of it, which drew the whole world out of nothing. He doth therefore often represent, by his prophets, this very work as a certain evidence of his unbounded power. See Isa. xliii. 13: xlv. 24; and li. 12, 13: Jer. li. 19, 20: Zech. xii. 1. What task can be so great as to surcharge him, who so easily brought forth a world? What number can be too small, what instrument too weak in his hand, for the greatest work, who, without either working instrument or materials, built such a palace?

Fear not, thou worm Jacob, and ye men of Israel—Why? Wherefore have they no reason to fear, they being but as a worm?—I will help thee, saith the Lord. Behold, I will make thee a new sharp thrashing instrument with teeth, and thou shalt thrash the mountains, and make the hills chaff. Isa. xli. 15. A worm in thyself, but in my hand a thrashing instrument. Weak Jacob and his strong God are too hard for all the world.

On the other side, what serve multitudes without him? All were originally nothing, and when HE wills, they prove as nothing. Severed from his concurrence, as ciphers, multiply them as you will, still they signify nothing. Ten thousand men, without God, are ten thousand nothings. We have had very late and very clear experiment of this, both to our grief and to our comfort. But both are forgotten, and indeed were never duly considered; for if they had, they would not so soon, yea, they truly would never be forgotten by us. Well, however, it grieveth us, by reason of our own continuing hard in wickedness. Yet this I am sure of, that the strong arm of the Lord is engaged in this work: he hath already appeared in it, and therefore will not let it fall; and though we were at a lower ebb than lately we were, yet should we rise again by his strength. Doubt it not, the enemies of our peace shall be ashamed, and God shall be yet more glorious in the world than ever, not only in our outward deliverance, but in that which is far richer and of higher beauty, the power and glory of his ordinances. He shall make things that are not, to be, by the mighty power of his mouth, and throughout the world, Jesus Christ shall go on conquering. In his name lies the reason of his prevailing. His name is called THE WORD of God, that same word by which all things were made; therefore no opposite power is able to stand before him. It is a great work to ruin great Babel, but his strength is enough for it. Mighty is the Lord God who judgeth. It is a great work to restore his church, but here is power enough for it, and it is spoken of under the resemblance of the creation, Isa. li. 16.

For the estate of thy soul, thou that art thoughtful of that, what cause hast thou to suspect? Is there any plea left for distrust in thy lowest condition? Thou art about great things, and findest all, not only difficulties, but impossibilities to thee. God is it that thou shouldst find it so, and be emptied of all fancy of self-strength. But then, look up above thyself, and all created, to a creating power. If thou canst not subdue thy lusts and iniquities, resolve to wrestle. Wrestle as thou wilt, still they are too hard for thee; but look to him who came to destroy the works of Satan. Hath not thy Almighty Lord resolved to do it for thee? Thou findest nothing within but blindness and hardness, canst not repent, nor believe, nor think a right thought of God. It is so. But one word from him can do all this, and make all those to subsist that now are not. Therefore, lay thyself before him, as dead, yea as very nothing. Say, "Lord, I am nothing of all that which constitutes the being of a Christian in holiness, in faith, in love: but speak thou the word, and I shall be a new creature, to thy praise. There is nothing upon my soul but darkness; but art not thou HE who said, 'Let there be light, and there was light?' That word, again, Lord, say it to my soul, and it shall be so." Think not to bring anything with thee. Renovation is as absolute and free a work, as creation. Could his creature oblige him to make it, before it had a being? No more can it oblige him to save it, or to give it a new being in Christ: all is free. The miracles of Christ, signs of power and goodness, are preludes to his greater work. It is most senseless to have a thought of preventing him, from whom all good and all being flow. And this he does: If any be in Christ, he is a new creature: the word is, all made new, new delights and desires, and thoughts new—a new heaven and a new earth—a new soul, and a new body; renewed in holiness, sanctified, and made conformable to Jesus Christ. And when thou findest some work of grace, which thou canst not wholly deny, and yet wantest that peace and joy which thou desirest, look to him for that too. Thou findest it not from the word preached; yet, he can speak it, and even by that word wherein formerly thou didst not find it. It is the fruit of the lips, but it is so withal, that it is his creation: he only causes it to be. I create the fruit of the lips, peace, peace. Isa. lvii. 19. The Father wrought by the Son in the first creation, but in a new and special manner works by him in this second creation. He is that word made flesh, who is the life and the spring of all the grace and comfort thou desirest or readest of. Go to him: he delights to let forth his mercies to thirsting souls; to revive them, to restre or turn them again, when they are in a swoon, as the word is, Psalm xxiii. The more thou puttest him to it, the more shalt thou find his prevailing power, and the fulness of grace that dwells in him, which is no more diminished by all he shows forth, than his divine power was weakened by the framing of the world. There is no scarcity of spirit in him; therefore, he proclaimed it as plural: If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink. He that believeth in me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

How manifold are thy works, O Lord! says the psalmist, Psalm civ. 24; and then he adds that wherein all the variety of them agrees, the holding forth of his incomparable wisdom, from whose wisdom they are: In wisdom thou hast made them all. As they are some of them more excellent than others, they certainly do, in a clearer and more eminent degree, glorify God. In the great fabric, that part which hath the place, the heavens, hath also this advantage; the greatness of the great Architect appears somewhat more bright in them. Therefore are they singled out from the rest for that purpose, both here, ver. 3, and Psalm xix. 1. But beyond all the rest, and even beyond them, are the wisdom and goodness of God displayed in the framing of his reasonable creatures.

There are of them two stages; the one higher, the angels, the other lower, yet, but a little lower, man: as here, we have them together.

Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels—of the nature of a spirit, a rational, intelligent spirit— * * * *

EXPOSITORY LECTURES ON PSALM XXXIX.*

LECTURE I.

VER. 1. I said I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue; I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me.

CERTAINLY it is a high dignity that is conferred upon man, that he may as freely and frequently as he will, converse with him who made him, the great king of heaven and earth. It is, indeed, a wonder, that God should honor poor creatures so much; but it is no less strange, that men having so great privileges, the most part of them do use them so little. Seldom do we come to him in times of ease. And when we are spurred to it by afflictions and pains, commonly we try all other means rather than this, which is the alone true and unfailing comfort. But such as have learned this way of laying their pained head and heart on his bosom, they are truly happy, though in the world's language they be never so miserable.

This is the resource of this holy man in the time of his affliction, whatever it was,—prayer and tears, bemoaning himself before his God and father, and that the more fervently, in that he finds his speaking to men so unprofitable; and therefore he refrains from it. The psalm consists of two parts, his silence to men, and his speech to God; and both of them are set with such sweet notes of music, though they be sad, that they deserve well to be committed To the chief musician.

* First published in the edition of the Expository Works, in two volumes, printed for David Wilson, Edinburgh, 1748.

I said I will take heed to my ways.] It was to himself that he said it; and it is impossible for any other to prove a good or a wise man, without much of this kind of speech to himself. It is one of the most excellent and distinguishing faculties of a reasonable creature; much beyond vocal speech, for in that, some birds may imitate us; but neither bird nor beast have anything of this kind of language, of reflecting or discoursing with itself. It is a wonderful brutality in the greatest part of men, who are so little conversant in this kind of speech, being framed and disposed for it, and which is not only of itself excellent, but of continual use and advantage; but it is a common evil among men, to go abroad, and out of themselves, which is a madness and a true distraction. It is true, a man hath need of a well-set mind, when he speaks to himself; for otherwise, he may be worse company to himself than if he were with others. But he ought to endeavor to have a better with him, to call in God to his heart to dwell with him. If thus we did, we should find how sweet this were to speak to ourselves, by now and then intermixing our speech with discourses unto God. For want of this, the most part not only lose their time in vanity, in their converse abroad with others, but do carry in heaps of that vanity to the stock which is in their own hearts, and do converse with that in secret, which is the greatest and deepest folly in the world.

Other solitary employments, as reading the disputes and controversies that are among men, are things not unuseful; yet, all turns to waste, if we read not our own heart, and study that. This is the study of every holy man, and between this and the consideration of God, he spends his hours and endeavors. Some have recommended the reading of men more than books; but what is in the one, or in both of them, or all the world beside, without this? A man shall find himself out of his proper business, if he acquaint not himself with this, to speak much with God and with himself, concerning the ordering of his own ways.

It is true, it is necessary for some men, in some particular charges and stations, to regard the ways of others; and besides something also there may be of a wise observing of others, to improve the good and the evil we see in them, to our own advantage, and the bettering of our own ways, looking on them to make the repercussion the stronger on ourselves; but except it be out of charity and wisdom, it flows either from uncharitable malice, or else a curious and vain spirit, to look much and narrowly into the ways of others, and to know the manner of living of persons about us, and so to know everything but ourselves: like travellers, that are well seen in foreign and remote parts, but strangers in the affairs of their own country at home. The check that Christ gave to Peter, is due to such, What is that to thee? Follow thou me. John xxi. 22. "Look thou to thine own feet, that they may be set in the right way." It is a strange thing, that men should lay out their diligence abroad to their loss, when their pains might be bestowed to their advantage nearer at hand, at home within themselves.

This that the psalmist here speaks of, taking heed to his ways, as it imports his present diligence, so, also, it hath in it reflection on his ways past, and these two do mutually assist one another. He shall never regulate his ways before him, who has not wisely considered his ways past; for there is wisdom gathered from the observation of what is gone, to the choosing where to walk in time to come, to see where he is weakest, and lies exposed to the greatest hazard, and there to guard. Thus David expresses it in another psalm, I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies. Psalm cxix. 52. And this should be done not only in the great change of one's first conversion from sin, but this double observance must be still continued every day: a man should be looking to his rule, and laying that rule to his way, and observing where the bulk and nonconformity to the rule is, and renewing his repentance for that, and amending it the next day, that still the present day may be the better for yesterday's error.

And surely there is much need of this, if we consider how we are encompassed about with hazards, and snares, and a variety of temptations, and how little we have either of strength to overcome, or of wisdom to avoid them, especially they being secretly set and unseen (which makes them the more dangerous), everywhere in the way in which we must walk, and even in those ways where we least think. Everywhere does the enemy of our souls lay traps and snares for us; in our table, in our bed, in our company, and alone. If the heart be earthly and carnal, there is the snare of riches and gains, or pleasures present, to think upon: and if it delight in spiritual things, that walk is not exempted either; there are snares of doubtings, presumption, and pride. And in the converse of one Christian with another, where spiritual affection hath been stirred, it turns often to carnal passions; as the apostle says of the Galatians, they begin in the spirit and end in the flesh. Gal. iii. 3.

This observing and watching, as it is needful, so it is a very delightful thing, though it will be hard and painful to the unexperienced. To have a man's actions and words continually curbed, so that he can not speak or do what he would,—these are fetters and bonds; yet, to those that know it, it is a pleasure to gain experience, and to be more skilled in preventing the surprises of our enemies, and upon that to have something added to our own art, and to be more able to resist upon new occasions, and to find ourselves every day outstripping ourselves. That is the sweetest life in the world, for the soul to be dressing itself for the espousals of the great King, putting on more of the ornaments and beauties of holiness. That is our glory, to be made conformable to the image of God, and of Jesus Christ. If an image had sense, it would desire nothing so much as to look on the original whence it received its name, and to become more and more like it: so it is the pleasure of renewed souls, to be looking on him, and to be growing daily more like him, whose living image they are, and to be fitting themselves for that day of glory wherein they shall be like him in the perfection they are capable of. And this makes death more pleasant than life to the believer: that which seems so bitter to the most of men, is sweetened to them most wonderfully. The continual observance of a man's ways, the keeping a watch continually over them, this casts a light upon the dark passage of death, which is at the end of that walk, and conveys him through to the fullness of life. So that the man who observes himself and his ways through life, hath little to do in examining them when he comes to die. It is a piece of strange folly, that we defer the whole, or a great part of our day's work, to the twilight of the evening, and are so cruel to ourselves, as to keep the great load of our life for a few hours or days, and for a pained, sickly body. He who makes it his daily work to observe his ways, is not astonished when that day comes, which long before was familiar to him every day.

That I sin not with my tongue.] It is the Wise man's advice, Keep thy heart with all diligence, or, above all keeping; and he gives the satisfying reason of it, for out of it are the issues of life. Prov. iv. 23. Such as the spring is, so will the streams be. The heart is the spring whence all the natural life and vital spirits flow through the body; and, in the Scripture sense, it is the spring of all our actions and conversation; for it sends out emissaries through all, through the eye, the hand, and all the senses and organs of the body, but through none more constantly and abundantly than the tongue; and therefore Solomon, after these words, immediately adds, Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee. The current of the heart runs in that channel; for it is the organ of societies, and is commonly employed in all the converse of men. And we can still, when all the other members are useless, use our tongues in regretting their unfitness for their offices: as sick and old persons are wont to do. Thus David here, as it seems, under some bodily sickness, labors to refrain his tongue, and lest it should prove too strong for him, he puts a curb upon it: though it did not free him from inward frettings of his heart, yet he lays a restraint upon his tongue, to stay the progress of sin, that grows in vigor by going out, and produces and begets sin of the same kind in the hearts and mouths of others, when it passes from the heart to the tongue. The Apostle James does amply and excellently teach the great importance of ordering the tongue in all a Christian's life. But we are ever learning, and never taught. We hear how excellent a guard this is to our lives, to keep a watch over our tongues; but, I fear, few of us gain the real advantage of this rule. We are far from the serious thoughts that a religious person had of this scripture, who, when he heard it read, withdrew himself for many years to the study of this precept, and made very good proficiency in it.

In all the disorders of the world, the tongue hath a great share. To let pass those irruptions of infernal furies, blasphemies and cursing, lying and uncharitable speeches, how much have we to account for unprofitable talking! It is a lamentable thing, that there is nothing, for the most part, in common entertainments and societies of men together, but refuse and trash; as if their tongues were given them for no other end than to be their shame, by discovering their folly and weakness! So likewise that of impatient speech in trouble and affliction, which certainly springs from an unmortified spirit, that hath learned nothing of that great lesson of submission to the will of God. But for all the disorders of the tongue, the remedy must begin at the heart. Purge the fountain, and then the streams will be clean. Keep thy heart, and then it will be easy to keep thy tongue. It is a great help in the quality of speech, to abate in the quantity; not to speak rashly, but to ponder what we are going to say. Set a watch before the door of thy lips. Psalm cxli. 3. He bids us not build it up like a stone wall, that nothing may go in or come out, but he speaks of a door, which may be sometimes open, oft-times shut, but withal, to have a watch standing before it continually. A Christian must labor to have his speech as contracted as can be, in the things of this earth; and even in divine things, our words should be few and wary. In speaking of the greatest things, it is a great point of wisdom not to speak much. That is David's resolution, to keep silence, especially before the wicked, who came to visit him, probably, when he was sick: while they were there, he held a watch before his lips, to speak nothing of God's hand on him, lest they should have mistaken him. And a man may have some thoughts of divine things, that it were very impertinent to speak out indifferently to all sorts even of good persons. This is a talkative age, and people contract a faculty to speak much in matters of religions, though their words for the most part be only the productions of their own brain; little of these things in their hearts. Surely, speeches of this kind are as bad as any, when holy things are spoken of with a notional freedom, where there is nothing but empty words. They who take themselves to solitude, choose the best and easiest part, if they have a warrant so to do; for this world is a tempestuous sea, in which there are many rocks, and a great difficulty it is to steer this little helm aright amidst them. However, the Apostle James makes it a great character of a Christian's perfection: If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man. Jam. iii. 2. But where is that man? Seeing we find men generally, and most of all ourselves, so far from this, it can not choose but work this, to stir up ardent desires in us, to be removed to that blessed society where there shall be never a word amiss, nor a word too much.

LECTURE II.

VER. 2. I was dumb with silence; I held my peace even from good; and my sorrow was stirred.

VER. 3. My heart was hot within me; while I was musing, the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue.

It is a very useful and profitable thing, to observe the motions and deportments of the spirits of wise and holy men, in all the various postures and conditions they are in. It is for that purpose they are drawn out to us in the Scriptures. There are some graces that are more proper, and come more in action, in times of ease and prosperity, such as temperance, moderation of mind, humility, and compassion. Others are more proper for times of distress, as faith, fortitude, patience, and resignation. It is very expedient, if not necessary, that affliction have its turns, and frequently, in the lives of the children of God; it is the tempest, that gives evidence of the pilot's skill. And as the Lord delighteth in all his works, looks on the frame and conduct of all things with pleasure, so he is delighted to look on this part, on this low sea of troubles, to see his champions meet with hard and pressing trials, such as sometimes do not only make them feel them, but do often make the conflict dubious to them, so that they seem to be almost foiled, yet do they acquit themselves, and come off with honor. It is not the excellency of grace, to be insensible in trouble (as some philosophers would have their wise men), but to overcome and be victorious.

Among the rest of this holy man's troubles, this was one, that the wicked did reproach him. This is a sharp arrow that flies thick in the world. It is one of the sharpest stings of poverty, that, as it is pinched with wants at home, so it is met with scorn abroad. It is reckoned among the sharp suffering, of holy men, Heb. xi. 36, that they suffered bitter mockings. Now, men commonly return these in the same kind, that is, by the tongue, whereof David is here aware. He refrains himself even from good; not only from his just defence, but even from good and pious discourses. We do so easily exceed in our words, that it is better sometimes to be wholly silent, than to speak that which is good: for our good borders so near upon evil, and so easy is the transition from the one to the other, that though we begin to speak of God and good things with a good intention, yet how quickly run we into another channel! Passion and self having stolen in, turn us quite from the first design of our speech. And this chiefly in disputes and debates about religion, wherein, though we begin with zeal for God, yet, oft-times in the end, we justify nothing but our own passion; and sometimes we do lie one against another in defence of what we call the truth.

It can not be denied, that to a holy heart, it is a great violence to be shut up altogether from the speech of God. It burns within, especially in the time of affliction, as was the case of Jeremiah: Then I said, I will not make mention of him, nor speak any more in his name: but his word was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and could not stay. Jer. xx. 9. So is it here with David; therefore he breaks out: the fire burns upward, and he speaks to God.

Let this be our way, when we can not find ease among men, to seek it in God. He knows the language of his children, and will not mistake it; yea, where there may be somewhat of weakness and distemper, he will bear with it. In all your distresses, in all your moanings, go to him, pour out your tears to him. Not only fire, but even water, where it wants a vent, will break upward. These tears drop not in our own lap, but they fall on his, and he hath a bottle to put them in: if ye empty them there, they shall return in wine of strong consolation.

Ver. 4. Now David's request is, Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am. In which he does not desire a response from God about the day of his death, but instruction concerning the frailty and shortness of his life. But did not David know this? Yes, he knew it, and yet he desires to know it. It is very fit we should ask of God that he would make us to know the things that we do know; I mean, that what we know empty and barely, we may know spiritually and fruitfully, and if there be any measure of this knowledge, that it may increase and grow more. We know that we are sinners, but that knowledge commonly produces nothing but cold, dry, and senseless confusion: but the right knowledge of sin would prick our hearts, and cause us to pour them out before the Lord. We know that Jesus is the Savior of sinners; it were fit to pray that we might know more of him, so much of him as might make us shape and fashion our hearts to his likeness. We know we must die, and that it is no long course to the utmost period of life; yet our hearts are little instructed by this knowledge. How great need have we to pray this prayer with David here, or that with Moses, Teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Psalm xc. 12. Did we indeed know and consider how quickly we shall pass hence, it were not possible for us to cleave so fast to the things of this life, and, as foolish children, to wade in ditches, and fill our laps with mire and dirt; to prefer base earth and flesh to immortality and glory.

That I may know how frail I am.] Most part of men are foolish, inconsiderate creatures, like unto the very beasts that perish, Psalm xlix. 12, only they are capable of greater vanity and misery; but, in as irrational a way, they toil on and hurry themselves in a multitude of business, by multitudes of desires, fears, and hopes, and know not whither all tends. But one well-advised thought of this one thing, would temper them in their hottest pursuits, if they would but think how frail they are, how vain a passing thing, not only these their particular desires and projects are, but they themselves, and their whole life. David prays that he may know his end, and his prayer is answered; Behold, thou hast made my days as a hand-breadth. If we were more in requests of this kind, we should receive more speedy and certain answers. If this be our request, to know ourselves, our frailties and vanity, we shall know that our days are few and evil, know both the brevity and vanity of them.

Ver. 5. Thou hast measured out my days as a hand-breadth. That is one of the shortest measures. We need not long lines to measure our lives by: each one carries a measure about with him, his own hand; that is the longest and fullest measure. It is not so much as a span: that might possibly have been the measure of old age in the infancy of the world, but now it is contracted to a hand-breadth, and that is the longest. But how many fall short of that! Many attain not to a finger-breadth: multitudes pass from the womb to the grave; and how many end their course within the compass of childhood!

Whether we take this hand-breadth for the fourscore years that is ordinarily the utmost extent of man's life in our days, or the four periods of our age, in which we use to distinguish it, childhood, youth, manhood, and old age, there are great numbers we see take up their lodging ere they come near the last of any of these, and few attain to the outmost border of them. All of us are but a hand-breadth from death, and not so much; for many of us have passed a great part of that hand-breadth already, and we know not how little of it is behind. We use commonly to divide our lives by years, months, weeks, and days, but it is all but one day; there is the morning, noon, afternoon, and evening. Man is as the grass that springs in the morning. Psalm xc. 5. As for all the days that are passed of our life, death hath them rather than we, and they are already in its possession. When we look back on them, they appear but as a shadow or dream; and if they be so to us, how much more short are they in the sight of God! So says David here: When I look on thee and thy eternity, mine age is as nothing before thee. What is our life, being compared to God, before whom a thousand years are but as one day! And it is less—like yesterday when it is past, and that is but a thought! The whole duration of the world is but a point in respect to eternity; and how small a point is the life of man, even in comparison with that!

The brevity of our life is a very useful consideration. From it we may learn patience under all our crosses and troubles; they may be shorter than life, but they can be no longer. There are few whom an affliction hath lain on all the days of their life; but though that were the case, yet a little time, and how quickly is it done! While thou art asleep, there is a cessation of thy trouble; and when awake, bemoaning and weeping for it, and for sin that is the cause of it, in the mean time it is sliding away. In all the bitter blasts that blow on thy face, thou who art a Christian indeed, mayst comfort thyself in the thought of the good lodging that is before thee. To others, it were the greatest comfort, that their afflictions in this life were lengthened out to eternity.

Likewise, this may teach us temperance in those things that are called the good things of this world. Though a man had a lease of all the fine things the world can afford for his whole life (which yet never any man that I know of had), what is it? A feigned dream of an hour long. None of those things that it now takes so much delight it, will accompany the cold lump of clay to the grave. Within a little while, those that are married and rejoice, shall be as if they rejoiced not, 1 Cor. vii. 29, as if they never had done it; and since they shall be so quickly, a wise man makes little difference, in these things, between their presence and their absence.

This thought should also teach us diligence in our business. We have a short day, and much to do; it were fit to be up early; to remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth. And ye that are come to riper years, be advised to lay hold on what remains; ye know not how little it is.

The more you fill yourselves with the things of this life, the less desire you will have after those rivers of pleasure that are at God's right hand. These shall never run dry, but all those other things shall be dried up within a little space; at the furthest, when old age and death come, if not sooner. And on the other side, the more we deny ourselves the sensual enjoyments of the present world, we grow the liker to that Divine estate, and are made the surer of it. And I am sure, all will grant that this is a very gainful exchange.

Verily, every man at his best estate is altogether vanity.] It is no wonder that the generality of men are strangers to God, for they are strangers to themselves. The cure of both these evils is from the same hand. He alone can teach us what he is, and what we are ourselves. All know and see that their life is short, and themselves vanity; but this holy man thought it needful to ask the true notion of it from above, and he receives the measure of his life, even a hand-breadth. There is a common imposture among people, to read their fortunes by their hands; but this is true palmistry indeed, to read the shortness of our life upon the palms of our hands.

Our days are not only few, but we ourselves are vanity. Every man, even a godly man, as he is a partaker of this life, is not exempted from vanity: nay, he knows it better than any other: but this thought comforts him, that he hath begun that life which is above and beyond all vanity. The words are weighty and full. It is not a problem, or a doubtful thing, but, surely, every man is vanity. I may call it a definition, and so it is proved, Psalm cxlv. 2, 3: What is man? He is like to vanity, and his days are as a shadow that passes away. His days do not only soon decline and pass away as a shadow, but also they are like vanity. While he appears to be something, he is nothing but the figure and picture of vanity. He is like it, not the copy of it, but rather the original and idea of it, for he hath derived vanity to the whole creation: he hath subjected the creatures to it, and hath thrown such a load of it upon them, that they groan under it; and so, vanity agrees to him properly, constantly, and universally. Every man, and that at his best estate, or, as the word is, in his settled and fixed state. Set him as sure and as high as you will, yet he is not above that; he carried it about with him as he does his nature.

This is a very profitable truth to think on, though some kind of hearers, even of the better sort, would judge it more profitable to hear of cases of conscience. But this is a great case of conscience, to consider it well, and carry the impression of it home with you on your hearts—the extreme vanity of ourselves; that we are nothing but vanity. And the note that is added here, Selah, if it import port anything to the sense and confirmation of what it is added to, it agrees well to this; but if it be only a musical note, to direct, as some think, the elevation, or according to others, the falling of the voice, it fits the sense very well. For you have man here lifted up and cast down again: lifted up—Man at his best estate, and from that thrown down to nothing, even in that estate, altogether vanity. What is that? It is, as the word signifies, an earth- ly vapor, and it is generally used to signify things of the least and meanest use, the most empty, airy things. So idols are often called by that name: they are nothing in respect of what is attributed to them by the children of men. And such a thing is man: he seems to be something, and is, indeed, nothing: as it is Psalm lxii. 9: Men of low degree are vanity—possibly that may be granted for a truth, and they pass for such, but he adds—Men of high degree are a lie: they promise something, and look bigger like, but they are nothing more, except this, a lie; and the greater they are, the louder the lie.

This it is, then, that we should acquaint ourselves with: that man, in this present life, in all the high advantages of it, is an empty, feeble, fading thing. If we look to the frame of man's body, what is he but a muddy wall, a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust? If we look within, there is nothing there but a sink and heap of filth. The body of man is not only subject to fevers, hectics, &c., that make the wall to moulder down, but take him in his health and strength, what is he but a bag of rottenness? And why should he take delight in his beauty, which is but the appearance of a thing, which a fit of sickness will so easily deface, or the running of a few years spoil the fashion of? A great heat or a cold puts that frame into disorder; a few days' sickness lays him in the dust, or much blood gathered within, gathers fevers and pleurisies, and so destroys that life it should maintain; or a fly or a crumb of bread may stop his breath, and so end his days.

If we consider men in societies, in cities and towns, often hath the overflowing scourge of famine and pestilence laid them waste; and from these they can not secure themselves in their greatest plenty and health, but they come on a sudden, and unlooked for. If we could see all the parts and persons in a great city at once, how many woes and miseries should we behold there! How many either want bread, or scarcely have it by hard labor! Then, to hear the groans of dying persons, and the sighs and weepings of those about them—how many of these things are within the walls of great cities at all times! Great palaces can not keep out death, but it breaks through and enters there, and thither, oft-times, the most painful and shameful diseases that are incident to the sons of men, resort. Death by vermin, hath seized on some of the greatest of kings that have ever been in the world. If we look on generals who have commanded the greatest armies, they carry about with them poor frail bodies as well as others; they may be killed with one small wound as well as the meanest soldier; and a few days' intemperance hath taken some of the most gallant and courageous of them away in the midst of their success. And, sure I am, he who believes and considers the life to come, and looks on this, and sees what it is, makes little account of those things that have so big a sound in the world: the revolutions of states, crowns, kingdoms, cities, towns, how poor, inconsiderable things are they, being compared with eternity! And he that looks not on them as such, is a fool.

LECTURE III.

VER. 6. Surely every man walketh in a vain show; surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.

THERE is a part of our hand-breadth past since we last left this place, and, as we are saying this, we are wearing out some portion of the rest of it. It were well if we considered this, so as to make a better improvement of what remains, than, I believe we shall find, upon examination of our ways, we have made of what is past. Let us see if we can gain the space of an hour, that we may be excited to a better management of the latter part of our time, than we have made of the former.

We are all, I think, convinced of the vanity of man, as to his outside, that he is a feeble, weak, poor creature; but we may have hope of somewhat better in that which is the man indeed, his mind and intellectual part. It is true, that that was originally excellent, and that there is somewhat of a radical excellency still in the soul of man; yet, it is so desperately degenerate, that, naturally, man, even in that consideration, is altogether vanity, in all the pieces of him: his mind is but a heap of vanity, nothing there but ignorance, folly, and disorder. And if we think not so, we are the more foolish and ignorant. That which passes with great pomp, under the title of learning and science, is commonly nothing else than a rhapsody of words and empty terms, which have nothing in them to make known the internal nature of things.

But even those persons who have the improvement of learning and education, who understand the model and government of affairs, who see their defects, and entertain themselves with various shapes of amending and reforming them, even in them we shall find nothing but a sadder and more serious vanity. It is a tormenting and vexing thing for men to promise to themselves great reformation and bettering of things. That thought usually deludes the wisest of men; they must at length come to that conclusion of Solomon, after much labor to little purpose, that crooked things can not be made straight, Eccles. i. 15. Yea, many things grow worse by laboring to rectify them; therefore he adds, verse 18, And he that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow.

As for knowledge in religion, we see the greatest part of the world lying in gross darkness; and even among Christians, how much ignorance of these things: which appears in this, that there are such swarms and productions of debates and contentions, that they are grown past number. And each party is confident that truth is on his side; and ordinarily the most ignorant and erroneous are the most confident and most imperious in their determinations. Surely it were a great part of our wisdom to free our spirits from these empty fruitless janglings that abound in the Christian world.

It were an endless toil to go through all degrees, professions, and employments of men in the world; we may go through nations, countries, crafts, schools, colleges, courts, camps, councils of state, and parliaments, and find nothing in all these but still more of this trouble and vexation in a finer dress and fashion, altogether vanity!

Every man walketh in a vain show.] His walk is nothing but a going on in continual vanity, adding a new stock of vanity, of his own coining, to what he has already within, and vexation of spirit woven all along in with it. He walks in an image, as the word is; converses with things of no reality, and which have no solidity in them, and he himself has as little. He himself is a walking image, in the midst of these images. They who are taken with the conceit of images and pictures, that is an emblem of their own life, and of all other men's also. Every man's fancy is to himself a gallery of pictures, and there he walks up and down, and considers not how vain these are, and how vain a thing he himself is.

My brethren, they are happy persons (but few are they in number), who are truly weaned from all those images and fancies the world dotes so much upon. If many of the children of men would turn their own thoughts backward in the evening but of one day, what would they find for the most part, but that they have been walking among these pictures, and passing from one vanity to another, and back again to and fro, to as little purpose as the running up and down of children at their play! He who runs after honor, pleasure, popular esteem,—what do you think? Does not that man walk in an image, pursuing after that which hath no other being than what the opinion and fancy of men give to it?—especially the last, which is a thing so fluctuating, uncertain, and inconstant, that while he hath it, he hath nothing? The other image that man follows and worships, is that in the text, that wretched madness of heaping up riches. This is the great foolishness and disease especially of old age, that the less way a man has to go, he makes the greater provision for it. When the hands are stiff, and fit for no other labor, they are fitted and composed for scraping together. But for what end dost thou take all this pains? If for thyself, a little sober care will do thy turn, if thy desires be sober; and if not so, thy diligence were better bestowed in impairing and diminishing of these; that is the easier way a great deal. And if it be for others, why dost thou take a certain unease to thyself, for the uncertain ease of others? And who these are thou dost not know ; may be, such as thou didst never intend them for. It were good we used more easy and undistracting diligence for the increasing of those treasures which we can not deny are far better, and whosoever hath them may abound therein with increase ; he knows well for whom he gathers them ; he himself shall possess them through all eternity.

If there were not a hope beyond this life, there were reason for that passionate word in Psalm lxxxix. 47 : Why hast thou made all men in vain ? To what purpose were it for poor wretched man to have been all his days tossed upon the waves of vanity, and then to lie down in the grave, and be no more heard of ? But it is not so : he is made capable of a noble and blessed life beyond this ; and our forgetfulness of this is the cause of all our misery and vanity here.

It is a great folly to complain of the shortness of our life, and yet to lavish it out so prodigally on trifles and shadows. If it were well managed, it would be sufficient for all we have to do. The only way to live indeed, is to be doing service to God and good to men : this is to live much in a little time. But when we play the fool in mispending our time, it may be indeed a sad thought to us, when we find it gone, and we are benighted in the dark so far from our home. But those that have their souls untied from this world and knit to God, they need not complain of the shortness of it, having laid hold on eternal life. For this life is flying away, there is no laying hold on it ; and it is no matter how soon it go away ; the sooner the better, for to such persons it seems rather to go too slow.

LECTURE IV.

VER. 7. And now, Lord, what wait I for ? My hope is in thee.

To entertain the minds of men with thoughts of their own vanity, and discourses of their own misery, seems to be sad and unpleasant ; but certainly it is not unprofitable, unless it be our own choice to make it so, and that were the greatest vanity and misery of all. Indeed, if there were no help for this sore evil, then the common shift were not to be blamed, yea, it were to be chosen as the only help in such a desperate case, not to think on it, to forget our misery, and to divert our thoughts from it by all possible means, rather than to increase it, and torment ourselves by insisting and poring on it ; and in that case shallow minds would have the advantage, that could not converse with these sad thoughts, for to increase this knowledge were but to increase sorrow. But far be it from us thus to determine : there is a hope which is a help to this evil, and this is what this holy man fixes on : And now, Lord, my hope is in thee. Otherwise, it were strange that the most excellent piece of the visible creation should be made subject to the most incurable unhappiness ; to feel misery which he can not shun, and to be tormented with desires that can not be satisfied. But there is some better expectation for the souls of men, and it is no other than HIMSELF who made them.

The wisest natural men have discoursed of man's vanity, and passionately bemoaned it : but in this they have fallen short, how to remedy it. They have aimed at it, and come near it, but have not been able to work it : they still labored to be satisfied in themselves. They speak somewhat of reason, but that will not do it ; for man being fallen under the curse of God, there is nothing but darkness and folly in himself. The only way to blessedness is by going out of ourselves unto God.

All our discourses of our own vanity will but further disquiet us, if they do not terminate here, if they do not fix on his eternal happiness, goodness, and verity.

I am persuaded, if many would ask this question of themselves, What wait I for ? they would puzzle themselves and not find an answer. There are a great many things that men desire and are gaping after, but few seek after one thing chiefly and stayedly : they float up and down, and are carried about without any certain motion, but by fancy and by guess ; and no wind can be fair for such persons, who aim at no certain haven.

If we put this question to ourselves, What would I have ? it were easy for many to answer—I would have an easy, quiet, peaceable life in this world. So would an ox or a horse. And is that all ? May be you would have a greater height of pleasure and honor. But think on this one thing : there is this one crack and vanity that spoils all these things, that they will not bear you up when you lean to them in times of distress ; and besides, when you have them they may be pulled from you, and if not, you must be plucked away from them within a little while. There is much seeming content in the pursuit of these things, but they are lost with greater discontent. It is God's goodness to men, to blast all things in the world to them, and to break their fairest hopes, that they may be constrained to look above to himself : he beats them from all shores, that he may bring them to the Rock that is higher than they. Psalm lxi. 2.

Oh, that God would once touch some of your hearts, who are under the chains of darkness, that ye might once bethink where to rest your heads in the midst of all our confusions. And here is the resting-place ; hope in God. Now, Lord, what wait I for ? My hope is in thee. Blessed soul that can say, " Lord, thou seest I desire nothing but thyself (as Peter said, Lord, thou knowest I love thee) : all the corners of my heart stand open in thy sight ; thou seest if there be any other desire or expectation but to please thee : and if there be any such thing in me (for I see it not), I pray thee discover it to me, and through thy grace it shall lodge no longer. My heart is thine alone, it is consecrated to thee; and if anything would profane thy temple, if it will not go forth by fair warning, let it be scourged out by thy rod, yea by any rod whatsoever it pleaseth thee to choose."

My hope is in thee.] This holy man, seeing the vanity of all other expectations and pursuits of men, at length runs to this: And now, Lord, what wait I for? My hope is in thee. He finds nothing but moving sand everywhere else; but he finds this Eternal Rock to be a strong foundation, as the Hebrew word by which he is styled doth signify. It is true, the union of the heart with God is made up by faith and love; but yet both these, in this our present condition of absence and distance from God, do act themselves much by the third grace which is joined with them, and that is hope. For faith is conversant about things that are not seen, and in a great part, that are not as yet, but are to come; and the spirit of faith, choosing things that are to come, is called hope. It is true they are not so wholly deferred, as that they possess nothing; but yet the utmost they possess is but a pledge and earnest-penny, a small thing in respect of that eternal inheritance they look for. What they have here is of the same kind with what they expect, but it is but a little portion of it; the smiles and glances of their Father's face, foretastes of heaven, which their souls are refreshed with. But these are but rare, and for a short time.

Hope is the great stock of believers: it is that which upholds them under all the faintings and sorrows of their mind in this life, and in their going through the valley and shadow of death. It is the helmet of their salvation, which, while they are looking over to eternity, beyond this present time, covers and keeps their head safe amid all the darts that fly round about them. In the present discomfort and darkness of mind, and the saddest hours they meet with in this life, hope is that which keeps up the soul; and it is that which David cheered up his soul with, Psalm xlii. 5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted in me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance. And even in this point the children of the world have no great advantage of the children of God, as to the things of this life; for much of their satisfaction, such as it is, doth hang, for the most part, on their hope; the happiest and richest of them do still piece it out with some further expectation, something they look for beyond what they have, and the expectation of that pleases them more than all their present possessions. But this great disadvantage they have, that all their hopes are but heaps of delusions and lies, and either they die and obtain them not, or if they do obtain them, yet they obtain them not; they are so far short of what they fancied and imagined of them beforehand. But the hope of the children of God, as it is without fail sure, so it is inconceivably full and satisfying, far beyond what the largest apprehension of any man is able to reach. Hope in God! What is wanting there?

This hope lodges only in the pure heart: it is a precious liquor that can be kept only in a clean vessel, and that which is not so can not receive it, but what it seems to receive it corrupts and destroys. It is a confidence arising from peace, agreement, and friendship, which can not subsist between the God of purity and those who allow unholiness in themselves. It is a strange impudence for men to talk of their trust and hope in God, who are in perfect hostility against him. Bold fellows go through dangers here, but it will not be so hereafter. Jer. ii. 27. They turn to me the back, and not the face; yet, in their trouble, they say, Arise and save us: they do it as confidently as if they never had despised God, but they mistake the matter; it is not so. Go and cry, says he, to the gods whom ye have chosen. Judg. x. 14. When men come to die, then they catch hold of the mercy of God; but from that their filthy hands are beat off, there is no help for them there, and so they fall down to the pit. A holy fear of God, and a happy hope in him, are commonly linked together. Behold the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy. Psalm xxxiii. 19.

And even in those who are more purified from sin, yet too large draughts of lawful pleasures do clog the spirits, and make this hope grow exceedingly weak. Surely the more we fill ourselves with these things, we leave the less appetite for the consolations of this blessed hope. They can not know the excellency of this hope, who labor not to keep it unmixed: it is best alone, as the richest wines and oils, which are the worst of mixtures. Be sober and hope, says the apostle Peter, 1 Epistle i. 13: keep your mind sober, and your hope shall be pure. If any thing or person leans on two supporters, whereof the one is whole and sound, and the other broken or crooked, that which is unsound will break, though the other remain whole, and that which was propped up by it will fall; whereas the one that was whole had been sufficient: thus it is when we divide our hopes between God and this present world, or any other good. Those who place their whole hopes on God, they gather in all their desires to him; the streams of their affections are not scattered and left in the muddy ditches of the world, they do not fall into stinking pools, but being gathered into one main torrent, they run on in that channel to the sea of his eternal goodness.

My hope is in thee.] We can not choose but all of us think that God is immensely good in himself; but that which is nearer, whereon our hearts most rise, is a relative goodness, that he is good to us, and that he is so perfectly and completely good, that having made choice of him, and obtained union with him, we need no more. Were once the hearts of the children of men persuaded of this, all their deliberations were at an end : they would not only choose no other, but defer no longer to fix on him. And what can trouble the soul that is thus established ? Nor change or overturning of outward things. Though the frame of the world itself were shaken to pieces, yet still the bottom of this hope is upon him who changeth not. And whatever the pressures be, whether poverty, sickness, or disquiet of mind, thou mayest draw abundant consolation from him in whom thou hast placed thy hope. There is only one thing that cruelly assaults it by the way, and that is the guilt of sin. All afflictions and troubles we meet with are not able to mar this hope or quench it, for where it is strong, it either breaks through them or flies above them : they can not overcome it, for there is no affliction inconsistent with the love of God ; yea, the sharpest affliction may sometimes have the clearest characters of his love upon it. But it is sin that presents him as angry to the view of the soul. When he looks through that cloud, he seems to be an enemy ; and when we apprehend him in that aspect, we are affrighted, and presently apprehend a storm. But even in this case, this hope apprehends his mercy. And thus David here.

LECTURE V.

VER. 8. Deliver me from all my transgressions : make me not the reproach of the foolish.

THIS is indeed the basis and foundation of all our other hopes, the free pardon of our sins. But none must entertain those sins, if they desire to be pardoned. Repentance and remission of sins are still linked together in the Scriptures ; and he that would have sin pardoned, and yet live in it, or retain the love of it, would have God and sin reconciled together, and that can never be. David finds his sins pressing him down ; he sees them as an army of men set in battle array about him ; and whither flies he for deliverance ? Even to him whom he had offended.

Ver. 9, 10. I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it. Remove thy stroke away from me : I am consumed by the blow of thy hand.] We are naturally very partial judges of ourselves ; and, as if we were not sufficiently able by nature, we study and devise by art to deceive ourselves. We are ready to reckon any good that is in us to the full, nay, to multiply it beyond what it is ; and further to help this, we use commonly to look on those who have less goodness in them, who are weaker, more foolish, and worse than ourselves ; and so we magnify the sense of our own worth and goodness by that comparison. And as in the goodness we have, or imagine we have, so likewise in the evils we suffer, we use to extol them very much in conceit. We account our lightest afflictions very great ; and to heighten our thoughts of them, we do readily take a view of those who are more at ease and less afflicted than ourselves ; and by these devices we nourish in ourselves pride, by the overweening conceit of our goodness, and impatience, by the overfeeling sense of our evils. But if we would help ourselves by comparison, we should do well to view those persons who are, or have been, eminent for holiness, recorded in Holy Writ, or whom we know in our own times, or have heard of in former times ; and by this means, we should lessen the great opinion we have of our own worth. And so likewise should we consider the many instances of great calamities and sorrows, which would tend to quiet our minds, and enable us to possess our souls in patience, under the little burden of trials that lies upon us. And, especially, we shall find those instances to fall in together, that as persons have been very eminent in holiness, they have also been eminent in suffering very sore strokes and sharp scourges from the hand of God. If we would think on their consuming blows and broken bones, their bones burnt as a hearth, and their flesh withered as grass, certainly we should entertain our thoughts sometimes with wonder at God's indulgence to us, that we are so little afflicted, when so many of the children of men, and so many of the children of God, suffer so many and so hard things ; and this would very much add to the stock of our praises. We should not think that we are more innocent in not deserving those things that are inflicted on others, but rather, that he who thus measures out to them and to us, knows our size, and sees how weak we are in comparison of them ; and that therefore he is indulgent to us, not because we are better, but because we are weaker, and are not able to bear so much as he lays on the stronger shoulders. Even in the sharpest of these rods there is mercy. It is a privilege to the sheep that is ready to wander, to be beaten into the right way. When thou art corrected, think that thereby thy sins are to be purged out, thy passions and lusts to be crucified by these pains ; and certainly, he that finds any cure of the evils of his spirit by the hardest sufferings of his flesh, gets a very gainful bargain. If thou account sin thy greatest unhappiness and mischief, thou wilt be glad to have it removed on any terms. There is at least in the time of affliction, a cessation from some sins ; the raging lust of ambition and pride doth cease, when a man is laid upon his back ; and these very cessations are some advantages. But there is one great benefit of affliction, which follows in the text, that it gives him the true measure of himself.

Ver. 11. When with rebukes thou dost cor- rect man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity, Selah.] Man, at his best estate, is altogether vanity: but at its lowest estate, it appears best unto him, how much vanity he is, and how much vanity he was at his best estate, seeing he was then capable of such a change, to fall so low from such a height. As that great man who was seeking new conquests, when he fell upon the sand, and saw the print of his own body, "Why," says he, "so small a parcel of earth will serve me, who am seeking after new kingdoms!"—thus it is, when a man is brought down, then he hath the right measure of himself, when he sees how vain a thing he is.

Thus the psalmist represents it here both as an argument to move God to compassion, and to instruct himself and other men. So Job xiii. 25: Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro with the wind? and wilt thou pursue dry stubble? And Psalm ciii. 14: For he knoweth our frame: he remembereth that we are dust. And his beauty, which seemed to be his perfection, yet, when the hand of God is on him, it is blasted as a moth-eaten garment. This should teach us humility, and to beware of sin, which provokes God to pour out his heavy judgments upon us. If any be proud of honor, let him remember Nebuchadnezzar and Herod—or if proud of riches, or of wit and endowments of mind, let him think how soon God can make all these to wither and melt away. Surely, every man is vanity.

Ver. 12. Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear to my cry; hold not thy peace at my tears; for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.] What is this life we cleave so fast to, and are so uneasy to hear at parting with, what is it but a trance, and a succession of sorrows, a weary tossing and tottering upon the waves of vanity and misery? No estate or course of life is exempted from the causes of this complaint: the poorer and meaner sort are troubled with wants, and the richer with the care of what they have, and sometimes with the loss of it; and the middle sort between the two, they partake, in common, of the vexations of both, for their life is spent in care for keeping what they have, and in turmoil for purchasing more; beside a world of miseries and evils that are incident equally to all sorts of men, such as sickness and pain of body, which is both a sharp affliction, and sits close to a man, and which he is least able, either by strength of mind, or by any art or rule, to bear; and this guest does as often haunt palaces as poor cottages; there are as many groans of sick and diseased bodies within silken curtains, as in the meanest lodging. Neither does godliness exempt the best of men from the sufferings of this life. David, who was both a great man and a good man, did share deeply in these, so that his conclusion still holds truth; no instance can be found to infringe it: Surely every man is altogether vanity.

It remains only to inquire, what manner of men they are who are furnished with the best helps, and with the most comfortable mitigations of their trouble, and with the strongest additions of support and strength to bear them up under it. And it will certainly be found that godliness alone hath this advantage. And among the many consolations godly men have under their troubles, this is one, and the chief one, their recourse unto prayer. So here, and Psalm cxlii. 4, 5. So Isa. xxxviii. 2: Hezekiah turned his face toward the wall: he turns his back on all worldly counsels and vain helps, and betakes himself to prayer; and prayer brings ease, and support, and reasonable deliverance, to the godly man. But their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after other gods; Psalm xvi. 4; and this all ungodly men do when they are afflicted: they run to other imaginary helps of their own, and those prove but the multipliers of sorrows, and add to their torment; they are miserable or troublesome comforters, like unskilful physicians, who add to the patient's pain, by nauseous, ill-chosen, and, it may be, pernicious drugs.

Now, in this prayer of David, we find three things, which are the chief qualifications of all acceptable prayers. The first is humility. He humbly confesses his sins, and his own weakness and worthlessness. We are not to put on a stoical, flinty kind of spirit under our afflictions, that so we may seem to shun womanish repinings and complaints, lest we run into the other evil, of despising the hand of God, but we are to humble our proud hearts, and break our unruly passions. There is something of this in the nature of affliction itself: as in the daytime men are abroad, but the night draws them home, so in the day of prosperity, men run out after vanities and pleasures, and when the dark night of affliction comes, then men should come home, and wisely lay the matter to heart. It is meet we humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God. It is meet to say unto him, as Job xxxiv. 31, I have been chastised, or have borne chastisement, and I will not offend any more. That is a kind of language that makes the rod fall out of his hand. That prayer ascends highest which comes from the lowest depth of an humbled heart. But God resists the proud; he proclaims himself an enemy to pride and stiffness of spirit; but his grace seeks the humble heart, as water does the low ground.

If a holy heart be the temple of God, and therefore a house of prayer, certainly, when it is framed and builded for such, the foundation of that temple is laid in deep humility; otherwise, no prayers that are offered up in it have the smell of pleasing incense to him.

The second qualification of this prayer is servency and importunity, which appears in the elegant gradation of the words: Hear my prayer, my words; if not that, yct, Give ear to my cry, which is louder; and if that pre- vail not, yet, Hold not thy peace at my tears, which is the loudest of all; so David, elsewhere, calls it the voice of his weeping. Though this gift of tears doth often flow from the natural temper, yet where that temper becomes spiritual and religious, it proves a singular instrument of repentance and prayer. But yet there may be a very great height of piety and godly affections where tears are wanting; yea, this defect may proceed from a singular sublimity of religion in their souls, being acted more in the upper region of the intellectual mind, and so not communicating much with the lower affections, or these expressions of them. We are not to judge of our spiritual proficiency by the gift of prayer, for the heart may be very spiritually affected, where there is no readiness or volubility of words. The sure measure of our growth is to be had from our holiness, which stands in this, to see how our hearts are crucified to the world, and how we are possessed with the love of God, and with ardent longings after union with him, and dwelling in his presence hereafter, and in being conformed to his will here.

It is the greatest folly imaginable in some to shed tears for their sins, and within a little while to return to them again; they think there is some kind of absolution in this way of easy venting themselves by tears in prayer, and when a new temptation returns, they easily yield to it. This is lightness and foolishness, like the inconstancy of a woman who entertains new lovers in her mourning apparel, having expressed much sorrow and grief for her former husband.

Now, fervency in prayer hath in it, 1st, Attentiveness of mind. If the mind be not present, it is impossible that much of the heart and affections can be there. How shall we think that God will hear those prayers which we do not hear ourselves? And shall we think them worthy of his acceptance, that are not worthy of our thoughts? Yet we should not leave off prayer because of the wanderings of our hearts in it, for that is the very design of the devil, but still we must continue in it, and amend this fault as much as we can; by remembering, in the entry, with whom we have to do, by freeing our minds as much as may be from the entanglements and multiplicity of business, and by laboring to have our thoughts often in heaven. For where the heart is much, it will be ever and anon turning thitherward, without any difficulty.

2dly, Fervency of prayer hath in it an intense bent of the affections: to have our desires as ardent as can be for the pardon of sin, for the mortifying of our lusts and passions, for the delivering us from the love of ourselves and this present world; and for such spiritual things to pray often, and to follow it with importunity. That is to pray fervently, never to rest till an answer come.

The third qualification is faith. He who comes to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of all that diligently seek him. Heb. xi. 6. And certainly, as he that comes to God must believe this, so he that believes this, can not but come to God: and if he be not presently answered, he that believes makes no haste—he resolves patiently to wait for the Lord, and to go to no other.

Surely, there is much to be had in prayer. All good may be obtained, and all evil averted by it; yea, it is a reward to itself. It is the greatest dignity of the creature, to be admitted to converse with God. And certainly, the soul that is much in prayer, grows in purity, and is raised by prayer to the despising of all those things that the world admires and is in love with, and by a wonderful way is conformed to the likeness of God.

For I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.] In the law, God recommends strangers to the care and compassion of his people; now David returns the argument to him, persuade him to deal kindly with him: "For I am a stranger with thee, that is, before thee—in this world wherein thou hast appointed me to sojourn a few days. And I betake myself to thy protection in this strange country; I seek shelter under the shadow of thy wings: therefore, have compassion upon me." He that looks on himself as a stranger, and is sensible of the darkness both round about him in this wilderness, and also within him, will often put up that request with David, Psalm cxix. 19, I am a stranger on this earth; hide not thy commandments from me—do not let me lose my way. And as we should use this argument to persuade God to look down upon us, so likewise, to persuade ourselves to send up our hearts and desires to him. What is the joy of our life, but the thoughts of that other life, our home, before us? And, certainly, he that lives much in these thoughts, set him where you will here, he is not much pleased or displeased; but if his Father call him home, that word gives him his heart's desire.

LECTURE VI.

VER. 13. O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.

WHY is it that we do not extremely hate that which we so desperately love, sin? For the deformity of itself is unspeakable: and, besides, it is the cause of all our woes. Sin hath opened the sluices, and lets in all the deluge of sorrows which makes the life of poor man nothing else than vanity and misery, so that the meanest orator in the world may be eloquent enough on that subject. What is our life, but a continual succession of many deaths? Though we should say nothing of all the bitterness and vexations that are hatched under the sweetest pleasures in the world, this one thing is enough, the multitude of diseases and pains, the variety of distempers, that those houses we are lodged in are exposed to. Poor creatures are oft-times tossed between two, the fear of death, and the tediousness of life; and under these fears they can not tell which to choose. Holy men are not exempted from some apprehensions of God's displeasure because of their sins; and that may make them cry out with David, O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more. Or, perhaps, this may be a desire, not so much simply for the prolonging of life, as for the intermitting of his pain, to have ease from the present smart. The extreme torment of some sickness, may draw the most fixed and confident spirits to cry out very earnestly for a little breathing. Or rather, if the words imply the desire of a recovery, and the spinning out of the thread of his life a little longer, surely he intended to employ it for God and his service. But long life was suitable to the promises of that time: so Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 5. There is no doubt those holy men under the law, knew somewhat of the state of immortality; their calling themselves strangers on earth (Heb. xi. 13), argued that they were no strangers to these thoughts. But it can not be denied, that that doctrine was but darkly laid out in those times. It is Christ Jesus who hath brought life and immortality to light, who did illuminate life and immortality, which before stood in the dark.

Surely, the desire of life is, for the most part, sensual and base, when men desire that they may still enjoy their animal pleasures, and are loath to be parted from them. They are pleased to term it, a desire to live and repent; and yet few do it when they are spared: like evil debtors, who desire forbearance from one term to another; but with no design at all to pay. But there is a natural desire of life, something of abhorrence in nature against the dissolution of these tabernacles. We are loath to go forth, like children who are afraid to walk in the dark, not knowing what may be there. In some, such a desire of life may be very reasonable; being surprised by sickness, and apprehensions of death, and sin unpardoned, they may desire a little time before they enter into eternity. For that change is not a thing to be hazarded upon a few days or hours' preparation. I will not say that death-bed repentance is altogether desperate, but certainly it is very dangerous, and to be suspected; and, therefore, the desire of a little time longer, in such a case, may be very allowable.

I will not deny but it is possible, even for a believer, to be taken in such a posture, that it may be very uncomfortable to him to be carried off so, through the affrightments of death, and his darkness as to his after-state. On the other hand, it is an argument of a good measure of spirituality and height of the love of God, to desire to depart, and be dissolved. in the midst of health, and the affluence of worldly comforts. But for men to desire and wish to be dead, when they are troubled and vexed with anything, is but a childish folly, flowing from a discontented mind, which being over, they desire nothing less than to die. It is true there may be a natural desire of death, which at sometimes hath shined in the spirits of some natural men: and there is much reason for it, not only to be freed from the evils and troubles of this life, but even from those things which many of this foolish world account their happiness—sensual pleasures, to eat and drink, and to be hungry again, and still to round that same course which, to souls that are raised above sensual things, is burdensome and grievous.

But there is a spiritual desire of death, which is very becoming a Christian. For Jesus Christ hath not only opened very clearly the doctrine of eternal life, but he himself hath passed through death, and lain down in the grave: he hath perfumed that passage, and warmed that bed for us; so that it is sweet and amiable for a Christian to pass through and follow him, and to be where he is. It is a strange thing, that the souls of Christians have not a continual desire to go to that company which is above (finding so much discord and disagreement among the best of men that are here): to go to the spirits of just men made perfect, where there is light, and love, and nothing else; to go to the company of angels, a higher rank of blessed spirits; but, most of all, to go to God, and to Jesus the Mediator of the New Testament. And, to say nothing positively of that glory (for the truth is, we can say nothing of it), the very evils that death delivers the true Christian from, may make him long for it; for such a one may say—I shall die, and go to a more excellent country, where I shall be happy for ever: that is, I shall die no more, I shall sorrow no more, I shall be sick no more, and, which is yet more considerable, I shall doubt no more, and shall be tempted no more; and, which is the chiefest of all, I shall sin no more.

EXPOSITORY LECTURES ON ISAIAH VI.

LECTURE I.

VER. 1--5.

THE division of this chapter (were that to any great purpose) may be stated thus:—

I. The prophet's vision, from ver. 1 to 3. In the year that king Uzziah died, I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple. 2. Above it stood the seraphims: each one had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. 3. And one cried unto another, and said, holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory.

II. The effects of it upon him, relating to this calling, rom ver. 4-13. And the posts of the door moved at the voice of them that cried, and the house was filled with smoke, &c.

In the vision, besides the circumstances of time and place specified, ver. 1, we have a glorious representation of the majesty of God, ver. 2: a suitable acclamation, a voice of praise being joined with it, ver. 3, 4.

The effects of it on the prophet toward his calling are three, viz., I. his preparation. II. his mission. III. his message.

I. The preparation, in these two particulars: 1. humiliation; 2. purification (ver. 6, 7): a deep conviction, and then, effectual removal of pollution.

II. In his mission we have three things: 1. God's inquiry for a messenger, ver. 8, former part. 2. The prophet's offer of himself, the latter part of ver. 8. 3. God's acceptance, ver. 9, former part.

III. His message—a heavy commination, from ver. 9-12, yet, allayed with a gracious mitigation, ver. 13; the judgment very lasting and wasting, yet a remnant reserved.

VER. 1. In the year that king Uzziah died, I saw also the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple.

I saw.] Observe the freedom of God in his choice of men to be near him and know him. And in the measuring out of the degrees of discovery unto those men differently, some had extraordinary revelations; and though prophetic visions now cease, yet there are certainly higher and clearer coruscations of God upon some souls, than upon many others, who yet are children of light, and partake of a measure of that light shining within them. Thus we are not carvers and choosers, and, therefore, are not peremptorily to desire anything in kind or measure that is singular; that were pride and folly. But above all things we are to esteem, and submissively to desire, still more and more knowledge of God, and humbly to wait and keep open the passage of light; not to close the windows, not to be indulgent to any known sin or impure affection; that will soon obstruct it. Into a filthy soul, wisdom will not enter.

In the year that king Uzziah died, I saw the Lord on his throne.] There is another king named here, to denote the time by; but he was a diseased and a dying king, who lived some years a leper, and then died. Men may speak in a court style of vain wishes, O king, live for ever; but this king here on the throne, is indeed THE KING IMMORTAL, the ever-living God.

God measures and proportions all his means to their ends. When he calls men to high services, he furnishes them with suitable preparations and enablements. Thus here with the prophet: he was to denounce heavy things against his own nation, a proud, stubborn people; to deal boldly and freely with the highest, yea, with the king himself, ch. vii.; and he is prepared by a vision of God. What can a man fear after that? All regal majesty and pomp looks petty and poor after that sight. Two kings together on their thrones in robes royal (1 Kings xxii.) did no whit astonish him who had seen a greater: I saw (says Micaiah) the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the hosts of heaven standing by. Much like this is the vision of Isaiah here before us.

Eyes dazzled with the sun, see not the glittering of drops of dew on the earth; and those are quickly gone, with all their faint and fading glory, to a soul taken with the contemplation of God. How meanly do they spend their days, who bestow them on counting money, or courting little earthly idols in ambition or love! From how high a stand doth he look down on those, who look on God, and admires his greatness, wonders at what he sees, and still seeks after more! These two are therefore joined together, beholding the beauty of the Lord, and inquiring in his temple. Psalm xxvii. 4. One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple.

Ver. 2, 3. Above it stood the seraphims: each one had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory.] These glorious courtiers, flaming spirits, are light and love, whose very feet are too bright for us, as his face is too bright for them; and they cry holy, holy, holy—thrice holy, most holy THREE, one God—Lord of Hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory. This they cry one to another, echoing it and returning it incessantly. They that praise him most, come-nearest their life. When we are to pray, or offer any worship to the great God in the sanctuary, especially in solemn worship there, let us think of him as thus on his throne above, and the diffusion of his glory there, of his train filling the upper temple, and so stoop low and fall down before him. Holy, holy, holy. This is the main thing wherein he is glorious, and we are to know and adore him in this view, and abhor ourselves as in his sight.

The whole earth.] So many creatures and various works and affairs, fruits and plants, and rich commodities, and so many calamities and miseries that kingdoms and people are afflicted with as by turns, and so many disorders, and such wickedness of men in public and private matters: and yet, in all these varieties and contrarieties of things, this one is the sum of all, and all is taken up in it, The whole earth is full of his glory. In framing and upholding, in ruling and ordering all, what a depth of power and wisdom.

VER. 4. The posts of the door moved at the voice of him that cried, and the house was filled with smoke.

How true must that be, that at his voice the earth quakes and the mountains tremble, when, at the voice of an angel crying or proclaiming his name, the very threshold of the temple (the then holiest part of the earth) moves! This, in the vision, was intended to represent the dreadfulfulness of his great name, which vile men dare baffle in vain oaths, and can speak thereof without sense: but hearts that are indeed his living temples will find this emotion: when his name is proclaimed, or when they mention or think of it, the posts will be moved with an awful trembling.

And the house was filled with smoke.] This was here a symbol of the presence and majesty of God. See Psalm xcvi. 2. Clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne; not a signal of displeasure, as some take it. He dwells in light that is inaccessible, and round about is thick darkness, shutting out the weak eyes of men, which were not able to abide the brightness of his glory. Much of our knowledge here, lies in this, to know that we know him not: and much of our praise, to confess that we can not praise him—silentium tibi laus, as they read Ps. lxxv. 1.

VER. 5. Then said I, Wo is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts.

Then said I, Wo is me.] He is not lifted up with the dignity, that he should be honored with such a vision of God; but on the contrary, is struck with humble, holy fear: Oh, I am undone! This constitutes much of the exercise of souls admitted nearest to God, even this astonishment and admiration that such as they should be regarded and raised to that height, and holy fear in a sense of their unholiness. When the blessed Virgin heard a voice very much to her own advantage (Luke i. 28, 29), instead of rising in her own conceit upon it, she was troubled, and marvelled what manner of salutation it should be, and was struck with fear, so that the angel found it needful to say, Fear not.

Illusions and deceits of spirit of this kind, can not be better distinguished from true manifestations of God, than by this, that they breed pride and presumption in the heart, make it vain and haughty; while true senses, and joys, and discoveries of love, in what kind soever, do most powerfully humble. Is est, qui superbire non potest, cui Deus ostendit misericordiam suam. Augustine.

For mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts.] The mother and nurse of pride, is ignorance of God. A small glance of him will make the best of men abhor themselves, and still the nearer sight of him, the lower conceit will there be of self, and the deeper sense of impurity and vileness. This tells us, though we hear and speak of God, alas! we know him not.

I am a man of polluted lips.] He mentions this the rather because he heard that song which he would have joined with, but durst not, because of polluted lips. Thus we must confess we are polluted all over, but much of our pollution breaks out by the lips, yet, commonly, we think not on it.

I am undone.] We could not indeed bear much, could not see God and live; therefore he veils himself. But surely we might see much more than we do, and live the better for it, the more humbly and holily. Our pollutions hinder and unfit us, as he implies when he says, A man of polluted lips. But oh, that we saw so much of him as to see this pollution, which makes us so unworthy and so unfit to see him.

He first cries, I am a man of unclean lips, and then adds, I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips. This is the true method; there can be no right sense of pollutions about us, but that which begins with a sense of those within us. Few men reflect much on themselves; or, if they do, they view themselves by a false light.

Polluted lips.] This he says in regard of the voice he heard. And with regard to the much irreverence with which we mention God, both ministers and people, as much of all our heart pollutions have their vent this way, so the promise of sanctifying his people runs much on this. Zeph. iii. 9. They of a pure lip shall offer. All are of the holy order, a royal priesthood, and through sanctified lips, as the censor, still they offer incense of prayer and praise. He is a perfect man that offends not in word. Jam. iii. 2. Commonly, by much speaking, there is much pollution: In many words there wants not sin. Prov. x. 19. Therefore let your speech be always seasoned with salt. Col. iv. 6. Now, many speeches need much salt, otherwise some part will be rotten, at least unsavory. Much of the sin of the land consists in this: there are few companies where God is not dishonored and provoked by your communication; and till this be laid to heart, judgments will multiply and grow instead of decreasing. Few, even of those who fear the Lord, speak often one to another, in a strain that God delights, not only to hearken to, but to write down and register for their good.

And I dwell amidst a people of unclean lips.] We infect each other when we meet. There is little converse that a man returns the better by, yea, by the most he is the worse: he brings back often more pollution, more folly and vanity by most companies and discourses. But we see here, that impurity humbly acknowledged, is graciously removed.

LECTURE II.

Ver. 6—8.

VER. 6. Then flew one of the seraphims unto me, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with tongs off the altar.

IMPURITY well discovered to a man, is half cured. Whosoever God graciously shows a man his own un sanctifiedness, there he goes on to cleanse and sanctify him: the light that discovers, is followed by a burning coal that purges away.

The Holy Spirit is that purifying fire: a touch of it cleanseth the hearts, and lips, and all, and kindles that affection in the soul which can not die out, which not many, which no waters can quench again. It doth this to all that are sanctified, but eminently it doth it (or, at least, they desire it may) to those who are to be the instruments of enlightening, purifying, and kindling others. So in the resemblance of fiery tongues came down this Spirit on the apostles; and thence they themselves were as burning coals scattered through the nations, blessed incendiaries of the world, setting it on fire with the love of Christ: tantum ligna ardentia dispersa, says Augustine.

VER. 7. And he laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips, and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin is purged.

Thine iniquity is taken away,—how impure soever before. This free grace is wonderful, to make some who have been notoriously unclean, by the change wrought by this fire, the touch of a coal, to become eminently gracious, and messengers of grace to others, carrying this and spreading it. They, though originally of dark clay, are by this fire made transparent glass through which the light of the gospel shines into the church.

This coal taken from the altar, may denote the deriving of the Spirit from Jesus Christ, our priest, altar, sacrifice, and all, by which we are purified and made fit for his service. He is the fountain of light, and life, and purity, and all grace to his messengers, and all his followers. His grace is indeed a live coal, where heavenly heat is mixed with earth, the fulness of the Godhead with our nature in human flesh. Thereby we draw near; and especially they who bear his name to men, under a sense of their own impurity, entreat his touch, as devout Bernard, who, in a holy hyperbole, exclaims, “had the prophet need of a coal! Oh, then, grant for me a whole globe of fire, to purge away my filthiness, and make me a fit messenger to this people!”

Thy sin is purged.] The children of God are a wonder to themselves, when that Spirit comes in, who conquers and purges so suddenly and easily what they before groan under and wrestle with, very long to little or no purpose. It is a change of the right hand of the Most High, as the Vulgate reads that word in Psalm lxxvii. 10: I said, this is my infirmity, but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High—mutatio dextræ Excelsi. A touch of that will cleanse and heal: the all-purifying virtue of his Spirit, whereof this baptism of the prophet's lips was a symbol, takes away the dross which by other means than that fire can not be purged. So in metals, much pains may be taken, and strength of hand used with little effect; that at most does but scratch the superficies, makes the outside a little bright and shining, but severs not the dross from within: that can not be done without fire. Have we not found how vainly we attempt while God withholds his hand? Yea, while a man fancies self-pureness, he is the more impure, as Job says, chap. ix. 30, 31. If I wash myself with snow-water, and make myself ever so clean, yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me. Therefore, prayer is the great resource of a soul under a sense of uncleanness, begging a new creation, for such it is indeed: Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me;—following God with this suit, and resolving to follow him till he grant it: for we well know he is able, and may say, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

This fire hath two effects: it works purity and activity; it takes away sin, and puts in spirit and life for obedience. And here Thy sin is purged, and then says he, ver. 8, Here am I: send me. And the former is effectual toward the latter: the more the soul is cleansed, the more alive and able it is made for service. The purging out of those sickly humors makes it more vigorous and able; whereas, they abounding clog the spirits, and make the vital operations heavy and weak. A soul well cleansed from the love of sin, and the world, and self, is in a healthful temper, and goes nimbly to any work. Outward discouragements and difficulties are then nothing. A feverish distemper within hinders and makes one lazy and unwieldy, unwilling and unable to labor: but that well purged and cured, he cares less for the hot weather without; strength of nature endures that more easily. Oh, how sweet to be thus actuated by love, a pure intention and desire of doing God service, and of bringing him in glory! Other motives, or the mixtures of them, are base; and though God may make use sometimes of such, yet he sees within, and knows what spring makes the wheels go, and he gives them their reward here,—somewhat possibly of that they seek, success, and credit, and a name; but the after-reward of faithful servants they need not look for in that work: for they receive their reward, and can they expect more? Many a Here am I, comes from other incentives than an altar coal; and so they burn and shine a while, but they soon consume and die out in a snuff: the heavenly altar-fire alone keeps in, and returns to heaven where it was kindled.

There is many a hot, furious march under the semblance and name of zeal for God, that loves to be seen; as Jehu, 2 Kings x. 16. Come with me and see my zeal for the Lord. Such persons may flatter themselves into that conceit in the heat of action to think it is for God, while he sees through it, and judges it as it is, zeal for self and their own interest; and he gives them, accordingly, some hireling journeyman's wages, and then turns them off. But oh, where the heart is purely actuated by a desire of his glory, and seeks nothing else, for such remains that blessed word, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into thy master's joy.

This, then, is to be sought for by ministers and eminent servants in public affairs, yea, by all that offer any service to God, a readiness from love. Something of this there is in all who are truly his, though held down in many, and almost smothered with rubbish; and in these there is some mixture of flesh drawing back. The spirit is ready, but the flesh is weak, and a load to it, hindering its working; and this strife is often found as a horse to an unskilful rider, at once pricked with the spur and checked with the bridle. But where this spirit of love is, it doth prevail, and wastes that opposition daily, and groweth in strength, becomes more quick and ready, more freed from self, and more actuated by the will of God; attaining somewhat further in that conformity with heaven, where shall be no will striving, but his alone; where those glorious bright spirits stand ready for all commands, who excel in strength, and employ it all to do his commandments. Psalm ciii. 20. And the more like them we be here, the more lively hope have we to be shortly with them, and to be wholly as they are.

VER. 8. Also, I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I: send me.

THIS inquiry imports not a doubtful deliberation in God, but a purpose to send. He is represented as a king, advising with himself or his council. And this is by some conceived as an intimation of the mystery of the Trinity, as Gen. i. 26, And God said, Let us make man in our own image.—Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? But were there not ready, millions of these winged messengers? What need, then, of such a word? True; angels were ready, but a man was sought. God, vouchsafing to send an embassy to men, will send one that might speak their language to them, and might stay and treat with them in a familiar, friendly way, an ambassador in ordinary, to lie still and treat with them. And in this condescension much wisdom and love appear. He will take men, subject to the like infirmities and pollutions with the people, as the prophet here acknowledges, but one purged from these pollutions, made holy; though not perfectly, yet eminently holy. This is very suitable; were not men invincibly obstinate, more suitable than that God should send by angels, that one of themselves should come and deal with men for God, and bear witness of his graciousness and readiness to forgive, so as to give himself for an instance of it, and say, "I have found him so." And they being changed and sanctified, show really that the thing may be done; that it is feasible to sanctify a sinner; and so, sinful men appear to be fitter for this service than imbodyed angels.

I said, Here am I: send me.] What a blessed change was wrought on Paul, when cast to the ground! His own will was broken all to pieces, and now he is only for his service, whose name he so hated, and whose servants he persecuted. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? Acts ix. 6. These are the very words and characters of a true convert. And thus, a soul turned to Christ may in some cases doubt what is his will, but that once resolved, there is no deliberation whether to do it or not. He says not, if the service be honorable or profitable, that is, carrying worldly credit or profit in it, then will I do it; no, but whatever it is, if it be thine, and thou appoint me to it, Here am I. And this makes the meanest work of his station excellent.

Then said I, Here am I.] A strange change in the prophet; even but now an undone man, and here presently a ready messenger, and so turned to an angel. Something of this, most find who are truly called to this high work of delivering messages from God: sometimes a sense of pollution benumbs and strikes them dead, and anon again they feel the flame of love kindled by that coal, quickening them to such a readiness, and such free offers of them—selves to service, as, to those who understand not the reason of it, would seem presumptuous forwardness. And there may be in some minds, at one and the same time, a strange mixture and counterworking of these two together; a sense of unfitness and unworthiness drawing back, and yet the strength of love driving forward, thinking thus, how can I, who am so filthy, so vile, speak of God? Yet he hath shown me mercy! How then can I be silent?

Send me.] Moses's reluctance, this same prophet would have vented too, before the touch of the coal, while he said, Who is me, I am undone, or struck down, as the word may signify; he can not speak with such unholy lips of so holy a God. Isaiah cries out of polluted lips, as Moses complained of stammering lips. And this is fit to precede, first, a sense of extreme inability and unworthiness, and then, upon a change and call, ready obedience. A man once undone and dead, and then recovered, is the only fit messenger for God. In such a one, love overcomes all difficulties both without and within, and in his work no constraint is he feeling but that of love; and where that is, no other will be needed. The sweet, all-powerful constraint of love will send thee all-cheerful, though it were through fire or water: no water can quench it, nor fire out-burn it; it burns hotter than any other kindled against it. After the touch of that coal, no forbearing. So Jer. xx. 9: But his word was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, I could not stay. Feed the flock of God which is among you, says St. Peter, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind. 1 Pet. v. 2. Yet the prophet says, Send me. Though he had so ardent a desire and readiness to go, yet he will not go unsent, but humbly offers himself, and waits both for his commission and instruction: and how awful are they!

LECTURE III.

VER. 9. And he said, Go and tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not.

VER. 10. Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and convert, and be healed.

His message, you see, is most sad, and so he is put to it, put to the trial of his obedience, as men usually are according to the degree of their fitness. Nothing is more sweet to a messenger than to have good news to carry. Oh, it is a blessed sweet thing to convert souls! But how heavy to harden them by preaching! Yet thus it is to many at some times, and almost generally to all. Certainly, before this, much had been heard and despised:

they had been hardening their own hearts, and now they shall have enough of it; their very sins shall be their plague, a plague of all others the most terrible, yet, as was said above, there are times of the height of this plague, as of others, and this was one of those times of its raging mortality. The prophet did nothing but preach, and yet they were stupified by it. And indeed, wherever the word does not soften and quicken, it hardens and kills; and the more lively the ministry of the word is where it works this effect, the more deeply doth it work it.

This was verified on the Jews: though then God's own people, yet it was verified on them to the utmost. And this context is often cited against them in the New Testament; no place so often. So excellent a preacher as Isaiah, and so well reputed among his people, yet was sent to preach them blind, and deaf, and dead. And this same does the gospel to most of many a congregation in Scotland; and the more of Christ that is spoken, the more are unbelievers hardened. Isaiah, the most evangelical of all the prophets, was yet brought to that, Who hath believed our report? Yea, this was fulfilled in the preaching of Christ himself; as the hotter the sun, the more is the clay hardened.

Go tell this people.] Observe the mighty power of the word, to whatsoever it is sent. As it is wonderfully efficacious for softening, melting, reducing to God, so, if it be sent to harden, to seal to judgment, to bring in and hasten it; and therefore it is spoken of as effecting the things it speaks: as in Jer. i. 10, See, I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build and to plant. So Ezek. xliii. 3, and Hos. vi. 5. Therefore, despise it not. Spiritual judgments are the heaviest of all: though least felt for a time, yet they stick closest, and prove saddest in the end. The not feeling, is a great part of the plague: in this is the nature and malignity of the disease, that it takes away the sight and sense of other things, and of itself. The plague is a disease seizing on the spirits, and therefore is so dangerous; but this seizes only on the spirit of the mind: and is anything so dreadful? Oh, any plague but that of the heart. People think it a good thing not to feel the word, not to be troubled. Well, as they love this, they are filled with it, and shall have enough of it. So in self-love, sui amator sibi dat. God is righteous and pure in this. There are many cavils about his working on the heart to harden, which arise from an ignorant, low conceit of God, as of a dependant being, or tied to laws, or to give account. We ought rather to tremble before him. He doth no iniquity, and we shall be forced to confess it. Many ways of his are obscure, but none are unjust. Find we not this people sit under the sound, and are many of them as if absent, as if they had never heard such things spoken of; so grossly ignorant of all these? Hearing, they hear, but understand not. Others are yet worse: they get a kind of knowledge, but it is dead, and works nothing. These see, and yet perceive not, and know not even what they know. Most are of this sort, and they are of all others the worst to convert. When they are told of Christ and forgiveness of sins, and are entreated to believe these mysteries, they cry out, "Oh! we do, we know them, and can answer, if you ask us, what these doctrines are." But the heart is not changed, no sin is forsaken, no study of holiness, no flame of love. This not perceiving, is the great judgment of this land: this the great cause of lamentation, that Christ is so much known, and yet known so little. People do not think whither it tends, and what the importance of this message is. They hear it as a passing tale, or, at the best, as for the present, a pleasing sound, a lovely song, Ezekiel xxxiii. 32; and if by an able minister, as sung by a good voice; but no impression is made, it dies out in the air, it enters not into their hearts to quicken them, and so their evil is the more deadly. Oh! bemoan this, beg the removal of it above all judgments, and the sending forth of that Spirit who causes the mountains to flow down. Isa. lxiv. 1. Many of you, my brethren, may be under somewhat of this, as there are divers degrees of it ere it comes to be incurable. Oh! pray to be delivered, lest it grow so far that be in vain to bid you do so. Better to be cast into extreme terrors for a time than to continue thus: better to fall into a fever, than into this lethargy, which makes you sleep to death.

Convert, and be healed.] These two together: all miseries are healed, and grace and favor flow forth, when once the soul is stirred up to seek after God, and turn unto him. Other courses of healing public or private evils, are but mountebank cures, which vex and torment, as unapt physic does, and do no good; yea, make things worse than before. See Hosea v. 13, compared with ch. vi. 1: When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to King Jareb; yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound.—Come and let us return unto the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up.

There is much in a custom of fruitless hearing, to stupefy and make hard—to make men sermon-proof. And the hearing of the most excellent, hardens most, both against them, and against all others that are their inferiors; for being accustomed to hear the most moving strains unmoved, makes them scorn, and easily beat back that which is less pressing. A largely endued and very spiritual minister, is either one of the highest blessings, or heaviest curses, that can come upon a people.

Hearing, hear not.] This even the ministers themselves may fall under: speakers may have no ears, as the Italian proverb says of preachers, "They do not hear their own voice." They may grow hard, by custom of speaking of Divine things without Divine affection; so that nothing themselves or others say, can work on them. Hence it is that so few formal dead ministers are converted, that one said, Raro vidi clericum pœnitentem; so hardened are they against the means of conviction, in which they have been so long conversant, and not converted by them. They have been speaking so often of heaven and hell, and of Jesus Christ, and feeling nothing of them, that the words have lost their power, and they are grown hard as the skin of leviathan, esteeming iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood. And this, by-the-way, beside that God's dispensation is so fixed, may be a reason why that sin mentioned in the sixth chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, is unpardonable; it is, in the nature of things, without such a miracle as God will not exert, impossible that they who have stood out such things in vain, should be renewed. This should make us who are ministers, especially to tremble at an unholy life, or at the thought of declining from those ways of religion, of which we have known so much, and for which we have so many means of improvement.

VER. 11. Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate;

VER. 12. And the Lord have removed men far away, and there be a great forsaking in the midst of the land.

Now this judgment fastening, we are sure to draw on all other judgments. Therefore, the prophet, touched with compassion, inquires, How long? and receives a very sad answer, Until the cities be wasted. God is sovereignly free in this; but usually he keeps that course, that long-continued and spared sinning, makes long-continued calamities when they come; judgments, as the ancients thought comets to be, are as lasting as the matter is they are kindled with; and truly, upon this account, we may justly apprehend that our troubles are but just beginning, rather than near their end. Yet, repentance might prevail for the shortening of them: those sweet showers soonest lay the stormy winds.

And this consideration may have something hopeful in it, that in these latter times, things move something more speedily, as natural motions do toward their end; for a short work will God make upon the earth, as the apostle's word is; and we see in our particular straits that were greatest, that the Lord hath made them short even beyond our expectation; and what remains is in his hand. I trust he will hasten the defeat of the plots and power of his enemies; and doubt not all the late and present commotions of these poor kingdoms are the birth-pangs of a happy deliverance and peace, and when they grow thickest, it is nearest the birth.

How long?] Observe the compassion of the messengers of God, not desiring the evil day, but mourning for it, pitying those they denounce judgment against, and melting for those they harden.

Till the cities be wasted.] This intimates there would be no relenting under all these judgments, but that these, as well as the word, and together with it, would harden them more, till they were almost quite consumed. And this is usual. Men think it would be otherwise, but it is found that times of great plagues and judgments are not times of great conversion: men are then more hardened both against the word and the rod; their spirits grow stiff and obdurate in a kind of desperation. But mercy, coming as the spring sunshine, mollifies, and dissolves, and makes fruitful; therefore such a day is to be longed for. I suspect we shall not see much done by the gospel till then; and before that, we may suffer yet more dismal things, and be wasted with pestilence, sword, and famine. Yet there is comfort in this, the Lord will not make a full end of us: a tenth shall be left; and if not we, yet at least our posterity shall reap the sweet fruits of our bitter calamities, which are the just fruits of our iniquities.

VER. 13. But yet in it shall be a tenth, and it shall return, and shall be eaten; as a teil-tree, and as an oak, whose substance is in them when they cast their leaves, so the holy seed shall be the substance thereof.

THERE is still a remnant holy to God, the preservers of a land from utter ruin. Profane persons despise the children of God, and know not that they are beholden to them for the subsistence of the land, and of the world: they are as those oaks, whose roots did bear up the earth of that highway that went between the king's house and the temple, as the resemblance is taken by some.

In judgments, the Lord remembers that. Destroy it not, there is a blessing in it. As for the personal condition of believers, there may be a great decay, a winter visage may be upon it; but yet, the holy seed abideth in them, and is their stability, and still that word is true that is borrowed hence, Semen sanctum, statumen terræ: The holy seed, the subsistence or establishment of the earth. When their number is completed, time shall end, and this visible world shall be set on fire. And this day is hastening forward, though most of us think but little, if at all, of it.

EXPOSITORY LECTURE ON ROMANS XII. 3-12.

VER. 3. For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.

BESIDE the common word of edification implying it, we find often in the Scriptures, teaching compared to building; and, among other things, the resemblance holds in this, that in both, of necessity, there is a foundation first to be laid, and then the structure to be raised upon it. He that gives rules of life, without first fixing principles of faith, offers preposterously at building a house without laying a foundation: and he that instructs what to believe, and directs not withal a believer how to live, doth in vain lay a foundation without following out the building. But the apostles were not so foolish builders as to sever these two in their labors in the church. In this epistle we find our apostle excellently acquitting himself in both these. He first largely and firmly lays the groundwork, in the foregoing part of the epistle: now, he adds exhortations and directions touching the particular duties of Christians.

The first thing, certainly, to be done with a soul, is, to convince it of sin and death, then to address and lead it unto Christ, our righteousness and life; this done, it should be taught to follow him. This is Christianity, to live in Christ, and to live to Christ; to live in him by faith, and to live to him in holiness. These our apostle joined in his doctrine, ch. viii. 1: There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

The exhortation that begins this chapter, hath in it the whole sum of Christian obedience, fitly expressed and strongly urged; and in that are all particular rules comprised.

But because of our ignorance and our sloth, we do not always readily draw forth particulars from those comprehensive general rules wherein they lie; we need, therefore, to be assisted in this; and to this the Scriptures descend, particularly the apostles in their epistles, and that usually in the latter part of them. And this is a main part of our duty in preaching the word, often to represent these rules to you, not so much that you may understand them better, though somewhat of this likewise may be needful, as that you may remember them, and eye them more, and walk according to them; and there is no more in these things truly known, than what is known after this manner. I have endeavored, in the course of my teaching, to reach this end. My design, and I hope yours likewise, hath been, not to pass so much time, nor to pass it with empty delight, which in other things might be done at an easy rate, but that you be really built up heavenward, and increase with the increase of God; that the truth and power of Christianity may possess our hearts, and grow there, and may be evident in our lives, to the glory of our Lord Jesus.

We shall endeavor to lay before you the particular graces that are the ornaments of Christians; and this, not that you may look on them simply, and commend them, but that you may pursue them, and be clothed with them, and then they will be much more comely and commendable: as a robe of rich apparel, if it seem fine while it hangs or lies by, it appears far better when it is put on.

The rules the apostle is to give, he prefaces thus, For I say, through the grace given to me—I speak as the messenger or apostle of Christ, according to that knowledge and experience that he hath given to me of these things; and so take it, as from one that hath some interest in, and share of, these graces I recommend to you. And this, indeed, makes recommendations carry home. Oh, that we could truly say this! Alas! it is an uncomfortable, and commonly an unprofitable thing, to speak of Christ and the graces of his Spirit, only as having heard of them, or read of them, as men that travel in their studies, do of foreign countries.

Διὰ τῆς χάριτος. The apostle represents this, to add the more authority, and gain the more acceptance, to what he had to say; and for this end, some care is to be had of the good opinion of people, so far as their interest is concerned, that the message we bring be not prejudged: otherwise, this truly set aside, it were little matter how we were mistaken or despised, yea, it were a thing someway desirable; only provided nothing be done on purpose that may justly, yea, or that may probably, procure it, for that both piety and charity forbid.

To every man.] This is more pressing than if he had said simply, to you, or generally, to you all; for in men's talking of things, it proves often too true, Quod omnibus, nemini. What is said to all, is said to no one; but to every one, that each one may suppose it spoken to him, as an ingenious picture looking to each in the room. Thus we ought to speak, and thus ye ought to hear. We to speak, not as telling some unconcerning stories, but, as having business with you; and you to hear, not each for another, as you often do—"Oh! such a passage touched such a one"—but each for himself.

The first particular the apostle recommends, is that gracing grace of humility, the ornament and the safety of all other graces, and which is so peculiarly Christian. Somewhat philosophers speak of temperance, justice, and other like virtues, but these tend rather to blow up and swell the mind with big conceit and confidence of itself, than to dwell together with self-abasement and humility. But in the school of Christ, the first lesson of all is, self-denial and humility; yea, it is written above the door, as the rule of entry or admission, Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart. And out of all question, that is truly the humblest heart which hath most of Christ in it.

Not to think highly.] Not aspiring and intending in things too high. And a great point of humility is subjection to God in the point of knowledge; in this was our first climbing that proved our fall; and yet still, amid all our ignorance and darkness, we are catching and gaping after the deadly fruit of unallowed knowledge.

This, withal, hath in it the attempering of our thoughts and practices to our measure and station; to know ourselves truly and thoroughly: for that will certainly beget a very low esteem of ourselves, to judge ourselves the unworthiest and meanest of all.

And having truly this estimate of ourselves, we shall not vainly attempt anything above our reach, nor disdainfully neglect anything that is within the compass of our calling and duty; which are the two evils so common among men, yea even among Christians, and in the church of God, and are the cause of most of the enormities and disorders that fall out in it. It is strange blindness, that they who do grossly miscarry in the duties of their own station, yet so readily fancy themselves capable of somewhat higher, and think themselves wronged if it be refused them.

The self-knowing Christian would rather descend, and finds himself very disproportioned to his present station, be it never so mean. He can say with David, Lord, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Psalm cxxxi. 1. But vain minds would still be tampering with the greatest affairs, and dwell not with themselves. Oh! my brethren, be entreated to study your own hearts better. Be less abroad in things that concern you not. There is work enough within you; heaps of base lusts, and self-deceits, and follies, that you see not yet; and many advantages of good things you seem to see in yourselves, that indeed are not there. Self-love is a flattering glass, which represents us to ourselves much fairer than we are; therefore turn from it, if you desire a true account of yourselves, and look into the pure and faithful mirror of God's law. Oh! what deformities will that discover, which you never saw nor thought of before: it will make you the lowest of all persons in your own eyes.

This low self-esteem doth not wholly take away the simple knowledge of what gifts and graces God hath bestowed on a man; for that were to make him both unthankful and unuseful. Qui se nescit, nescit se uti. He who doth not know what God hath freely given him, can not return praise to God, nor make use of himself for God in his station. Yea, the apostle's caution intimates a sober, humble reflection on the measure God hath given a man, as what he not only allows but requires; and himself gives example of it in his own present expression, declaring that he speaks these things through the grace that is given to him.

But this knowledge of a man's own gifts and graces, that it may not preclude his attaining more, but help him to more, in the humble acknowledgment and use of what he hath, should have these two qualifications: 1. That he beware of overweening; that he take his measure much below, rather than any whit beyond what he truly hath. 2. That whatsoever it is, he always look on it, not as his own, but as God's, having his superscription on it, and all the glory of it being his peculiar tribute; nothing of that to be interrupted or retained: Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory. Still, all the glory entirely sent up to him. Thus, here, the apostle sets all grace in that view. As God hath dispensed the measure; and so speaks of his own, Through the grace given to me. Still is it to be looked on, not as what we have, but as what he hath given. That is the gospel style, Grace, free gifts—χαρις χάρισματα. Whereas philosophy speaks of all as habits, or havings, or possessions.

Now, viewed in that relative dependant notion of freely given, a man shall never be puffed up by any endowments, though he see and know them: yea, the more he knows them thus, he will be the more humble still, as being the more obliged. The more he hath received, the greater they are, the lower he bows, pressed down under the weight of his engagements to God: as Abraham fell on his face when God talked with him, and made so rich promises to him. Gen. xvii. 3. See David's strain, 1 Chron. xxix. 15: But who am I, and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? For all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee. This the apostle gives as the sovereign preservative against the swelling poison of conceit, What hast thou that thou didst not receive? 1 Cor. iv. 7.

He who is thus regulated in his own esteem, will, by this, certainly, be moderated in his desire of esteem from others, and can not well meet with anything that way, that will either puff him up, or cast him down: if overprized by others, he takes that as their mistake; if undervalued, he rejoices in that, having set himself so low in himself that others can not well set him lower. So when men account meanly of him, they are really of his own opinion; and you know that offends none, that pleases them rather, to have others agree with their opinions, and be of their mind.

They who are busy after reputation, and would be esteemed, are but begging voices; they would have others think with them, and confirm the conclusion they have already resolved on, in favor of themselves; and this is a most foolish thing; for, disappointed in this, men are discontented, and so their peace hangs on others' fancies; and if satisfied with it, they surfeit and undo themselves with the delight of it. Bees sometimes kill themselves with their own honey; and there is such a word to this purpose, Prov. xxv. 27: It is not good to eat much honey; so, for men to search their own glory, is not glory.

VER. 4, 5. For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office; so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another.

In this consideration we have God's wisdom manifested, and are instructed what is our wisdom. He, in the great world, made all by weight, number, and measure; so, in the lesser world, man, and in the new world, his church, he proportions all to the use he hath designed them for. He could give to them who have least, more than the very greatest have, but he thought this unfit: it might be some advantage to them, yet to the whole body not so; and therefore not truly so to them neither, being parts of it, and having their good involved in the good of the body.

This resemblance is often used in Scripture, and holds excellently well, but is little learned. Our temper and carriage correspond not to it. Who is there almost that finds it, the Spirit of Christ in them, knitting them to him as the common head, and one to another, as one in him; each busy to advance him, and so seeking his glory, and to promote the good of one another? But alas! rather each is for self, accused self, as of an independent divided substance; yea worse, hating and tearing one another, a monstrous sight, as if one limb of the same body should be pulling another to pieces. It signifies little to tell men what mutual tenderness there is in nature; that for a thorn in the foot, the back bows, the head stoops, the eyes look, the hands feel, and seek it, to pull it out.* Christians are still so rigid, so unchristian to each other, they drive one another with the thorn sticking in, forcing their brethren to ways against the persuasions of their consciences.

In the following verses, viz., 6, 7, 8, we have a specification of divers offices, and the duties of them; the due observance of which is essential to the peace and growth of the church, makes all go on sweetly and fruitfully. But men are either presumptuously or preposterously busy out of their own station, or slothfully negligent in it; and both these, instead of edifying, are discomposing and destroying things.

* Spinam calcet pes, &c.—AUGUSTINE.

Not to insist on the distinction of offices, it is evident, in all enumerations of this kind, that the same word sometimes means divers things, and divers words mean the same thing, as ministry may comprise all, though sometimes peculiar to deacons, sometimes taken for teachers or pastors. Here it is general, and the particulars following distribute it: some are to teach, which is doctorial; some to exhort, which is more pastoral; some are to give, which is proper to deacons; some have their whole charge to rule, as elders; some are particularly for attendance on the sick.

But in all, fidelity and sedulity are requisite. How high soever men are placed, if they are unfaithful, the higher judgment awaits them. How low soever, if thou be sincere and studious of thy duty, thou shalt sustain no loss by thy low station, but rather thy faithfulness will be the more set off by it: He that is faithful in little, shall be made ruler over much. Oh, that we were more eaten up with zeal of our Lord's house and winning of souls, whom he deposes to that! Oh, that they who rule would study more rule of their own houses, that should go before, and of their own hearts, that should be first of all! Alas! how shall men whose passions and lusts rule them, well rule the house of God? Be afraid and wise, ye who are called to that, and know at length, what is so generally either unknown or unconsidered, the exemplary holiness required in your persons, and the diligent watchfulness over the flock of God. There are many debates, and troubles, and pains about these our liberties, but little diligence in the use of them. Congregations are still as full of impiety and profaneness as ever. Oh! take heed, lest we thus forfeit them after all they have cost, and provoke God to bereave us of them. Men are busy, who, we know, are not friends to the church of God. But oh, that we were more careful to be on good terms with HIM! If HE be for us, who can be against us? It is no matter who be; he is too wise and too strong for them all.

VER. 9: Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good.

THE whole sum of the law is, love; love to God, and love to man: these two contain all, and the former of the two contains the latter. Love to God is the only true principle and spring of all due love to man; and all love that begins there, returns thither likewise, and ends there.

The engaging of the whole mind and soul to the love of God, does not engross it so that there should be no kind of love communicable to man; on the contrary, it is to refine it, that it may flow forth the purer and better. All love should be first called in to God, to be sublimated and purified there, and then set in its right channel and motion, so as man may be loved in him and for him; not to impair our love to him, but indeed to extend and act it as he allows. And so to love man, is to love God, that love taking its rise from him, and terminating in him: and in this circle is the proper motion of celestial Divine love.

The duty, then, here meant and commanded, is this, that we love one another. And our love must be thus qualified; it must be un hypocritical and sincere, such as, though it may consist with, yet doth not wholly consist in civilities of expression and behavior, but a real benevolence of soul, and good will to all; a love disposing us readily to forgive evil, and to do good upon all occasions.

Yet this is not such a tenderness of complacency as leads to partake with any in any evil ways; Oh! no; abhorring that which is evil, flying from it with indignation, with a kind of antipathy. And thus it will be from the new nature in a Christian, the holy Spirit of Christ, which can not endure the unholiness or impurity of the world, but is chased away, as doves by noisome smells, or bees by smoke. This delicacy of spirit profane men laugh at, as a weak, foolish meanness; but, fools as they are, they know not that it arises from that highest wisdom, which is from above, which is indeed, peaceable, but first is pure, and can admit of no peace nor agreement with any persons or things that are impure. This is to be like the all-wise God, with whom wickedness can not dwell: his pure eyes can not pleasantly behold any iniquity.

Oh! much of the love of God would work more hatred of sin. But if thy hatred of evil be right, know it will begin at home; as we feel aversions and abhorrences most when the things are nearest us. It is not the upright nature of holiness, to hate sin in others, and to hug it, or spare it, in thyself, whether the same kind of sin, or any other; for if this abhorrence be right, it is against all sin, the whole, as natural contrarieties are, and it is most against it, where nearest in thyself. It is the true Divine fire of zeal, kindled by the love of God, that burns up sin, but first that which is nearest it, as a fire in the hearth does, and so reaches what is farther off. But if thy zeal fly most abroad upon others, it is an unruly, disordered wild-fire, cracking and squibbing up and down, good for nothing but to set houses and towns on fire.

Cleave to that which is good.] This expresses a vehement and inseparable affection; loving and rejoicing in all the good thou seest in others; desiring and seeking after all the good thou canst attain unto thyself; and being more pleased with the society of godly persons than any other, such as will put thee, and keep thee, most in mind of thy home and the way thither, and admonish and reduce thee from any declining steps. Their reproofs are more sweet to thee than the laughter and flattery of profane men: as one said to his master, "Thou shalt find no staff hard enough to beat me from thee.”* Though they seem harsh to thee, yet wilt thou say, Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness. Psalm. cxli. 5. And no opposition will drive thee from the truth of God and his ways, which are only good, if thy heart be once glued by love and fastened to them. Yea, thou wilt cleave the closer to it, the more thou art persecuted for the truth; and the more thou sufferest for it, wilt love it the better. The word that is used in marriage, of the husband cleaving to the wife, holds true in the soul once married to that which is good: all violence will be too weak to sever thee. Learn to know what this is that is truly good, to know the excellency and sweetness of holiness, and it will be impossible to part thy affection from it. But this is the reason why men are so soon shaken, and the slender hold they have removed; the superficiality of the soul, only, is tied to the outside of religion, by some external relations and engagements, and these are a running knot that easily slips. Few receive the truth in the love of it, and have their hearts united to Jesus Christ, who is indeed all that good we have to seek after, and to cleave to.

VER. 10. Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another.

Now, in this way of holy, spiritual affection, seeking the true good of one another, be kind in brotherly love; not upon design of particular interest, but by a natural propension, such as is in creatures toward their young; such a tenderness as is among men of nearest relations, parents and children, and brethren; and know that you are indeed brethren of the highest birth and parentage, and so beyond all brethren, Christians are obliged to love one another. Alas! that in them, likewise, it should prove so unhappily true, Fratrum quoque gratia rara est, that the love of brethren is rare; that they should be so hardly drawn to acts of love, and so easily stirred to fits of anger and bitterness, one toward another! My beloved, are we Christians? Oh, where is the spirit of Christ? Where that great law of his, that badge of his followers, love one another, that by which the Christians of the first times, astonished the pagans about them? Yea, their very enemies and persecutors were amazed at it. It were well, and would be one considerable gain by our enemies, if their combinations and malice against the godly might drive them close together, and unite them more to one another in love.

In honor preferring one another.] Putting all possible respect on one another: this is not in ceremony or compliment, though these civilities that are due, and done without feignedness or affectation, are not disallowed, yea, are, I conceive, included; but in matter of real esteem, each preferring one another. For, though a man may see the weakness of those he converses with, yet passing, and, as far as he can, covering these, he ought to take notice of what is good. All have something commendable, and no one hath all; so the meanest may in something be preferable to the highest. And Christian humility and charity will seek out for and espy that, and for it put all respect upon them, that their quality and station are able to bear: and in this, one should prevent another, and strive who should do most in this kind, as a good and happy contention.

And the source of this is, love to God, which so mortifies the heart to all outward advantages, that, further than a man is tied by place and calling, he would not receive, much less desire, any kind of respect from any, but had rather be slighted and disregarded. What cares a soul enamoured with the glory to come, for the vain passing air of preference and honor here? That it can easily bate to any, and, so far as a man has any power of it, would put it upon others, far rather than own it himself. Such a one can sweetly please himself in being the meanest in all companies where he comes, and passing for such, and he is glad of respect done to others; still looking homeward, where there is no prejudging one another at all, but perfect unenvying and unenvied glory. Glory here is to be shunned rather than pursued, and if it will follow, yet is less to be regarded than thy shadow. Oh, how light and vanishing is it, and even things more solid than it! The fashion of this world passeth away.

VER. 11. Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.

Not slothful in business.] These condensed rules have much in them; and this one is very needful, for often a listless, indisposed weariness overtakes even good men: seeing so little to be done to any purpose, they are almost ready to give over all; yet, they ought to bestir themselves, and apply to diligence in their place. Be not unduly stickling and busy in things improper, but enclosing thy diligence within thy sphere. Suffer it not to stand, but keep it there in motion. As to thy worldly affairs, be so diligent as to give them good despatch, when thou art about them, but have thy heart as little in them, as much disengaged as may be; yet so acquitting them wisely, they shall trouble thee the less, when thou art in higher and better employments. As to thyself, be often examining thy heart and ways, striving constantly against sin; though little sensible advantage be gained, yet, if thou yield, it will be worse; if it prevail so much amidst all thy opposition, what would it do if thou shouldst sit still! Use all holy means, how fruitless soever they seem for the present, and wait on God. We have toiled all night, said Simon, and taken nothing, Luke v. 5: and yet, at his command, essaying again, they took more at once, than if, after their ordinary way, they had been taking all night. So as to others, give not up because thou seest no present success, but, in thy place, admonish, exhort, and rebuke, with all meekness and patience. Doth God wait on sinners, and wilt not thou wait a little for others?

* Ουκ τὸ ξύλον ἐνρῶσεις, &c.

Fervent in spirit.] Beware of a fretful impatience; that is a sickly distempered heat, as that of a fever, which makes a man unfit for work, and men commonly in this break away from their business; but much healthful, natural heat makes a man strong and able to endure labor and continue in it. This is the thing here recommended. To be so hot and fervent in spirit, is a great advantage; it is the very strength of the soul in all employments. Much love to God, and desire of his glory, this is the heat that will not weary, will cheerfully go through all discouragements: many waters will not quench it. This fervor of spirit, wrought by the Spirit of God, doth clearly distinguish itself from that inordinate heat of our spirits, which may sometimes either act alone, or mingle itself with the other in the best causes and affairs. This holy fervor is composed and regular in working, runs not heedily to unadvised or disorderly ways; it is a sweet delightful heat, not painful and vexing as the other; it carries on to duty, and is not disturbed about events.

Serving the Lord.] Some copies have it, servicing the time; which may bear a fair construction, of taking present occasions of good, and being useful in our generation, and accommodating ourselves in all lawful things to times and persons, for their good, as our apostle became all things to all, to win some; yet, this kind of expression not being found elsewhere in Scripture, and the most copies having it as we read it, and some mistake of letters in transcribers seeming to have occasioned it, it is much rather to be taken as in our version.

But, out of all question, some do follow that mistaken reading in its worst sense: instead of servicing the Lord, serving the times. And this some do even in evil ways; others, in ways that are good, yet, following upon trust, and complying, though unwillingly, because the times carry things so; but when times change to the worse, these men are discovered, for still they serve their master, the times, and their own advantage in them: which way soever that goes, they follow; so that their following the better side in better times, is but accidental.

But this servicing the Lord, is more even and lasting; serving him still in all times, doing all for him, having no aim but his glory. Such a heart can not be diverted from its course by any counter-blast of times.

Would you be steadfast in times of approaching trial, seek to have your hearts acquainted with God, and fixed on him. For others will be shaken: but such will follow him through all hazards, and fear no ill while he is with them.

VER. 12. Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer.

Rejoicing in hope.] Oh, this we seldom do. When are our hearts as if transported with the blessed hope of our inheritance? This would make us what follows.

Patient in tribulation.] People would hear much of this, of preparing for suffering. There may be a distemper in desiring to hear and speak so much of that. What though trials be coming, as it is likely they are, we should account too much of ourselves, and this present world, to dwell expressly on that subject. We see the apostles do not so, though they lived and wrote in the times of another sort of persecution than we have yet seen; and they to whom the apostle here writes lived where it was most violent and potent, and yet they spend not all on this; some brief words of it are interspersed with the discourse thrown as it were into a parenthesis: but still, the main is, the doctrine of faith and rules of holiness. And these are indeed the great furniture for all sufferings: I know no other. To see much of the excellency and worth of Jesus Christ, and the riches of our hope in him; to have these in our view, much in our hearts and in our mouths; these drown all the little fears of present things. See how, in passing, our apostle speaks, as it were in a slighting way, of all sufferings for him: I have cast it up, says he, and I reckon that the sufferings of this present time (of this now) are not worthy to be compared to the glory which shall be revealed in us.

Again, the other thing is, the rules of holiness: these powerfully enable for suffering anything rather than unholiness. That sickness of the soul, those corrupt humors of sin, make it crazy, so that it can endure no blasts of air; but when it is purged and free from these, and in communion with God in his ways, then it is healthful and strong, and so, is able to endure anything. The mortifying of our affections to the world, that is what enables for suffering. Whither reaches the cruelty of man, but to thy goods or thy body? And what makes any faint, but an over esteem of these, by which they are filled with desires to preserve, and fears to lose them? Now, when the heart is disengaged from these, and hath taken up in God, is rich and content in him, it stands not much to the courtesy of any: let them take the rest, it suffers with joy, the spoiling of goods, having in heaven a more enduring substance. Heb. x. 34. And for the utmost killing them, they look on it as the highest favor: it is to them but the making a hole for them in their prison-wall to get out at. Therefore, I say, there is nothing doth so fit for all encounters, as to be much instructed in that which is the substance of Christianity, hearts purified, and lives holily and spiritually regulated. In a word much study of Christ, and much study of thyself for aught I know, are the wisest and strongest preparatives for all possible sufferings.

How sweetly can the soul retire into him, and repose in him, in the greatest storms! I know nothing that can much dismay him who can believe and pray.* That, you see, is added.

Continuing instant in prayer.] If afraid of fainting, yea, if at the point of fainting, this revives the soul, draws in no less than the strength of God to support it: and what then can surcharge it?

* Nempe tenens quod amo, nihil, illum amplexus, timebo.

Thy access to him, all the enemies in the world can not hinder. The closest prison shuts not out thy God; yea, rather it shuts out other things and companies, that thou mayest have the more leisure for him, and the sweeter converse with him. Oh! acquaint yourselves with this exercise of prayer, and by it with God, that if days of trouble come, you may know whither to go, and what way; and if you know this way, whatever befalls you, you are not much to be bemoaned.

LECTURES

ON THE

FIRST NINE CHAPTERS OF ST. MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1. The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham.

As the bounty of God appears in the furniture and comforts of our natural life, in that he hath not only provided for simple necessity, but enriched it with plentiful variety; thus he hath done likewise toward the spiritual life in the provision of the Holy Scriptures, having in them so rich diversity of the kind of writings, prophecies and histories, poesies and epistles, and of the kind, and expressly on the same subject, four books written by the hands of four several men, but all led by the hand of the same Spirit, and all of them so harmoniously according together, as makes up one song; the four with a delightful variety of notes, but no mistuning, or jarring difference: those that seem to be so, being duly considered, do not only well agree, but there is still some instructive advantage in the diversity; each recording something, some of them divers things that are not in the other; and what one hath more briefly, is more enlarged in some other: they are not so different as to be discordant, nor so the same as to be superfluous. Their order in the time of their writing is, with good reason, conceived to be the same with that of their placing as we have them. This of St. Matthew was written first, and very likely in Hebrew, as more particularly for the use of his own nation, though in His purpose who set him on to work (as all the other scriptures) intended for the good of the church in all succeeding ages. And he begins with the great mysterious point on which hangs our happiness, that which is our grand comfort, as St. Austin speaks, the manhood of God. The chapter hath these two, his genealogy, and his nativity, each particularly intituled; for the first words are the inscription, not of the whole book, nor of the whole chapter, but only of the first part of it. The book, that is (as the Hebrew word signifies), the roll, or list of the generation, that is, the descent of Jesus Christ.

The account by ascending, as St. Luke does, or by descending, as this evangelist, is altogether indifferent; neither need we, with the ancients, seek subtle and mysterious reasons of it, which are too airy to have either certain truth, or profitable use in them. The reckoning of the one only down from Abraham, and the other up to Adam, may have some more solid reason; the one having regard to the particular promise made to Abraham, and the other to the general interest of mankind, and that according to the promise made to our first parents in the garden. And this beginning in Abraham here, relishes somewhat of that we spake, of penning this gospel in Hebrew, with particular respect to the Jews for informing them first: as, indeed, the gospel was first to be preached to them, so might they have somewhat of the same privilege in the writing of it—he of whom it treats being born among them, and of them. And before entering to branch the lineage, the evangelist particularly mentions David and Abraham, because of the particular promises made to them of the Messiah to come of their seed.

The great diversity of the names from David to Joseph (of them all, indeed, save two) has drawn several persons to take the one for the line of Joseph, the other for the line of Mary. But the diversity of names ariseth not so much from the custom of that nation, of one person having divers names (which commonly is answered in this), though somewhat of that may be in it; but it is much rather from that, it seems, St. Matthew does deduce the legal succession in government (by Solomon), St. Luke the natural in birth (by Nathan). St. Matthew, to make up the number of his three fourteens, even omits some immediate parents, which alters nothing at all of the true deduction, and nephews are frequently called, and truly are, the sons of their grandfathers, though not immediate. Now, though it is possible that it might be otherwise, yet the evangelists take it as a thing then manifest and known when they wrote, that Joseph, according to the appointment and ordinary practice of his nation, did marry within his tribe and family. So that his extraction, who was but the supposed and nominal father, doth give account of Mary, the real mother of Jesus Christ. Other scruples, though it may be to some needful to clear them, yet I name not, as being useless to acquaint those with who find them not. And some there be altogether needless and curious, which may pass among the vain, unprofitable questions of genealogists that the apostle advises to avoid.

VER. 18. Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: when as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child by the Holy Ghost.

ST. LUKE is more large in the history of the conception, but (which the rest have not) this evangelist acquaints us with Joseph's behavior in the business. We have, 1st. His first doubtful thoughts within himself: 2d. His right information, and directions from God; 3d. His answerable acquiescence and obedience.

Perceiving Mary, who was espoused to him, to be with child before they came together, and not knowing how this came to pass, it would certainly perplex him much; yet goes he not in a sudden passion, or rage of jealousy, to take the extremest course, but being a just man, that is, not strict and severe, as taking justice in a strict sense, for so it would seem contrary to the present intendment;—yet, some have taken it so, though he was a just man;—but it is indeed rendered as the cause of his purpose of mitigating the law's rigor, and so, just is here a good man, a man of a moderate, mild spirit, averse from rigors, as good men usually are. And as his own temper, so, no doubt, Mary's carriage, did incline him to this way; observing her modesty and piety, which undoubtedly was singular, and would appear in her whole deportment; but further than that spake for her, it doth not appear that she spake all this while anything for herself: she offered not to declare the admirable way of her conception, which would have seemed feigned and incredible from her mouth, but quietly refers the matter to Him who had done it. Thus silent innocence rests satisfied in itself, where it may be inconvenient or fruitless to plead for itself, and loses nothing by doing so, for it is always in due season vindicated and cleared by a better hand. And thus it was here: she is silent, and God speaks for her.

Ver. 20. While he thought on these things, &c.] The whole matter is opened to him by the angel of God in a dream. This blessed child is owned by his glorious Father; the conception declared to be pure and supernatural by the Holy Ghost; his birth and name, and the reasons of it, are foretold; and upon these, Joseph is ascertained, not only of the spotless innocency, but of the matchless dignity, of his espoused Mary in this conception, and the true quality of her Divine Son, and so is furnished with sufficient ground of receiving her as his wife, which accordingly he forthwith did.

The last words of the chapter are added for the future clearness concerning the purity of his birth. But denying for the time before, which was to the present purpose, affirms nothing at all for the time after, as is evident by abundant instances of this manner of speech, where until goes no further than the named term any way, yea, does rather import the perpetuity of what it speaks; as Gen.

xxviii. 15, Until I have done that, &c., and Isa. xxii. 14, Till ye die—which yet hath not been alleged, for anything I know, for a purgatory after death.

Ver. 22. In the narration, the apostle inserts (as is his custom) the parallel of the thing with a prophecy foretelling all this, of the accommodating of which I will not now insist. It is evident that it looks beyond anything that those times, or that any time, before this fulness of time, did afford. And this singular Virgin's conception was altogether agreeable to the singular person so conceived and born, both as to the purity of his human, and the dignity of his Divine, nature; that he might be known to be not only a holy, sinless man, but more than a simple man, God-man, God with us, as his name is.

Observation. The book of the generation of Jesus Christ.] Many great volumes of history have been written of states and kingdoms of the earth, and lives of particular famous men, and the reading of them may delight and inform the mind; but what are they all, how empty and comfortless stuff in respect of this history! The book of the generation of Jesus Christ. This is the gospel, the alone good tidings to all nations and all ages; still fresh, and equally good news from one generation to another. Had not the Virgin borne this Son, we must say, all of us, "Good for us we had not been born."

Now, that so many ages were run by, before his coming, HIS will, who chose that point of time, is sufficient reason. But, 1st. We may perceive by this, that the faith of the church and people of God was exercised in the expectance of this promised seed, in whom all the nations should be blessed.

2dly. And the esteem of this rich gift raised (and well did he deserve to be) the desire and hope of the nations. Thus the Lord hath been pleased, in other great favors, to use this way to reveal them in the promise long time before the performance; so, a son to Abraham, and the deliverance from Egypt, and that other from Babylon long before the captivity.

3dly. He was equally from the beginning, in his Father's view, for the interest of believers, in all those preceding ages, as if he had already lived and died and rose again, A Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; for he sees through all generations and successions of times, and all things in them are always alike present to his eye. But in the meantime, while the church was held in prefiguring shadows, this was their grand desire, that he might appear in the flesh; still looking and waiting when the day should break, and the shadows flee away. And thus in the Song of Solomon may we take that wish (ch. viii. 1), Oh! that thou wast as my brother! And though the time seemed long, yet the vision was for the set time, and then it spake, and lied not; and he was coming forward in the succession of time, hast—

ing as a roe on the mountains, skipping from one age, from one hill to another: as here we have it, Abraham begat Isaac, Isaac begat Jacob, &c. And this is now the great wish of his spouse, the church, and of each particular soul espoused to him, that he would come again as he hath promised; and he will do so. What a sweet echo there (Rev. xxii. 17) of Come! The Spirit says Come, and the Bride says Come; and he says (ver. 20), Behold I come quickly; and they resound again, Amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus!

Ver. 21. But thou shalt call his name Jesus.] That is the name that refreshes the fainting spirits of humbled sinners, that the sweet-smelling balm, that the ointment poured out, that draws the virgins to love him; sweet in the mouth and in the ear, and life in the heart. A Savior, for he shall save his people from their sins. The Jews were his people once in a particular way; but all Jews and Gentiles that run unto his name as their refuge, are his people, and he hath engaged himself to be their Savior, whatsoever kind of people they be, and whatsoever kind of guiltiness of sins they bring with them. And for that reason, as is observed, are named in this his genealogy, persons grossly stained, and the woman too (ver. 3) is specified, all under the same blot; and one a stranger, not of the seed of the Jews; signifying him to be a Savior of all nations, and even of the vilest sinners. But we know not his riches and our own poverty; therefore we run not to him. We perceive not that we are lost and perishing; therefore a Savior is a word of little relish. Oh, were we convinced of the huge mass of guilt that lies upon us, and the wrath that for it hangs over us, ready to fall on us and sink us, this would be our continual thought, till we were resolved in it, "Is this Savior mine?" And to the end we might find him so, we should tread upon all that lies in our way to run to him.

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1. Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem,

VER. 2. Saying, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him.

The blessed Son now born hath for part of his name, in the prophet foretelling, or rather telling his birth (Isa. ix. 6) Wonderful. He is so in his birth: that we have seen in the former chapter. He is so in his life and death, particularly in that part of his life which is ordinarily scarce at all remarkable, his infancy. The history of that we have in this chapter. So, as in that place of the prophet, wonderful is the beginning of his name, he is wonderful in the beginning of his life.

That wonder that goes along throughout all his life and death, is, in the passages here recorded, very legible, a strong contemperature of majesty and meanness: yea, these two, so far distant in notion, yet meet in him, the meanness of man and the majesty of God. So obscurely born and so poorly lodged, yet, that birth marked, and that lodging pointed out, by a star that seems to have no other work nor motion, but to tell of him and lead to him; and by it wise men are led from afar, to offer rich presents to a poor babe, and to do homage to him as a king, and to worship him!

Then, afterward he is put to flee for his life in his swaddling clothes. He who came to give life to dead man, is in hazard of a cruel death at the entry of his life, and escapes it by the obscure and hasty flight of his parents with him; yet, even in that flight there is a track of majesty, that they flee, stay, and return with him, all upon Divine warnings. Thus was this Son of Righteousness veiled and clouded in human flesh, and a low kind of human life, and yet some rays of Deity are still breaking through and telling, here dwells the Godhead bodily.

In this chapter, these two things of him are remarkable. First, He is marvellously witnessed and worshipped. Secondly, persecuted and preserved.

He is witnessed, 1st, By a star stirring up strangers from far, to seek him, and leading them to find him.

2dly, By those strangers coming and declaring this to be their errand, and inquiring after the place of his birth.

3dly, By the chief priests and scribes, from a clear prophecy, resolving them.

Of these, and other like points in the following history, what questions are moved more curious than useful, I shall either pass wholly in silence, or only name them to pass them, to put them out of our way, that they may not stop us in what may be useful. And textual difficulties that call for clearing, I shall endeavor to open with as much briefness as may well consist with clearness, and to serve for that end of clearing them. For this star, what shall we see the better into the end and person whom it served, by deciding, if we could, much less by debating what we can not decide, whether it was a star or a comet? Called a star for its resemblance, as the Scripture often gives things the vulgar names, it seems to have been temporary, and made for this singular service only. However, it was a star that led to the sun.

After men have pleased themselves in the employ of all their reading and wit, to find what the Magi were, further than the text comes, they can assuredly inform us nothing. They were Magi (wise men), and of the east; but whether from Chaldea, or Persia, or Arabia, neither that name they bear, nor the presents they bring, can certainly conclude. It can not be denied, that all these nations called their astrologers, and generally their philosophers, by that name; and they might bring the same presents from any of those, and from divers other eastern countries: nor is there any more evidence that they were Balaam's posterity, or of his school, though the prophecy of a star arising in Jacob seems to suit somewhat well with this kind of notice given them by a star, and with their observing it, and following it. And truly, besides the uncertainty, the inutility of this may save us a labor; for what shall we be really the wiser, to know particularly what these wise men were, or whence they were? Sure I am, to make them three to fit their number to their presents, and to make kings of them, and give them names, and then to wrangle about their burial-place, is to play the fool about the wise men.

If you ask, how the star could speak this, that there was a great king born, and born in Judea, and speak it so as to persuade them to come and see? I conceive, all their skill in astronomy, and Balaam's prophecy of the star in Jacob, and the tradition of the Messiah, and his star, and sybils prophesying of them, could not make the language of this star thus clear and intelligible to them. There was, no doubt, an extraordinary darting in of a higher light into their minds, clearer than that of the star, to make its meaning clear to them, and to draw them forth to this journey. The star appeared to them in the east, but it does not appear that it led them all the way, though commonly it be so conceived: on the contrary, after their setting forth, it seems not to have appeared to them till they came from Jerusalem, whither they went as likeliest either to find him they sought, or notice of him at least. And this likewise was by a Divine hand ordered, that both there they might give testimony of Christ, and likewise receive their further testimony of him and address to him, and be confirmed in their persuasions concerning him, and then seasonably the star appears to establish and lead them.

Ver. 3. When Herod the king had heard these things, he was troubled.] The wise men's question occasions Herod's fear, and that, the meeting of the priests and scribes to resolve it. They do it from the prophet Micah, ch. v. 2. The difference in the cited words is really none, Bethlehem Ephrata, and Bethlehem Judah, being all one. And the prophet's words, read interrogatively (as well they may), are clearly the same thing with the evangelist's narrative. However the least of all in itself, yet, it was not the least, but the greatest, by this great King's being born in it. And so, David bears the type of his Son and Lord, for he was of obscure birth in this same city.

Ver. 7-12. Then Herod, when he had privately called the wise men—sent them to Bethlehem.] The wise men, thus answered and led, came to Bethlehem, and are now so confirmed of the royalty of this child, that they are not removed from that persuasion, nor at all staggered in it, by the sight of so much outward meanness as they found: a poor babe in a common inn; whether still in the manger or no, is not certain, so it may be; however, doubtless, in a very low condition, far from royal grandeur, but yet so high in his own dignity and in their thoughts, that they fell down and worshipped, and offered their present, which they did not to Herod in all his pomp. This many ancient and modern are pleased to subtilize into mysteries, which, though I dare not confidently deny all, yet dare I aver nothing. He that brought them forth, directed them directly home, having no more business at Jerusalem. When they had found the king they came to seek, they left king Herod to seek his intelligence from others.

Ver. 13-23. But these were strange news to Herod—a born king of the Jews. The common fears that are of the ill genius of tyrants, and that are the fell revenge of the many fears they cause to so many others, are now raised, and rage within him upon this report. And for all his craft, and the growth of it for cruelties upon long practice, yet is he, as it were, so thunderstruck with this fear, that he can not resolve on any sure way for this end, but inquires the age of the child, and it seems, defers a good time, and smothers the intended massacre (for that answers best the doubt about the age of two years), and then sends and kills all the children of or under that age: that was the sacrifice which in his inquiry he meant to offer, instead of worshipping the child born. His royal Father could have preserved him otherwise than by the care and flight of his supposed father with him; but thus he pleased, even in this, to carry on his divine Son under the covert of such human and humble ways of preservation, to make him in all things like us (sin excepted), and to sweeten those things to us, when we are called to be like him in them, in being persecuted, and by persecution forced to flee.

That text, ver. 15, Out of Egypt have I called my Son, suits most fitly, the words having (as other such adapted places) their prophetic aspect to Jesus Christ, without any prejudice of their first proper sense, in persons or things typifying him. Israel is called the Lord's son, and his first born, Ex. iv. 22; Jer. xxxi. 9.

The other text, He shall be called a Nazarene, I rather think, signifies his singular holiness, which the name imports, and all the prophets foretold of him, and the legal Nazarenes prefigured, than that it relates to any particular prophecy. Besides, it is in the text the prophets, in general: Which was spoken by the prophets. Ver. 23.

Observe 1. The freedom of God's calling and drawing men unto his Son; that it follows not the track of human appearances and external engagements. Strangers are brought from far to worship Christ, and are glad at his birth. His own, among whom, and those particularly for whom, he was born, were not rejoiced, yea, were troubled at it; so far were they from receiving him as their king, and worshipping him. And strange, that having resolved the Magi's question, they all sit still, for anything we find, and not one is so taken with it, as to take share of the small latter end of their long journey, and to go some miles off, to see so great and matchless a wonder! Thus, many who are far off in their ways, are humbled and brought to Christ, and those who in external profession seemed always near to him, are still far off; nearest the church (as ye say) farthest from God. My brethren, rest not on your outward relations, your interest in the ordinances and profession of religion, but see how your hearts stand affected toward Jesus Christ. If you receive him as king, then shall ye partake of the sweet fruits of his kingdom.

Obs. 2. There was some appearance of reason (though, indeed, reasonless) that Herod should be stirred with the news of a newborn king; for though Christ's office never wrongs the just power of kings, yet, the jealousy of it will never be out of their minds, while they are not acquainted with him: they will still think that his kingdom encroaches upon theirs; and this is the ground of their almost general enmity against him. But why were the Jews troubled, who could not but apprehend, according to the very notion of the Messiah, that if this was he, he was come for their deliverance and release from the tyranny of foreign power? Yet, they with Herod are troubled. The reason seems to be, they feared that trouble and war would arise by this appearing, and they might possibly foresee much in the way to the change, and therefore would rather have chosen to lie still under the burden of the Roman power. There is a natural prejudice in all against the kingdom of Christ, that it brings disturbance and disquiet with it, and therefore men would rather sleep in their chains than hear of a deliverance by him. Thus, the Jews in Egypt appear to have been prejudiced against the message of their going forth, which Moses brought them. Thus, a carnal heart would comply with its bondage, rather than be at any pains in the remove from it.

Obs. 3. Was the birth of Christ subject to accompanying trouble? Thus it is in the soul, a tumult as it were, of Herod and the Jews. They that are without, viz., carnal friends, all in a rage at it: "What! turn a melancholy, precise fool, go mad," &c. And within, like the tumultuous multitude, all the lusts of the heart are clamoring for their interest, noising to it, that it will suffer much in this change, that all wonted delights will be cut off, that there will arise much war and trouble by this new kingdom; besides many other doubts and fears that arise in this matter. Think it not strange to find it thus, that the soul is tossed with disquiet at the birth of Christ in it; but rather let it rejoice in this trouble, as a sign of that blessed birth, and that spiritual kingdom of Christ within it, which, however it occasion some present stir, shall sweetly compensate that, and compose the soul, and make it happy: for the Child born is the Prince of Peace (Isa. ix. 6), and the proper nature of his kingdom, that whereof it is made up, is, righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Rom. xiv. 17.

Obs. 4. Herod's fear and anger against this news gathers the priests and scribes together, to give clear testimony from the Scriptures of that very birth which was so hateful to him, and to verify it by the true designment of the place. Thus all his enemies' practices still prove, in the issue, of service to him; all all their stirrings against his kingdom and glory make for it. When all is reckoned, it is found in effect that they undo themselves, and advance his end whom they oppose.

Obs. 5. Bring me word, that I may come and worship him. Ver. 8. This is an old piece of king-craft, we see, older than Machiavel, to serve themselves of the shadow and mask of religion, in order to walk unseen in their atheism. The most of them in their wars and confederacies pretending religion, and intending the subversion of it, would seem to come to worship, and come indeed to worry. Cultum pretendit, cultrum intendit.

Obs. 6. Though Herod and the priests were both enemies, yet they concur to this testimony, and furnish it to the inquiring strangers, but went not with them, nor so much as sent any. Thus many testify, yea, teach the truth of Christ in the general, yet go not to him, as signs in the way direct others, and stir not themselves. But, my brethren, think it not enough to give a general assent to divine truths, for unless the heart be warmed with them, and the soul stirred up to seek an interest in them, they save not, yea, they more deeply condemn.

Obs. 7. Divers readings of the evangelists and prophets, agreeing in one sense, are very useful. Bethlehem the least, yet, not the least; the least of thyself, but the greatest by the birth of the great king born in thee. Thus all are raised and ennobled by Christ. The poorest persons, and things in themselves most despicable, yet, through him, become most excellent. The simplicity of the ordinances, the word and sacraments, so far below the pomp of the world, and gaudy, false worship, in outward visage, yet are much further above them in inward dignity. Thus, the soul of a poor, simple, unlettered believer, that is the meanest and least in itself, far below the greatest persons and great wits of the world in naturals, yet, Jesus Christ being born in it, is not the least, but in spiritual excellency truly great, and far beyond all others void of Christ.

Obs. 8. Christ newly born, is hotly persecuted, put to flight, &c. This is a presage of his after condition and entertainment in the world in his own person, and still in his body, his Church, the saints. No sooner is Christ born in thee, than the wicked will be upon thee, seeking to kill him with persecuting malice, with scoffs and taunts at the least.

Obs. 9. All his notions are by divine direction. Thus, his saints in all times, particularly in times of straits and troubles, must still be depending on his pointing out of every step, and are safe in following that.

Further, we may observe, that they whom the Father intends to bring to the Son, shall not want means of their calling and leading to him. He will create a light in them, and cause it to arise in their hearts to stir them up to inquire after him. And when they need direction, and seek it, he will furnish it even where it would be least expected. If they be driven to attend it at their hands who go not to Christ themselves, even under a ministry that hath little life in it,—that is formal and spiritless in itself, yet, if God hath cast thy lot there, even there, I say, shall a soul seeking after Jesus Christ find direction and confirmation, and the word shall be made lively to it by a higher hand: and though they go not to Christ, yet shall they give thee his true address, and direct thee right to him, as here the scribes and priests did these inquirers.

Again, observe how God takes hold of men by suitable ways. His call does not lie wholly in the congruity of the means, but he makes it effectual; yet, he carries that efficacy so sweetly, that there is not any violence at all. Often in the means, that sweetness consists in the particular aptness of them. These were star-gazers, and he gives them notice according to their faculty by a star. Thus, some are taken with some accessory qualification of a minister, baited by this to give ear and take liking to his doctrine. Thus, St. Augustine confesses he was caught in hearing St. Ambrose, through delight in his eloquence; for though he looked no farther, yet, together with the words he loved, the things that he loved not did likewise slide in and gain upon him. Again, they undertake a long and hard journey, and resolve to go on, and, missing him at Jerusalem, they inquire there concerning him, and will not leave off till they find him. A soul that hath once seen a light pointing out Christ to it, and stirring it up to seek after him, will not be driven back, nor called off from going to him, by any discouragements and difficulties: yea, they sharpen it, and set an edge on it, and make them so much the more earnest. Others can speak of him, and lie still, and not stir to go to him, as here the priests: but such a soul must have him, and will not take rest without him; will still inquire where he is, where and how I may find my Christ. A man may possibly meet with some formal minister, that knows little of Christ, and loves him less, who yet can tell such an inquirer, that by believing he shall find him, and instruct him somewhat about the notion of faith, and inseparable repentance, and leaving off sin, which things he himself, who directs, makes no use of, hath no experience of at all: yet may his information be useful to the soul seeking Christ, and in following them it may find him. And as it is in the first inquiry and journey to Christ, so, in after seeking, upon his withdrawals: as Cant. iii. and v. Though the watchman that should direct thee deride and mock thee, yea, though they smite and wound thee, yet, if once thou hast found the sweetness of his love, or but heard his voice speaking to thy heart, and desiring it to open to him, thou wilt not leave off thy search day or night, till thou hast found him, in how mean a condition and outward appearance soever: thou wilt see through that, and behold him thy king, thy beloved Lord, and see him beautiful, all beauty and loveliness, and wilt be forced to declare him so, that he outvies all creature loves, as not worthy to be compared: yea, that their enjoyments have not near so much sweetness as the very seekings and mournings after Jesus Christ.

Ver. 11. Fell down and worshipped him.] When a soul is busy asking after Jesus Christ, if it be inquired what would you do with him. Why this is my purpose, will it say, I would worship him. I would not only be saved by him, but I would fall down and adore him, and acknowledge him my king: and if I had anything better than another, I would offer it him. But what hast thou? Hast thou rich presents for him? Alas! no. These are called wise men, and were, it seems, rich; had rich gifts. I am a foolish and a poor creature, and I have nothing to offer.—Nothing. Hast thou a heart? Yes: a heart I have: but, alas! there can be nothing more unfit for him, and unworthy of him: it is dark, and foul, and hard, all disorder and filthiness. Yet, wilt thou give it him as it is, and be willing that he use and dispose of it as it pleases him? Oh, that he would accept of it, that he would take it upon any terms! Here it is: if it would fly out from this offer, I would he would lay hold of it.—Oh! that it were once received by him, that it were in his hand; and then let him do with it what seems him good. Sayest thou so? Then it is done. Give it really and freely, and he will take, and make it better at its worst, than all the gold, and frankincense, and myrrh of all those rich countries where they abound, and will purify, rectify, and make it quite another thing than it is. And it shall never repent thee to have made a gift of it to him. He shall frame it to his own likeness, and in return will give thee himself, and be thine for ever.

CHAPTER III.

ALTHOUGH the enemies of Jesus Christ, and, for a time, even his friends and followers, mistook the nature of his kingdom, yet he is a king. This being questioned, he himself avowed it before the Roman judge; and even in his low estate on earth, yet were there intermixed signs and characters of royalty. To instance here no more, the former chapter hath the history of one of them, and this of another. In that was the homage done to him a little after his entering into the world by birth. In this, we have his harbinger preparing his way a little before his coming forth into the world, to manifest himself in his words and works.

This chapter, you see, contains the history of John Baptist—1st. The nature of his office; 2dly. The exercise of his office; and that both generally to the multitude of the Jews that resorted to his baptism, and particularly to some of more eminent note among them, the Pharisees and Sadducees, and singularly on the person of Jesus Christ.

Ver. 1. In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea.] This relates not to the history that goes before, but to that which follows to be recorded, as the usual style of the Hebrew bears. It is clear that many years fell between even the greatest part both of Christ's life, and of John Baptist's; in both which, from the birth to the coming forth to preach, all the intervening time is past over in silence, not only here, but in all the other evangelists, saving one act of Christ's appearing in public about the age of twelve years, recorded by St. Luke, which was but a glance of this jewel, that lay locked up a long time after.

John the Baptist, an extraordinary person in his birth and calling, holy from the womb, a prophet, and more than a prophet; and Jesus Christ himself far more than he, his Lord and Master, the Prince of prophets; and yet, neither of them came abroad in his ministry till about the age of thirty years, the time specified in the law for the service of the house of God. But our ignorance makes us bold and foolhardy; we rush forward not knowing ourselves nor this calling, its excellency and holiness, and our meanness and unholiness. This I say, not that I think measure doth punctually and literally tie us, especially the necessity of some times and the scarcity of faithful laborers being considered, upon which some may lawfully, yea, ought to be drawn forth, if unwilling and yet able.

But surely, the consideration of these examples should give a due check and curb to our usual precipitate hearts, which in these times have need of some restraint, even in some who possibly have some competency both of abilities and true piety. Good fruit may be plucked too green, which, let alone awhile to ripen, would prove much more pleasant and profitable.

In these two, their long lying hid is so much the more remarkable, inasmuch as besides their singular fitness for appearing much sooner, they had so short a time allotted for their course; the forerunner but about one year, and our Lord Jesus Christ himself but about three years and a half. But this was the assigned time in the Divine wisdom, which was found sufficient for the work committed to them; and what needs more? Let not any grudge for themselves, or for any other, their speedy removal, upon this conceit, that they might, in nature's course, continue much longer, and in appearance, through their labor be still more serviceable. Let all rather study for themselves, and wish unto others, that they may be diligent in their work while their day lasts, be it short or long, faithful and fruitful in their generation, and the shorter their day is like to be, work the faster; for certainly the good of life is not in the length of it, but in the use of it.

There are between our Savior and this his messenger or forerunner, divers notable agreements: their being near of kindred; their births taking place in one year, and both foretold by an angel; and as Christ was the son of a virgin, John the son of aged parents, and a mother so long barren: little odds in the time of both their appearing to the world, and abiding in it; both sealing their doctrine with their blood. But as in these, in all, the Lord hath the pre-eminence beyond his servant, so this faithful servant did always most willingly acknowledge it, yea, his very business was to abase himself and exalt his master; and this he did, as we find throughout his history. And those of the servants of Christ that are most honored to be nearest him, are always the greatest abasers of themselves, the most desirous to have him honored.

John's office, we have briefly expressed in the first verse, partly in his name John Baptist, a minister of baptism, and partly in the word joined with it, preaching. Preaching of the word was joined with baptism: John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness.

I will not here speak of the nature of baptism, the combination of preaching with it; their aspect each to the other, and concurrence to one excellent end; the word unfolding the sacrament, and the sacrament sealing the word; the word, as a light, informing and clearing the sense of the seal, and it again, as a seal, confirming and ratifying the truth of the word: as you see some significant seals or signets engraven, have a word about them expressing their sense.

But truly, the word is a light, and the sacraments have in them of the same light illuminating them; and this of baptism, the ancients do particularly express by light. Yet are they both nothing but darkness to us, till the same light shine in our hearts: for till then, we are nothing but darkness ourselves, and therefore the most luminous things are so to us: noonday is as midnight to a blind man. And we use these ordinances, the word and the sacrament, without profit and comfort for the most part, because we have not of that Divine light within us; and we have it not, because we ask it not, are not often there where it is to be had, nor earnest suiters for it: for we have his word that can not fail, that our Heavenly Father will give even this choice gift, this light (for that is it), his Holy Spirit to them that ask it. Then would word and sacrament be sweet to us, which now are so lifeless and unsavory.

Ver. 2. We have in the following words the sum of his doctrine: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. In the point of time and the way of his ministry, he was indeed singular; yet, the substance of his doctrine is the same with those that went before, and those that came after him. All the prophets preached repentance, and joined in the prediction of this kingdom of God; and our Savior himself, and his disciples, as you will after find, preached not only this same doctrine, but even in the same words: only this he had particular, that he stood between the two, as it were, the link of law and gospel, as one calls him, and was the first that said, The kingdom of God is at hand, and pointed it out as come while he was speaking.

Repent.] This is the main purport and end of God's messages to man in all times, by all whom he hath sent (as has been already said), prophets, apostles, Jesus Christ and his forerunner; and still, all his ministers under the gospel, have no other in effect to say, than to call men to repentance, to bring them home to God. Man is naturally turned away from God, and is still further running away and hastening to the pit; and God is calling after him, Do not destroy yourselves, I will receive and pardon you; Oh! return; why will ye die? And yet, men will not hearken, but run to their ruin. This word is daily preached; and yet who almost is persuaded so much as to stop his course a little and consider what is propounded to him, much less to break off his course and return? Oh, the bountifulness and graciousness of God, who thus entreats, and still entreats base worms, whom he might tread on and crush in a moment! Oh, the wretchedness and madness of man who refuses, and still refuses those gracious entreaties! You have been called to in these terms, and where are they that return? Where are hearts breaking for their iniquities; and breaking away from them, mourning after the Lord, and longing for a look of his countenance, and desiring nothing else? Oh! that some soul might now be stirred up, and set but upon thoughts of repenting, serious, real thoughts that would not die! The Lord will reach forth his hand and draw it to himself, though it find it can not stir; yea, in that very desire of returning to him, he hath prevented it and touched it, and will not lose it, will not suffer it, and his begun work in it, to perish.

For the kingdom of heaven.] Ay, this is the attractive, that which puts life and hope into the soul. Jesus Christ, peace and reconciliation in him to God—this is the kingdom of heaven. And here it was at hand, and it came, and was published through the world. And throughout all ages of it, the gospel is at hand, in the gracious offers of it to all that hear the word; and it is brought into the souls that believingly receive the word, and Jesus Christ revealed in it. This gives both hope to the sinner, and stirs up desires. Were there not a way of receiving him, it were in vain to call men to return; but seeing there is a ransom found—seeing the way is opened up—who is there that have eyes opened to behold that mercy, that will delay any longer? that will not hasten into it, and lay hold upon it?

The gospel is not a doctrine of licentiousness, but the pure and sweet word of that new life which is in Christ. And though in the notion of repentance, there is an aspect to, and use of the law, convincing of sin and death, and working a sense of misery and sorrow from that sense, yet all this it works most sweetly and kindly, contempered with and adapted by, the doctrine of the gospel; for in this they mix and agree, and throughout all the Scriptures of both Testaments, run combined, as they do in the words of the sermon here. For this is the sum of the law and the gospel as they now stand to us-ward; Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Nothing is so powerful as the doctrine of free grace to convert a soul, not excluding convincements of sin by the law, but so including them that that deadly, killing sentence, thus prepared, becomes excellently medicinal (as the treats that are made of viper's flesh; the law, in regard of condemning power, being now dead, and not only dead, but so qualified by the cordial promises of the gospel, that it does not really condemn, but only shows condemnation out of Christ, and so causes the soul to close with Christ, and find salvation and life with him: as the dead viper's flesh, so compounded, hath a secret virtue to advance the working of those ingredients that are in the composition against poison.

For the kingdom, &c.] This is the logic and rhetoric of the Scripture, to persuade holiness and repentance by the grace and pardon revealed in the gospel. Those beams of love and free mercy are most powerful to melt the heart. Now, says he, the great Messiah is at hand. He is come: whatsoever have been men's ways before, now they may come home unto God in him. And will not they, seeing he is come from heaven to save? Will they not come from the way of hell, from sin, to be saved by him? And thus the Lord Jesus is daily set before us, and, in him, free forgiveness of all that is past; and if men will perish in multitudes, they must perish; but you that have a mind to live, come to him.

Ver. 3. For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias.] His calling is further expressed and confirmed by a prophecy of him, designating him by the nature of a voice, The voice of one crying in the wilderness; and his cry is, Prepare the ye way of the Lord, &c., which suits well with the foregoing sum of his preaching, is in effect the same with it. Repent is, prepare the way of the Lord, and make his paths straight. Repentance levels the heart to God, makes it a plain for Christ to walk in, casts down the mountains of pride, and raises the soul from base, low, earthly ways and affections, smooths the rugged passions, and straightens the crooked deceit of the heart, makes it sincere and straight both toward God and man. And then the reason, The kingdom of God is at hand, is implied in that, Prepare his way; that says, He is coming, is upon his way, and therefore sends his harbinger to make it fit for him. And this is our business, to be dealing with our hearts, levelling, smoothing, and straightening them for our Lord, that he may take delight to dwell and walk in them, and refresh them with his presence; and, certainly, the more holy diligence is used in suiting the heart to his holy will, the more of his sweet presence shall we enjoy.

Ver. 4. And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair.] He is further described from his habit and course of life, suiting the nature of his calling, and the strain of his preaching. A preacher of repentance, not willingly resorting to courts and cities, but keeping in the wilderness; that was, not a place altogether uninhabited, but a less peopled, mountainous soil, the very place of his birth; who had his habit and diet like the place, and like the employment. Though his solitude and rough garments are a slender hold for the hermetical way magnified in the Romish church, when that of Zechariah fits better, and their clothes are sooner shaped to that pattern, where he speaks of those false tongues that wear a rough garment to deceive, Zech. xiii. 4—yet certainly, besides somewhat extraordinary and singular in him and his calling, to which this was consonant, there is this for the example of all the messengers of God, to live as much as may be in their condition and station, disengaged from the world, not following the vain delights and ways of it; not bathing in the solaces and pleasures of earth, and entangling themselves in the cares of it, but, sober, and modest, and mortified in their way of living; making it their main business not to please the flesh, but to do service to their Lord, to walk in his ways, and prepare his way for him in the hearts of his people. Further, this was implied in this mean way of life, that the less of human grandeur, the more of Divine power, and of the majesty of God, might appear in his ministry.

Ver. 5. Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan.] That is, great multitudes flocked to him, to hear him, and be baptized. For though baptism, in the way he used it, was not usual, yet their accustomed use of legal worship made it the less strange, and the more acceptable to them. And being accompanied with the doctrine of repentance, remission of sins, and the news of the kingdom of heaven approaching, it could not choose but find some reverence and attention. But certainly, of multitudes that will run to the word, and, possibly, particularly flock after the ministry of some for a time, there may be many, as doubtless were there, that are but light stuff, carried with the stream as corks and straws are. Men should examine well even such things as seem to speak some love to religion in them, whether they be real or not. This, John does not spare to tell home to the seemingly best of those that came to him, that esteemed themselves, and were esteemed by others, more religious than the multitude. Yea, the Spirit of God directed him to deal more sharply with them than with others that came to him; they being of all others commonly most confident of self-righteousness, and therefore farthest from the true work of repentance, which humbles the soul to the dust, and lays it low in its own eyes: these sects being, beyond the multitude, swelled with conceit of their own estate, he spares the rest, and pricks them sharply, that the tumor may fall. It may seem somewhat strange that he entertains so roughly those that came respectfully to him, and with others were willing and desirous to hear his doctrine, and partake of his baptism. Was not this the way to beat them back, and make them distaste both?

There is, indeed, much prudence required in the ministers of the word, to know to attemper their admonitions and reproofs, that by too much rigor they discourage not weak beginners who are inquiring after the ways of God; but withal they should be no less wary that by too much credulity and lenity they sooth not any in their formality and carnal confidence. And the most we have to deal withal, commonly are in most hazard upon this hand; there is too little heart-humbling. And many are ready to take up some piece of reformation of their ways, and the externals of religion, and deem themselves presently good Christians. Oh! the deceit and slothfulness of our hearts! How ready are we to lay hold upon an easy guise of our own, and think what some further press, is but melancholy and needless preciseness!

Ver. 8. Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance.] Though he wonders at their coming, and fairly tells them so, yet he rejects them not, despairs not of them; he gives them sound advice, which implies always some hopes of prevailing. Give none up for desperate; catch hold of what they do, to drive them to what further they ought to do. You profess to flee from the wrath to come; bring forth fruits then. You say you are Christians and believers: Oh! let your ways and lives say so. Let Christ dwell in your hearts, and be shown in your lives.

Ver. 9. Think not to say, We have Abraham to our father.] The foolish heart is still leaning to this fancy of external relations and privileges. Beware; rest not on these—the reformed religion, pure ordinances, or a place of esteem possibly among the strictest sort of reformed professors. And do not think you put an obligation on religion, and that it is indebted to you; but pray take heed. God can leave you, and deliver you up to these vain thoughts, and provide himself without you. He can draw the remotest and unlike-liest to himself, and let you go.

Ver. 10. And this is a sifting, trying time. He comes, who will unmask your hypocrisies, and search you to the bottom; who will lay his axe to the root of the trees, and cut up the fruitless. Where the gospel comes in greatest power, there is the certainest, and saddest weight of judgment on the unbelieving and impenitent, the formal and fruitless.

Ver. 11. I indeed baptize you with water.] The true badge of a messenger of Jesus Christ is, to abase himself and to magnify his master. Baptism with the Holy Ghost, and with fire, may, possibly, have some aspect to the singular sending of the Holy Ghost in fiery tongues. That purifying virtue, that flame of love, oh, that we found it!

Ver. 12. And only they, the wheat, are for the garner, they that are pure and spiritual: the chaff, light and vain hearts, are fuel for the fire. No middle class: we must be either baptized in that fire, or burnt in this.

Ver. 13–15: In the baptism of Christ, observe the exemplary humility both of the master and of the servant: of the master, in subjecting himself to this ordinance; of the servant in administering it, first, in his modest question and declining it, and secondly, in his quiet yielding and obedience. He that was so pure and spotless, had no need of that, or any other washing; He, the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world, as this John testified; He, the fountain opened for sin and iniquity, and therefore, well says he, I have need of thy baptism. Yet here he humbles himself to be baptized. Oh! that we who are baptized had more of his likeness in this humble reverence for Divine ordinances, looking on them as his in every warranted hand. What though he that teaches be less knowing and less spiritual than thou that hearest, one that might rather learn of thee, yet the appointment of God obliges thee to attend as humbly and regardfully to his ministry as if he were an angel.

John recoils a little. Thus truly, as he in regard to the person, so will every humbled, self-knowing minister, even in reference to the ordinances themselves, wonder often, and be sometimes at the point of forbearing. Oh! who am I, to handle such holy things, to stand in so high a service, to convey life, I that am dead! to administer so high, so pure and purifying ordinances, myself so impure! But again, being commanded and engaged of God's own hand, that overcomes and silences; and in the continuing in the work upon that consideration, there is no less, yea, the greater humility, than in the other thoughts of unfitness; a submissive resignation of a man to his Lord. However the matter seem to me, and truly I deem myself unworthy of the lowest employment without thee, yet, thou appointing, I have no more to say: good reason thy will stand, and not mine.

Ver. 16, 17. Now, in the baptism, the humility of both is richly rewarded with so glorious a vision and voice. The thing is mean and low in the common form of it; baptized in the common river. Oh! what transcendent glory in such a manifestation of that blessed Trinity on earth, that is the perpetual wonder and happiness of heaven. Oh, that we had eyes to see it, and that our hearts were more taken with this glance here and the hopes of full vision ere long! Like a dove. Oh! that that Spirit were more abundant in us, flowing from our Head, on whose head it here rested.

My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.] In this word lies all the comfort of a Christian. No pleasingness, nor acceptance, indeed, out of him; but in him, all acceptance of all who are in him. Nothing delights the Father but in this view. All the world is as nothing in his eye, and all men hateful and abominable by sin. Thou, with all thy good-nature, and good-breeding, and good-carriage, art vile and detestable out of Christ. But if thou get under the robe of Jesus, thou, and all thy guiltiness and villainess, then art thou lovely in the Father's eye. Oh! that we could absolutely take up in him, whatsoever we are, yet shrouded under him! Constant, fixed believing is all. Let not the Father then see us but in the Son, and all is well.

CHAPEER IV.

VER. 1. Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil.

THE apostle doth fitly style our Lord Jesus the captain, or leader, of our salvation. He marches, leads all the way, puts us on nothing that he hath not first encountered. And in his going before, there is that decorum there marked, Heb. xii. 10: It was meet he should be made perfect by sufferings. So particularly by this kind, that is the sharpest sensation, by these he was entered into his calling; initiated or consecrated, as the word there is. Let none, therefore, of his followers think to go free. If you mean to follow Christ, reckon for temptations, to meet them even at first, and so in all the way. We readily misreckon, though warned; we count as we would have it; write up such ease and joys, &c., and think not on afflictions without, and temptations within, which yet are much our portion here. Unwise to put to sea and expect no storms, nothing but fair weather! Let this be our warning, that we be not secure; we shall meet temptations. But let this be our comfort, that we be not dismayed, that in this we do follow him. He went before us in this conflict, and overcame before us, and for us; and we likewise, in his strength, shall overcome.

Then.—When? Look backward. Then—presently after he was baptized, and not simply by the water of Jordan, but by the Spirit from heaven, and was singularly replenished, full of the Holy Ghost, as St. Luke hath it, Luke iv. 1. Thus shalt thou be sure to be assaulted when thou hast received the greatest enlargements from heaven, either at the sacrament or in prayer, or in any other way; then look for an onset. This arch-pirate lets the empty ships pass, but lays wait for them when they return richest laden.

Then.—Again, Look forward. Then—when he was to enter on his work, his public ministry. Thus look to be assailed, when thou art to engage in any special service. Each according to his place will find this: when he is upon some purpose of honoring God in any particular undertaking or course, and is nearest the performance, then shall the strength of hell be mustered up against him. Now, knowing it to be thus, this ought rather to embolden than discourage us in any such way. This expert enemy knows his interest well, and does not thus bestir himself lightly, but feels that his kingdom is in danger, and that he shall certainly be a loser.

Now, as this is incident to every Christian, and particularly, according to the eminency of their service, to ministers of Jesus Christ, as here to him when toward entering on his own ministry, so, in this, they should reinforce themselves in him; should follow him on, and apply and employ him for the victory.

This [temptation] was one of Luther's schoolmasters, and so it is to all the servants of Christ; and so are all the three, prayer, meditation, and temptation. And this is very needful, that both with the more skill, and with the more compassion, they may be helpful to them that are tempted. Certainly, in all things, experience gives the deepest sense and the readiest faculties. He who was here tempted, could know more by speculation than ever any man; yet it was found meet that even he should be trained by the experience of these things, as in that cited place, Hebrews ii. 10—perfected as captain, made a complete commander by hard services, sufferings, and temptations. So Heb. iv. 15, and v. 2-8. Men expert in war, laugh at the learnedest discourse of pedants, as is reported of Hannibal.

Oh! heart-feeling is a main thing in this. It is going to the wrong hand, for a troubled or tempted Christian to go to an untroubled, untempted minister, who never knew what that meant. Their errand takes not: they find little ease in complaining of their grief to him that never felt such a thing; as Nazianzen observes, that they who are stung with a serpent, can not endure to bemoan themselves to any but some that have felt the pain. To have found such trouble, and then an issue, such and such comfort—oh, it enables much in that case. See 2 Cor. i. 4, 6.

Led by the Spirit.] That same Spirit that came down on him in baptism, ch. iii., here leads him forth to his conflict, not for this alone, to seek it, but leads for such exercise there, wherein it was designed and appointed to meet him. The Spirit in us doth not carry us wilfully seeking of temptations; yea, we pray by his direction who was thus led, that we may not be led into temptations; that is, that we may be so led into them as not to be left to them and foiled in them; but he leads us into those places and employments, when we follow his leading, wherein, by God's disposal, we do meet with temptations. And to be thus led any way whatsoever, is safe, and the issue happy, as here it was. That is sweet in all things, to be carried; not to go of ourselves any way, but that of each step it may be said, Led by the Spirit. Led to be tempted, in order that he might return with the glory of the victory.

Into the wilderness.] This is the field chosen for this duel between the roaring lion of the bottomless pit and the royal line of the tribe of Judah. This serpent tempted the first Adam in the garden, and the second Adam in the wilderness, with different success indeed; and ever since doth still tempt the posterity of both, in all variety of places and conditions, in several ways suitable. Company and conversation have their temptations; and solitude, even the wilderness, hath its own too. No place or estate on earth is privileged; no business, not lawful laboring, eating and drinking, yea, not fasting and praying; yea, in these are readily the most assaults, but in them likewise the sweetest victory: as here.

Verse 2. And when he had fasted forty days.] Though this was a miraculous and extraordinary fast, as a mark of his extraordinary person and calling, and of the ministry of the gospel's harmoniously according with the law and the prophets, Moses and Elias, yet, surely a holy fast it was, wherein our Savior (as those his forerunners, no doubt) fed upon prayer and Divine contemplation.

He hungered.] So all along, as in this fast, so, with his following hunger, Divine power combined with human weakness, such as was sinless.

Ver. 3. If thou be the Son of God.] Doubtless the tempter was in some doubt himself about this ; though he saw many concurrent proofs of it, yet thought possibly it might be otherwise, and therefore tries. And as he expresses his own doubt, so he suggests the doubt to our Savior. It is vain to specify these three temptations by three particular sins, for they are each complicated and made up of variety, as usually all sins are. In this I would not exclude something of working on appetite, stirring to an impatient, intemperate haste in satisfying that ; and the exception is weak, that it is not delicacies, but bread that is propounded, for that is as strong a temptation in extreme hunger as delicacies ; but the main is unbelief, and so making haste. So, in the first temptation of our first parents, the matter of pleasing appetite made some ingredient, but the chief thing was unbelief : Yea, hath God said ? Gen. iii. 6. And so here, If thou be the Son of God. And as that was joined to pride, stirring them to a proud desire to be gods, so, in this case, Satan aims at drawing a needless show of it, that Christ was God. And our Savior's answer meets all these suggestions : that of his pressing hunger, finding another answer for it than bread ; that is not the only thing for it ; that of doubting or unbelief (as it was the main evil, so the main of the answer stands opposed to it), trusting in the word of God, that is, in his power and effectual support. I need not myself try conclusions to see whether I be the Son of God, nor (which answers the bent of it) need I at this time give a trial that I am the Son of God. So he diverts the satisfying him in that point of his Godhead, and answers only for a man : Man shall not live upon bread alone, &c.

The second and third temptations, whether they were by change of place, or representation of species, as I think it can not be forcibly either concluded or refuted either way, so it is not of much benefit or importance that it should be. The motion of throwing him down headlong (though it is not thus urged by any that I remember) seems to me with the strongest appearance to incline to a real standing upon the place ; for if not, then it was necessary that both the place and the steepness should not only be represented to our Savior's imagination, but that he should really believe that he was there ; otherwise, the temptation of casting himself down thence were altogether null, and could have no place. Nor, though it may be granted that he might suffer a false representation (somewhat of which must likely be allowed, to make up the third temptation, with the advantage of a high mountain), yet, whether we may fairly admit in our Savior an apprehension of such a false representation as true, should be considered.

But leaving that, we find the second temptation to be, clearly, to a presumptuous tempting of God, and the third, to the horrid apostacy from God, even to worshipping of the devil, and that baited with an offer of the world ; first to commit idolatry to it, and then next, to himself for it. He is clearly beat off in all ; it could not be otherwise. But truly this may seem strange, that Satan durst suggest such horrid, foul notions, to so holy, so singularly holy a man, for that at least he knew him to be, and had strong suspicions that he was more than a man, even the Son of God.

And this I think the sovereign satisfaction of a soul, in the matter of blasphemous injections, which many, even holy persons, are troubled with : much is said to it by many ; but surely there is nothing like the view of this instance. That he uses thee so, what wonder ! He had the hardiness even to use thy Lord so, who was so high above all stain of sin, as in all things, so in these. True, indeed, we can not well avoid all soil, but some guilt sticks to us ; as from the throwing of a dirty ball against the wall, though it is presently beat back, yet it leaves a spot behind ; our nature being so easily receptive of sinful defilement. But he was altogether undefileable in all assaults ; yet this is our grand comfort, that he was tempted, and even that with such vile things. So, then, if finding any such thing, cry to him for help, as one who can feel it, and entreat him to see how grating these thoughts are to thee, and to pity thee, and repel Satan ; and he will do it, and will account those not thy sin at all, but his ; and if anything stick, will wash it off with his own blood.

Observe. The devil can cite scripture. Receive not, then, everything at first, that comes with an it is written ; and as not everything of men's opinions thus backed, so, not those doubts that are raised within thee, and managed against thee in this way. How often does Satan make a poor believer at a stand by some scripture objection ! But take this course ; follow thy Captain in this. Satan is a liar, and cuts and pares when he cites ; as he here left out, thy ways, to make room for Cast thyself headlong, which was not the way. Now our Savior does not contest with him about this, takes no notice of that sleight, but in a plain, full counter-blow, beats him out of it, gives him another it is written, that carries clear how he abused his. And there is admirable wisdom in this, much more than if he had disputed about the word which all observe here, was cunningly left out ; for in this, our Savior teaches us our better way in this case, either with perverse men, in the avouching of their errors, or with Satan, in his thus assaulting us with misalleged scripture, not so much to subtilize about the very place or words abused. It may be so cunningly done sometimes, that we can not well find it out ; but this downright, sure way beats off the sophister with another place, clearly and plainly carrying that truth which he opposes and we adhere to. So, though thou canst not clear the sense of an obscure scripture, thou shalt always find a sufficient guard in another that is clearer.

Our Savior was pleased thus to bear many assaults, and thus to fence and beat off the tempter by the word, both for our instruction and comfort, who otherwise, for himself, could immediately have repelled him, and sent him back at first. But indeed he pleased not himself in anything; had an eye to us in all he did and suffered, and did all in reference to our advantage. Oh, how should we love him!

And let not any abuse of the Scripture, by Satan or by men, abate our esteem, or lead us to abandon our use of it; but let us study it still, labor to be well acquainted with it, make it our magazine, have ready our defences thence in all kinds of assault. Oh! let this word dwell richly in us, for it is our life. A stone out of this brook smites Goliath. And observing these evils here, labor to be fortified against them. Surely they were main ones, that were brought forth in this combat. Ready we are either to distrust our God, or, in abused confidence, to presume upon unwarranted ways. And, for the third temptation, how strong is it, though not to gain that gross point of disclaiming God for love of the world, yet, how many hearts are secretly and insensibly inveigled and stolen away from him by it, drawn to neglect his worship, or to cold remissness in it, and to follow the ways of the honor, gain, or pleasures of this world, that Satan suggests, and so to worship him and it altogether, instead of the Lord our God, whom alone we are to adore and serve, and whose due is all our heart!

Ver. 10. Get thee hence, Satan.] Thus, when anything moves to debauch and draw off the heart from God, it is to be beat away with indignation. And thus in all conflicts, continue fighting in thy Lord's strength: give not over, resist still, and the enemy shall flee, as here.

Ver. 11. Then the devil leaveth him.] Retires, indeed, but it was for a season, as St. Luke hath it there, ch. iv. 15. So we should still make for new onsets, and not promise ourselves, upon a cessation, perpetual quiet, but rather fortify in those times of breathing. But this know, that our Lord is tender of us, and will inlay our painful conflicts with sweet comforts. Let us remember to call our Lord to take him off, and he will not see us surcharged or tempted above what we are able, or he enables us, to bear: and he will refresh us with consolations, strong consolations as we need. And these in a high degree usually follow hard conflicts patiently and stoutly sustained. Our Lord had a cordial draft both before and after this conflict: before, in the last verse of chapter iii., he was confirmed in the very point he was assaulted in: This is my beloved Son. And as he was confirmed before, so was he comforted after: The angels came and ministered to him. Oh! the sweet issue our Lord gives to many a sad battle of weak Christians, wherein they possibly thought once that it was lost, and that they could never hold out, and come through it. But never think so: we shall come through all, and the day shall be ours.

Ver. 12. Now when Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, he departed into Galilee.] We need not fear. God uses men, but needs them not: when they are restrained or removed, he can provide more. When John is shut up, Jesus comes forth.

Ver. 13. And leaveth Nazareth.] Not being honored in his own country. So, commonness of things makes them cheap and low with us, how excellent soever. This disease of lightness and novelty, so natural to us, we have need to watch against.

Ver. 14–16. That it might be fulfilled, &c.] Now the prophecy is raised to its higher sense. The relief which the prophet speaks of, in relation to a temporal sense, was but a shadow. This is light indeed, Jesus coming into their coasts; the Sun of righteousness arising. Oh, how pitiful is the condition of those nations that still are in darkness, destitute of his light! How should we pity them! But how much more pitiable their condition, who, in the midst of this light, are still in darkness; shining in their land, but not in their hearts! These still are under the shadow of death. Oh! fear and tremble, you that, in the clear gospel light, are sitting still in your natural darkness of mind and hardness of heart, and still loving that darkness, and refusing this Divine light. Oh! let it in, that you may live, and not pass from darkness to darkness, from inward darkness to utter darkness, where is nothing but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth.

Ver. 17. From that time Jesus began to preach.] So gave he forth light by preaching, showing the way of salvation. And he was eminently, the light—he that very way of salvation. He, the Prince and Savior exalted to give repentance, and remission of sins, and the kingdom, yet humbles himself to be the Herald, to proclaim his own gift and pardon. And in humbling himself to this work of preaching, he hath highly exalted it. Shall ever that be accounted low, and fit only for mean persons, which the Lord of glory made his calling and work in the world?

And to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.] This was said before to be the sermon of his forerunner; not only the same sense, but the very same words. He who needed to borrow from none, but gives all to all, yet disdains not to preach this over after John Baptist. There is certainly a pride and vanity in the minds of men, in that extreme affecting still either to speak or hear new things. Oh, were you called together often, and this said as from God, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, and found obedient, now one heart yielding, and then another, though it might seem poor to vain heads, yet oh, what excellent preaching were it! God's voice more regarded and owned, would make that sweet which we often despise.

Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Oh, sweet invitation, the offer of a pardon to a repenting sinner! but how much more that of a kingdom! He might say, Repent, for the prison of hell is at hand, if ye do not; but rather he this way draws, by the happiness and glory attending our return.

Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. And at hand to you, if ye repent, to be yours; grace and all the rich promises of it, and, within a while, full glory. And no more ado; it is at hand. Let go your hold of the one, and straight catch hold of the other; it is at hand. But who believes this?

—If we do, what madness is it not to accept it!

The chapter hath, first, our Savior's preparation to his public calling; secondly, his begun administration of it in all the three parts, preaching of the gospel, calling disciples, and working miracles.

Ver. 18. And Jesus walking by the sea of Galilee, saw two brethren.] Here we have the calling of two pairs of brethren, both of the same calling, fishers, to a higher calling of the same name, fishers still, but, of men: that is the excellency and dignity of it. Not now to follow out the resemblance, there is much art in this Divine fishing of human souls, both in casting the net in public preaching, and angling in private converse.

Ver. 19. And they straightway left their nets and followed him.] This was Elijah's touch to Elisha, What have I done to thee? Did our hearts once hear his voice, net would not entangle us; nor cables bind us; no friends, nor parents, nor business, would hold us: we should break from all, yea, if it might be otherwise, would run from all to follow him.

Ver. 23. And Jesus went about all Galilee.] Here observe his Divine power and goodness shining forth in the miraculous cure of all diseases. But these bodily cures were but preludes of the main work; but signs hung out to show where the physician of souls dwelt. And whatsoever be thy spiritual maladies, though never so many and so desperate, yet come. Never any came to him and went away uncured.

CHAPTER V.

VER. 1. And seeing the multitude, he went up into a mountain. And when he was set, his disciples came unto him.

VER. 2. And he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor, &c.

OTHERS may grow stale, but this sermon, never so often read over, is always new. Oh, how full of Divine doctrine! How plain, and yet how high and excellent, delighting the soul as a bright day, clear light all along!

We need not strain for the clearness of it upon that word, He opened his mouth; for every word here spoken speaks for itself; carries, as light does, its own evidence. He begins with that great point which all are concerned in, and all naturally someway desirous to know, the doctrine of blessedness, in short aphorisms; and the rest of his discourse follows out the same argument, directing the way to happiness in those graces, purity, meekness, mercy, &c. For although all grace is radically one, and he that hath one hath all, yet they are thus specified: 1st. For the weakness of our apprehensions, which take not full views so easily, they are spelled out to us, but only so, that taking them the easier severally, as letters of one word, we may set them together again, as all being one blessedness. 2dly. Though every true Christian hath all graces, yet all are not alike eminent in all. We may confidently say, that there is no one who equally excels in every grace; but in several persons, several particular graces do most act and evidence themselves, shooting up above the rest; yea, in one and the same person, one grace will, at some times, be more evident and sensible than at others. 3dly. They are thus parcelled out to us, that we may apply ourselves the more particularly sometimes to the study of one, sometimes to the study of another, the neglect whereof is a great cause of our great deficiency in them all. We hear them and like them, may be, and think these are good, but we do not set to the attainment of them: we applaud, and leave them there; approve all, and neglect all. If at any time we have any desires after them, they are general and confused: we grasp at all, and catch nothing.

This I would recommend, to be more particular in our purposes: sometimes to set ourselves to some one grace, not secluding nor turning away the rest, for that can not be, but yet, more particularly plying that one, were it humility, poverty of spirit, meekness, or any other; and for some time to make that one our main task, were it for some weeks or months together, and examine every day's practice in that particularly. But like unsettled students among many books, we rove and reel, and make offers at every grace, and still lag behind, and make no considerable purchase nor progression in any.

Now for blessedness, what is the common voice, at least, of men's minds and practices, though they speak it not out? Blessed are the rich, the honorable, the well-landed, or well-befriended, and they that can grow great enough in the world. But if we believe this Teacher, it is not these; no such matter. But if blessedness be in things spiritual and inward, then men would imagine readily of those things which sound highest, that have some grandeur, and somewhat heroic in them—in great knowledge of faculty, and zeal for high services, or in raptures, and ecstasies, and singular Divine experiences. But here there is nothing of these neither, but the meanest, most despised things; yea, those that (some of them) seem to sound as miserable and sad: The poor in spirit—they that mourn—the meek, &c. Oh! sweet, lowly graces, poverty of spirit, meekness, that grow low, and are of dark hue, as the violet's, but of a fragrant smell; as one says, chief in garlands: these are prime in the garlands of a Christian. Oh! study these; seek to have them growing within you. Suffering remarkable martyrdom may seem to have some lustre in it; but how take you it, to be reviled and scoffed at, and hated, and taunted, by Christians in name, because thou desirest to be one indeed?

Each of these beatitudes, for all the low sound at first, ends high, and makes good the title. Blessed are the poor in spirit; ay, they are the only rich, heirs to a kingdom, and such a kingdom: theirs is the kingdom of God. Lofty, vain minds are truly base. By poverty in spirit, is meant, I conceive, not only sense of spiritual want (though commonly it is so taken), but, more comprehensively, a lowly frame of heart, not swelled either with desires, or delight, or conceit, of any worldly advantage, or self-excellency, either outward or inward. Thus may a man be, amid very many such advantages and riches, poor, and that is his blessing. Yet here is connoted, I perceive, the condition of outward poverty as more suiting, and usually more connected with that temper of spirit. In Luke it is, Blessed are the poor, opposed to the rich. And he that is poor in spirit, if outwardly poor, is truly rich in the midst of poverty. So, they that mourn shall be comforted, and the meek shall inherit the earth. Not that this is their all, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven, also. But this word from the Psalm carries a fit promise, that meekness, seeming to be that which makes a man a prey to every one, and easily wronged and thrust out by all, yet shall be provided and protected, and he shall enjoy so much even of this earth as is fit for him, with more quiet and sweetness than the proud and boisterous, who are ever, almost, in contentions.

The pure in heart, abridging themselves of sights and enjoyments that the world seeks after—sensual delights, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life—shall have a better sight, and purer joy, suiting them; sweetest communion with God here, and, ere long, full vision; for they shall see God. So in the rest it is clear.

Blessed are they which are persecuted—Rejoice.] Look off from your sufferings, and each way you will find matter of encouragement and joy. Look back to the prophets that were before you, and look forward to the reward in heaven that is before you. The firm belief of that kingdom, that glory above, that vision, what will it not make easy to forego or undergo, to do or suffer? It is the want of that belief that keeps the low things of this earth so high in our esteem.

Ver. 13, 14. Ye are the salt of the earth—ye are the light of the world.] This next point particularly concerns the disciples, and after them, the ministers of Christ. In these resemblances lie their dignity and their duty; and the former is used for urging the latter; and that is the best view of it. Let men look as much as they can upon the excellency of this their high calling, so that it raise their spirits to high endeavors of acting suitably to it. What a simple thing, to feed self-conceit by this! Alas, poor man! He is light indeed in another sense, who grows vain upon it that he is called light, and does not rather tremble that he is so unlike it in this. Salt—what were all table provisions without this? Light—what were the world without this? Christ communicates his own name to them. The light of the world. All the children of God are children of light, but his messengers more eminently so. Men that think ministers a needless commodity in the world, if they give any belief to the gospel, may see what they are: and if you could live well without salt, and without light, so might ye without ministers.

But, alas! how much unsavory salt, how many dark lights are among us! And if the salt lose its savor, it can do good to nothing, and nothing can do good to it. The most unprofitable piece of the world, is either a profane, a carnal, or a formal, dead minister; he is good for nothing—unsavory salt, of all things the most unsavory. And if the light within thee be darkness (as our Savior says afterward), how great is that darkness! Oh, that Christ shined more in our labors, in our conversation, and in companies where we come; that we were more savory and seasoning others; not in jestings, or in sports (these salts are unsavory in ministers), but in words of edification, ministering grace to the hearers! And this, though it specially applies to ministers, yet extends to all Christians. Let your light so shine, not to make yourselves somebody, but for the glory of the Father of lights, whence you have the light, your heavenly Father. Oh, that this were predominant in all! Happy that heart that is filled with constant desires of this, and that aims at the glory of God, minding self in nothing, but God in all!

Ver. 17. Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets.] He lays hold of this, takes occasion, upon clearing a mistake that had arisen respecting him, to pass on to such doctrines as he knew were necessary for the clearing of the law of God, wronged by false glosses; and he thus vindicates both himself and that law whereof he was the lord and author. Some, possibly, to obstruct his way and prejudice him in men's opinions, spake of him as a teacher of new doctrine, and an enemy of the law: others, it may be, hearing of a doctrine that sounded new, would willingly have had it so, would have been free, and enjoy libertinism. Now, to dispel both misapprehensions, our Savior owns his purpose to be nothing such. On the contrary, I come not to destroy, but to fulfil. This did he in all things, in doctrine and in practice; and he declares it a thing impossible for any to annul the law; that if any should offer at it, in his actions or doctrine, he should undo himself, but not the least title of the law. Yet, further, these men that cry up the law, and would charge me with the dissolving of it, for all their noise, I declare to you, that except you take heed, and observe that law better than they do, ye cannot enter into heaven. How many deceive themselves, as these self-pleasing, vain men did! But be warned. Except your righteousness, your religion, go beyond the civil neighbor, the good church-keeper, the formal, painted professor, ye shall fall short of that which both you and they reckon upon. How many, who think themselves fair for heaven, shall find themselves wofully mistaken when it is past help! Oh! examine well in due time, and see whether you are indeed for heaven or not. It is the saddest mistake ever man fell into, to dream on of heaven, till he find himself in hell.

Ver. 21. Ye have heard, &c.] Now he clears the law, and teaches the true spiritual sense of it, in divers points of it, wherein it was grossly abused; shows that it binds not only the hand and the tongue, but even the heart. Men aiming at self-righteousness by the law, and desirous of that as cheap as might be, with the least pains, not being willing or able to rise to its perfection, drew it down and shaped it to their imperfection: cut it to the measure of external obedience, and that of the easiest size. Thus men readily do; they rather fancy the word and rules of Christianity to their humors, than purge and correct those humors by the word. This exposition of the sixth commandment, condemns not only gross murder, but rash anger and reviling speech, as a breach of it, and condemnable: which is expressed in allusion to the civil judicatures among the Jews, and thence, in case of any such thing, he presses speedy and undelayed reconciliation, as a thing most acceptable to God, and without which no other homages or religious performances would be acceptable to him. Now it is not only anger without cause that is condemned, but vain, undue anger, exceeding cause and measure. Were there the consciousness and constant regard of this; were every reproachful or disdainful word, every harsh look, every rising angry thought against thy brother looked on as murder, oh, in what order would it put thy tongue, eye, and heart, in this respect! This we hear, and think it should be thus, but we have not resolved that it must be thus, do not watch and pray that it may be so, after an unchaste look and touch of impure desire, though not breaking out to act, yea, though not ripening within to full consent.

And by occasion of this, a man being ready to think, Oh, how strait, how hard is this! he adds, in verse 29, a useful advice, and a powerful encouragement with it. If thine eye offend thee—anything that proves a snare, how dear soever, as a right eye, or right hand. Men are loath to pare off or abridge occasions of sin, where some strong interest binds them. But thus to go whole and sound to hell!—Oh! better limp to heaven.

Ver. 31. Then follows of divorce, which, upon any difference, was worn into common use, and opinion of lawfulness. Afterward, he speaks of usual vain swearing, a sin which men have always affected, even they who, by profession, are God's own people: at which a man might wonder, did not we find it so lamentably true. But yet, Swear not at all, not after the liberty you take by swearing either by heaven or earth, thinking thus you spare God's name; but swearing by them must have relation to God, and so his name is interested. But oh! a little reverence for the great God would make thee tremble at it. Nothing is stronger evidence of a graceless heart, than oaths and profane swearing.

Lastly, at ver. 43, we have that sweet doctrine of not revenging, but patiently bearing, and readily forgiving of injuries, and loving enemies, and doing good to all. This does not bar any calm way of self-righting, to which there is sometimes an obligation; but men overstretch it, and passion and self-love domineer, under this pretext. Therefore, the words sound a little extreme, as a counter-bowing of our crooked hearts, but it is to bring them straight. Let Julian and other atheists laugh at it, but it is the glory of Christians. No doctrine or religion in the world presses so much clemency and innocency, and bounty as theirs, even to sworn enemies. This, we say, is its glory: And whereas it seems to render men sheepish, to make them less than men, it makes them indeed more than men, even like God. Benignity and mercy are divine and Godlike, chief traits of God's image in his children. His sun rises, and his rain descends on the just and the unjust. So, a diffusive, sweet, bountiful soul, is still desiring to do good, by hand, by counsel, by any comfort within its reach toward all, rewarding good for evil. These things, deeply thought on and really practised, would make Christians indeed, children like their Heavenly Father.

CHAPTER VI.

CHRIST'S business upon earth was to bring man to heaven. He came down and became man for that purpose; came forth from God, to bring us back to God. 1 Pet. iii. 18. As his life and death, so his divine doctrine tends to that, to enlighten the minds of men with the right knowledge, and inflame their hearts with the real love, of God. We are drowned in sense and the love of earthly things; and in spiritual things, our hearts are sensual and earthly. Now you perceive the doctrine of this chapter, clearly aiming at the raising of men's hearts to heaven. That is the end of the gospel and all preaching, that men may learn, in all their actions, to eye God more and man less; to be less earnest and careful for earth, and more for heaven. This is the scope of the chapter.

These two main evils in the heart of man, hypocrisy and earthliness, spring from ignorance and forgetfulness of God. Deep persuasions of God and heavenly things, would set men and earthly things very low in our hearts. Would it be possible for men to love the praise of men more than the praise of God, if they considered what he is, and what man is; how high and how lasting a good is his liking and approbation, how poor and vanishing a thing is man's good opinion? Oh, atheism, atheism! hence springs the love of present things. Both these go under that name, present esteem, and present possessions. The one, the love of air (as I may say), the other, the love of earth; and both spring from want of belief and love of heaven, so high above both. This is the great work, to call off the eye from this low prospect, to raise it up higher, to look not on things seen, but on things not seen. And oh, the odds! Things that are seen, are temporal: things that are not seen, are eternal. 2 Cor. iv. 18. At this our Savior aims his discourse, to persuade men to singleness of heart in their performance of religious duties, and moderation of mind in their provision for earthly necessities.

Having spoken of doing good in the former chapter, he speaks now of the manner and intention which is chiefly to be heeded, to exceed the Pharisees, who did many outward actions, particularly of these here specified, but spoiled all by the wretched desire of vain glory; a subtle evil preying most on best things, alms, prayer, &c.—a moth that breeds in and corrupts the finest garments.

The duties he particularly names, as these three, alms, prayer, fasting. Alms I scruple not to call a religious duty, though of the Second Table, upon the apostle St. James's warrant, Jam. i. 27. And the way of it which our Savior here teaches, will make it religious indeed: to regard God in it, not to seek to appear to man, yea, to seek not to appear to man; to hide and cover it all that thou canst from men. We are commanded, indeed, in the former chapter, to let our light shine before men: this here is not contrary, yea, that is the same with this: this barring vain self-glory, that directing to God's glory. Let your light shine, but so shine (like the sun that gives light and scarcely suffers you to look upon itself) that they may see your works, yourselves, as little as may be, and may glorify, not you, but your heavenly father. Good actions can not well be hid, and possibly, some even of this sort, giving of alms. Yea, sometimes it may be necessary for example and exciting others, that they should know of it. But take heed that vanity creep not in under this. And further than either unavoidable necessity, or some evident further good of thy neighbor carries it, desire to be unknown and unseen in this. When it must be public, let thy intention be secret. Take no delight in having the eyes of men on thee: yea, rather count it a pain, and still eye God alone, for he eyes thee. And remember it, even in public acts of charity, and other such like, He sees in secret. Though the action be no secret, the spring, the source of it is, and he sees by what weights the wheels go, and he still looks upon that; views thy heart, the hidden bent and intention of it, which man can not see. So then, though in some cases thou must be seen to do, yet in no case do to be seen: that differs much, and where that is, even the other will be as little as may be. Thou wilt desire rather, and, where it can be, still choose to do unseen, that others should know as little of thy charity as may be, besides the party that receives it; yea, if it might be, that even the party might not know,—as he that stole in money under his sick friend's pillow; yea, to let thy very self know as little as possible, as our Savior here expresses it, Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. An excellent word! Reflect not on it as thy action, with self-pleasing; that is the left hand in view; but look on God's goodness to thee, that thou art not in the receiver's room, and he in thine; that he makes thee able to relieve another, which many are not, and being able, makes thee willing, which far fewer are. For both, thou art to bless him, and be the humbler, the more thou dost. Take thy very giving to thy distressed brother, as a gift from God, a further obligation on thee. Though he is pleased to become thy debtor for a further reward, yet, truly, the thing itself is his gift, and a great one, as David acknowledges excellently in their offering to the Temple. 1 Chron. xxix. 14: But who am I, and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly, after this sort? For all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee. Not only the power, but the will is from God, both of thine own which we give thee.

Oh, how far are the heart from this direct looking to God, this most-enlarging love of God! And therefore are they so close-handed to the necessities of the poor, even of the saints, where some enforcing occasion, some eye of men, some wretched side respect or other draws it not forth. A thousand objections are raised: either they need it not, or will not accept of it, or have this fault or that, are proud or idle, &c. But does not thy God see what is at the bottom of all this logic, these disputes before they come off with anything? And when thou dost give, how much of self, and how little of God is there in it! The left hand knows, yea, it is done with the left hand, though the bodily right hand do it. Most men's charity is altogether left-handed: sinister respects and intentions are the main movers in it.

But how noble and happy a thing is a truly liberal heart! Even natural liberty hath much beauty in it, but much more that which is spiritual and Christian. According to thy power, abounding in good works, that is riches,—rich in good works; and he that soweth plentifully, shall reap plentifully. And be cheerful in it, and do this for God, out of love to him. And for the fruit, how rich is that! So much as it is fit to look to reward, look to God's only. Take him as thy debtor upon his word, rather than present payment from men. Theirs is present indeed, and our carnal hearts are all for the present, but consider, as it is present, so it passes presently, and is straightway spent. God's reward, though to come, is yet certain, and when come, is abiding, everlasting. Thus, in respect of all good actions, and a holy, self-denying course of life, in nothing take pay of men. How vain, what smoke is it, their breath, and how soon will it be spent! And then, when thou shouldst come to look for a reward from God, to know it is done, that you are paid already! That well judged, is one of the saddest words in all the scripture, the hypocrite's doom. He hath no more to look for; he would be seen, and was seen; he would be praised of men, and praised he was; he is paid, and can expect no further, but that reward which he would gladly miss, the hypocrite's portion, eternal fire.

As to prayer, how foolish and how wretched a thing is it, to speak to God, and look to men! What is there wherein the heart will be single and abstracted from men, and commune with God alone, if not in prayer?

Another evil, much like to that of show, is here corrected, an affected, empty, babbling length in prayer, without affection. The want of that makes a short prayer long and babbling: while much of that, makes a long prayer short: as in a speech, the quality is the measure of the quantity, a long speech may be very short. This affected length we incline to very much in holy exercises; many beads are dropped, and paternosters said, &c. We lay too much stress on the continuance and length; think all's well, if enough be done; whereas God's thoughts are far other, and ours should conform to his. It is enough if well done. If the heart is close to him in ever so short a prayer, there is much said in a little. We usually speak many words, and say little. For help in this, the most excellent model given by our Savior, is here inserted; the beautiful order and full comprehensive matter of which, can never be enough admired.

Then as to fasting, which is a necessary help of prayer: it does unplug and free the wings of the soul to mount to heaven; and in some respects, it is a help to alms too. The same rule must here be observed, to appear as little as may be; for the affected discovery spoils and loses all, yea, the needless discovery runs too much hazard, therefore it is by all means to be avoided. Personal fasting should be conducted secretly. Practise constant temperance. Better to let the bridle be always short held on thy appetite, than sometimes to pull it in extremely, and then lay the reins loose again; that is the way to stumble and fall in both.

Ver 19. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth.] In these words our Savior enforces the other point of moderation. The heart in heaven, and fixed on the true treasure there, is the only way to regulate and moderate the desires in all things on earth. For it is the distempered love of earthly things that causes all the distracting care about them; and the cause of that distempered love to earth, is ignorance of heaven, and disaffection to it. Men may discourse of many considerations, and sometimes think soberly, how foolishly man turmoils, and is disquieted in vain, heaping up, and not knowing who shall possess, and knowing certainly that not he very long, that he is shortly to leave all. But these things will not prevail; men keep their hold. Not only their hands, but their hearts, are still fastened to what they have, and what they would have still more of, rather than of those excellent things which would call them off from earthly enjoyments, to fix them on heaven and immortality, if these were really believed.

Where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal.] Inward decay, and outward hazards! The treasure above is free from both. Oh, that ours were there! But hearts that are so little there, make it very questionable. Oh, for an eye single and pure, enlightened to behold that blessed hope, and to fix upon it! Can an heir of heaven be much troubled upon earth? Impossible. If at any time his heart bends that way, will he not straightly check himself, and think, What am I doing? Is this my business? The Gentiles seek for them, and look for no more: they must make the best of them; but would I be content with this for my portion? Where lies my treasure? Who is my master?

Ver. 24–34. No man can serve two masters. Therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life.] Our Savior here argues against the service of the world; first, as unworthy a servant of Christ; secondly, as impossible for him; thirdly, as needless, and that at large. Your heavenly Father knows your need, and cares for you. Ye need not both care, his care is sufficient. Further, it is fruitless ; such your perplexing care is, for due diligence in one's calling is not barred ; yea, that is to be used, that we may care the less. Then it avails nothing. Ver. 27. Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature ? Lay these things together. Your Father will care and provide. He that clothes the lilies, and feeds the birds, will he allow his children to starve and go naked ? Then think how preposterous and absurd to distrust him in these petty things, when you trust him in so much greater.

Ver. 33. But seek ye first the kingdom of God. A kingdom ! Oh, seek that, and account, as he does, all things else but accessaries, a parcel by-the-by, to be cast in. But alas ! little see we of that great inheritance, that kingdom, and therefore these little poor things seem so great with us.

CHAPTER VII.

WE have here continued the dropping of the divine doctrine of Christ, distilling as the dew in several brief rules, as pure pearly drops of heavenly wisdom, in divers particulars of main use and concernment.

First, there is a direction concerning the judging of men, ver. 1-6. Then, another, regarding the supplicating of God, ver. 7-11. After that, the straight rule of equity given us, ver. 12. And then, the straight way of happiness recommended, ver. 13, 14. Lastly, a double word of caution to undeceive us, both in the discerning of others' teaching, and our own learning, ver. 15-27 : we are to beware that we be not deluded by false teachers, and that we delude not ourselves, being false learners under the teaching of truth. These are most weighty points ; but light vain hearts are little taken with them.

Ver. 1-5. Judge not, that ye be not judged.] This is a most common evil in man's perverse nature. Even moral men have taken notice of it ; yea, almost every man perceives and hates it in another, and yet hugs it in himself. This is the evil—unequal judging ; sharp-sightedness in the evils of others, and blindness in our own. And this very evil itself, of unequal judging, we can perceive in another, and overlook in our own bosom. What discourse fills most societies, and consumes their time, but descant on the conditions and actions of others !

Lawful judgments in states, for the censuring and punishment of crimes, are not barred ; nor, in private persons, a prudent discerning of what is evil and sinful in others, and judging accordingly of it. But this judging is, the usually taking the chair to censure all persons and affairs about us ; the prying into the actions, yea, even the intentions of men, either through a false glass, seeing faults where there are none, or through a magnifying and multiplying glass, making them appear many more than indeed they are. This is done, first, by a curious searching into the actions of others ; secondly, by the censuring of good and indifferent actions as evil ; thirdly, by hasty, rash censuring of doubtful actions, though a little suspicious ; fourthly, by a true censuring of evil actions, yet not with a good intention—not to amend but to defame thy brother ; and, fifthly, by a desperate sentencing of the final estate even of the worst.

This is here declared to be dangerous and preposterous. 1st. Dangerous, by drawing an answerably severe censure and judgment upon ourselves, usually even from men, but, however, certainly from God. Thou that playest the arch critic on all around thee, art thou without fault ? Hast thou flattered thyself into such a fancy, as to think that thou art above all exception ? Is there nothing, either a true or a seeming blemish, for any to point at in thee ? Surely there is something, some part lying open, that men may hit at thee ; and they will surely not miss to do it, if thou provokest them. However, remember, if thou shouldest escape all tongues, and pass free this way, yet, One unavoidable searching hand thou must come under ; His judgment who sees thee to the bottom, and can charge thee with the secret sins of thy bosom. He can and will so pay thee home, all thy unjust judgments of thy brethren, with just judging of thy ways and thoughts, that thou thyself shalt confess no wrong is done to thee. For with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged.

Then, 2dly. It is absurd and preposterous. First cast the beam out of thine own eye. If thou wouldst, to any good purpose, take knowledge of thy brother's failings, begin at home ; so clear thine eye as to discern aright. A heart well purified speaks the most suitable and pertinent reproofs, and they prove the most piercing and powerful.

Shall these things prevail, my brethren ? Were it love to God, a fire of holy zeal, it would seize first on things nearest it ; but it is a flying, infernal wildfire, running abroad and scattering itself. Is not this the grand entertainment ? Such-a-one is a foolish person ; another, proud ; a third, covetous. And of persons professing religion, yet will ye say, They are as contentious, and bitter, and avaricious as others : or, at best, if you have nothing to say against them particularly, yet, All is dissimulation ; they are but hypocrites. And while a mind is of this vein, believe me, the most blameless track of life, and in it the the very best action, how easy is it to invent a sinister sense of it, and blur it !

But oh ! my brethren, be not so foolish. Blunt the fiery edge off your censures on yourselves, where it is so safe and advantageous to be thorough and home. Just the opposite to this, judging others incurs sharp judgment ; but judging thyself is the way not to be judged. 1 Cor. xi. 31. For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. This is the happy and gainful severity. Learn, then, to look upon others, and all their ways, with the highest charity, which thinketh no evil, is witty and inventive of good constructions upon anything that may clear them, as malice is of miscensures of the best things. Take all candidly and mildly by the easiest side, the right handle. And for thyself, search thy heart; sift, try thy best actions, find out thy own earthliness, thy pride and vanity, thy selfishness and hypocrisy, even in good. A self-searching Christian is made up of humility and meekness. If thou wouldst find much peace and favor with God and man, be very low in thine own eyes. Forgive thyself little, and others much.

Ver. 6. Give not that which is holy unto the dogs.] The former rule abates the sharp eye of rash judging; this quickens and clears the eye of right discerning: that was for the moderate censuring of evil; this is for the prudent imparting of good. Be ready to communicate spiritual good to all, yet so as, if men do evidence themselves to be as dogs and swine, to have that high esteem of holy things, as not to prostitute them to their contempt and rage, and wrong both those excellent things and yourselves: lest they trample them, as puddled swine, not knowing their worth, and turn again and rend you, as enraged dogs.

Holy things—pearls. So are they esteemed by all that know them; the sweet and precious promises of the word, the excellent high calling of a Christian; and their price is inestimable. The pearl of great price is, Jesus Christ, revealed in the gospel. Oh, learn and seek after high esteeming thoughts of him and of Divine things. Learn to be rich in those, and to covet them indeed. And though imparting them to others, it impairs them not to yourselves, and therefore you are to be ready and free that way; yet, because of some manifest despisers of them, learn this wisdom in that matter, Give not holy things to dogs.

There is an imprudent zeal, and sometimes a mixture of an irreverent commonness, in speaking of holy things indifferently in all companies. Certainly, such company willingly ought to be chosen, as give most liberal and kind entertainment to such discourse. But when not of choice, but by some unavoidable engagement, we fall among others, then our rule ought to be, not to partake of their ungodly ways and communication; but for the communicating, in another way, holy things to them, this must be well advised on, whether it be suitable to this rule. We are not, indeed, to give persons easily up for desperate, as dogs or swine; this were to fall into the former fault of rash judging; but where they are evidently such, the respect for holy things is to be preserved, and not unwisely to be exposed to their derision.

Much need is there of a spirit of wisdom in this, without which there is no instructing by rules, so as to guide us aright in all particular occurrences and societies; therefore we are to beg that anointing that teaches us all things. 1 John ii. 27. Speak willingly to God, but still with holy fear in thyself, and it may be entertained with holy fear to others.

Ver. 7. Ask, and it shall be given you—seek, and ye shall find: knock, and it shall be opened unto you.] This is for advantage to all. For wisdom to follow the foregoing and following rules, the great purveyor of a Christian, is prayer, and the great qualifications of prayer, are perseverance and fervency. Ask—seek—knock; be earnest and importunate; give not over. And the great support, the very life of prayer, that which quickens and continues it, and keeps it from giving over, is faith, a firm persuasion of audience and attainment. This is here ascertained by our Savior; proved by irrefragable argument. All good is promised to be given, and that which is the top of all, the chief to be sought, the Holy Spirit, is promised to them that ask it, as St. Luke hath it. We say our prayers, and there is an end. And this perfunctory formality creeps even upon Christians who are unwary and slothful, and hence so little is obtained. Many that pray, know little of this Divine art of prayer, this wrestling with God, this resolving not to let him go until he bless them, as Jacob did.

Ver. 12. Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.] This is added, and seems connected, but it is another rule apart, and this great rule which all know and few observe—in equity, in charity, meekness, and all due respect. Self, self undoes all, and sets the world on fire. Though it be a separate precept, yet it may have some aspect to the former respecting prayer, as, if you would have God condescending, and favorable, and bountiful to you, be so to men; and so you shall be, if you change places and suppose yourself in their room, and they in yours. This is the law and the prophets: that is, all is of this nature. Duty to others, as pressed in the law and the prophets, is reducible to this.

Ver. 13. Enter ye in at the strait gate.] This is undeniably a main point; yet, alas! we seem not to think so. How disinclined are we to the way of eternal happiness! The difficulty is so represented as to add an edge to our earnestness, not to abate and weaken our endeavors. This way is strait indeed, but there is still room enough within. John xiv. 2. In my Father's house are many mansions. The ease and delight there, shall abundantly compensate all the trouble in the way. We must resolve then, if we would not perish, that we must take this way, how strait and rugged soever, and strip and put off all that entangles and encumbers—that swelling pride, those superfluous desires and lusts; yea, to put off and leave behind even self itself. Once in at that gate, we shall find all perfectly compensated. And remember, they are few that enter; few there are that so much as seek it, but far fewer that find it, even of those that make some kind of seeking after it. Many shall seek to enter (so it is in the other evangelist), and shall not be able; therefore, strive ye. What bustle is there made by sea and land for scraps of this earth, and heaven alone is so cheap in our eyes, as if it were worth no diligence, scarce even a serious thought! Surely, either heaven is but a fancy, or the world is mad?

Ver. 15. Beware of false prophets.] Not to go wrong in our way, we must take heed not to mistake our guides (especially as so many in all ages give themselves out for such), that they mislead us not, wrapping error in truth's mantle: yet, there is ever something to a discerning eye, that will readily discover them. As for the grand deceiver, the Devil, the vulgar fable, that in all apparitions whatsoever there is still the shape of a cloven foot, holds true, for there is something in their carriage that, narrowly eyed, will tell what they are. Ye shall know them by their fruits.

Ver. 21. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven.] But every man is his own worst deceiver; therefore he ought most to beware of himself. Whether teacher or learner, he is his own false prophet, speaking peace where there is no peace. Therefore, beware of yourselves. Delude not yourselves with a vain trust in an empty profession. Not every one that says, Lord, Lord—that makes much noise and sound of the name of Christ, yea, that bears his name to others, that preaches him. Oh! how many shall find themselves to have misreckoned in that day, when they are not owned by him, but commanded away by that sad word depart! Look to it, therefore, to the truth of denying yourselves, and your own will, and yielding yourselves up to God: but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven, says our Savior. Oh! take heed of founding your house in the sand. Though ever so stately and fair built, and showing fine, yet that foundation will be its ruin. There is no safe building but on the rock, that rock of salvation who here taught this doctrine. Then come storms as they will, there can be no fear. He that buildeth on him shall not be ashamed. 1 Peter ii. 6. No matter what houses or lands ye have here, whether any or none—he himself had none here—provided you build on him as the foundation of eternal blessedness. Oh, that men would think of this, and amidst all their ensuring of things still unsure, would mind the making of this sure, which may be made so sure for ever, as not to be moved!

Ver. 28. And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine.] A divine way of teaching! Even some not converted, are yet struck and astonished with it, but by this eminently, He taught them as one having authority. This not only by a powerful secret influence, on hearts which he touched by his Divine power, but even in the way of his own teaching. And for some measure of this his ministers ought to seek, and to seek it from him, if they would find it. There is a force in things spoken from the heart with holy and spiritual affection: even common things thus spoken, are far above the greatest strains and notions, that are only an harangue or speech framed by strength of gifts and study. Oh! much prayer would put life and authority into what we speak. To be much on the mount with God, would make our faces shine when coming with his message to men.

CHAPTER VIII.

HE dwelt among us, says St. John, and we saw his glory, as the glory of the only-begotten Son of God, full of grace and truth. This all his history testifies of him, both his marvellous doctrine foregoing, and his miraculous works that here follow.

Ver. 1. When he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him.] A thing he nowise regarded, yet would not hinder; yea, he continued teaching and working those things that drew them. His delight was not in their flocking after him, but in instructing and doing them good.

Ver. 2. And, behold, there came a leper and worshipped him.] Whether this was intended as the highest kind of civil reverence, as to a prophet, or Divine worship, as to God, it is not easy to aver, because it is hard to determine what kind of persuasion he, and the centurion, and others now coming to him, had; how little, or how much, or if any apprehension of him as the Messiah and Son of God. This being as yet not much noised abroad, yet they might have it by special revelation from God. A high confidence, however, there was of a Divine power being with him for the greatest works. This is clearly expressed; and in whatsoever notion it was, our Savior takes it very graciously, and grants their suits. We are commonly unsatisfied with all that comes not up to our own height; but our meek Redeemer cheriseth sincerity, and accepts of what he finds, even the very least, and extols it to the highest pitch it was capable of.

Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.] Strong confidence and humility are contempered in this word: confidence in asserting full power in Christ for the work (the doubt of his will cannot be challenged as injurious or unbelieving, for he had as yet no warrant absolutely to believe that he would); the humility in the way of propounding it, not daring peremptorily to sue for it, but moving it thus, as a thing in his hand to do; the sense of his vile disease and other unworthiness, it is likely, depressing him, and forming his desire in this style only, as representing and reserving the matter with humble submission, as resolved not to quarrel nor complain if he should refuse, but to acknowledge pure compassion and goodness, if obtained : g. d. Lord, it becomes not such a horrid, polluted wretch to say any further than this, I believe, and crave leave to say it out, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

Ver. 3. And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him.] And this humble motion is as graciously taken: he hath straightway real experience both of the power that he believed in, and of the good-will that he durst not think himself so sure of, yet had (no doubt) some good hope of. Thou sayest, I can? I say, I will: be thou clean. And the touch of his hand is a concurrent sign of his goodness and condescension. That word had power enough alone, without the touch; yet it goes not alone, lest it should look like a disdain of touching. He is pleased, therefore, to put his pure hand to the defiled skin of this leper, being in no hazard to receive pollution by that touch by which the leper received a cleansing. And thus in his word he speaks to sinners, where he hath revealed his will together with his power; and that we may doubt it not, we may read it in his blood streaming forth for our cleansing. Yet, if any one, out of a deep sense of his vileness, think, "I know that he can cleanse me, but will he look upon such a one? Or, if he look, will he not straight turn away? Will he vouchsafe to touch my filthy sores, and apply his own precious blood for my cleansing and healing? Yes, he will." Speak it not as doubting, but as humbly referring the matter, thou mayest even in the same style, say, Lord, "I am filthy as ever any that came to thee, yet, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." And thou shalt find that powerful cure from a word of his mouth, and a touch of his hand, that all thy scrubbing, and washing, and bathing in legal self-cleansings, could never have attained; and that not only as to the guiltiness, but likewise as to the power and polluting filthiness of thy sin. And this is to be laid before him in the prevailings of lusts and sinful impurities: "Lord, thou knowest how impossible it is for me, and I know how possible, how easy it is for thee, to cleanse me." And if thou shouldst say no more, lie before him, and look upward till he pity thee. If he be not changed from what he was, he will pity thee, and thou shalt find it.

Ver. 4. And Jesus saith unto him, See that thou tell no man.] This charge not to divulge the cure, besides our Lord's exemplary humility in avoiding noise, was that he might wait the fitter time of discovering himself, and because as yet, it might rather hinder him: as Mark i. 45. The other evangelists tell us that the man kept not this injunction, wherein, though he was to be blamed, yet there is some excuse in part, from the ardent affection and overcoming joy that he could not well conceal. Nor are we sharply to inveigh against all the impertinences and imprudences of new converts, in their speeches and carriage in religious things, though they are to be admonished to study prudence. It is no wonder that so high a change does a little transport them beyond their bounds. The showing to the priest, and offering of the gift, was both a respect to the law, not as yet out of date, and a provision for a testimony for Christ, when it should be afterward known that he had done it. This may be the meaning of that word, for a testimony to them. And it is not at all unlikely that the restraint from publishing it to others, was only till it should be first shown to the priest, and approved by him as full cleanness, which, possibly, otherwise, out of envy to Jesus Christ, they might have denied, if it had been known and famed abroad as his work.

Ver. 5-9. And when Jesus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beseeching him.] The history of the centurion hath much of the like confidence and lowliness. He desired him but to say the word, no more being needful for the thing to be done, and no more fit to be desired of him who is addressed. I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof. They that spake for him, as St. Luke hath it, said, He was worthy for whom Jesus should do this. He, of a far different mind, sends by others what is here related as his own speech; they speaking what he put in their mouths, that he was not unworthy of Christ's presence. His confidence of power in Christ's word to do the deed, he expresses by the resemblance of his own command over his soldiers. He himself being but one under others, was yet so readily obeyed by those under him; and he believed all diseases to be much more under the word of Jesus's command. So, indeed, they know his word, and so, also, he rebukes soul-diseases and they are gone, as the fever in the next history. Oh! if we did but believe this and put him to it! For faith doth so, and in a manner commands him, as he doth all other things.

Ver. 10. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said unto them that followed, Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.] This man was a stranger, and a soldier, yet, it seems, a proselyte; and our Lord, receiving this as a kind of first fruits of the Gentiles, foretells upon it a plentiful harvest of them: Many shall come, and the children of the kingdom be cast out. Ver. 11. This is a harsh word to the Jews; and yet, thus often, the most remote and unlikely, who have long lived strangers to religion, have proved notable converts: and they that have lived from their childhood under a powerful ministry, and with persons professing religion, and have themselves been moulded into a form of it, yet die in their sins, and never lay hold of that salvation unto which they always seem to be so near. And this near miss of happiness is the greatest misery. Children of the kingdom in outward appearance and church privileges, yet, prove children of wrath, not only not entering into the kingdom they had a seeming title to, but cast out into the dungeon of utter darkness!

Observe the misery of the damned, resembled by utter darkness, void of light, and full of hideous noises and cries; weeping and gnashing of teeth. And the happiness of glory is resembled to a banquet, where there is full light and joy; a coronation banquet, where all the company of kings sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God. And this and all other resemblances in Scripture are but a dark shadow of that bright glory. Oh! were the things of eternity, the misery and the blessedness to come, indeed believed, how much would our thoughts be in them, and how little room would they leave for the trifles and vanities that our hearts are taken up with!

Ver. 14. When Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever.] He takes humble, compassionate notice of all maladies where he comes, and is touched with the griefs of his own, and so moved as to touch and heal them. This King's touch cures all sorts of diseases: it did so while he walked in a low despised condition on earth, and it does so still by that virtual Divine power, now that he is in heaven; and although his glory there is greater, his compassion is not less than when he was here; and his compassion always was, and is, directed much more to souls diseased, than to bodies, as they are better and more valuable.

Ver. 15. And she arose, and ministered unto them.] Oh! thus it should still be; yea, thus it will be. They whom he cures, will bestow upon him the health and strength they have received by him, and shall be serviceable to him. How can it be so fitly and duly employed? Then are all deliverances and favors, outward and inward work, most kindly and sweetly enjoyed, when they are most quickly and entirely returned to their spring, all improved and offered up to him from whom they come.

Ver. 16. When the even was come, they brought unto him many that were possessed.] Upon the report of these works, they run to him in great numbers. Oh, that upon the report of his all-healing virtue published in the gospel, sick souls were thronging about him! The others were welcome, but these would be much more so. Many came to him, and we hear of none who were turned away without help. He cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick. Oh, come hither, all ye that have anything that troubles you. Is it a lethargic, a dead benumbness of spirit, or is it a fever, a boiling of passions or lusts, yea, is it, as it were, a kind of possession of an unclean or an unquiet spirit? Come forward: here is help for thee. He cured those here, with his word. Now that word of the prophet, here applied (ver. 17), had its accomplishment in part, even in these works; in his suffering the importunity of the multitudes coming early and late, and suffering likewise the maladies he cured, by the tender compassion he felt in doing it. He is not a hard-hearted, insensible physician; no, he is matchless in love and tenderness, feeling as it were their pains who came to him, till they were cured; and he still does feel the pains and groans of his own, on their sick beds. And yet, all this, his curing all these bodily evils, was but a pledge of the higher averring and fulfilling of the prophetic word. Our first disease struck nearer to him by far, than those that he cured: he put on the pain of all our transgressions, the whole weight falling at once upon his back, as the apostle renders it—bare our sins in his own body on the tree. Now, of that wonderful way of curing, by bearing and transferring over upon himself our spiritual maladies and miseries, there could not be a fitter prelude and foresign, than this of healing diseased bodies. Sickness is one of the bitter and chief fruits of sin. Next to proper spiritual evils, none are more grievous, yea, none so much. It sits the closest, and the sense of it can least be shifted. Other things that are without a man, are capable of more easy diversion; fancy, or reason, may bear off much; but paining sickness will not be so lightly argued out: the demonstrations are very sensible and conclusive.

As in other things, so it is here; health, the chief of temporal blessings, as much as anything, passes unesteemed and unconsidered while we enjoy it. But oh, a fit of sickness makes it sweet, gives it the highest recommendation: the groans and plaints of a sick bed are the most powerful rhetoric to commend health. What can a man enjoy of all the pleasures and pomp about him, when blasted by one sharp pain seizing upon any part of him? Amidst all attendance and furniture, he thinks the poorest scullion in his house, that is in health, much happier than he for the time. Yet this we think not of, while we eat and sleep, and have tolerable health; consider not that continued mercy, how great it is; think not on the difference between that, and loathing of all food, weary, restless nights, and tossings to and fro until the morning.

Now I say, this considered, the goodness and power of Jesus Christ were most fitly manifested in this way, as introductory to the great deliverance from sin and death, he came to effect for us, by bearing them himself, in our stead, and so taking them away. And so, in cures afterward, as you find in the next chapter, he began to let out somewhat of that, as the main: Thy sins are forgiven thee. And without this, what is health itself, though in its kind very precious, especially when so speedily and easily restored after sickness by a word or a touch? Yet, what had this been but a little reprieve, while the sentence of death, yea, eternal death, was still standing, and shortly to fall on? Oh, the lifting of that desperate sinking burthen, our sins, and taking them upon himself for us! How far do all words, and what is larger, all thoughts, fall short of the height of that love! Oh, boundless, immense love! It will take up eternity to consider it.

Ver. 18. Now when Jesus saw great multitudes about him, he gave commandment to depart unto the other side.] Other reasons may be imagined for his withdrawing from these, but it appears that his work now lay elsewhere, and he was to go through it. And the other evangelists are express in this: I must preach also to other cities, for for this came I forth. He had much work, and a short time to perform it in; so he follows it diligently. Thus his servants ought to go or stay, indifferently, for all places and services, as they are called, and not to please others and themselves, but him who sends them.

Ver. 19, 20. And a certain scribe came, and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. And Jesus saith unto him, Foxes have holes, &c.] Strange! Our Savior seems to turn off the very ready and full offer of one, and to put forward another who drew back. He is, indeed, absolutely free in his choice, and may without control do this, let pass high temporary fits and offers, and lay hold on what hath far less appearance. And the truth is, he is privy to the secret actions of men's hearts, and can discern in some of a very plausible zeal and forwardness, some false principles within, whence it is kindled; and in others more slow and inactive, sees under that more sincerity at the bottom. This scribe, possibly, taken with the splendor of Christ's miracles, and the flocking of multitudes unto him, perceived not his present poverty and meanness, and after disgraces and sufferings. Many make lavish offers to religion at a time when it is in request, or possibly upon some discernment of its own worth and beauty, but do not count the cost: consider not the enmity of the world, the outward meanness, the reproaching and despising that usually attend it. It is indeed by far the best bargain with all those who count the cost, if men would understand it right, and think it so ere they engage in it.

Now we see what condition Christ, who was Lord of all, chose for our sakes, amid his own to live as a stranger, having no property, not so much as the beasts and the birds. He became poor to make us rich, 2 Cor. viii. 9; not rich in those things he was poor in, but in things infinitely better. In that he calls his followers, most commonly, to a conformity with himself: he forbids not, indeed, property and possessions, but surely we should learn amid all to walk, in affection at least, like him, as strangers here, not glued to anything, using the world as though we used it not. And they who are really thus as he was, oh, what comfort have they in this! How is it sweetened to them, if in that condition they indeed follow him! Hast thou no dwelling of thy own, no possession, and little for present supply? Look up to him who passed through here in that very same way, and cleave the closer to him; so much the more eye him as thy riches and portion, and thou needst not envy kings in their best days. And whatsoever be thy estate, how soon shall it be past! And all that live, have much a like space of earth to lie down in at last. But oh, the rich inheritance above, for all that lay hold on it, and follow our Lord Jesus Christ by the way!

Ver. 21. Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father.] Now the other craves a delay. And a world of such excuses there are. They that will not give Christ an absolute refusal, yet have somewhat first to be done. This match, or bargain, or purchase, or at least a time civilly to take farewell of friends; and thus the most shift it off. But as to those whom he resolves to have, he will not take their refusal. Let the dead, says he, bury their dead. There are enough of common persons, who have no share of life in me, they may do that; Follow thou me. Oh! happy they whom he will not loose; whom he powerfully, yet sweetly constrains to break from all and follow him! Sure I am, it shall never repent them.

Ver. 23-27. And being entered into a ship, there arose a great tempest.] Still new occasions, and accordingly new evidence of the Divine power of Jesus Christ. Upon the ship wherein he is, there may, and usually does arise a storm; yet, happy is it to be embarked with him upon all hazards! His ship may be tost, but perish it can not. His counsels are deep and wise, and we can not find them out. He knows what he is about to do, when we can least understand him. When we think that he leads out his people to be swallowed up in the sea, or destroyed in the wilderness, he is only raising a mount for himself to be seen on, and bringing them into the view of dangers, yea, of apparent ruin, to be more glorious in their deliverance. His way is in the deep, and his footsteps are not known. Canst thou by searching find out God? says he in Job. Which is not, I conceive, so much meant of his essence, as of his operations and ways, which are so profound and untraceable. We are at a stand often to think what he means to do; whether he has given up his church and cause to the winds and waves, when his enemies rage and roar, and he is silent, as if he cared not what became of all. The seas swell, the ship is tost, and he sleeps.

Not to speak here of Christ putting on our natural frailties, or of this sleep, whether it was natural or voluntary ; it might be and likely was both : wearied with the concourse of the multitude on the land, he falls asleep in the ship ; yet, doubtless, he had the command of those natural inclinations in himself, and chooses now to sleep, to increase the appearance of the danger, and add horror to the visage of it. So no doubt it did ; not all the blustering of the winds, nor the rising of the waves, was so frightful and sad to the disciples, as that their Master slept so sound in the midst of them ; so sound as if rocked asleep by them, and either wholly insensible, or very regardless of their danger : as St. Luke expresses their feelings, Carest thou not that we perish? Now, in this man who slept, dwelt God who sleeps not, the Watchman of Israel, who does not so much as slumber. But they, either not so clearly understanding, or, in the fright, not so duly remembering and considering this, were eying only the posture wherein he was visible to them ; therefore, the sounder he slept, it awaked and increased their fear the more. And as Jesus Christ here really did, even so God seems sometimes to his own to do ; and they express it so. Thus the Psalmist : Awake, arise, why sleepest thou, O Lord? This he seems to do, when the ungodly prosper, and when his people lie trodden under foot, and he seems to take no notice of their pressure, nor stirs for their deliverance. And this is the saddest part of their affliction ; they have no hope nor stay, but in the favor and protection of their God : now when that is retired, and the curtain drawn, and he asleep, their prayers not heard, and no appearance of his help, I say it is a grand trial of faith, which shakes and disquiets more than all other things, how terrible soever. No rage or noise of the enemy is so grievous as the silence and sleeping of God. Thus, in a soul, when lusts and temptations are swelling and raging, and God is retired, and as asleep to it, says nothing, controls them not, but suffers them to take their course ; this is that which breeds the highest anguish, and brings a soul to the mouth of the pit, to the brink of desperation. Then it is forced to cry for a word from his mouth : Lord Jesus, speak but a word ; keep not silence to me, or I am undone : there is no recovery for me ; if thou keep silence, I am dead : I shall be like them that go down to the pit ; or, as it is here, Save, Master, or we perish.

And this is one main end for which he does sleep, to awake us, to rouse and stir our prayers, which commonly are, in times of ease, heavy, drowsy, lifeless things, as a man's speech in sleep, dreaming, incoherent, senseless stuff. This they may be to God, who hearkens to what the heart says in them, though, to man's ears, the words may be fit and good sense. But by the straining of a sharp affliction, or near pressing danger, the heart is awaked and speaks itself. Such a word seems to sound in its ears, as that of the mariners to Jonah, Arise, thou sluggard, and call upon thy God. Men lo but trifle in fair weather, but in the storm they are more in earnest. Especially, a soul acquainted with God, that follows and relies upon him, will take this course, and no other : it runs straight to him, and if he be asleep, awakes him. And in this they are to be approved and commended, that, as here, their course is to Jesus Christ, as confident of his power and willingness to deliver them. This the disciples did believe ; otherwise they had not left working for themselves, to go to awake him.

Yet was there, with their faith, a mixture of distempered, distrustful fear, which Jesus well knew, and which he would not otherwise have charged them with. He doth not altogether deny that there was faith in them, but checks the deficiency of it : O ye of little faith, why did ye doubt? Apprehend danger and fear they might ; yea, if they had not, they would not have come to Christ in that manner. Without a living sense of distress or danger, there can be neither faith nor prayer. These are stirred up and raised to act, by the knowledge and feeling of our need of help. But the misery is, we scarcely in anything know our bounds : our passions raised, do usually overflow and pass the banks. A little fear does but awake faith, but much fear weakens it, and in the awakening gives it too great a blow, such a one as astonishes it, and makes it stagger. That they were afraid, was tolerable ; but their hearts, it seems, were not so established in the persuasion of Christ's Divine power and care of them, as became them ; and this he plainly, yet gently, checks. And there is this alloy of distrust in believing, not only in the weaker, but even in the strongest Christian ; and there is a continual wrestling between them ; sometimes the one is uppermost, and sometimes the other ; but faith, in the end, shall have the victory. See what strange difference there was between Job and Job : would one think it were the same person ?—one while cursing his birth, and wishing for death, and yet, afterward declaring, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. And again, afterward, complaining, Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thy enemy? And yet anon, again, I know that my Redeemer liveth. This they should think of, who doubt because they doubt, and multiply distrust upon itself, concluding that they have no faith, because they find so much and so frequent doubting within them. But this is a great mistake. Some doubtings there may be, where there is even much faith : and a little faith there may be, where there is much doubting. But, upon this account, is doubting by any means to be entertained or favored ? Yea, it is to be hated and opposed with all our strength, and the strength of God must be implored to overcome it, as the grand enemy of our peace, and his glory. By all means is faith to be cherished, and distrust to be checked. Our Savior pardons it in his disciples, yet he blames it. He refuses not his help, yet he blames their unbelief. O ye of little faith! He requires, and delights in a strong, firm believing on him, though the least and weakest he rejects not.

Having first rebuked their fear, he rebukes the storm that caused it, and makes a calm, a great calm. No wonder that they wondered at it: though they had seen many of his works, and were now expecting somewhat of this from him, yet it surpasses their expectation, and strikes them into admiration, to see a man, a man subject to weariness and sleep, and yet that man awaking to still the wind and seas with the word of his mouth. Oh! the greatness of the Lord whom we serve, the sovereign of sea and land, commanding all with a word, desperate diseases, blasting winds, raging seas, and tormenting devils!

And there was a great calm. This often happens in his church after such storms as threatened shipwreck. And so in a soul, when all within (and these are the worst storms) is full of confusion and noises, the heart working like a troubled sea, and finding no rest neither from its own persuasions, nor the skilfullest speeches of others, but, amid all, likely to be swallowed up or split in pieces; then, then, one word from Christ's mouth quiets all presently, and makes the soul calmer and smoother than the stillest water in the fairest day. Oh, what wonder and love will possess the soul that hath found any such thing!

Ver. 28-34. And when he was come to the other side, into the country of the Gergesenes, there met him two possessed with devils.] The following history hath many things of very useful remark; but those things offer themselves to all that read it. We may see the great malice of Satan, and the great power and goodness of Jesus Christ, and the great baseness and brutishness of the men of this place, here spoken of. Satan's malice appears in the men possessed, carrying them to run wild among tombs, and to commit outrage upon them who passed by, and then, apprehending their dispossession thence, to desire to go into the swine of that place, and destroying them, which was their design upon the men, as the event proved. He who had the power, and graciously used it, to cast them out of the possessed men, was not tied to their suit as a point of capitulation. He could have cast them quite out of their coasts, and sent them back immediately to their own prison; but in Divine wisdom and justice, he grants their suit, knowing well what use they would make of it, and what would follow.

But oh! the Gadarenes themselves were the swine, viler than those the devils entered and drowned; yea, they were worse possessed than the swine, and drowned in a more fearful deep, by the craft of those devils. And that was their plot. The devils, knowing how fast the hearts of the owners were linked to their swine, thought it likely that the swine being drowned, they would follow, would drown themselves in the rejecting of Jesus Christ. And they did so. How many who read or hear this with indignation, yet, possibly, do little better in their hearts—cleaving to their herds, or other goods, gains, or pleasures, or anything of this earth, and in the love of these, refusing Jesus Christ! Think it not a harsh word, but take heed that ye be not such; for of the multitudes to whom Christ is offered, there are very few whose hearts do really open to him, and receive him. But oh, happy they that do! This was the clearest instance of perfect misery, and yet, they were scarcely at all to be pitied, being the choosers and devisers of it themselves: they besought Jesus to depart, that is, besought life and blessedness to go from them. And what does a sinner, when he turns out and rejects motions and inspirations of holiness, lest his lusts and pleasures of sin should be lost, but dismiss Jesus, lest the swine should be drowned?

CHAPTER IX.

VER. 1. And he entered into a ship, and passed over, and came into his own city.

HE who measures the waters in the hollow of his hand, and commands them (as ch. v. 26), is ferried over in some boat or small vessel. And was it not richly laden with this inestimable pearl, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, all fulness dwelling in him? All the rich ships from both the Indies, were not to be compared to this.

Ver. 2. And behold, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy.] The other evangelists tell with what difficulty they did so, and how they overcame that difficulty with resolution and industry, which indeed overcome all. A strong bent toward Jesus Christ will not be hindered. Nor is their violence in uncovering the house, or their rudeness in interrupting his discourse, rejected or reproved, but all is accepted for the principle, faith, which was tempered with love to the sick, and even to Jesus Christ, as the person from whom they expected the cure.

And Jesus seeing their faith.] It is needless to dispute that one may be benefited by the influence of another's faith. Surely, much may be done by it. Thus, it may bring and present a person, may recommend, may pray for him, and may be respected in the grant of mercy, not only in temporals, but in spirituals. But yet, the just lives only by his own faith, which no doubt this poor man had. For the word, theirs, excludes not, but rather includes the sick man's, who no doubt consented to this course in the same confidence. But yet, it is good to be in believing people's company. Another person, a family, a city, a society, may fare the better for the faith of an individual. Often, one who prays in a family, averts judgments, and draws down blessings upon the whole.

—Said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee.] This, though not appearing to be the errand, was yet the most important part of the cure, the root of blessings and blessedness, removing the root of all care and misery. Whether the sick man did most of all, or did at all desire, or expect this at the hands of Jesus Christ, we can not tell; but if he thought not of it (and we see no other), oh, what a surprise of love! It is good, coming to Jesus on any terms, on any errand. Some come, driven by outward afflictions, and yet return delivered from sin and eternal death. In this respect, there is great variety in this matter of declaring a pardon. Some seek and knock, and wait long, and hear it not. Others are prevented, who scarcely sought it, but Christ's first word to them is this. But all is one as to the main: they who seek it with sorrow, shall be sure to find it with joy; and they who first find it without previous sorrow, shall yet be sure to find that sorrow for sin, in some measure, likewise, after pardon, if not before. And truly it seems sweetest and kindest, when mercy melts the heart. But well may he say, be of good courage, who could add this, thy sins be forgiven thee. Oh! what can dismay after this? The heart, wholly filled with divine peace and love, bears up all, and sorrow is turned into joy before a soul thus assured. Jesus knew well, that the healing of his palsy, without this pardon, had been but a lame cure, only the half, and the far less, the meaner half. This was the main business that brought him down from heaven to be a man, and to dwell among men, and that made him die for man; that which nailed him to the cross, and drew forth his heart's blood: it was for the remission of the sins of many. These cures of bodily diseases, though clear demonstrations of Christ's Divine power and goodness, were but a transient appendage and symbol of that mainly intended and highest mercy, the forgiveness of sins.

The sentence of eternal death standing in full force above the head of an unpardoned sinner, if it were lively apprehended, oh! what a paralytic trembling would it strike the soul into, causing the joints of it to shake and smite one upon another, in the midst of its fullest health and mirth, as the hand-writing on the wall did that drunken king Belshazzar. But we know not what sin is, though we hear and speak of it, and sometimes confess it; and therefore our hearts leap not at the report of a pardon, though we hear of it, and usually entreat it. Any of you, when complaining that you are robbed, or spoiled of your goods, would scarcely think it to the purpose were I to tell you, your sins are pardoned. But oh! how fit a word it is to answer and drown all griefs; so pertinent that nothing besides it is so! And happy that soul that hears it from his mouth who gives it, and who alone can ascertain it. This is the answer that will satisfy. If thou sayest, "I am diseased;" ay, but thy sin is pardoned. "I am poor;" ay, but thy sin is pardoned. And surely, a soul that heeds it right, will be quieted, and will be bold, of good courage, as the word here is, and will embrace all other burdens, and go light under them; will say, "Lord, now let me live, or let me die, let me abound or want, let me be healthy or sick, take away what thou wilt, or lay on what thou wilt, all is well; thou hast pardoned my sin."

Ver. 3. And behold certain of the scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth.] Supposing Jesus but a man, yet, there was no necessity for this construction. He was a holy man, a singular, extraordinary man, doing unparalleled miracles; and he said not, I forgive thy sins, but Thy sins are forgiven thee; which was a word not beyond the capacity of a prophetic power to say it declaratively. And though there was an air of authority, might they not have thought, This may be the Messiah, who they knew was to come, and was to be the Son of God, and to bring remission of sins along with him? But that base spirit, the spirit of envy, with which they were filled, willingly rejects all better sort of constructions, and fastens on the absolutely worst it can invent. To an eye that looks through the dark glass of prejudice and malice, all is discolored. Yet they are struck with so much awe, that they dare not speak it out. That which struck them was, they were obscured by his brightness. They were animalia gloriæ, as one calls the philosophers, and could not endure to go less in the opinion they had gained: a sore mischief, and one much attaching to known and venerable possession. Genus irritable vatum.

But a spirit devoted to HIM whose due all glory is, willingly resigns it to him, in what way he will. Let whoso will be best or chief, so that still he be chief of all, and glorified in all. The holy Baptist had another spirit than these rabbies: he told it freely and gladly, He must increase, but I must decrease. It was his end, as the morning star is willingly drowned in the brightness of the rising sun.

Ver. 4. And Jesus knowing their thoughts.] This, without anything further, was clearly enough to demonstrate his Divine power. Oh! that this was ever in our thoughts, that all our thoughts are under his eye! If they were so, and we know them to be so, to some grave, wise man, how wary, and choice should we be of them? And shall we have less regard to the holiest and wisest Lord, to whom they are all naked and open?

Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts?] There was no reason in the thing, but the reason was, their hearts were evil, and their emissions like themselves. An evil heart is an incessant forge of evil thoughts. It is a corrupt spring still issuing forth, and till it be renewed, it can not find any other. From the heart come evil thoughts: that is in the front of all the black train that comes forth of the heart, as our Savior teaches, Matt. xv. 19. These are the seeds of all the wickedness that fills the world. Chief regard, therefore, is to be had to the heart. An excellent advice that of Solomon, Keep thy heart with all diligence. To amend some evil customs, without the renewing of the heart, is but to lop the branches that will grow again, or others in their stead; but a holy heart meditates on holy things, is still in heaven, is all reverence toward God, and meekness and charity to men.

Ver. 5. Whether it is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk? Though the remission of sins flows originally from the same power, and so is equal, and in its own place hath the preference, being by far the greater mercy, yet the other of bodily cure runs into the senses, and so both is more evident to the beholders, and affects them more. The other word might be spoken with less control, the efficacy or inefficacy of it not falling under the cognition of them that heard it; but this of healing the palsy, would either be attested or denied in the effect.

Ver. 6. But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins.] Now he asserts a peculiar power of forgiving sin. Though a man walking on the earth as the rest, yet, in testimony of the divine power, He saith to the sick of the palsy—this apostrophe maketh the proof more lively, joining presently the real experiment of that miraculous cure—Arise, take up thy bed. That word which gave being to the world, what is hard to it? And in the case of spiritual deadness, soul-palsy, no more is necessary than a word from his mouth, and it shall be lively and strong: it shall skip and leap. Isa. xxxv. 6. Lord, speak that word! And indeed, wheresoever he pardons sin, he withdraws the soul able and nimble, to run in the way of his commandments; to carry its bed, that before carried it: to command and wield at pleasure those low things wherein it rested.

Ver. 8. But when the multitude saw it they marvelled.] They feared, says St. Luke. A gracious work it was, yet so full of wonder, that it struck them with a kind of fear. And they glorified God. Thus shall he break out, and shine bright in his works, when most opposed by evil men. Yet they knew him not well, but took him for an extraordinary man only. But thus he was pleased to be known by degrees, and to rise as the morning light. It is a common presumption, and generally that of the least knowing, to think that they have the true and full sense of the articles of religion; and that presumption is commonly accompanied with this precipitancy, that we would constrain all to know and believe, at once, without delay, whatsoever we think and believe. Who had given such power unto men. But had they known this honor given unto men, that this man was God, they would have wondered much more. And if he was so astonishingly wonderful in healing a sick man, how wonderful shall he be in raising the dead! And if in his lowliness his power was admired, how much more shall all admire that power which shall then be given him, when the man, Christ, shall come in the brightness of his glory, to judge the world!

Ver. 9. And as Jesus passed forth from thence, he saw a man named Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom.] He stayed no long time upon earth, but he lost no part of that time. Every step to us is a wonder of goodness. And here is a cure which the evangelist ingenuously relates as done upon himself, which was no less, if not more wonderful than that performed upon the paralytic; and done as easily and quickly by the same means, a word spoken.

He saw a man named Matthew. He loves first, and spies first, when we think on nothing less than him; as he says to Nathanael: Before Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee. And this seeing of Matthew was no casual, but a designed sight, proceeding from a former sight, like unto that of Nathanael; and is the sight of his foreknowing and forechoosing love. So even this very sight of his calling and converting power did prevent Matthew, while he thought of no such thing, and would have let Jesus pass, being so intent upon his busy employment, as either not to have seen him at all, or to have taken no notice of him.

Sitting at the receipt of custom. This is the common case, the posture of called sinners. While they are thinking of no such thing, but altogether drowned in other desires and cares (even at the church, their hearts are often more in their shops, or fields, or any earthly business they are engaged in), their very hearts being a little customhouse, such a crowd and noise of cares and vanities, as there is usually of people in a customhouse, He who hath their names in his book of life, at his appointed time glances at them, by a powerful look cast on them, and, by a word spoken to them, draws them to himself; and that without minding any previous worth or congruous disposition in them, more than in others; yea, finding them in a more indisposed temper and posture, possibly, than many others who are not called, as the evangelist here freely and humbly declares of himself, speaking out his calling, and his busy diligence in it, in the very instant that he is called from it. Observe, likewise, his expressing of his common name, Matthew; whereas the other evangelist, in the recital of this story, gives him that other name which was the more honorable, Levi. Sitting at the receipt of custom, a profession of great gain, but little credit among the Jews; and though, possibly, not utterly unlawful in the nature of it, yet, so generally corrupt in the exercise and management of it; like some other callings, which, though a man can not absolutely determine them to be unlawful, are yet seldom or never lawfully and spotlessly discharged. Therefore, the Jews shunned the very society of publicans (tax-gatherers) as a wicked, execrable kind of men, and did in a manner necessitate them to converse with the worst sort of persons, as being expelled and generally avoided by all others: so that you find them here, ver. 10, and usually in the gospel, linked together, publicans and sinners, that is, noted, nefarious sinners, such as harlots, and other scandalously vicious persons. Yet from this stained and ill-reputed calling, is Matthew called by the holy Lord, to follow him. As he called poor fishermen, and made them fishers of men, to catch men, to save them by their net spread, the word of life preached, so he calls a rich publican to be a gatherer-in of his tribute and treasure in the world, the souls of chosen sinners, by the publication of the gospel.

No rank of men is so low, as to be below the condescension of his choice and grace; and none are so remote, in the reputed or real iniquity of their station or person, as to be without the extent and reach of his saving hand. And he is pleased to give instances of this in choosing whom he will, and making them what he will, that no flesh may glory before him, but that all flesh may glorify him, whom no unworthiness or unfitness can prejudice, either in the freedom of his grace in choosing them, or in the power of his grace in changing the mind and fitting them for for what he calls them to. He hath no need, nor takes notice of our rules, nor judges according to our thoughts. Not only have we here a publican, but afterward a persecutor, made a most eminent preacher and apostle of Jesus Christ. And his choice and calling wipes out the stain of all preceding sin, though the persons themselves do readily acknowledge it on all occasions, as St. Paul often does, and St. Matthew does here. And indeed it is sincerity and humility for them who are converted, at a great distance of time so to do. But for others to object to them, after their conversion, either the meanness or the sinfulness of their former lives, were great uncharity and folly: it were to reckon up to men that which God hath blotted out, who alone is interested in the account.

Herein God is wonderful, who seizeth on some persons in the midst of youthful dissipations, or violent pursuits of the world, and purifies them for himself; makes them not only vessels of honor, but of the first rank, to bear his name to others; makes them eminently holy, gives them great abilities, and which is the top of all abilities, ardent love, and mighty affection for his service. His Spirit, that holy fire, refines gross earth into the pureness of transparent glass, to be the inlet of light to his people.

Now, why is this one taken from the customhouse, and so many others left, both there and elsewhere, round about him? This is arcanum imperii, a state secret: no reason is to be expected but his good pleasure. Why is such a poor creature in a cottage chosen, and great palaces passed by? Why are simple and unlettered persons taught the mysteries of heaven, and great wits left to evaporate themselves upon vain loves, and other like follies? Why in the same house is one chosen and called, and it may be a servant, and the rest passed by? Nothing can be given in answer but this: Even so, Father, because it pleaseth thee.

And he saith unto him, Follow me.] I am not of the mind of a grave interpreter who thinks there were other words added to persuade him, though not related. I am somewhat confident that there was no more said at all, this being our Savior's usual word of calling others in the same way, and so powerful a word, and of such mighty influence, that there was no resisting it. He arose and followed him. No chains so strong to hold an earthly mind, as those of gold and silver. He was here in the midst of them, and very heavy ones they were, no doubt; yet, the word makes the soul break loose with a marvellous force from all. Some apprehend (as well they may), there was an attractive power in the aimable Jesus who here called him; but surely the word had of his divine power in it, and reached the heart, and could not be resisted, and drew more strongly than all the receipts, and gains, and involved business of his profession, which could not hold him back. So Elijah but cast his mantle upon Elisha in passing, and he followed. What have I done to thee? said he. Nothing to look at, yet enough to constrain him to leave all and follow him. So it is in the conversion of any sinners; no weights nor bolts can hold them: they must follow a commanding word, such as that which, in the creation, causes that to be that it commands; a magnetic touch of Jesus Christ, speaking in a word to the heart, so that it must follow him. Oh! happy souls that have felt it!

Ver. 10-13. And as Jesus sat at meat in the house, behold, many publicans and sinners came, and sat down with him, and his disciples.] The other evangelists tell that it was in Matthew's house, and at a great feast which he made; this himself does not mention. This feast he made both as a respectful entertainment to his new Master, and as a civil farewell to his old friends, and fellow publicans: and possibly he took the confidence to invite them together with Jesus Christ, hoping that his presence and company might have likewise some happy influence upon some of them; and it is likely divers of them came uninvited, out of a desire to see Jesus, having heard of this his sudden and powerful withdrawing of one who, no doubt, was a prime man among them. However, the mild and gracious Jesus refuses neither the feast nor the company, condescending to the most ordinary customs of life, and in these things affecting nothing of austerity and singularity; and he chose this compliant way as most suitable to his design: He became like us in all things, excepting sin.

But all along, the spirit of pharisaical envy follows him, and lies at the catch for an advantage. Here it seemed fair for them. They accost not himself with it, but his disciples, hoping more easily to unsettle them of their opinion of their Master: How is this? He calls you to follow him as to some eminent way of sanctity, and leads you unto feasting and good cheer, and that with the refuse and impure sort of men, publicans and sinners. Jesus takes on him the answer, as alone able to give it home. Why? What wonder you to see me in such company? Why, where should a man be, but where his business lies? Were it strange to find a physician in an hospital or infirmary, or anywhere among the sick? Here is my work and great employment; and you might have read a word applicable to this purpose: I will have mercy and not sacrifice; that is, rather than sacrifice, or any ceremonial observance, such as this you urge, of abhorring the society of such persons, substantial goodness and duties of compassion and love. And instead of squinting on what you see, go think on this. You have read it likely, but do not well understand it; study better what it means. Meanwhile know this, that I am prosecuting the great design of my coming into the world, while I am in such company. I came to call not the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Not the righteous; either them that conceit themselves such, as you do, or any that are really converted already and religious. My present business is not so much with them, as to restore the ungodly, to call sinners to repentance.

I will not now speak of the rules and qualifications of using or avoiding the converse of unholy persons; but doubtless there lies much, we shall find, as in this instance, in the due consideration of the persons on both sides, what hope there may be of reclaiming them, and what safety of not being corrupted by them, lest, while we think to pull them out of the mire, they drag us into it. Here there was none of that danger at all, and there was the highest power for converting; and the persons, even by coming so willingly where he was, seem not to have been the most obstinate and incorrigible. But we should reflect well on ourselves in this case, that our intention be suitable to this, and that we be in some measure hopeful to be able to accomplish, before we attempt such a thing: otherwise it will prove fool-hardiness, to adventure much of this kind.

But this is the great comfort of sinners, this word: I came to call not the righteous, but sinners. What can a diffident heart say, that it should not come to Jesus Christ? Art thou a sinner, an eminent sinner? Therefore come to him, for he came to thee. It is such that he comes to seek—they are the very objects of his grace. He had nothing else to do in the world but to save such; he came on purpose for their sakes. His very name tells it: He shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins. It is so far from being a just hinderance, that it is the only title to his favorable intentions, that thou art a sinner. Were it not strange if one should say, I am sick, very sick, therefore I will not make an address to the physician? And to say, I am a sinner, and a great one, therefore I dare not go to the Savior of sinners, would be equally strange. Oh, no; therefore I will go: he came for me; I am sure he is able to heal me—ought to be the language of all such.

But though this is a great encouragement to sinners, it is no encouragement at all to sin. He came to call sinners, but it is to call them to repentance. This the whole gospel, and all the doctrine of grace, still presses. If thou bring thy sins to Jesus Christ, as thy malady and misery, to be cured of them, and delivered from them, it is well; but to come with them as thy beloved darlings and delight, thinking still to retain them and receive him, thou mistakest him grossly, and miserably deludest thyself. He came forth from God, to restore souls to God, in order to make us partakers of his Divine nature. The great intendment of the blessed Jesus, and the great redemption he wrought is, to separate our hearts and sin. We know him not, if we take it otherwise. And this says clearly, that though he hath come to us, and stretched forth his hands long among us, few of us are come to him. Oh! how few have trod on the neck of their beloved sin, to come to Jesus Christ! This is the great, deplorable wretchedness of the land: not the losses and ravages of war; not the loss of civil liberty, or anything else that way; this is it—Unrepentance. We turn not by being smitten with the sharpest rod: we turned not by being invited with tender mercies. Look on such as have been suffering at home, or wandering abroad; what change has been wrought on our hearts? What imports who do, or do not, rule over us, while our unworthy lusts and passions still do? If spoiled and poor, and without Christ too, then we are poor indeed; oh, pitiful poor! Yea, if thou escape many things that light sadly on others, yet, if thou hast not escaped the dominion of sin, and that curse of death that cleaves to it, oh, wretched caitiff! Think what Jesus came and died for—what we live for—and what is our great business on this earth—that our sins should die before us. He came to call the earthly to heavenly-mindedness and heavenly conversation; to call the unclean to purity: to call the passionate and furious to meekness; to call the proud to humility. Oh, answer this call. Give him the desire of his heart, and he will certainly give thee thine.

S E R M O N S .

SERMON I.

HEAVENLY WISDOM.

MANY and great are the evils that lodge within the heart of man, and they come forth abundantly both by the tongue and by the hand, yet the heart is not emptied of them; yea, the more it vents them outwardly, the more they increase within. Well might HE who knows the heart so well, call it an evil treasure. We find the prophet Ezekiel, in his eighth chapter, led by the Lord in vision to Jerusalem, to view the sins of the Jews who remained there in the time of the captivity: when he had showed him one abomination, he caused him to dig through the wall, to enter and discover more, and so directed him several times, from one place to another, and still said, I will show thee yet greater abominations. Thus it is with those whom the Lord leads into an examination of their own hearts (for men are usually strangers to themselves), by the light of his word, and his Spirit going before them; he lets them see heaps of abominations in every room, and the vilest in the most retired and darkest corners. And truly, should he leave them there, they would despair of remedy. No; he makes this discovery on purpose that they should sue to him for help. Do so, then, as many of you as have taken any notice of the evils of your own hearts. Tell the Lord, those hearts are his own work: He formed the heart of man within him. And they are his own choice too: My son, give me thy heart. Entreat him to redress all those abuses wherewith Satan and sin have filled it, and then to take possession of it himself, for therein consists its happiness. This is, or should be, a main end of our resortings to his house and service. Wrong not yourselves so far as to turn these serious exercises of religion into an idle divertisement. What a happiness were it, if every time you come to his solemn worship, some of your strongest sins did receive a new wound, and some of your weakest graces a new strength!

JAMES iii. 17.

But the wisdom that is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.

God doth know, that in the day that ye shall eat thereof, your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil, was the first hissing of that old serpent, by which he poisoned mankind in the root. Man, not contented with the impression of God's image, in which he was created, lost it by catching at a shadow. Climbing higher than his station, he fell far below it: seeking to be more than man, to become as God, he made himself less than man. He lodged not a night in honor, but became as the beasts that perish. Psalm xlix. 12. Ever since, nature's best wisdom is full of impurity, turbulency, and distemper; nor can anything rectify it, but a wisdom from above, that both cleaneth and composeth the soul: it is first pure, and then peaceable.

This epistle, as some that follow, is called general, both by reason of the dispersion of the parties to whom it is addressed, and the universality of the subject which it treats; containing a great number (if not all) of the necessary directions and comforts of a Christian's life, both for the active and the passive part of it. It is evident that the apostle's main design is, to arm the dispersed Jews against all kinds of temptations—both those of affliction, in the first chapter, at the 2d verse, and sinful temptations, verse 13th. And having discoursed of two special means of strengthening them against both—speaking to God in prayer, and hearing God speak in his word—in the last two verses of that first chapter, he recommends, as chief duties of religion, and sure evidences of integrity in religion, first, meeckness and moderation, chiefly in their speeches, and then, charity and purity in their actions; insisting largely upon the latter, in the second chapter, and upon the former, the ruling of the tongue, in the third chapter: and here, toward the end of it, he shows the true opposite springs of mis-carriage in speech and action, and of right ordering and regulating of both. Evil conversation, strifes, and envyings, are the fruits of a base wisdom that is earthly, sensual, and devilish, ver. 15th; but purity, meekness, and mercy, are the proper effects and certain signs of heavenly wisdom.

The wisdom that is from above is first pure: its gentleness can agree with anything except impurity. Then it is peaceable—it offends nobody, except purity offend them. It is not raging and boisterous. It is not only pure, being void of that mire and dirt which the wicked are said to cast out like the sea (Isa. lvii. 20), but peaceable likewise, not swelling, and restless like the sea, as is there said of the wicked. Nor is it only peaceable negatively, not offending, but as the word bears [εἰρηνική] pacific, disposed to make and seek peace. And as it readily offends none, so it is not easily offended. It is gentle and moderate, [επιεικής], and if offended, [εὐπειθής], easily entreated to forgive. And as it easily passeth by men's offences, so it doth not pass by, but looks upon their distresses and wants—as full of compassion as it is free from unruly and distempered passions. Nor rests it in an affected sympathy; its mercy is helpful—full of mercy and good fruits. And it both forgives and pities, and gives without partiality, and without hypocrisy: [ἀδιακρίτος καὶ ἀνυπόκριτος]. The word ἀδιακρίτος may as well bear another sense, no less suiting both with this wisdom, and these its other qualities; that is, not taking upon it a censorious discerning, and judging of others. They that have most of this wisdom, are least rigid to those that have less of it. I know no better evidence of strength in grace, than to bear much with those that are weak in it. And lastly, as it spares the infirmities of others, so it makes not false and vain shows of its own excellencies; it is without hypocrisy. This denies two things, both dissimulation and ostentation. The art of dissembling or hypocritecraft, is no part of this wisdom. And for the other, ostentation, surely the air of applause is too light a purchase for solid wisdom. The works of this wisdom may be seen, yea, they should be seen, and possibly be now and then commended; but they should not be done for that low end, either to be seen or to be commended. Surely not, being of so noble extraction. This wisdom having descended from heaven, will be little careful for the estimation of those that are of the earth, and are but too often of the earth, earthly.

The due order of handling these particulars more fully can not well be missed. Doubtless, the subject (wisdom from above) requires our first consideration; next, the excellent qualities that are attributed to it; and lastly, their order is to be considered, the rather because so clearly expressed, first pure, then peaceable, &c.

[Wisdom from above.] There be two things in that: there is the general term of wisdom, common to divers sort of wisdom, though most eminently and truly belonging to this best wisdom; then there is the birth or original of this wisdom, serving as its difference to specify and distinguish it from all the rest—wisdom from above. Wisdom, in the general, is a very plausible word among men. Who is there that would not willingly pass for wise? Yea, often those that are least of all such, are most desirous to be accounted such; and where this fails them, they usually make up that want in their own conceit and strong opinion. Nor do men only thus love the reputation of wisdom, but they naturally desire to be wise, as they do to be happy: yet, through corrupt nature's blindness, they do as naturally mistake and fall short both of the one and the other; and being once wrong, the more progress they make, they are farther out of the way, and pretending to wisdom in a false way, they still befool themselves, as the apostle speaks, Rom. i. 22: φάσκοντες εἶναι σοφοὶ ἐμωρανθησαν. Professing themselves to be wise, they become fools.

Our apostle, ver. 15, speaking of that wicked wisdom that is fruitful of wrongs, strifes, and debates, and that is only abusively to be called wisdom, shows what kind of wisdom it is, by three notable characters, earthly, natural, and devilish; which though they be here jointly attributed to one and the same subject, yet we may make use of them to signify some differences of false wisdom. There is an infernal, or devilish wisdom, proper for contriving cruelties and oppressions, or subtle shifts and deceits that make atheism a main basis and pillar of state policy: such as those that devise mischief upon their beds. &c. Mic. ii. 1. This is a serpentine wisdom, not joined with, but most opposite to the dove-like simplicity. There is an earthly wisdom that draws not so deep in impiety as that other, yet is sufficient to keep a man out of all acquaintance with God and Divine matters, and is drawing his eye perpetually downward, employing him in the pursuit of such things as can not fill the soul, except it be with anguish and vexation. By thy great wisdom, and by thy traffic hast thou increased thy riches, and thine heart is lifted up because of thy riches. Ezek. xxviii. 5. That dexterity of gathering riches, where it is not attended with the Christian art of rightly using them, abases men's souls, and indisposes them wholly for this wisdom that is from above. There is a natural wisdom far more plausible than the other two, more harmless than that hellish wisdom, and more refined than that earthly wisdom, yet no more able to make man holy and happy than they are: Natural, ψυχική, it is the word the Apostle St. Paul useth. 1 Cor. ii. ἄσθρωνος ψυχικός, naming the natural man by his better part, his soul: intimating that the soul, even in the highest faculty of it, the understanding, and that in the highest pitch of excellency to which nature can raise it, is blind in spiritual objects. Things that are above, can not be known but by a wisdom from above. Nature neither affords this wisdom, nor can it of itself acquire it. There is to advertise us, that we mistake not morality and common knowledge, even of Divine things, for the wisdom that is from above. That may raise a man high above the vulgar, as the tops of the highest mountains leave the valleys below them; yet is it still as far short of true supernatural wisdom, as the highest earth is of the highest sphere. There is one main point of the method of this wisdom that is of most hard digestion to a natural man, and the more natural wise he be, the worse he likes it: If any man would be wise, let him become a fool that he may become wise. 1 Cor. iii. 18. There is nothing gives nature a greater prejudice against religion, than this initial point of self-denial. When men of eminent learning, or the strong politicians, hear that, if they will come to Christ, they must renounce their own wisdom to be fit for his, many of them go away as sorrowful as the young man when he heard of selling all his goods and giving them to the poor.

Jesus Christ is that eternal and substantial wisdom that came from above, to deliver men from perishing in their affected folly, as you find it at large in Prov. viii. St. Paul, in the first chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, calls him the wisdom of God, ver. 24; that shows his excellency in himself: and ver. 30, he tells us that he is made of God our wisdom; that shows his usefulness to us. And by him alone is this infused wisdom from above conveyed to us. In him are the hid treasures of wisdom and knowledge, Col. ii. 3; and from his fulness, if at all, we all receive grace for grace; and of all graces, first some measures of this wisdom, without which no man can know himself, much less can he know God.

Now this supernatural wisdom hath in it both speculation and prudence; it is contemplative and practical: these two must not be separated. I wisdom dwell with prudence. Prov. viii. 12. This wisdom, in its contemplative part, reads Christ much, and discovers in him a new world of hidden excellencies unknown to this old world. There are treasures of wisdom in him, but they are hid, and no eye sees them, but that which is enlightened with thy wisdom. No, it is impossible, as one says (Sophocles), τὰ Θεία γινώσκει κρυπτόντας Θεού, to know Divine things while God concealeth them. But when the renewed understanding of a Christian is once initiated into this study, it both grows daily more and more apprehensive, and Christ becomes more communicative of himself, and makes the soul more acquainted with the amiable countenance of his Father in him reconciled. No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him. John i. 18. What wonder if the unlettered and despised Christian knows more of the mysteries of heaven, than the naturalist, though both wise and learned? Christ admits the believer into his bosom, and he is in the bosom of the Father. But withal know, that all this knowledge, though speculatively high, yet descends to practice: as it learns what God is, so it thence teacheth man, what he should be. This wisdom flows from heaven, and a heavenly conversation flows from it; as we find it there characterized by those practical graces of purity, peace, meekness, &c.

This wisdom represents to us, the purity of God's nature. 1 John iii. 3. It gives the soul an eye to see the comeliness and beauty of purity: as the philosopher said of virtue, to the end it might be loved, he would wish no more but that it could be seen. And as it thus morally persuades, so, by an insensible virtue, it assimilates the soul to Christ, by frequent contemplation. It also produces all the motives to holiness and obedience; it begets these precious qualities in the soul. It giveth a Christian a view of the matchless virtues that are in Christ, and stirs him up to a diligent, though imperfect imitation of them. It sets before us Christ's spotless purity, in whose mouth there was no guile, and so invites us to purity. It represents the perpetual calmness of his spirit, that no tempest could reach to disturb it: In his mouth there was no contentious noise, his voice was not heard in the streets; and this recommends peaceableness, and gentleness. And so in the rest here mentioned.

Hence, I conceive, may be fitly learned for our use, that seeing here is a due wisdom and knowledge necessary for guidance and direction in the ways of purity and peace, it is evident that gross ignorance can not consist with the truth of religion, much less can it be a help and advantage to it. I shall never deny that a false, superstitious religion stands in need of it: "Not too much scripture wisdom for the people." The pomp of that vain religion, like court masks, shows best by candle-light. Fond nature likes it well: the day of spiritual wisdom would discover its imposture too clearly. But to let their foul devotion pass (for such it must needs be that is born of so black a mother as ignorance), let this wisdom at least be justified of those that pretend to be her children. It is lamentable that among us, where knowledge is not withheld, men should, through sloth and love of darkness, deprive themselves of it. What abundance of almost brutish ignorance is among the commons! and thence arise uncleanness, and all manner of wickedness: a darkness that both hides and increaseth impurity. What is the reason of so much impiety and iniquity in all places, but the want of the knowledge of God? Not knowing Jesus Christ, and not obeying his gospel, are joined together. Hosea iv. 1, 2; 2 Thess. i. 8. It will be found true, that where there is no obedience, there is no right knowledge of Christ. But out of all question, where there is not a competency of knowledge, there can be no obedience. And as these two lodge together, to observe what attends them both. He shall come in flaming fire to render vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And if there be any that think to shroud unpunished among the thickets of ignorance, especially amidst the means of knowledge, take notice of this; though it may hide the deformity of sin from your own sight for a time, it can not palliate it from the piercing eye, nor cover it from the revenging hand of Divine Justice. As you would escape, then, that wrath to come, come to wisdom's school, and how simple soever ye be as to this world, if you would not perish with the world, learn to be wise unto salvation.

And truly, it is mainly important for this effect, that the ministers of the gospel be active and dexterous in imparting this wisdom to their people. If they would have their conversation to be holy, and peaceable, and fruitful, &c., the most expedient way is at once to principle them well in the fundamentals of religion; for therein is their great defect. How can they walk evenly and regularly, so long as they are in the dark? One main thing is, to be often pointing at the way to Christ, the fountain of this wisdom. Without this, you bid them be clothed, and clothe them not.

How needful then is it, that pastors themselves be seers indeed, as the prophets were called of old; not only faithful but wise dispensers, as our Savior speaks, Luke xii. 42, that they be διδασκαλικοί, able and apt to teach. 1 Tim. iii. 2. Laudable is the prudence that tries much the churches' storehouses, the seminaries of learning; but withal, it is not to be forgot, that as a due furniture of learning is very requisite for this employment, so it is not sufficient. When one is duly enriched that way, there is yet one thing wanting, that grows not in schools; except this infused wisdom from above season and sanctify all other endowments, they remain κοινὰ common and unholy, and therefore unfit for the sanctuary. Among other weak pretences to Christ's favor in the last day, this is one, We have preached in thy name; yet says Christ, I never knew you. Surely, then, they know not him, and yet they preached him. Cold and lifeless (though never so fine and well contrived) must those discourses be, that are of an unknown Christ. Pastors are called angels, and therefore, though they use the secondary helps of knowledge, they are mainly to bring their message from above, from the fountain, the head of this pure wisdom.

Pure.] If it come from above, it must needs be pure originally; yea, it is formally pure too, being a main trait of God's renewed image in the soul. By this wisdom, the understanding is both refined and strengthened to entertain right conceptions of God in his nature and works. And this is primarily necessary, that the mind be not infected with false opinions in religion. If the spring-head be polluted, the streams can not be pure. This is more important than men usually think, for a good life. But that which I suppose to be here chiefly intended, is, that it is effectively and practically pure: it purifies the heart (said of faith, Acts xv. 9, which, in some sense and acceptation, differs not much from this wisdom), and consequently, the words and actions that flow from the heart.

This purity, some render chastity: The wisdom from above is chaste, ἀγνή. The word is indeed often so taken, and includes that here, but it is too narrow a sense to restrict it to that only. It implies here, a universal detestation of all impurity, both of flesh and spirit, as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. vii. 1.

Pride, self-love, profaneness of spirit, and irreligion, though they do not so properly pollute the body as carnal uncleanness, yet they do no less defile the soul, and make it abominable in the sight of God. Those apostate angels, called unclean spirits, are incapable of bodily defilement, though indeed they tempt and inveigle men to it; their own inherent pollutions must needs be spiritual, for they are spirits. Idolatry in Scripture, goes often under the name of fornication and adultery; and indeed these sins may mutually borrow and lend their names the one to the other; idolatry may well be called spiritual unchastity, and unchaste love, carnal idolatry. Earthly-mindedness likewise is an impurity of the soul: in the apostle's phrase, covetousness is idolatry, and so, a spiritual pollution; yea, it may well share with idolatry in its borrowed name, and be called adultery too, for it misbestows the soul's prime affection upon the creature, which right is God's peculiar due.

This purity that true wisdom works is contrary to all pollution. We know then in some measure what it is: it remains to inquire where it is; and there is the difficulty. It is far easier to describe it in itself, than to find it among men. Who can say I have made my heart clean? Proverbs xx. 9. Look upon the greatest part of mankind, and you may know at first sight, that purity is not to be looked for among them: they suffer it not to come near them, much less to dwell with them and within them; they hate the very semblance of it in others, and themselves delight in intemperance and all manner of licentiousness, like foolish children striving who shall go farthest into the mire. These can not say, they have made clean their hearts, for all their words and actions will belie them. If you come to the mere moralist, the world's honest man, and ask him, it may be he will tell you, he hath cleansed his heart; but believe him not. It will appear he is not yet cleansed, because he says he has done it himself; for (you know) there must be some other beside man at this work; again, he rising up no higher than nature, hath none of this heavenly wisdom in him, and therefore is without this purity too. But if you chance to take notice of some well-skilled hypocrite, everything you meet with makes you almost confident, that there is purity; yet, if he be strictly put to it, he may make some good account of the pains he hath taken to refine his tongue and his public actions, but he dares not say he hath made clean his heart; it troubles his peace to be asked the question. He never intended to banish sin, but to retire it to his innermost and best room, that so it might dwell unseen within him; and where then should it lodge but in his heart? Yet, possibly, because what is outward is so fair, and man can not look deeper to contradict him, he may embolden himself to say, he is inwardly suitable to his appearance; but there is a day at hand that shall, to his endless shame, at once discover both his secret impurity and his impudence in denying it.

After these, there follow a few despised and melancholy persons (at least as to outward appearance), who are almost always hanging down their heads, and complaining of abundant sinfulness. And surely, purity can not be expected in these who are so far from it by their own confession; yet the truth is, that such purity as is here below, will either be found to lodge among these, or nowhere. Be not deceived; think not that they who loath, and (as they can) flee from the unholiness of the world, are therefore taken with the conceit of their own holiness: but as their perfect purity of justification is by Christ's imputed righteousness, so likewise they will know, and do always acknowledge, that their inherent holiness is from above too, from the same fountain, Jesus Christ. The wisdom from above is pure; this is their engagement to humility, for it excludes vaunting and boasting; and beside that, it is imperfect, troubled and stained with sin, which is enough to keep them humble. Their daily sad experience will not suffer them to be so mistaken: their many faults of infirmity can not but keep them from this presumptuous fault. There is a generation, indeed, that are pure in their own eyes, but they are such as are not washed from their filth. Prov. xxx. 12. They that are washed, are still bewailing that they again contract so much defilement. The most purified Christians are they that are most sensible of their impurity. Therefore I called not this a universal freedom from pollution, but a universal detestation of it. They that are thus pure, are daily defiled with many sins, but they can not be in love with any sin at all, nor do they willingly dispense with the smallest sins, which a natural man either sees not to be sin (though his dim moonlight discover grosser evils), or, if he do not see them, yet he judges it too much niceness to choose a great inconvenience rather than a little sin. Again, they differ in another particular: a natural man may be so far in love with virtue after his manner, as to dislike his own faults, and resolve to amend them: but yet he would think it a great weakness to sit down and mourn for sin, and to afflict his soul, as the Scripture speaks. The Christian's repentance goes not so lightly; there is a great deal more work in it. There is not only indignation against impurity, but it proceeds to revenge, 2 Cor. vii. 11. The saints we read of in Scripture, were ashamed of their impurity, but never of their tears for it. Let the world enjoy their own thoughts, and account it folly, yet surely the Christian who delights in purity, seeing he can not be free from daily sin, when he retires himself at night, is then best contented when his eyes serve him most plentifully to weep out the stains of the by-past day; yet he knows withal that it is only his Redeemer's blood that takes away the guilt of them. This is the condition of those that are truly, though not fully cleansed from the pollutions of the world by the Spirit of wisdom and purity. What mean they, then, who would argue themselves out of this number, because they find yet much dross left, and that they are not so defeated and refined as they would wish to be? On the contrary, this hatred of pollution testifies strongly that the contrary of it, purity, is there; and though its beginnings be small, doubt not, it shall in the end be victorious. The smoking of this flax shows indeed that there is gross matter there, but it witnesseth likewise that there is fire in it too, and though it be little, we have Christ's own word for it, that it shall not be quenched; and if he favor it, no other power shall be able to quench it. You find not, indeed, absolute holiness in your persons, nor in your best performances, yet, if you breathe and follow after it, if the pulse of the heart beat thus, if the main current of your affections be toward purity, if sin be in you as your disease and greatest grief, and not as your delight, then, take courage: you are as pure as travellers can be; and notwithstanding that impure spirit, Satan, and the impurity of your own spirits, vex you daily with temptations, and often foil you, yet, in despite of them all, you shall arrive safe at home where perfection dwells.

The wisdom from above is pure.] Be ashamed, then, of your extreme folly, you that take pleasure in any kind of uncleanness. Especially, seeing God hath reformed and purged his house among us, you that are, or should be, his living temples, remain not unreformed. If you do, church-reformation will be so far from profiting you, that as a clearer light, it will but serve to make your impurity both more visible and more inexcusable. If you mean that the Holy Ghost should dwell with you, entertain him, avoiding both spiritual and fleshly pollutions. The word he used doth more particularly signify chastity; and certainly, wherever this wisdom from above is, this comely grace is one of her attendants. Whatever any have been in times past, let all be persuaded henceforth to mortify all lustful and carnal affections. Know that there is more true and lasting pleasure in the contempt of unlawful pleasures, than in the enjoyment of them. Grieve not, then, the good Spirit of God with actions or speeches, yea, or with thoughts that are impure. The unholy soul, like the mystical Babylon, makes itself a cage of unclean birds, and a habitation of filthy spirits; and if it continues to be such, it must, when it dislodges, take up its habitation with cursed spirits for ever in utter darkness. But as for those that are sincerely and affectionately pure, that is, pure in heart, our Savior hath pronounced their begun happiness—Blessed are they that are pure in heart, and assured them of full happiness—for they shall see God. This wisdom is sent from heaven on purpose to guide the elect thither by the way of purity. And mark how well their reward is suited to their labor!—their frequent contemplating and beholding of God's purity as they could, while they were on their journey, and their laboring to be like him, shall bring them to sit down in glory, and to be for ever the pure beholders of that purest object. They shall see God. What this is, we can not tell you, nor can you conceive it; but walk heavenward in purity, and long to be there, where you shall know what it means: For you shall see him as he is.

Now to that blessed Trinity be praise for ever!

SERMON II.

THE PATIENT AND DOCILE SUFFERER.

I will return to my place, saith the Lord by his prophet, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face. In their affliction they will seek me early. Hos. v. 15. The Father of mercies hides himself from his children, not to lose them, but that they may seek him, and may learn, having found him, to keep closer by him than formerly. He threatens them, to keep them from punishment: if his threatening work submission, it is well; if not, he punishes them gently, to save them from destruction. He seeks no more but that they acknowledge their offence, and seek his face. Wonderful clemency! For who can forbear to confess multitudes of offences, who know themselves? And who can choose but seek thy face, who ever saw thy face, and who know thee? In their affliction they will seek me early. He that prays not till affliction comes and forces him to it, is very slothful; but he that prays not in affliction, is altogether senseless. Certainly, they that at this time are not more than ordinarily fervent in prayer, or do not at least desire and strive to be so, can not well think that there is any spiritual life within them. Surely it is high time to stir up ourselves to prayers and tears. All may bear arms in that kind of service. Weak women may be strong in prayer; and those tears wherein they usually abound upon other occasions, can not be so well spent as this way. Let them not run out in howlings and impatience, but bring them, by bewailing sins, private as well as public, to quench this public fire. And, ye men, yea, ye men of courage, account it no disparagement thus to weep. We read often of David's tears, which were no stain to his valor. That cloud which hangs over us, which the frequent vapors of our sins have made, except it dissolve and fall down again in these sweet showers of godly tears, is certainly reserved to be the matter of a dreadful storm. Be instant, every one, in secret, for the averting of this wrath, and let us now again unite the cries of our hearts for this purpose to our compassionate God, in the name and mediation of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ.

JOB xxxiv. 31, 32.

Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more. That which I see not, teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more.

THE great sin, as well as the great misery of man, is, the forgetting of God; and the great end and use of his works and of his word, is, to teach us the right remembrance and consideration of him in all estates. These words do particularly instruct us in the application of our thoughts toward him in the time of affliction. The shortness and the various signification of the words used in the original, give occasion to some other readings and another sense of them. But this we have in our translation, being not only very profitable, but very congruous, both to the words of the primitive text, and to the contexture of the discourse, I shall keep to it, without dividing your thoughts by the mentioning of any other. Neither will I lead you so far about, as to speak of the great dispute of this book, and the question about it which is held. He that speaks here, though the youngest of the company, yet, as a wise and calm-spirited man, closes all with a discourse of excellent temper, and full of grave, useful instructions, among which this is one.

Surely it is meet to be said (or spoken) to God.] This speaking to God, though it may be vocal, yet it is not necessarily nor chiefly so, but is always mainly, and may often be only, mental: without this, the words of the mouth, how well chosen and well expressed soever they be, are to God of no account or signification at all. But if the heart speak, even when there is not a word in the mouth, it is that he hearkens to, and regards that speech, though made by a voice that none hears but he, and in a language that none understands but he.

But it is a rare, unfrequent thing, this communing of the heart with God, speaking its thoughts to him concerning itself, and concerning him, and his dealings with it, and the purposes and intentions it hath toward him—which is the speech here recommended, and is that Divine exercise of meditation and soliloquy of the soul with itself and with God, hearkening what the Lord God speaks to us within us, and our hearts echoing and resounding his words (as Psalm xxvii. 8, 9), and opening to him our thoughts of them and of ourselves. Though they stand open, and he sees them all, even when we tell him not of them, yet, because he loves us, he loves to hear them of our own speaking: Let me hear thy voice, for it is sweet; as a father delights in the little stammering, lisping language of his beloved child. And if the reflex affection of children be in us, we shall love also to speak with our Father, and to tell him all our mind, and to be often with him in the entertainments of our secret thoughts.

But the most of men are little within: either they wear out their hours in vain discourse with others, or possibly vainer discourses with themselves. Even those who are not of the worst sort, and who, possibly, have their times of secret prayer, yet do not so delight to think of God, and to speak with him, as they do to be conversant in other affairs, and companies, and discourses, in which there is a great deal of froth and emptiness. Men think, by talking of many things, to be refreshed; and yet, when they have done, find that it is nothing, and that they had much better have been alone, or have said nothing. Our thoughts and speeches, in most things, run to waste, yea, are defiled; as water spilt on the ground is both lost, and can not be gathered up again, and is polluted, mingled with dust. But no word spoken to God, from the serious sense of a holy heart, is lost: he receives it, and returns it into our bosom with advantage. A soul that delights to speak to him, will find that he also delights to speak to it. And this communication, certainly, is the sweetest and happiest choice; to speak little with men, and much with God. One short word, such as this here, spoken to God in a darted thought, eases the heart more when it is afflicted, than the largest discourses and complainings to the greatest and powerfulest of men, or the kindest and most friendly. It gives not only ease, but joy, to say to God, I have sinned, yet I am thine; or, as here, I have borne chastisement, I will no more offend. The time of affliction is peculiarly a time of speaking to God; and such speech as this is peculiarly befitting such a time. And this is one great recommendation of affliction, that it is a time of wiser and more sober thoughts—a time of the returning of the mind inward and upward. A high place, fulness and pleasure, draw the mind more outward. Great light and white colors dissipate the sight of the eye, and the very thoughts of the mind too; and men find that the night is a fitter season for deep thoughts. It is better, says Solomon, to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting. Those blacks made the mind more serious. It is a rare thing to find much retirement unto God, much humility and brokenness of spirit, true purity and spirituality of heart, in the affluence and great prosperities of the world. It is no easy thing to carry a very full cup even, and to digest well the fatness of a great estate and great place. They are not to be envied who have them: even though they be of the better sort of men, it is a thousand to one but they shall be losers by the gains and advancements of this world, suffering proportionably great abatements of their best advantages, by their prosperity. The generality of men, while they are at ease, do securely neglect God, and little mind either to speak to him, or to hear him speak to them. God complains thus of his own people: I spoke to them in their prosperity, and they would not hear. The noises of coach-wheels, of their pleasures, and of their great affairs, so fill their ears, that the still voice wherein God is, can not be heard. I will bring her into the wilderness, and there I will speak to her heart, says God of his church. There the heart is more at quiet to hear God, and to speak to him, and is disposed to speak in the style here prescribed, humbly and repentingly.

I have borne chastisement.] The speaking this unto God under affliction signifies, that our affliction is from his hand; and to the acknowledgment of this truth, the very natural consciences of men do incline them. Though trouble be the general lot of mankind, yet it doth not come on him by an providential fatality: though man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward, yet it cries not out of the dust. Job v. 6, 7. It is no less true, and in itself no less clear, that all the good we enjoy, and all the evil we suffer, come from the same Hand; but we are naturally more sensible of evil than of good, and therefore do more readily reflect upon the original and causes of it. Our distresses lead us to the notice of the righteous God inflicting them, and of our own unrighteous ways procuring them, and provoking him so to do; and therefore it is meet to speak in this submissive, humble language to him. It is by all means necessary to speak to him. He is the party we have to deal withal, or to speak to, even in those afflictions whereof men are the intervenient visible causes. They are, indeed, but instrumental causes, the rod and staff in his hand who smites us; therefore our business is with him, in whose Supreme Hand alone the mitigations and increases, the continuance and the ending, of our troubles lie. Who gave Jacob to the spoil, and Israel to the robbers? Did not the Lord, against whom we have sinned? Isa. xlii. 24. So, Lam. i. 14, The yoke of my transgressions is bound on by his hand. Therefore, it is altogether necessary in all afflictions to speak to him. And as it is necessary to speak to him, so it is meet to speak thus to him, I have borne chastisement, I will no more offend. These words have in them the true composition of real repentance, humble submission and holy resolution. I have borne chastisement—that is, I have justly borne it, and do heartily submit to it; I bear it justly, and take it well; Lord, I acquit thee, and accuse myself. This language becomes the most innocent persons in the world in their suffering. Job knew it well, and did often acknowledge it in his preceding speeches. Though sometimes, in the heat of dispute, and in opposition to the uncharitable and unjust imputations of his friends, he seems to overstrain the assertion of his own integrity (which Elihu here corrects), you know he cries out, I have sinned against thee: what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? Job vii. 20. And chap. ix. 30, If I wash myself with snow-water, and make my hands never so clean, yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me.

Vain, foolish persons fret and foam at the miscarriage of a cause they apprehend to be righteous; but this is a great vanity and inconsiderate temerity in not observing the great and apparent unrighteousness in the persons managing it. But though both the cause and the persons were just to the greatest height imaginable among men, yet still were it meet to speak thus unto God in the lowest acknowledgments and confessions, that righteousness belongs unto him, and unto us shame and confusion of face. So says the Church, Lam. iii. The Lord is righteous, for I have rebelled against his commandments. Though affliction is not always designedly intended as the chastisement of some particular sin, yet, where sin is (and that is the case of all the sons of Adam), affliction coming in, may safely be considered in its natural cognation and alliance with sin, and so press forth humble confessions of sin, and resolutions against it. And thus in Lev. xxvi. 41, They shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity; shall take it humbly and penitently, and kiss the rod.

Oh, that there were such a heart in us!—that, instead of empty words, that scatter themselves in the wind, our many vain discourses we hold one with another, concerning our past and present sufferings, and further fears, and disputing of many fruitless and endless questions, we were more abundantly turning our speech this way, in unto God, and saying, We desire to give thee glory, and to take shame to ourselves, and to bear our chastisement, and to offend no more; to return each from his evil way; and to gain this by the furnace, the purging away of our dross—our many great iniquities—our oaths and cursings, and lying—our deceit, and oppressions, and pride, and covetousness—our base love of ourselves and hating one another—that we may be delivered from the tyranny of our own lusts and passions; and, in other things, let the Lord do with us as seems good in his eyes. Oh, that we were speaking to God in Ephraim's words, Jer. xxxi. 18, 19, 20: Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised: Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, &c.: words not unlike these would stir his bowels, as there: as it is said, that one string perfectly tuned to another, being touched, the other stirs of itself. When a stubborn child leaves struggling under the rod, and turns to entreating, the father then leaves off striking; nothing overcomes him but that. When a man says unto God, "Father, I have provoked thee to this; but pardon, and through thy grace I will do so no more;

then the rod is thrown aside, and the Father of mercies and his humbled child fall to mutual tenderness and embraces.

What I see not, teach thou me.] The great article of conversion is, the disengagement of the heart from the love of sin. In that posture, as it actually forsakes whatsoever it perceives to be amiss, so it stands in an absolute readiness to return to every duty that yet lies hidden, upon the first discovery. That is here the genuine voice of a repentant sinner, What I see not, teach thou me: if I have done iniquity, I will do no more.

This is a very necessary supplication, even for the most discerning and clearest-sighted penitent, both in reference to the commandment and rule for discovering the general nature and several kinds of sin, and withal for the application of this general light to the examination of a man's own heart and ways, that so he may have a more exact and particular account of his own sins.

The former part of the petition is for the knowledge of the law of God, as the rule by which a man is to try and to judge himself. The most knowing are not above the need of this request; yea, I am persuaded, the most knowing know best how much they need it, and are most humbled in themselves in the conscience of their ignorance and darkness in divine things, and are most earnest and pressing in this daily supplication for increases of light and spiritual knowledge from him who is the fountain of it: What I see not, teach thou me. On the other side, the least knowing are often the most confident that they know all, and swelled with a conceited sufficiency of their model and determination of all things, both dogmatical and practical: and therefore are they the most imperious and magisterial in their conclusions, and the most impatient of contradiction, or even of the most modest dissent.

The wisest and holiest persons speak always in the humblest and most depressing style of their own knowledge, and that not with an affectation of modesty, but under a real sense of the thing as it is, and the sincere account they give of it, and that commonly when they are declaring themselves most solemnly, as in the sight of God, or speaking in supplication to him with whom they dare least of all dissemble. Whosoever he was that spake those words, in the thirtieth chapter of Proverbs, surely he was a man of eminent wisdom and piety, and yet he begins thus: Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man; I have neither learned wisdom, nor have I the knowledge of the Holy. And though he was so diligent a student, and so great a proficient in the law of God, yet, how importunate a petitioner is he for the understanding of it, as if he knew nothing at all! Besides the like expressions in other psalms, in that one psalm [the cxix.], which, although of such length, hath nothing but the breathing forth of his affection to the word and law of God, how often doth David in it reiterate that petition, Teach me thy statutes!—so often, that a carnal mind is tempted to grow weary of it, as a nauseating tautology; but he made it still new with the freshness and vehemency of his affection: Make me to understand the way of thy precepts—Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law—and open thou mine eyes, that I may see the wonders of thy law—unseal mine eyes, as if they were still veiled and dark. These are the earnest and nobly ambitious desires that daily solicit holy hearts, and stir them up to solicit the Teacher of hearts to be admitted more into the secrets and recesses of divine knowledge; not to those abysses that God intends should be secret still, and from which he hath barred out our curiosity, as the forbidden tree of knowledge, those secrets that belong to himself alone, and concern us not to inquire after. And certainly, to be wading in those deeps, is the way to be drowned in them. The searcher of majesty shall be oppressed with glory. Yet there is in man a perverse, preposterous desire to pore upon such things as are on purpose hidden that we should not inquire after them, and to seek after useless, empty speculations of them, which is a luxury and intemperance of the understanding, like unto that, and springing from that, which at first undid us in the root. These are times full of those empty, airy questions, and notions in which there is no clearness nor certainty to be attained, and if it were, yet it would serve to little or no purpose, not making the man who thinks he hath found them out, one jot the better or holier man than he was before. What avails it, says a devout author, to dispute and discourse high concerning the Trinity, and want humility, and so displease that Trinity? The light and knowledge suited according to the intendment of this copy, is of nature, such as purifies the heart and rectifies the life. What I see not, teach thou me; that is, of such things as may serve this end, that if I have done iniquity, I may do it no more. This is sound and solid knowledge, such a light as inflames the heart with the love of God and of the beauties of holiness, and still, as it grows, makes those to grow likewise. Such are still, we see, David's multiplied supplications in that cxix. Psalm: not to know reserved and useless things, but, Hide not thy commandments from me. Thy hands have made me and fashioned me: now, what is it that thy creature and workmanship begs of thee? What is that which will complete my being and make me do honor to my Maker? This is it—Give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments.

You that would be successful supplicants in this request, wean your hearts from that vanity of desire: such knowledge as is the cypress-tree, fair and tall, but fruitless and sapless. Apply all you know, to the purging out of sin, and intend all the further knowledge you desire, to that same end. Seek to be acquainted with higher rules of mortification, and self-denial, and charity, than as yet you have either practised, or possibly so much as thought on; that by these, your affections and actions may be advanced to greater degrees of purity, and conformity with the holiness of God. And for this end, beg of him to teach you what you see not in the exactness of the law and rule; and withal (which is the other thing in this word), that, what you see not in the application of it and search of yourself, he would likewise show you; for in that, we are commonly as undiscerning and dim-sighted as in the other. Even where men have some notion of the rule and their duty, yet they perceive not their own, even their gross recessions and declinings from it. Love is a blinding thing, and above all love, self-love; and every man is naturally his own flatterer: he deals not faithfully and sincerely with himself in the search of his own evils. Now this we are to entreat of God, to be led into ourselves, and to be applied to the work of self-searching, by his own hand; not only to have a right apprehension of the law given us, but a true sight of ourselves. Oh! how many hidden, undiscerned, yea, unsuspected impurities and follies are there in the hearts of those who are the most diligent in this inquiry, much more in the greater part, even of such as can not absolutely be denied the name of good men! Some honest intentions and good desires there are in them; but they are slothful and unwilling to go into this painful business of trying and judging themselves, and when they set to it, many secret corners, and in those, many latent corruptions do escape their search. Cleanse me from secret faults, says David; that is, not only from those hidden from men, but even from myself, as is clearly his meaning, by the words preceding. Who knows the errors of his life? Therefore is it necessary that we desire light of God. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord, says Solomon, searching the innermost parts of the belly; but it is a candle unlighted, when he does not illuminate it for that search. Oh! what a deal of vanity and love of this world, envy and secret pride, lurks in many of our hearts, which we do not at all perceive, till God causeth us to see it, leading us in, as he did the prophet Ezekiel in the vision, to see the idolatry of the Jews in his very temple, by which they had provoked him to forsake it, and go far from his sanctuary; and having discovered one parcel, leads him in farther, and makes him enter through the wall, and adds often. Son of man hast thou seen these? I will cause thee to see yet more abominations, and yet more abominations. Thus it is within many of us who should be his temples, but we have a multitude of images of jealousy, one lying hid behind another, till he thus discovers them to us. Oh, what need have we to entreat him thus, What I see not, teach thou me!

Now, in both these, both in the knowledge of our rule and of ourselves, though there may be some useful subserviency of the ministry of men, yet, the great Teacher of the true knowledge of his law, and of himself, and of ourselves, is God. Men may speak to the ear, but his chair is in heaven who teaches hearts: cathedram habet in cælo. Matchless Teacher! who teacheth more in one hour than men can do in a whole age, who can cure the invincible unteachableness of the dullest heart, give understanding to the simple, and open the eyes of the blind! So then, would we be made wise, wise for eternity, learned in real, living divinity, let us sit down at his feet, and make this our continual request, What I see not, teach thou me?

If I have done iniquity.] That is, any iniquity that I yet know not of, any hidden sin, let me but once see it, and, I hope, thou shalt see it no more within me; not willingly lodged and entertained. This speaks an entire, total giving up of all sin, and is a proclaiming of utter defiance and enmity against it; casting out what is already found out, without delay, and resolving that still in further search, as it shall be more discovered, it shall be forthwith dislodged, without a thought of sparing or partial indulgence to anything that is sin, or that is like it, or that may any way befriend it, or be an occasion and incentive of it. This is that absolute renouncing of sin, and surrender of the whole soul and our whole selves to God, which whosoever do not heartily consent to and resolve on, their religion is in vain, and (which is here the point) their affliction is in vain: whatsoever they have suffered, they have gained nothing by all their sufferings, if their hearts remain still self-willed, stubborn, untamed, and unpliant, to God. And this makes their miseries out of measure miserable, and their sins out of measure sinful: whereas, were it thus qualified, and had it any operation this way toward the subjecting of their hearts unto God, affliction were not to be called misery, but would go under the title of a blessedness: Blessed is the man whom thou correctest and teachest him out of thy law. That is suiting with this here desired, I have borne chastisement; what I see not, teach thou me; and if I have done iniquity, I will do it no more. Oh! were it thus with us, my brethren, how might we rejoice, and insert into our praises all that is come upon us, if it had wrought or advanced any thing of this kind within us, this blessed complacency with the will of God: not entertaining anything knowingly that displeases him; finding a pleasure in the denial and destruction of our own most beloved pleasures at his appointment and for his sake. Whatsoever is in us, and dearest to us, that would offend us, that would draw us to offend him, were it the right hand, let it be cut off; or the right eye, let it be plucked out: or, to make shorter work, let the whole man die at once, crucified with Jesus, that we may be henceforth dead to sin, dead to the world, dead to ourselves, and alive only to God.

SERMON III.

THE DIVINE GLORY OF SION.

THERE is no exercise so delightful to those that are truly godly, as the solemn worship of God, if they find his powerful and sensible presence in it; and indeed there is nothing on earth more like to heaven than that is. But when he withdraws himself, and withholds the influence and breathings of his spirit in his service, then good souls find nothing more lifeless and uncomfortable. But there is this difference, even at such a time, between them and those that have no spiritual life in them at all, that they find, and are sensible of this difference; whereas the others know not what it means. And for the most part, the greatest number of those that meet together with a profession to worship God, yet are such as do not understand this difference. Custom and formality draw many to the ordinary places of public worship, and fill too much of the room; and sometimes novelty and curiosity, drawing to places not ordinary, have a large share: but how few are there that come on purpose to meet with God in his worship, and to find his power in strengthening their weak faith, and weakening their strong corruptions, affording them provision of spiritual strength and comfort against times of trial, and, in a word, advancing them some steps forward in their journey toward heaven, where happiness and perfection dwell! Certainly, these sweet effects are to be found in these ordinances, if we would look after them. Let it grieve us then, that we have so often lost our labor in the worship of God through our own neglect, and entreat the Lord, that at this time he would not send us away empty. For how weak soever the means be, if he put forth his strength, the work shall be done, in some measure, to his glory and our edification. Now that he may be pleased to do so, to leave a blessing behind him, let us pray, &c.

ISAIAH xxviii. 5, 6.

In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty unto the residue of his people.
And for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment, and for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate.

ALL the works of Divine Providence are full of wisdom and justice, even every one severally considered; yet we observe them best to be such, when we take notice of their order and mutual aspect one to another, whether in the succession of times, or such passages as are contemporary and fall in together at one and the same time. As, when the Lord brings notable judgments upon the proud workers of iniquity, and at the same time confers special mercies on his own people, who is there that may not perceive justice and mercy illustrating and beautifying one another? It is true, the full reward and perfect rest of the godly is not here below; they would be sorry if it were: nor is this the place of plenary punishment for the ungodly; men may look for a judgment too. Yet, the Lord is pleased at sometimes to give some resemblances and pledges, as it were, of that great and last judgment in remarkable passages of justice and mercy, at one and the same time; and such a time it is that the prophet foretells in this his sermon, which concerns the two sister kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Having denounced a heavy calamity to come upon Israel, under the name of Ephraim, he comforts those of Judah under the name of the residue of his people. They not being so grossly corrupted as the others were, he stays them with this promise: In that day, saith he, when the other shall be overwhelmed, as with a deluge, the Lord of hosts shall be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty unto the residue of his people.

The promise is made up of three benefits, yet the three are but one; or rather, one is all the three to them: The Lord of hosts, it is he that shall be their honor, wisdom, and strength; he shall be a crown, &c. But first, a word as to the circumstance of time, In that day.

That sovereign Lord, who at first set up the lights of heaven to distinguish times and seasons by their constant motion, and likewise by his supreme providence ruling the world, hath fixed the periods of states and kingdoms, and decreed their revolutions, their rising, ascending, and their height, with their decline and setting, hath by a special providence determined those changes and vicissitudes that befall his church. That which the psalmist speaks, in his own particular, Psalm xxxi. 15, holds of each believer, and of the church which they make up in all ages and places: I said, Thou art my God, my times are in thy hand. A sure and steady hand indeed, and therefore he builds his confidence upon it, ver. 13. They took counsel against me, but I trusted in thee. And upon this, he prays in faith, that the face of God may shine upon him, and the wicked may be ashamed.

Thus, then as many of you as are looking after a day of mercy to the church of God, pray and believe upon this ground, That the time of it is neither in the frail hands of those that favor and seek it, nor in the hands of those that oppose it, how strong and subtle soever they be, but in HIS almighty hand, who doth in heaven and earth what pleaseth him. If he have said, Now, and here, will I give a day of refreshment to my people, who have long groaned for it, a day of the purity and power of religion; if, I say, this be his purpose, they must have somewhat more than omnipotence, who can hinder it. When his appointed time comes, to make a day of deliverance dawn upon his church, after their long night either of affliction or of defection, or both; they who contrive against that day-spring, are as vain as if they would sit down to plot how to hinder the sun from rising in the morning. And they who let go their hopes of it, because of great apparent difficulties that interpose between their eye and the accomplishment of that work, are as weak as if they should imagine, when mists and thick vapors appear about the horizon in the morning, that these could hinder the rising of the sun, which is so far out of their reach, and comes forth as a bridegroom, and rejoices as a mighty man to run his race, says David. Those mists may indeed hinder his clear appearance, and keep it from the eye for a time; but reason tells us, even then, that they can not stop his course. And faith assures us no less in the other case, that no difficulties can hold back God's day and work of mercy to his people. But you will say, All the difficulty is, to know whether the appointed time be near or not. It is true, we have no particular prophecies to assure us; but certainly, when God awakes his children and makes them rise, this is a probable sign that it is near day. I mean, when he stirs them up to more than usual hopes, and prayers, and endeavors, it is very likely that he intends them some special good. But yet more, when he himself is arisen (as it pleaseth him to speak), that is, when he is begun to appear, in a more than ordinary manner of working by singular and wonderful footsteps of providence, this is, no doubt, a sign that he will go on to show remarkable mercy to Sion, and that the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come. Ps. cii. 13.

Howsoever then, let the wonderful workings of the Lord move those of you that have any power and opportunity, to be now (if ever) active for the greatest good both of the present age and of posterity. And you that can be no other way useful, yet you shall be no small helpers if you be much in prayer; let both your hopes and your fears serve to sharpen your prayers. Be not too much dejected with any discouragement, neither be ye carnally lifted up with outward appearances; for the heart of him that is lifted up, is not upright in him, Hab. ii. 4; but live, as the just do, by your faith. And if the deferring of your hopes should sicken your hearts, as Solomon speaks, yet, stay and comfort them with the cordial of the promises. This you are sure of, you have God's own word engaged for it, that in those latter days Babylon shall be brought to the dust, and the true church of Christ shall flourish and increase. And this vision is for an appointed time (as Habakkuk says of his); at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it, it will surely come, it will not tarry.

In that day.] That is, in the day of Ephraim's or Israel's calamity denounced in the former verses; which, as most do conceive, was when the Assyrian oppressed them, and in the end led them captive, in the reign of Hosea, as you have the history of it, 2 Kings xvii., at which time Hezekiah was king of Judah, as you find in the following chapter: and in that notable reformation wrought by him, with those blessings that followed upon it, is found the accomplishment of this promise to Judah, In that day, &c. The parallel of God's different dealing with these two kingdoms at the time there specified (in that day), does afford divers lessons, which might be here not impertinently taken notice of. Only this:

Though Judah also had its own corruptions when Hezekiah came to the crown, yet it pleased the Lord to spare them and work a peaceable reformation, making Israel's punishment their warning. Truly, that nation with whom the Lord deals thus graciously, is vilely ungrateful if they observe it not with much humility and thankfulness, and with profit too. If the Lord should answer your desires and hopes with a reformation in a peaceable way, and should yet lengthen out your long-continued peace, and should make this little past shaking of it cause it to take root the faster; if he should, I say, do this, where would ye find fit praises for such a wonder of mercy? especially considering, that in the meanwhile he hath made other reformed churches fields of blood, and made, as it were, the sound of their stripes preach repentance to us. But certainly, if the hearing the voice of the rod prevail not, we shall feel the smart of it, as this people of Judah did afterward, because they were not so wise as to become wiser and better by Israel's folly and calamity. We are expecting great things at our Lord's hands, and our provocations and sins against him are great; yet there is no one of them all puts us in so much danger of disappointment, as impenitence. Were there more repentance and personal reformation among us, we might take it as a hopeful forerunner of that public reformation which so many seem now to desire.

The Lord of hosts.] This style of his, you know, is frequent in the prophets, in their predictions of mercy and judgment; intimating both his greatness and majesty, and his supreme power for accomplishing his word. No created power can resist him; yea, all must serve him. The most excellent creatures can have no greater honor: the greatest are not exempted, nor the meanest excluded from serving him. In Acts xii. 23, you find one of the noblest creatures, and a number of the vilest, made use of at the same time in the same service. Because Herod did accept of the sacrilege of the people, and gave not back to this Lord of hosts his own glory, the angel of the Lord smote him, and the vermin devoured him. And in Egypt, you know the employing of the destroying angel, and what variety of hosts this Lord of hosts did employ to plague them. What madness, then, is it to oppose and encounter this great General!—even in doubtful cases, to run on blindly, without examining, lest peradventure a man should be found a fighter against God. And on the other side, it is great weakness to admit any fear under his banner. If a man could say, when he was told of the multitude of the ships the enemy had, Against how many do ye reckon me? how much more justly may we reckon this Lord of hosts, against multitudes of enemies, how great soever! They are to him as the drop of a bucket, and the smallest dust of the balance. It is ignorance and mean thoughts of this mighty Lord, that make his enemies so confident; and it is the same evil, in some degree, or, at the best, forgetfulness of his power, that causeth diffidence in his followers. I, even I, am he that comforteth you: who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die, and forgettest the Lord, thy Maker. Isa. li. 12, 13. Now this same Lord of hosts, you know, is likewise called the God of peace: he is indeed, et pace et bello insignis, splendid both in peace and war. The blessing of peace, and the success of war, are both from him; and to him alone is due the praise of both.

Shall be for a crown of glory.] He shall dignify and adorn them by his special presence: to wit, in the purity of his ordinances and religion among them; the profession and flourishing of that, shall be their special glory and beauty. For, as the other two benefits concern their civil good, justice flourishing within, and wealth and opulence from without, so, doubtless, this first, this glory and beauty, is religion, as the chiefest of the three, and the other two are its attendants. In Ps. xxvi. 8, the sanctuary, the place of their solemn worship, is called the place where God's honor dwelleth, or the tabernacle of his honor, and, Psalm xvi. 9, the glorious sanctuary, or the beauty of holiness. And the ark of God, you know, was called the glory. The glory is departed from Israel (said the wife of Phineas), for the ark of God is taken. 1 Samuel iv. 21. Pure religion and a pure worship is the glory of God among his people, and, consequently, their glory. Now, referring this prophecy to Hezekiah's time, the accomplishment of it is evident, in that work of reformation whereof you have the full history, 2 Chron. xxix. 30, &c.

If it be thus, that the purity of religion and worship is the crown and glory of a people; and therefore, on the other side, that their deepest stain of dishonor and vileness is the vitiating of religion with human devices; then, to contend for the preservation or the reformation of it, is noble and worthy of a Christian. It is for the crown of Jesus Christ, which is likewise a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty to them, he being their head.

It is, indeed, the true glory both of kings and their kingdoms. Labor, then, for constancy in this work: let no man take your crown from you. You know how busy the emissaries of the church of Rome have been to take it from us, or, at least, to pick the diamonds out of it, and put in false, counterfeit ones in their places. I mean, they stole away the power of religion, and filled up the room with shadows and fopperies of their own devising. It is the vanity of that church to think they adorn the worship of God when they dress it up with splendor in her service, which, though some magnify it so much, yet may most truly be called a glistening slavery and captivity. Then is she truly free, and wears her crown, when the ordinances of God are conformable to his own appointment. It is vanity in man, I say, when they dress it up with a multitude of gaudy ceremonies, and make it the smallest part of itself; whereas, indeed, its true glory consists not in pomp, but in purity and simplicity. In the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, we find the church, under the name of a woman, richly attired, indeed, but her ornaments be all heavenly; the sun her clothing, and her crown of twelve stars. Needs she, then, borrow sublunary glory? No, she treads upon it: the moon is under her feet. There is another woman, indeed, in that same book, arrayed in purple and scarlet, decked with gold and precious stones, and having a golden cup in her hand, but that golden cup is full of abominations and filthiness, and she herself the mother of abominations. Apoc. xvii. 4. The natural man judges according to his reach; but to a spiritual eye there is a most genuine beauty in the service of God, and the government of his house; and when they are nearest to the rule, the word of God, then it is that the Lord himself is the crown and diadem of his church.

[A crown of glory.] Again: we may consider this personally, as belonging in particular to every believer. They are all made kings and priests unto God the Father. Apoc. i. 6. They are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, 1 Peter ii. 9, how despicable soever to the world. This is their dignity: the Lord is their crown and diadem. He subdues their lusts, and makes them kings over their own affections, and more than conquerors over all troubles and persecutions; whereas carnal men are continually hurried, like slaves, unto base employments, still kept tolling in the ignoble service of their own lusts. They think, indeed, it is their liberty; but that is a baseness of spirit that complies so well with so vile and servile a condition. And whereas they judge the godly to be the refuse and dross of the earth, and the proper objects of contempt, this is because this their crown, though most glorious, is invisible to the eye of nature. The Lord is a crown. If they knew what this is, they would see enough in it to countervail their outward meanness and the reproaches the world cast on them: as the Apostle St. Peter hath it, 1 Peter iv. 14, If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth on you. He is their crown.

And observe, how this crown is opposed to that blasted glory and fading crown of pride, spoken of in the former verses. Wo to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower.

Who is there that sees not, in daily experience, the vanity and inconstancy of worldly glory, and yet how few are there that wean themselves from it, and learn to disdain it! Still men dote upon that which is not, upon a shadow, a nothing. But would you have a glory that fadeth not, a garland that can not wither, make the Lord your crown and your glory; and if he be so, glory in him, and in nothing else. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches; but let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth ME. Jer. ix. 23, 24.

You that are noble, aspire to this crown, as being so far above your perishing honors and bounded powers. And you that are outwardly meaner and lower, see how little cause you have to complain of your condition, seeing you are not debarred from this best and greatest honor. And, that you may discern aright what it is, know that it consists in the renovation of God's image within you, which is in holiness and righteousness: so the Lord becomes your crown in the kingdom of grace. And by this you may discover whether or no you have attained it: if you can yet delight to wallow in the puddle and pleasures of sin, you are far from this royal condition; but if you find your soul possessed with the love of holiness, and that you are trampling upon profane delights, this may persuade you that God hath enabled you, and crowned you with his grace, and will crown you with his glory. Again, try it by this; if the Lord is become your crown and your glory, you will glory in him, and in nothing else. Though you be wise, you will not glory in your wisdom, nor in strength, nor in riches, nor in honors, though you had them all; but if you glory, you will glory in the Lord. And withal, your highest joy will be to see the advancement of his glory, and, if you can, to be any way serviceable to the advancing of it.

[And for a spirit of judgment.] Both to those that sit in judgment, and to the people. For justice is the strongest base and establishment of authority. And withal, the influence of it is most sweet and comfortable to those who are under authority; and where it is wanting, that order and relation of superiors and inferiors, which God hath appointed in the societies of men for their good, tends exceedingly to the damage of both. And therefore, where God intendeth to continue the peace and welfare of a people, he is liberal in pouring out much of this spirit of judgment on those who sit in judgment. On the contrary, it is for a heavy punishment, when he withdraws his Spirit from rulers, and leaves them wholly to the corruption and vanity of their own spirits.

To him that sitteth in judgment. That is, to all that are in places of authority and judicature, from the supreme to the lowest magistrate; for this concerns them all. For they be all raised in their subordination, and several places above the people, for the benefit and good of the people; as the stars, that be set so high, yet are placed there to be useful and beneficial to the inferior world.

Now this spirit of judgment comprehends in it both due wisdom and prudence, for the trial and right judging of affairs, and for the discerning between sound and perverse counsel; and, withal, a judgment practically good, that can not be biased from the straight line of equity and justice by any sinister respect.

Now, seeing the spirit of judgment is from the Lord, yea, he is this spirit, it ought to persuade those that sit in judgment, to entreat and pray for this, and to depend upon it, and beware of self-confidence. Trust in the Lord, saith Solomon, and lean not to thine own understanding: for if you do, it will prove but a broken reed. And as they that sit in judgment should entreat his Spirit by prayer, so, generally, all must share with them in this duty, and make supplication for all that are in authority over them, especially in extraordinary times. Truly we have matter of thankfulness, that the Lord hath in some measure inclined the royal heart of our sovereign to the desires of his people; and we ought still to pray that the Lord would give the king his judgments; and then, as the psalmist adds, The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness. Psalm lxxii. 3. And, for this end, let all who wish the public, yea, their own good, pray for abundance of this spirit of judgment to be conferred on them. Your eyes and expectations are upon them. If you would enjoy the lamp, you must pour in oil. This spirit, indeed, you can not pour upon them, but if you pour out many prayers, you may draw it from above: he will give it, who here promises to be a spirit of judgment.

And for strength. Observe, the way to be powerful and successful against foreign enemies, is, to have religion and justice flourishing at home. And truly, if it please our God to answer the desires of his people at this time, it may so unite the affection and strength of the two kingdoms (the Lord of hosts being their strength), as to make them a terror to their enemies: whereas they were become a scorn and derision to them. For your particular, labor to make the Lord your glory, to have Christ made unto you, as the apostle speaks, both wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, which are the glory and beauty of the soul, and redemption from spiritual enemies. Draw strength from him to fight and prevail against them, till, after the short combat of this life, you obtain the crown, and dwell in his presence, where you shall fear no more assaults, neither of sin nor of affliction, but shall be for ever happy in the blessed vision of his face. To him be glory. Amen.

SERMON IV.

CHRIST THE LIGHT AND LUSTRE OF THE CHURCH.

EXTERNAL worship doth openly acknowledge a Deity, but want of inward sense in worship secretly denieth it: the fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. It is strange to hear so much noise of religion in the world, and to find so little piety. To present the living God with a carcass of lifeless worship, is to pay him with shells of services, and so to mock him. And it is a more admirable long-suffering in him to defer the punishment of such devotion, than of all the other sins in the world. The Egyptian temples were rich and stately fabrics: a stranger who had looked upon them without, would have imagined some great deity within; but if they entered (as Lucian says, laughing at them), nothing was to be seen, but only some ape, or cat, or pied bull, or some other fine god like those. To behold our fair semblance of religion who frequent this house, it would appear that we were all the temples of the Holy Ghost; but whoso could look within us, would find in many of our hearts, lust, pride, avarice, or some such like secret vice adored as a god. And these are they which, while our bodies sit here, do alienate our souls from the service of the Eternal God, so that we are either altogether senseless and dead before him, or, if any fit of spiritual motion rise within us, we find it here, and here we leave it, as if it were sacrifice to take it home with us. But did once that Spirit of grace breathe savingly upon our souls, we should straight renounce and abhor those base idols, and then all the current of our affection would run more in this channel: our services would then be spiritual, and it would be our heaven upon earth, to view God in his sanctuary. And the obtaining of the change, is, or should be, the main end of this our meeting; and, that it may be the happy effect of it, our recourse must be to the throne of grace by humble prayer, in the name of our Mediator, Jesus Christ, the righteous.

ISAIAH lx. 1.

Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.

ADMIRABLE is the worth and depth of Divine providence! This, either we know not, or at least seldom remember. While we forget the wonders of providence, we direct our thoughts to baser objects, and think not on it; and while we forget the depth of providence (if at any time we look toward it), we judge rashly and think amiss of it. If this be true of that general providence whereby God rules the world, it is more true of his special providence toward his church. This is both the most excellent piece of it, and therefore best worth the reading, and also the hardest piece, and therefore it requires sobriety in judging: above all other things, he that suddenly judges in this, makes haste to err. To have a right view of it, it must be taken altogether, and not by parcels. Pieces of rarest artifice, while they are a making, seem little worth, especially to an unskilful eye, which, being completed, command admiration. Peter Martyr says well, De operibus Dei, antequam actum, non est judicandum: There is no judging of the works of God, before they are finished. There is a time when the daughters of Zion embrace the dunghill and sit desolate in the streets, as Jeremiah hath it in his Lamentations (iv. 5), and at that same time the voice of Babylon is, I sit as a queen and shall see no sorrow. Apoc. xviii. 7; Isa. xlvii. 7. All is out of order here. But if we stay awhile, we shall see Sion and Babylon appointed to change seats, by the great Master of the world: Come down, says he, Daughter of Babylon, and sit in the dust. Isa. xlvii. 1. And here, to Sion, Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. It is an entire catastrophe: both parties find a notable alteration together. That same hand that exalts the one, ruins the other. When the sun rises upon the church, her antipodes must needs be covered with darkness: as we find it in the next verse to the text: Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee.

The prophet, elevated by the Spirit of God to a view of after ages as clear as if they were present, seems here to find his people sitting under the dark mantle of a sad and tedious night, and having long expected the sun's return in vain, before its time, they give over expectation when it is near them, and desperately fold themselves to lie perpetually in the dark. Now the prophet, standing as it were, awake upon some mountain, perceives the day approaching, and the golden chariots of the morning of deliverance hastening forward, and seems to come speedily with this glad news to a captive people, and sounds this trumpet in their ears, Arise, shine, for thy light is come. The very manner of expression is sudden and rousing, without a copulative; not, arise and shine, but, Arise, shine, &c.

The words have in them a clear stamp of relation to a low posture and obscure condition: they suppose a people lying or sitting without light. Deep distress is that dark foil that best sets off the lustre of marvellous deliverances; and among many other reasons of the church's vicissitudes, why may not this be one? The Lord is more illustrious in the world by that deep wisdom and great power that shines when he raises and restores her from desperate afflictions, than if he had still preserved her in constant ease. He seems sometimes careless of her condition, and regardless of her groans; but even then, is he waiting the most fit time to be gracious, as our prophet speaks. And when it is time, out of the basest estate he brings her forth more fresh, strong, and beautiful, than before. Though you have lain among the pots, yet ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. Psalm lxxviii. 13. Do with the church what you will, she shall come through, and that with advantage. Mergas profundo, pulchrior exilit, as one says of Rome. Keep the church seventy years captive, yet, after that, she shall arise and shine more glorious than ever.

But surely, the strain of this evangelic prophecy rises higher than any temporal deliverance. Therefore we must rise to some more spiritual sense of it, not excluding the former. And that which some call divers senses of the same scripture, is, indeed, but divers parts of one full sense. This prophecy is, out of question, a most rich description of the kingdom of Christ under the gospel. And in this sense, this invitation to arise and shine is mainly addressed to the mystical Jerusalem, yet not without some privilege to the literal Jerusalem beyond other people. They are first invited to arise and shine, because the sun arose first in their horizon. Christ came first of the Jews, and came first to them, The Redeemer shall come to Zion, says our prophet, in the former chapter. But miserable Jerusalem knew not the day of her visitation, nor the things that concerned her peace, and therefore are they now hid from her eyes. She delighted to deceive herself with fancies of I know not what imaginary grandeur and outward glory, to which the promised Messiah should exalt her, and did, in that kind particularly, abuse this very prophecy: so doting upon a sense grossly literal, she forfeited the enjoyment of those spiritual blessings that are here described. But undoubtedly, that people of the Jews shall once more be commanded to arise and shine, and their return shall be the riches of the Gentiles; and that shall be a more glorious time than ever the church of God did yet behold. Nor is there any inconvenience, if we think that the high expressions of this prophecy have some spiritual reference to that time, since the great doctor of the Gentiles applies some words of the former chapter to that purpose, Rom. xi. 29. They forget a main point of the church's glory, who pray not daily for the conversion of the Jews.

But to pass that, and insist on the spiritual sense of these words, as directed to the whole church of Christ, they contain a powerful excitement to a twofold act, enforced (as I conceive), by one reason under a twofold expression, neither of them superfluous, but each giving light to the other, and suiting very aptly with the two words of command: Arise, for the glory of the Lord is risen, and shine, for thy light is come.

I will not now subdivide these parts again, and cut them smaller, but will rather unite them again into this one proposition: The coming and presence of Christ engages all to whom he comes, to arise and shine. In this proposition may be considered, the nature of the duties, the universality of the subject, and the force of the reason.

I. The nature of the duties—what it is to arise and shine. Arising hath reference either to a fall, or to some contrary posture of sitting or lying, or to one of those two conditions which are so like one another, sleep, or death; and to all these, spiritually understood, may it here be referred. This is the voice of the gospel to the sons of Adam, arise; for in him they all fell. The first sin of that first man was the great fall of mankind: it could not but undo us, it was from so high a station. Our daily sins are our daily falls, and they are the fruits of that great one. Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity, says the Lord to his people, Hos. xiv. 1. As for those postures of sitting and lying, the Scripture makes use of them both to signify the state of sin. Says not St. John, The world lies in wickedness? 1 John v. 19. Are not the people said to sit in darkness, mentioned Matt. iv. 16? Which is directly opposite to arise and shine. In the darkness of Egypt, it is said, the people sat still; none arose from their places. In the gross mist of corrupt nature, man can not bestir himself to any spiritual action; but when this light is come, then he may, and should arise.

Now for sleep and death, sin is most frequently represented in holy writ under their black vizors. To forbear citing places where they are severally so used, we shall find them jointly in one, Ephes. v. 14: Arise, thou that sleepest, and stand up from the dead; which place seems to have special allusion to this very text.

The impenitent sinner is as one buried in sleep: his soul is in darkness, fit for sleep, and loves to be so. That he may sleep the sounder, he shuts all the passages of light, as enemies to his rest, and so, by close windows and curtains, makes an artificial night to himself within: not a beam appears there, though without the clear day of the gospel shines round about him. The senses of his soul, as we may call them, are all bound up, and are not exercised to discern good and evil, as the apostle speaks, Heb. v. 14. And his leading faculty, his understanding, is surcharged with sleepy vapors, that arise incessantly from the inferior part of his soul, his perverse affections. Nor hath his mind any other exercise, in his sleepy condition, than the vain business of dreaming. His most refined and wisest thoughts are but mere extravagancies from man's due end, and his greatest contentments nothing but golden dreams. Yet he is serious in them, and no wonder; for who can discern the folly of his own dream till he is awake? He that dreams he eateth, when he awakes, finds his soul empty, and not till then. Isa. xxix. 8. Now, while he thus sleeps, his great business lies by; yet spends he his hand-breadth of time as fast, while he is fast asleep, as if he were in continual employment. Judge, then, if it be not needful to bid this man arise.

Lastly, this voice may import, that man is spiritually dead. God is the life of the soul, as it is of the body: while he dwells there, it is both comely and active; but once destitute of his presence, it becomes a carcass, where, besides privation of life and motion, there is a positive filthiness, a putrefaction in the soul, unspeakably worse than that of dead bodies. Corruptio optimi pessima. And as dead bodies are removed from the sight of men, dead souls are cast out from the favorable sight of God, till Christ's saying, Arise, revives them. The ministers of the word are appointed to cry, Arise, indifferently to all that hear them; and Christ hath reserved this privilege and liberty, to join his effective voice when and to whom he pleases. A carnal man may show his teeth at this; but who is he that can, by any solid reason, charge absurdity upon this way of dispensing outward and inward vocation? I will not here mention their idle cavils. The Scripture is undeniably clear in this, that man is naturally dead in sin. The gospel bids him arise, and it is Christ that is his life, and that raises him.

Thus we see, in some measure, what it is for men to arise. Now being risen, they must shine, and that two ways; jointly and publicly, as they make up visible churches, and likewise personally, in their particular conversation. First, then, what is the shining of the true church? Doth not a church, then, shine, when church service is raised from a decent and primitive simplicity, and decorated with pompous ceremonies, with rich furniture and gaudy vestments? Is not the church, then, beautiful? Yes, indeed; but all the question is, whether this be the proper, genuine beauty or not; whether this be not strange fire, as the fire that Aaron's sons used, which became vain, and was taken as strange fire. Methinks it can not be better decided than to refer it to St. John, in his book of the Revelations. We find there the descriptions of two several women, the one riding in state, arrayed in purple, decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearl, ch. xvii.: the other, ch. xii. in rich attire too, but of another kind, clothed with the sun, and a crown of twelve stars on her head. The other's decorament was all earthly, this woman's is all celestial. What need has she to borrow light and beauty from precious stones, who is clothed with the sun, and crowned with stars? She wears no sub-lunary ornaments, but, which is more noble, she treads upon them; the moon is under her feet. Now, if you know (as you do all, without doubt), which of these two is the spouse of Christ, you can easily resolve the question. The truth is, those things seem to deck religion, but they undo it. Observe where they are most used, and we shall find little or no substance of devotion under them; as we see in that apostate church of Rome. This painting is dishonorable for Christ's spouse, and besides, it spoils her natural complexion. The superstitious use of torches and lights in the church by day, is a kind of shining, but surely not that which is commanded here. No; it is an affront done both to the sun in the heaven, and to the Sun of Righteousness in the church.

What is meant, then, when the church is commanded to shine, or be enlightened? These two readings give the entire sense of the word; for, first, having no light of herself, she must receive light, and then show it; first, be enlightened, and then shine. She is enlightened by Christ, the Sun of righteousness, shining in the sphere of the gospel. This is that light that comes to her, and the glory of the Lord that arises upon her. Hence she receives her laws and forms of government, and her shining is, briefly, the pure exercise of those and conformity to them.

And the personal shining of the several members of a church is, a comely congruity with pure worship and discipline; and it is that which now is most needful to be urged. Every Christian soul is personally engaged first to be enlightened, and then to shine; and we must draw our light for ourselves from that same source that furnishes the church with her public light. There is a word in the civil law, Uxor fulget radiis mariti: The wife shines by the rays of her husband's light. Now every faithful soul is espoused to Christ, and therefore may well shine, seeing the Sun himself is their husband. He adorns them with a double beauty of justification and sanctification: by that they shine more especially to God, by this to men. And may not these two be signified by a double character given to the spouse in Cant. vi. 20? She is fair as the moon, and clear as the sun. The lesser light is that of sanctification, fair as the moon; that of justification the greater, by which she is as clear as the sun. The sun is perfectly luminous, but the moon is but half enlightened: so, the believer is perfectly justified, but sanctified only in part: his one half, his flesh, is dark; and as the partial illumination is the reason of so many changes in the moon, to which changes the sun is not subject at all, so the imperfection of a Christian's holiness is the cause of so many waxings and wanings, and of the great inequality in his performances, whereas in the meanwhile his justification remains constantly like itself. This is imputed, that inherent. The light of sanctification must begin in the understanding, and thence be transfused to the affections, the inferior parts of the soul, and thence break forth and shine into action. This is then the nature of the duties, Arise and shine.

II. The universality of the subject, which was the second head, is this, that every man that knows Christ, is here engaged to shine too. Neither grandeur exempts from the duty of shining, nor doth meanness exclude from the privilege of shining. Men of low condition in this world need not despair of it, for it is a spiritual act: great men need not despise it, for it is a noble act, to shine by Christ's light. In the third verse of this chapter it is said to the church, Kings shall come to the brightness of thy rising. To what end, but to partake of her light and shine with her? And indeed, the regal attire of Christ's righteousness, and the white robes of holiness, will exceedingly well become kings and princes. Give the king thy judgments, O Lord, and thy righteousness to the king's son.

III. The third and last thing propounded was the force of the reason; that Christ's presence engages to arise and shine. Wherein it is supposed that Christ, declared in the gospel, is the light which is said here to come, and the glory of the Lord which is said to be risen; so that now it should be more amply cleared, how Christ is light and the glory of the Lord, and what his coming and rising is. But of these afterward. I shall close now with a word of exhortation.

Arise, then, for the glory of the Lord is risen. The day of the gospel is too precious that any of it should be spent in sleep, or idleness, or worthless business. Worthless business detains many of us. Arise, immortal souls, from turmoiling in the dust, and working in the clay like Egyptian captives. Address yourselves to more noble work. There is a Redeemer come, who will pay your ransom, and rescue you from such vile service, for more excellent employment. It is strange how the souls of Christians can so much forget their first original from heaven, and their new hopes of returning thither, and the rich price of their redemption, and, forgetting all these, dwell so low, and dote so much upon trifles. How is it that they hear not their well-beloved's voice crying, Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away? Though the eyes of true believers are so enlightened, that they shall not sleep unto death, yet their spirits are often seized with a kind of drowsiness and slumber, and sometimes even when they should be of most activity. The time of Christ's check to his three disciples made it very sharp, though the words are mild: What! could you not watch with me one hour? Shake off, believing souls, that heavy humor.

Arise, and satiate the eye of faith with the contemplation of Christ's beauty, and follow after him, till you attain the place of full enjoyment. And you others who never yet saw him, arise, and admire his matchless excellency. The things you esteem great, appear so but through ignorance of his greatness. His brightness, if you saw it, would obscure to you the greatest splendor of the world, as all those stars that go never down upon us, yet they are swallowed up in the surpassing light of the sun when it arises. Stand up from the dead, and he shall give you light. Arise and work while it is day, for the night shall come wherein none can work, says our Savior himself. Happy are they who rise early in the morning of their youth; for the day of life is very short, and the art of Christianity long and difficult. Is it not a grievous thing, that men never consider why they came into the world, till they be upon the point of going out again, nor think how to live, till they be summoned to die? But most of all unhappy, he who never wakens out of that pleasing dream of false happiness, till he falls into eternal misery. Arise, then, betimes, and prevent that sad awakening.

And being risen, put on your beautiful garments. Isaiah liii. 1. Draw toward you with the hand of faith the rich mantle of Christ's righteousness. It is time to awake, says the apostle, and presently after. Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ. Rom. xiii. 11, 14. And it is a wonder how a sinner can rest, while he is out of this garment; for there is no other in heaven nor on earth, can make him shine to God, and so shelter him from the stroke of justice. Put him on, then, and so shine: being thus clothed, thou shalt shine in justification, and likewise in sanctity. What a privilege is it, to be like God! A sanctified conscience, what can be said against it? And first have an enlightened understanding, for that is the proper seat of light. That ignorant zeal which Rome commends, exposes religion to scorn and contempt. Heat without light, is the character of the fire of hell. I know, all are not tied to a like degree of knowledge, but certainly, all are obliged to have a competency, and diligence for increase. Aspire, then, to be intelligent Christians, and to know well what you believe. Let your minds be filled with knowledge, as the apostle speaks. But let it not stop there; it must have influence into the will. Lux est vehiculum caloris: True light conveys heat. All the knowledge that the natural man hath of Christ, not warming his affection to Christ, is but ignis fatuus, a vain light: it shall never lead him to happiness. Saving light produces love, and by that acts. Faith works by love, says the apostle. That breaks forth and shines in the life, in godliness, righteousness, and sobriety. Shine, then, in all these; first, in piety toward God, for this is the reflection of those rays of light back toward their source, and this will command the other two. No man that shines in godliness will wallow in injustice and intemperance. Guile and wrong can not endure the light: they that are unjust can not shine. And let them never offer to shine among Christians, who are not sober, but stamed with riot and uncleanness. These foul enormities lay waste the conscience, and put out the light. How can any seeds of grace subsist undrowned, that are exposed to a daily deluge of cups? How can that pure Spirit that chose the likeness of a chaste dove, dwell and give light in that soul which is a nest of impure and filthy lusts? No; there can be no fellowship between this celestial light, whereby we should shine, and those infernal workings of darkness. Let profane men hold it a chief strain of wit, to scoff at purity, but you who pretend heavenward in good earnest, and mean to shine in glory, shine here in holiness; For without holiness no man shall see God. And do it with these qualifications: (1.) Constantly—in every estate. Let not this Divine light go out, neither by day in prosperity, nor by night in adversity. In every place. Do not shine clear, and be dark in your chamber: they that do thus, have their reward. That is a sad word, if rightly understood. Beware of hypocrisy. (2.) Shine progressively, gaining still more and more victory over darkness, till you attain unmixed and perfect light. The way of the just, says Solomon, is like a shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Prov. iv. 18. (3.) Shine humbly, to his glory whose light you borrow; not to show forth your own excellencies, but his, who hath called you from darkness to his marvellous light. 1 Pet. ii. 9. If we be children of light, our brightness must praise the Father of lights. Let your light so shine before men, that they, seeing your good works (not yourselves, if you can be hid; as the sun affords its light, and will scarce suffer us to look upon itself) may glorify (not you, but) your heavenly Father. Matt. v. 6. To conclude,

The pure light of the church is revived, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon you, and upon this glory there shall be a defence. If God be your glory in the midst of you, he will be likewise a wall of fire round about you. All the danger is, if we fall short in the duty of shining. But as you desire that this glory should abide and dwell among you, let all estates of men provoke one another to shine bright in holiness. You who either by birth or office are in eminent stations, know that you were set there to be eminent and exemplary in shining, as stars of more notable magnitude. You who are ministers of this light, know that you are the light of the world; and if the very light become darkness, how great will that darkness be! You that are of a lower order, know that you must shine too; for it is a common duty. There is a certain company of small stars in the firmament, which, though they can not be each one severally seen, yet, being many, their united light makes a conspicuous brightness in the heavens, which is called the milky way; so, though the shining of every private Christian is not so much severally remarkable, yet the concourse and meeting of their light together will make a bright path of holiness shine in the church.

Now to the end we may each one shine in our measure, we must learn to turn ourselves often toward him from whom our light is derived. Conversing with him, will make us more and more like him. There is a secret unknown virtue for this purpose in secret prayer and meditation. Were we more in the mount with God, our faces would shine more with men. Let us then rescue from the world all the time we can, to resort frequently thither, till such time as the soul, which is now often pulled down again by the flesh, shall let that mantle fall and come down no more, but shine there without spot, and be for ever satisfied with her Maker's image.

SERMON V.

CHRIST THE LIGHT AND LUSTRE OF THE CHURCH.

ART imitates nature; and the nearer it comes to nature in its effects, it is the more excellent. Grace is the new nature of a Christian, and hypocrisy that art which counterfeits it; and the more exquisite it is in imitation, it is the more plausible to men, but the more abominable to God. It may frame a spiritual man in image so to the life, that not only others, but even the hypocrite himself may admire it, and favoring his own artifice, may be deceived so far, as to say, and to think, it lives, and fall in love with it; but he is no less abhorred by the Searcher of hearts, than pleasing to himself. Surely, this mischief of hypocrisy can never be enough inveighed against. When religion is in request, it is the chief malady of the church, and numbers die of it: though, because it is a subtle and inward evil, it be little perceived. It is to be feared there are many sick of it, who look well and comely in God's outward worship, and they may pass well in good weather, in times of peace, but days of adversity are days of trial. The prosperous estate of the church makes hypocrites, and her distress discovers them. But if they escape such trial, there is one inevitable day coming, wherein all secret things shall be made manifest. Men shall be turned inside out: and among all sinners that shall then be brought before that judgment-seat, the deformedest sight shall be an unmasked hypocrite, and the heaviest sentence shall be his portion.

Oh! that the consideration of this would scare us out of that false disguise in time, and set us all upon the study of sincerity! Precious is that grace in God's esteem: a little of it will weigh down mountains of formal religion, in the balance of the sanctuary. Which of us have not now brought hypocrisy, more or less, into the house of God? Oh, that it were not with intention to nourish it, but with desire to be here cured of it! For he alone who hates it so much, can cure it; he alone can confer upon us that sincerity wherein he mainly delights. If we have a mind, indeed, to be endued with it, it is nowhere else to be had: we must entreat it of God by humble prayer, in the name of his well-beloved Son, by the assistance of his Holy Spirit.

ISAIAH lx. 1.

Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.

Truly, light is sweet, and it is a pleasing thing to behold the sun, says the preacher, Eccl. xi. 7. But the interchange of night with day adds to its beauty, and the longest night makes day the welcomest; as that people well know, whose situation in the world gives them a five or six months' night all of one piece. It is reported of some of them, that when they conceive their night draws toward an end, they put on their richest apparel, and climb up to the highest mountains, with emulation who shall first discover the returning light; which, so soon as it appears, they salute with acclamations of joy, and welcome it with solemn feasting, and all other testimonies of exceeding gladness. But such is the lethargy of sinful man, that he stirs not to meet his spiritual light; and, which is worse, when it comes upon him, it finds him in love with darkness. Instead of his shouts of joy for this light, many a cry must be sounded in his ears, to awaken him; and it is well, too, if at length he hear and obey this voice, Arise, shine, for thy light is come. It is clear that the words contain a command, and the reason of it: the command to a twofold act: the reason under two expressions, proportionately different. Good reason the church should arise, when the Lord's glory is risen upon her; and it is very congruous she should be enlightened and shine, when her light is come. Of those two acts, or duties, somewhat was formerly spoken; and the reason likewise was made use of so far as relative to those duties, and tending to their enforcement. But the meaning of the phrases in which the reason is expressed, was rather, at that time, supposed, than either duly proved or illustrated; so that it will be now expedient to consider, simply in themselves, these latter words; Thy light is come, and The glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.

So far as this prophecy hath respect to the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, that temporal deliverance, and the ensuing peace and prosperity, was their light, and that Divine power by which it was effected, was this glory of the Lord. And, indeed, both these expressions are frequently used in such a sense in holy writ. When I waited for light, there came darkness, says Job, chap. xxx. 26. So Isaiah lviii. 8, and many other places. And the glory of the Lord is used for a singular effect of his power, John xi. 40, Isaiah lx. 18, and elsewhere. But this literal sense is but a step to elevate the prophet to a sight of Christ's spiritual kingdom; which is usual with him, as our Savior himself testifies of another of his prophecies: These things said Isaiah when he saw his glory, and spake of him. John xii. 41. It was a sight of that same glory, that makes him say, Thy light is come.

In these words, there are three things concerning Christ, represented to the church's view. First, His beauty and excellency in that he is called light, and the glory of the Lord. Secondly, The church's propriety and interest in him, thy light, and risen upon thee; which hath a restrictive emphasis, as the very next verse doth clearly manifest. As he is originally the glory of the Lord, and the light of the Lord, lumen de lumine, so he is, communicatively, the church's light, and her glory too, as it is expressed in the 19th verse of the same chapter, Thy God thy glory. Thus hath she both his worth, and her own right in him, to consider. Thirdly, His presence, or her actual possession, He is come and is risen. And in these, the church and each faithful soul may find a double spring of affection, the one of love, the other of joy. The transcendent beauty of Christ makes him the choicest object of love, and her property in him, or title to him, together with possession, is the proper cause of solid joy.

First, then, this excellency is expressed by those two characters, light and the glory of the Lord. Concerning which, it will be fit both to demonstrate that they are the proper titles of Christ, and here to be taken for him: as also, to show what they signify in him.

Indeed the apostle in his second epistle to the Corinthians (ch. iii.) insists much in extolling both the light and the glory of the gospel, and in the 4th verse of the next chapter, speaks of the light of the glorious gospel, but he immediately intimates whence it hath this light and glory: The glorious gospel of Christ, says he, who is the image of God. So that it is most unnecessary to inquire whether the Messiah, or the word that reveals him, be rather here couched under these terms of light and the glory of the Lord. These two agree so well together, and these words agree so well with them both, that it were an injury to attempt to sever them. All the difference will be this; Christ is that incomplex and substantial light, the gospel that complex light wherein he appears. But (not to be guilty of dark terms, especially in a discourse of light), I take it, in this resemblance, Christ is the sun, and the gospel his proper sphere or heaven, wherein he gives light to his church.

He is primarily the glory of the Lord, and the gospel is so by participation, because it declares him: so that much of that which shall be spoken here of Christ, will be secondarily to be understood of the gospel of Christ.

That Christ is light, the Scripture speaks abundantly. His own voice concerning himself, notwithstanding the cavil of the Pharisees, is above all exception, for he is truth itself: I am the light of the world, saith he; he that follows me shall not walk in darkness. John viii. 12. The Father who sent him, gives him the same title: I will give thee for a light of the Gentiles, Isa. xlii. 6; and xlix. 6. And not to multiply citations of the prophets and evangelists, who with one consent all magnify this light, take the true testimony of a false prophet; and, indeed, the favorable witness of an adversary is strongest: it is that of Balaam, who saw that Christ was light, though, because he saw him afar off (as he says himself), and had not his eye fortified, like the true prophets, he discerned him but as a star: There shall come a star out of Jacob. Numb. xxiv. 17. But what need we go so far, to be certified what this light and glory of the Lord is? The Lord of glory himself, in the very next verse to the text, assures us of it: Upon thee shall the Lord arise. And in the 19th verse, The Lord shall be thy everlasting light, and thy God thy glory.

By this time, I hope, it is clear, that the Eternal Son of God, co-essential with his Father, was he who gave accomplishment to this prophecy, by appearing to the world wrapped up in the darkness of human nature. He is that day-spring from on high, which hath visited us, as old Zacharias speaks. Luke i. 78.

Among all created excellences, none can be borrowed more fitly representing Christ than that of light. And is it not Christ that decks his church with supernatural beauty, and makes it indeed Kivoss, a comely world, called out of the world? But the manifold agreement of light with Christ doth require more particular consideration.

Light is (as they call it) primum visibile, the first object of sight. And Jesus Christ, whom the apostle styles God over all, blessed for ever, is primum intelligibile, the prime object of the understanding. What is then become of that Divine spark, that understanding soul, which the Father of spirits breathes into these bodies, that all our thoughts creep here below, and leave their chief and noblest object unconsidered? Which of us may not complain (though few of us do), that our souls have either no wings to elevate themselves to the contemplation of him from whom they issued, or if they make attempts at it, our affections, engaged to the world, make us, like a bird tied by the foot, fall presently down again into the mire? It is high time to leave hunting shadows, and to turn our internal eye to the beholding of this uncreated light.

In this elementary world, light being (as we here) the first thing visible, all things are seen by it, and it by itself. Thus is Christ among spiritual things, in the elect world of his church. All things are made manifest by the light, says the apostles, Ephes. v. 13, speaking of Christ, as the following verse doth evidently testify. It is in his word that he shines, and makes it a directing and convincing light, to discover all things that concern his church and himself, and to be known by its own brightness. How impertinent, then, is that question so much tossed by the Romish church, How know you the Scriptures (say they) to be the word of God, without the testimony of the church? I would ask one of them again, how they can know that it is daylight, except some one light a candle to let them see it. They are little versed in Holy Scripture, who know not that it is frequently called light; and they are senseless who know not that light is seen and known by itself. If our gospel be hid, says the Apostle, it is hid to them that perish, the god of this world having blinded their minds against the light of the glorious gospel of Christ. 2 Cor. iv. 3. No wonder if such stand in need of a testimony. A blind man knows not that it is light at noonday, but by report; not to those that have eyes, light is seen by itself.

Again, light makes all other things that are in themselves visible, to become actually visible, as they speak; so, by the word of this substantial word, Jesus Christ, all things in religion are tried and discovered. The very authority of the church, which they obtrude so confidently, must be stopped and examined by these Scriptures, which they would make stand to its courtesy. Doctrines and worship must be tried by this light; and that will not endure this trial, must not be endured in the house of God. To the law and to the testimony, says the prophet, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them. Isa. viii. 20. The rays of Christ's light are displayed through both his Testaments, and in them we see him.

But oh, how sublime is the knowledge of him! No one is ignorant that there is light, yet, what light is, few know; the best wits are troubled to define it: so, all that bear the name of Christians acknowledge that Christ is, but to know what he is, is of marvellous difficulty. In a speculative way, unsoundable is the depth of his nature and properties. And his generation who can declare? says our prophet, Isa. liii. 8. I define not, whether his eternal generation he meant, or his incarnation in time. These are mysteries that shall hold the very angels busy in admiration for ever. And as for experimental knowledge by faith, how small is the number of those that are truly acquainted with it!

Again, light fitly resembles Christ in purity: it visits many impure places, and lights upon the basest parts of the earth, and yet remains most pure and undefiled. Christ sees and takes notice of all the enormities and sinful pollutions in the world: as David says of the sun, there is nothing hid from his beams: yea, many of those foul evils he cures, and purgeth away these pollutions; and yet, he is never stained by them in the least degree. He is a physician not capable of infection, and therefore while he dwelt among men, he shunned not publicans and sinners, but sought them rather, for with such was his business and employment. Indeed, for a frail man to be too bold in frequenting profane and obstinate persons, though with intention to reclaim them, is not always so safe. Metus est ne attrahant. They may pull him in, who would help them forth, and pollute him who would cleanse them. But our Savior, the light of the world, runs no such hazard: he is stronger than the perversest sinner, yea, than the prince of darkness himself, over whom his banners are always victorious, and purer than to be in danger of pollution. His precious blood is a fountain opened for sin and uncleanness: sinners are purified by it, and it is not defiled by them. Thousands have washed in it, yet it shall abide, and always shall be most perfectly pure. And such a high priest was needful for us, who is ἀπλῆρος, undefiled, and who, though conversant with sinners, to communicate to them his goodness, was yet separate from sinners in immunity from their evil. Heb. vii. 26.

To this agrees well that title which the prophet Malachi gives him, chap. iv. 2, when he calls him the Sun of Righteousness; full of purity and righteousness, as the sun is of light; all luminous, without spot; subject to no eclipse in himself, his light being his own, though our sins interposed may hide him sometimes from us, as those real eclipses in the sun are rather ours, for we are deprived of light, but not of the sun. Christ is in many ways most fitly called the Sun; for since all created light falls infinitely short of his worth, the prince and chief of lights, the sun, can not but suit best, so far as may be, to set forth his excellency.

The light of the sun is neither parted nor diminished, by being imparted to many several people and nations that behold it at one time; nor is the righteousness of this Sun of Righteousness either lessened to himself, or to individual believers, by many partaking of it at once: it is wholly conferred upon each one of them, and remains whole in himself. Hence it is, that not only Christ invites so liberally sinners to come to him, but even justified persons would so gladly draw all others to lay hold on this righteousness of their Redeemer; knowing well, that if all the world were enriched by it, they themselves would be no whit the poorer.

Again, the sun hath a vivifying power, not only upon plants and vegetables, but, if philosophers be right, Sol et homo generant hominem, it hath a special influence in the generation of man. But it is both more certainly and more eminently true of this Sun we speak of, in man's regeneration; that he is the proper and principal efficient of it. The evangelist calls him at once, the light and the life of men. John i. 4. To say nothing of him as a treasure, he is the source of our spiritual life and motion.

When the sun takes its course toward us in the season of the year, it drives away the sharp frosts of the heavy fogs of winter, it clears the heavens, decks the earth with variety of plants and flowers, and awakes the birds to the pleasant strains of their natural music. When Christ, after a kind of winter absence, returns to visit a declining church, admirable is the change that he produces: all begins to flourish by his sweet influence; his house, his worship, his people, are all clothed with a new beauty; but it is spiritual, and therefore, none but spiritual eyes can discern it. When he will thus return, all the power and policy of man can no more hinder him, than it could stay the course of the sun in its circle. In like manner, a deserted, forsaken soul, that can do nothing but languish and droop, while Christ withdraws himself, what inexpressible vigor and alacrity finds it at his returning! Then those graces which, while they lurked, seemed to have been lost and quite extinguished, bud forth anew with pleasant color and fragrant smell. It is the light of his countenance that banisheth their false fears, that strengthens their faith, and cures their spiritual infirmities. The Sun is indeed the sovereign physician: Unto you that fear my name, shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing under his wings. Mal. iv. 2.

Finally, all darkness flies away before him: it was his arising in the world that made the day break and the shadows fly away. The types and shadows of the law were then abolished. It was his light that dispelled the mists of ignorance and idolatry, and he alone delivers the soul from the night of sin and misery produced by it. All the stars, and the moon with them, can not make it day in the world; this is the sun's prerogative: nor can nature's highest light, the most refined science and morality, make it day in the soul; for this is Christ's.

The common light of reason, every man that comes into the world hath from him as his Creator; but the special light of grace, they alone who are born again, have from him as their Savior. Gross is the darkness of every natural mind, till Christ enlighten it: it can neither discern nor receive the things of God, οὐ δέχεται. Ye were darkness, says the apostle, but now are ye light in the Lord. Ephes. v. 8. The natural mind is nothing else but a mass of darkness; and the companion of darkness is confusion, as it was in the mass of the world before light was created. And what is there under heaven more confused than a carnal mind; the affections quite out of order, and though all naught, yet, sometimes fighting one with another, and continually hurrying the judgment whither they please? Now, to dissipate this darkness, and remedy this confusion, Christ shines externally in his word. But too much daily experience testifies, that this is not sufficient: therefore to those whom he will make children of the light, to meet with this outward light of his word, he gives another internal light by the Spirit. The sun can make dark things clear, but it can not make a blind man see them: but herein is the excellency of this Sun, that he illuminates not only the object, but the faculty; does not only reveal the mysteries of his kingdom, but opens blind eyes to behold them. And the first lineament of the renewed image of God in man, is that light in the understanding, removing not only that simple ignorance of divine things, but those misconceits, likewise, and false principles, and that wicked pertinacity, whereof man's mind is naturally full. He who at first commanded light to shine out of darkness, infuseth saving knowledge and light into the dark soul of man. And this light (as was said) kindles love. It is vehiculum caloris, hath a powerful influence, begetting heat in the affections. Nor can this divine light be ever again fully extinguished, but conducts the soul that hath received it, till it be received to the land of light and perfect happiness. Thus in our Redeemer is the fountain of life, as the psalmist speaks, and in his light do we see light. Psalm xxxvi. 9.

He is likewise here styled the glory of the Lord. In 2 Sam. iv. the ark of God is called the glory, but it enjoyeth that name as a type of Christ, in whom now that which the ark contained is fulfilled. The tabernacle is called the dwelling of God's glory, Psalm xxvi. 8, likewise typifying him, in the tabernacle of whose human nature that glory dwells far more excellently. John i. 14. Ἐσκήνωσέν ἐν ἡμῖν, He dwelt in a tabernacle among us, and we saw his glory as the glory of the only begotten Son of God, full of grace and truth. The author of the epistle to the Hebrews calls him ἀπαύλασα, the brightness of his Father's glory, and the character of his person. Heb. i. 3. And under these expressions lies that remarkable mystery of the Son's eternal relation to the Father, which is rather humbly to be adored than boldly to be explained, either by God's perfect understanding of his own essence, or by any other notion. It is true, he is called the wisdom of the Father, but this wisdom is too wonderful for us. He is called The Word, but what this word means, I think we shall not well know till we see him face to face, and contemplate him in the light of glory. Meanwhile we may see him to be the glory of the Lord, in a safer way, and in a sufficient measure to guide us to that clear vision reserved above for us. We saw his glory, says that sublime evangelist. But how could this excellent glory be seen by sinful men, and not astonish and strike dead the beholders? He was made flesh and dwelt among us, says he, and so we saw his glory. That majesty which we could never have looked upon, he veiled with human flesh, that we might not die, yea, live by seeing him. There he stood behind the wall, and showed himself through the lattice. In him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, Col. ii. 9, but it was σωματικῶς, bodily: for who could have endured the splendor of the Godhead's fulness, if that cloud of his body had not been drawn between? And through it did shine that grace and truth, that wisdom and power, in the work of our redemption, whereby he was clearly manifested to be the glory of the Lord.

Surely, we need not now ask the church, or a believing soul, What is thy beloved more than another? Or if we do, well may she answer, He is the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely; for he is the light of the world and the glory of the Lord. Let not the numerous titles of earthly potentates be once admitted into comparison with these. If we believe David, Psalm lxii. 9, the state-liest things and persons in the world, being balanced with vanity itself, are found lighter than it: and shall we offer to weigh them with Christ? If we knew him rightly, we would not sell the least glance or beam of this light of his countenance, for the highest favor of mortal man, though it were constant and unchangeable, which it is not. It is ignorance of Christ that maintains the credit of those vanities we admire. The Christian that is truly acquainted with him, enamored with the brightness of his beauty, can generously trample upon the smilings of the world with the one foot, and upon her frownings with the other. If he be rich or honorable, or both, yet, he glories not in that, but Christ, who is the glory of the Lord, is even then his chiefest glory; and the light of Christ obscures that worldly splendor in his estimation. And as the enjoyment of Christ overtops all his other joys, so it overcomes his griefs. As that great light drowns the light of prosperity, so it shines bright in the darkness of affliction: no dungeon so close that it can keep out the rays of Christ's love from his beloved prisoners. The world can no more take away this light, than it can give it. Unto the just ariseth light in darkness, says the psalmist; and, When I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me, says the church, Mic. vii. 8. And as this light is a comfort, so it is likewise a defence, which suffers no more of distress to come near the godly, than is profitable for them. Therefore we find very frequently in Scripture, where this light and glory is mentioned, protection and safety jointly spoken of: The Lord is my light, and withal my salvation: whom shall I fear? says David, Psalm xxvii. 1. The Lord is a sun, and he is a shield too. Psalm lxxxiv. 11. And truly I think him shot-proof that hath the sun for his buckler. And for glory, Upon all the glory shall be a defence, says our prophet, chap. iv. 5. And the prophet Zachariah, where he calls the Lord the church's glory in the midst of her, calls him likewise, a wall of fire round about her, chap. ii. 4. The only way, then, to be safe, is to keep this light and the glory entire. To part with any part of this glory, is to make a breach in that wall of fire; and if that be a means of safety, let all men judge. No, keep it whole, and then they must come through the fire, who will assault you. Nor is this light only defensive of the church that embraceth it, but it is likewise destructive of all adverse powers. See a clear testimony for this in Isa. x. 17, 18. And the light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame, and (speaking there of the Assyrians) it shall burn and devour his thorns and his briars in one day, and shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body, and they shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth. Let ever then the church of God entirely observe this light and glory of the Lord; and she shall undoubtedly be preserved by it.

But to close in a word, first, to those who know this light, and then, to those who are yet strangers to it.

You who know Christ, glory in him perpetually. Well may he be your glory, when he is the glory of the Lord. There are some who pretend love to Christ, and yet, a taunting word of some profane miscreant will almost make them ashamed of him. How would they die for Christ, who are so tender as not to endure a scoff for him? Where is that spirit of Moses, who accounted the very reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt? Heb. xi. 26. Oh, learn to glory in Christ; think highly of him, and speak so too. Methinks it is the discourse in the world that becomes Christians best, to be speaking one to another honorably of Jesus Christ. And of all men, the preachers of his gospel should be most frequent in this subject. This should be their great theme, to extol and commend the Lord Jesus, that they may inflame many hearts with his love; and best can they do this, who are most strongly taken with this love themselves. Such will most gladly abase themselves, that Christ may be magnified; and whatsoever be their excellencies, they will still account Christ their glory. And they are richly repaid, for he accounts them his glory. This would seem a strange word, if it were not the apostle's: They are the messengers of the churches and the glory of Christ. 2 Cor. viii. 23. Delight who will, either in sloth or ignorance on the one hand, or in vain speculations and strains of frothy wit on the other; surely, those preachers only shall be approved in the great day, who have constantly endeavored.

in their measure, to speak the best and fittest they could for their Master's advantage. And happy those Christians, of what estate soever, who in all estates make Christ their glory, and in all actions have their eye fixed upon his glory, who is their light and the glory of the Lord!

Now to those who are strangers to him (would to God none that are to be spoken to, were such!) to them, I say, notice is given both of the excellency and the necessity of Christ. Though it were possible to grope the way to happiness in the dark, yet, none will deny but to be conducted thither by a constant light is both more safe and more delightful. But were there any possibility of attaining that end without this light, the neglect of it were not altogether so strange. The wonder of all is this, that Christ alone being both that life, and the way to it, and the truth, or light, that guides in that way (John xiv. 6), yet Christians (so called) should esteem and look after him as little as if he were wholly needless! What meanest thou, O besotted sinner? Is it so light a thing to die in thy sins, and to die eternally for them, that thou wilt not so much as open and admit the light of salvation? What wilt thou pretend in that terrible day? Though all other kinds of people should offer some excuse, thou who hast heard the gospel, shalt be speechless. For not only shall the rigor of justice condemn thee, but mercy itself shall plead against thee; for thou hast despised it. That light did come and was not embraced, shall be the main condemnation. How many thousands who make no doubt of heaven, yet shall then fall short of it! It is not a superficial profession, that will then pass current. It is not some public sighs and groans from an unsanctified heart, which either come from custom, or some present touch of the word, nor yet is it some sudden risings of inward affection toward Christ, upon the report of his worth, that shall then serve the turn. The intellectual knowledge of Christ, the distinct understanding, yea, the orthodox preaching of his gospel, the maintaining of his public cause, and suffering for it, shall not then be found sufficient. Only that peculiar apprehension of Christ, those constant flames of spiritual love, that even course of holy walking in his light, shall be those characters whereby Christ shall own his children, and admit them into the inheritance of perfect light. One of the speakers in the book of Job, discoursing of the prosperity of the ungodly, calls it but his candle, and tells how long it can last: his candle (says he) shall be put out with him. And that's the longest term of it: if it last his lifetime, it shall convey him no further; he goes into eternity in the dark, and therefore, as St. John says, he knows not whither he goeth. Quò nunc abibis? said that emperor (Adrian) to his soul. Is it not a sad thing when the soul that knows no other than worldly light, must take leave of it, and enter into eternal darkness, there to be incessantly tormented with present anguish, and the frightful expectation of the last judgment, when it must take again that body which was the accomplice of its wickedness, to be partaker of its punishment; when it shall have a double misery, to behold crowns of immortality distributed to the godly, after the short combats of this life, and itself thrust out among the devils? Then shall all men be in some way sensible, what is the worth of this now contemned light, the Lord Jesus Christ: the greatest number too late, for they shall be banished from it for ever. But the righteous shall then most perfectly know, and for ever enjoy, this light and glory of the Lord. To whom, with the Father of lights, and the Spirit of grace, be eternity in praise and honor.

SERMON VI.

HOPE AMID BILLOWS.

WHAT shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? said our Savior, who was to lay down a ransom for it, and knew well that it would cost infinitely more than the world was worth. Yet, the most of men value their own souls at a far lower rate than the whole world, losing them for broken morsels of it: yea, many times for vain hopes that are never accomplished. And as these men make a miserable bargain, so on the contrary, they that lose the world, or anything worldly, yea, though it were the whole, to save their souls, make a profitable loss of it. Nature teaches men to hazard and lose all for the life of the body rather than lose it (although it proves many times very uncomfortable by the loss of these outward things), and yet, the most part of men pass their whole lifetime without one serious thought of the excellency and importance of their souls, whose life and happiness is of a higher nature, and neither consists in, nor depends upon, anything here below. Hence it is, that while they use the helps of this present life, and the defences of it when it is in danger, and use them with so much diligence and attention, the means of that better life of their better part, their souls they either use not at all, or so slightly and coldly that they never find salvation in them. You may find it some way in yourselves: the threatenings and preparations of men against you have awakened and roused you more to think upon means of your temporal safety; but how few are sensible and afraid of the wrath of God, who, as our Savior tells us, can kill both body and soul, and cast them into hell! You want not frequent advertisement from the word of God, so plentifully preached, that many are perishing, one part in gross ignorance of God, another in profane and licentious living, and the greatest part in a formal and lifeless profession of religion, without the power of it; and yet, where are they who lay it to heart, and bestir themselves to rescue their souls from destruction? Certainly, whatsoever men profess, it is unbelief that is the cause of impotence. Men are not convinced of the purity of God's nature, nor sensible of the impurity of their own; therefore they apply not themselves in good earnest to the work of repentance, and to reformation, the liveliest part of it. Labor, then, for a more active and practical knowledge of God and Divine truths, such as may humble and renew your souls; not only that you may be delivered from outward troubles that threaten you, but much more, that you may escape the wrath to come. And because neither the word preached, nor judgments, nor mercies, that are set before you, are sufficient to quicken a dead soul, or soften a hard heart, without the effectual concurrence of the Spirit of God, let us have recourse to the throne of grace, by humble and earnest prayer, in the name and mediation of Jesus Christ.

PSALM xlii. 8.

Yet the Lord will command his loving-kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.

MAN is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward, saith Eliphaz, Job v. 7. And as it is the corruption and sinfulness of his birth and nature, that has exposed him to trouble, so nature usually sets him at work, to look out for such things as may preserve and deliver him from trouble, or, at least, mitigate and temper the bitterness of it. And because there is not any one worldly thing that hath either certainty or sufficiency enough to serve at all times, therefore worldly and natural men are forced to make use of variety, and are but badly served with them all. The believing soul hath but one comfort whereon he relies, but it is a great one, which alone weighs down all the rest. Bread strengthens, and wine makes glad the heart of man, Psalm civ. 15. But God is the strength of my heart, says the psalmist, Psalm lxxiii. 26, and the gladness of it too: Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than they have when their corn and wine increaseth. Psalm vi. 7. And therefore, while the rest are seeking after some scattered crumbs of goodness in the creatures, and saying, Who will show us any good? he fixes his choice upon this one thing, the light of God's countenance. And it is the constant assurance of this that upholds him. Waves beat upon him, yea, and go over him; yet, the Lord will command his loving kindness to shine upon him.

In this psalm we may perceive the psalmist full of perplexed thoughts, and that between strong desires and griefs, and yet, in the midst of them, now and then, some advantage, and intermixing strains of hope with his sad complaints: for immediately before, we heard nothing but the impetuous noise of many waters, deep calling unto deep, in the former verse; we have here, as it were, a touch of the sweet sound of David's harp: Yet the Lord will command his loving kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me.

In the words we have David's confidence and David's purpose: the one suiting very well with the other. His confidence in God's loving kindness: Yet the Lord will command his loving kindness. And his purpose: And in the night his song shall be with me.

It is true, the latter words, In the night his song shall be with me, may be taken as a part of the expression of his confidence, taking the song for the matter or subject of the song, the goodness of God: as if he should say, Both in the day and in the night, I shall find the sweet fruits of God's favor and loving kindness. But not excluding that, I rather take it to be intended as his resolution, that it should be his custom in the quiet season of the night, to look back upon God's goodness manifested to him in the actions and occurrences of the day; and thus entertaining his soul with that secret discourse, he would stir it up to the praises of his God, and withal would join prayer for the continuance and further manifestation of it. David (as was hinted before) intermixes strains of hope, not that faint and common hope of possibility or probability, that after stormy days it may be better with him, but a certain hope that shall never make ashamed; such a hope as springs from faith, yea, in effect, is one with it. Faith rests upon the goodness and truth of Him who hath promised, and hope, raising itself upon faith so established, stands up and looks out to the future accomplishment of the promise. Therefore the apostle calls Faith, the substance of things hoped for, inopertans, and the evidence of things not seen. Heb. xi. 1. Of all other hope it is true, Spes est nomen boni incerti: It is the name of uncertain good. But this can say, The Lord will command his loving kindness.

The Lord will command. What a sudden change is here! Would you think this were the same man that was even now almost overwhelmed? Thus faith always conquers, though seldom, or never, without a hard conflict; not only assaulted by troubles without, but, which is worse, by incredulity within; nor assaulted only, but many times brought under; yet does it not succumb and give over, knowing that even after many foils, yet, in the end, it shall overcome.

His confidence you may consider, first, oppositely, and then positively, or simply in itself. Oppositely both to his present trouble, and to his complaints, wherein this trouble is expressed: and that is fitly implied, though it be not in the original.

Though the multitude and weight of Job's afflictions did force out of him some bitter words, and made him look back upon the day of his birth, and curse it; yet faith recovers him from his distemper, and makes him look forward with joy, even as far as to the blessed day of his resurrection: I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet, in my flesh shall I see God. Job xix. 25. The former words of impatience he spake indeed, but he adheres to these, and wishes that they were written with an iron pen, and engraven to abide for ever. Therefore we hear of him again in scripture, as a righteous and patient man, but of these words of his impatience not a word. In the lxxviii Psalm, what sad expostulations are those the psalmist uses, Will he be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone for ever? Doth his promise fail for evermore? Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies? But see how he corrects them, ver. 10: Then I said, this is my infirmity, but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. Thus Jonah (ch. ii. 3, 4) speaks in a strain much like this; but there it was literally true, that God had cast him into the deep. And here, deep calls unto deep, yet, in the midst of those deeps, faith is not drowned; you see it lifts up its head above water; Yet, the Lord will command, &c. Yea, though it takes particular notice of God's hand in the affliction, yet it goes not to another hand for comfort: it is Thy waves and Thy billows, yet that same God whose waves are like to destroy me, will ere long commend his loving kindness to shine upon me. So Job xiii. 15. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. A wonderful expression of faith! He says not, though he afflict me sore, but, Though he slay me: not, Though evil men or Satan should do it, but, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. What troubled mind can imagine any thing harder against itself than this?

1. Learn, then, to check those excessive doubts and fears, by some such resolute word as this. Turn the promise, first upon thyself, and then upon God. Consider that he hath promised life eternal to believers, and then say, "Though I saw his hand as it were lifted up to destroy me, yet from that very hand will I expect salvation; for I have his word engaged for it, that if I believe, I shall be saved." I do not say, that a soul under temptation can assure itself that God is already reconciled to it; and herein possibly lies oftentimes the mistake; for this reflex act of assurance, though it be our duty to seek after it, is itself rather a gift and reward than a duty. But the direct and proper act of faith is of perpetual use and necessity, and then most when there is least sense of assurance. And it is no other than a recumbency or reliance, a rolling over of the soul upon free mercy. That which breeds us much perplexity, is, that we would invert God's order. If I knew, say some, that the promise belonged to me, and that Christ were a Savior to me, I could believe. That is to say, I would first see, and then believe. But the true method is just contrary. I had fainted, says David, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord. He believed it first, and saw it afterward. And in this same psalm, laboring to still his disquieted soul by elevating it above his troubles to look upon his God, he says to it, Hope in him now, and, ere it be long, thou shalt praise him for the help of his countenance, even while His countenance is withheld. And thus faith ought to triumph over spiritual fears and difficulties.

2. How incongruous is it, that outward dangers or trials should overmatch it! Will you trust God upon his word, for salvation and eternal happiness, and be diffident for the safety and needful blessings of this temporal life, which life, in comparison, is but for a moment, and the best things of it but dross? Consider that you dishonor faith exceedingly, and degenerate from the believing saints of former ages. Indeed, the promises of this life, and that which concerns it, though godliness hath them, yet, they are not so absolute, nor are they so absolutely needful for you. But considering the wisdom and love of your heavenly Father, learn to compose your minds by it.

I will not be afraid, though ten thousands of the people set themselves against me round about, says David. Psalm iii. 6. And lest you think him singular, in the 46th Psalm, it is the joint voice of the whole church of God: We will not fear, though the earth be removed, and the mountains be cast into the midst of the sea: though the waters thereof roar and be troubled; though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. There is a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God: the holy place of the tabernacle of the most high God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved. That is the way to be immoveable in the midst of troubles, as a rock amidst the waves. When God is in the midst of a kingdom or city, he makes it firm as Mount Sion, that can not be removed. When he is in the midst of a soul, though calamities throng about it on all hands, and roar like the billows of the sea, yet, there is a constant calm within, such a peace as the world can neither give nor take away. On the other side, what is it but want of lodging God in the soul, and that in his stead the world is in the midst of men's hearts, that makes them shake like the leaves of trees at every blast of danger? What a shame is it, seeing natural men, by the strength of nature, and by help of moral precepts, have attained such undaunted resolution and courage against outward changes, that yet they who would pass for Christians, are so soft and fainting, and so sensible of the smallest alterations! The advantage that we have in this regard is infinite. What is the best ground-work of a philosopher's constancy, but as moving sands in comparison of the Rock that we may build upon? But the truth is, that either we make no provision of faith for times of trial, or, if any we have, we neither know the worth nor the use of it, but lay it by, as a dead unprofitable thing, when we should most use and exercise it. Notwithstanding all our frequenting of God's house, and our plausible profession, is it not too true, that the most of us either do not at all furnish ourselves with those spiritual arms that are so needful in the militant life of a Christian, or we learn not how to handle them, and are not in readiness for service? As was the case of that improvident soldier, whom his commander found mending some piece of his armor, when they were to give battle. It were not amiss, before afflictions overtake us, to try and train the mind somewhat by supposing the very worst and hardest of them; to say, What if the waves and billows of adversity were swelled and flowing in upon me; could I then believe? God hath said, I will not fail thee nor forsake thee, with a heap of negations: In no wise, I will not. He hath said, When thou passest through the fire and through the water, I will be with thee. These I know, and can discourse of them; but could I repose and rest upon them in the day of trial? Put your souls to it. Is there any thing or person that you esteem and love exceedingly? Say, What if I should lose this? Is there some evil that is naturally more contrary and terrible to you than many others? Spare not to present that to the imagination too, and labor to make faith master of it beforehand in case it should befall you; and if the first thought of it scare you, look upon it the oftener, till the visage of it become familiar to you, that you start and scare no more at it. Nor is there any danger in these thoughts. Troubles can not be brought the nearer by our thus thinking on them; but you may be both safer and stronger by breathing and exercising of your faith in supposed cases. But if you be so tender-spirited, that you can not look upon calamities so much as in thought or fancy, how would you be able for a real encounter? No, surely. But the soul that hath made God his stay, can do both. See it in that notable resolution of the prophet, Hab. iii. 17: Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines, the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat, the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation. The Lord God is my strength. And in that of David, Psalm xxiii. 4: Yea, says he, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me. You see how faith is a cork to his soul, keeping it from sinking in the deeps of afflictions. Yea, that big word which one says of his morally just man, is true of the believer: Si fractus illabatur orbis—Though the very fabric of the world were falling about him, yet would he stand upright and undaunted in the midst of its ruins.

In this confidence, considered in itself, we may observe, 1. The object of it; The loving kindness of the Lord. 2. The manner or way by which he expects to enjoy it. The Lord will command it. 3. The time: In the day.

1. The object: His loving kindness. He says not, The Lord will command my return to the house of God, or, will accomplish my deliverance from the heavy oppression and sharp reproaches of the enemy, which would have answered more particularly and expressly to his present griefs, but, will command his loving kindness. And the reason of his thus expressing himself, I conceive to be twofold. [1.] In the assurance of this, is necessarily comprised the certainty of all other good things. This special favor and benignity of the Lord doth engage his power and wisdom (both which you know are infinite) to the procurement of everything truly good for those whom he so favors. Therefore it is, that David chooses rather to name the streams of particular mercies in this their living Source and Fountain, than to specify them severally. Nor is it only thus more compendious, but the expression is fuller too, which are the two great advantages of speech. And this I take to be the other reason: [2.] A man may enjoy great deliverances, and many positive benefits from the hand of God, and yet have no share in his loving kindness. How frequently doth God heap riches, and honor, and health, on those he hates, and the common gifts of the mind too, wisdom and learning, yea, the common gifts of his own Spirit, and give a fair and long day of external prosperity to those on whom he never vouchsafed the least glance of his favorable countenance! Yea, on the contrary, he gives all those specious gifts to them with a secret curse! As he gave a king in wrath to his people, so he often gives kingdoms in his wrath to kings. Therefore David looks higher than the very kingdom which God promised him and gave him, when he speaks of his loving kindness. In a word, he resolves to solace himself with the assurance of this, though he was stripped of all other comforts, and to quiet his soul herein, till deliverance should come; and when it should come, and whatsoever mercies with it, to receive them as fruits and effects of this loving kindness: not prizing them so much for themselves, as for the impressions of that love which is upon them. And it is that image and superscription that both engages and moves him most to pay his tribute of praise. And truly, this is everywhere David's temper: his frequent distresses and wants never excite him so much to desire any particular comfort in the creature, as to entreat the presence and favor of God himself. His saddest times are when, to his sense, this favor is eclipsed. In my prosperity I said, I shall not be moved. And what was his adversity that made him of another mind? Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. This verifies his position in that same Psalm. In thy favor is life. Thus, in the 63d Psalm, at the beginning, My soul thirsteth for thee, in a dry land where there is no water: not for water, where there is none, but, for thee where there is no water. Therefore he adds, in verse 3, Thy loving kindness is better than life. And all that be truly wise, are of this mind, and will subscribe to his choice. Let them enjoy this loving kindness and prize it, because, whatever befalls them, their happiness and joy is above the reach of all calamities. Let them be derided and reproached abroad, yet still, this inward persuasion makes them glad and contented. As a rich man said, though the people hated and taunted him, yet, when he came home and looked upon his chests, Ego met mihi plaudo domi; with how much better reason do believers bear out external injuries! What inward contentment is theirs, when they consider themselves as truly enriched with the favor of God! And as this makes them contemn the contempts that the world puts upon them, so, likewise, it breeds in them a neglect and disdain of those poor trifles that the world admires. The sum of their desires is (as that of the cynic's was, the sunshine), that the rays of the love of God may shine constantly upon them. The favorable aspect and large proffers of kings and princes, would be unwelcome to them, if they should stand between them and the sight of that Sun. And truly they have reason. What are the highest things the world affords? What are great honors and great estates, but great cares and griefs well dressed and colored over with a show of pleasure, that promise contentment, and perform nothing but vexation? That they are not satisfying, is evident; for the obtaining of much of them doth but stretch the appetite, and teach men to desire more. They are not solid, neither. Will not the pains of a gout, of a strangury, or some such malady (to say nothing of the worst, the pains of a guilty conscience), blast all these delights? What relish finds a man in large revenues and stately buildings, in high preferments and honorable titles, when either his body or his mind is in anguish! And besides the emptiness of all these things, you know they want one main point, continuance. But the loving kindness of God hath all requisites to make the soul happy. O, satisfy us early with thy goodness (or mercy), says Moses, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days. Psalm xc. 14. There is fulness in that for the vastest desires of the soul—satisfy us: there is solid contentment—that begets true joy and gladness; and there is permanency —all our days. It is the only comfort of this life, and the assurance of a better. This were a large subject to insist on, but certainly the naming of his loving kindness should beget in each heart a high esteem of it, an ardent desire after it. And if it do so with you, then know, that it is only to be found in the way of holiness. He is a holy God, and can love nothing that is altogether unlike himself. There must always be some similitude and conformity of nature to ground kindness and friendship upon, and to maintain it. That saying is true, Idem velle et idem nolle, firma amicitia. What gross self-flattery is it, to think that God's loving kindness can be toward you, while you are in love with sin, which he so perfectly hates! How can the profane swearer, or voluptuous person, or the oppressor and covetous, or the close hypocrite (worse than any of them), rest upon the loving kindness of the Lord in the day of troubles? No, surely. But the terror of his wrath shall be added to all their other calamities; and they shall find it heavier than all the rest. God will not pour this precious oil of gladness, this persuasion of his love, into filthy vessels. Even his own children, when they grieve and sadden his holy Spirit by unholiness, shall be sadly punished by the withdrawing of those comforting and sensible expressions of his love.

Labor, then, you who as yet never tasted of this love, to know what it means. For-sake and hate that which hitherto has made you strangers to it; for if you obtain this, it shall comfort you when those things can not, but would rather prove your greatest torment. And you who have received any testimonies of it, entertain it carefully, for it is your best comfort both in your best days and in your worst days too.

You would all gladly be delivered from the many evils that threaten you; for many they be indeed, and peace is a great blessing. But suppose you were secured from all those fears, and he should command a sudden calm (which truly he can do), would you then think yourselves happy? That life of yours which you so fear to lose by fire or sword, though you had peace, would ere long fall into the hands of some ague, or fever, or consumption, and perish by them; or at the longest, a few years will end it: it is a lighted candle, which, though nobody blow out, will quickly burn out of itself. But this loving kindness is not so short lived: it shall last as long as your souls, and so long as it lasts, they shall be happy. Those goods that you fear shall be pillaged and spoiled in war, how many hazards are they subject to even in peace! Solomon tells you, that riches oftentimes, though nobody should take them away, make themselves wings, and fly away. And truly, many times the undue sparing of them, is but the letting of their wings grow, which makes them readier to fly away: and the contributing a part of them to do good, only clips their wings a little, and makes them stay the longer with their owner. But this by the way. Howsoever, in the day of death, and in the day of wrath, as Solomon says, they profit nothing at all. Prov. xi. 4. So, then, though you may desire that God would command deliverance for you, yet, if you would be truly happy, your greater and more earnest suit should be, that he would command his loving kindness to appear to your souls. And having once obtained this, you may possibly be persecuted, and endure hard trials, but one thing is made sure, you can not be miserable. Nor shall you want temporal mercies and preservation too, so far as they are good for you. The inward assurance of this love shall carry you strangely and sweetly through all outward vicissitudes; and when the day shall come, that all other comforts shall look pale upon you, then shall you find the worth and happiness of this more than ever before. Observe,

2. The manner in which the psalmist expects to enjoy the object of his confidence. The Lord will command, make it appear to me. Sometimes God is said to shut up and hide his love from his children, and that is a mournful time with them. But we read not that he shuts out his love, and ceaseth altogether to have affection to those whom once he loved. And therefore, when he shows himself again, in the gracious manifestations of his mercy, he is not said to begin anew to love them, but only to command his love, which erewhile he had countermanded to appear.

3. The time: In the day. If you have a mind to take the day and night, figuratively, for prosperous and adverse times, it would lead you, in that sense, to observe David's constancy in God's praises; which was such that not only in the day of deliverance, but even in the night of distress, he resolved a song for God. And truly, many times God gives his children in an afflicted condition, more sweetness of spirit, more aptitude, not only to pray, but to praise, and more spiritual delight in himself, than in times of outward peace and prosperity. He giveth songs in the night, said Job; and you know the sound of music is most delightful in the night. But to take it properly, David is confident that in the several actions and occurrences of the day he should find the goodness and favorable assistance of the Lord; and then he resolves (which leads to the other part of the text) in the night time to meditate on that goodness, and to frame a song of praise to the Author of it.

And indeed, what is the whole thread of our life, but a checkered twist, black and white, of delights and dangers interwoven? and the happiest passing of it, is constantly to enjoy and to observe the experiences of God's goodness, and to praise him for them. David was a wise king, and withal a valiant soldier, and yet we see he thought not this experience inconsonant with either of these two conditions. This precious book of Psalms (a great part thereof being his) testifies clearly that prayer and praises were his great employment. A religious disposition of mind may not only consist with fortitude and magnanimity, but is indeed the best principle and cause of both, contrary to the wicked and foolish opinion of profane persons. Whether of the two, do you think, might welcome a day of battle with most courage and resolution, he that had passed the preceding night in revelling and carousing, or he that had spent it in prayer, and obtained some assurance of a better life? Truly, if they went on with equal forwardness, there is no man, except he were an atheist, but would judge the one to be brutish fury and precipitation, and the other true valor.

His song. In the worst estate there is ever some matter of praise to be mixed with request; and truly, we may justly suspect that our neglect of praises makes our prayers unacceptable.

And my prayer. In the best estate here below, praise must be accompanied with prayer. Our wants, and necessities, and straits, return daily upon us, and require new supplies of mercy; and prayer, if we know how to use it right, is the way to obtain them all.

To the God of my life, or, the God that is my life. This word is added, as the reason of all that went before. If you ask David why he reposes so much upon the loving kindness of God, what he means, to spend so much pains in praises and prayer to God; he answers, Because he is my life. He is the author and preserver of my temporal life, and all the passages and accidents of it are in his hand alone. He hath also given me, and he maintains in me a spiritual life; yea, he is the life of my soul: it lives by union with him, as my body does by union with it, and he hath laid up life eternal for me. Would Christians think thus indeed, the light of this consideration would dispel their distrustful fears. Certainly there is atheism at the bottom of them; if not a denial or a misconceit of God, at least a forgetfulness of God. See Isa. li. 12, 13: I, even I, am he that comforteth you. Who art thou that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man, which shall be made as grass, and forgettest the Lord thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth? Consider, then, that men have no power over our present life, but by the appointment of God. And beside that, we have another life which is infinitely more precious than this: a life spiritual, and which is the beginning of eternal life; and this is altogether out of danger from them. Our life is hid with Christ in God. Col. iii. 3. It is hid, and wicked men can not so much as see it: how then should they take it from us, seeing it is hid? And that not meanly: it is hid with Christ in God: What then shall become of it? Read the next verse, and read it to your comfort, for there is abundance in it, if you look right upon it. When Christ, who is our life shall appear, we likewise shall appear with him in glory. They that are in God, being united to him through Christ, can never by any power be separated from him. It is an indissoluble union. Death itself, that is the great dissolver of all other unions, civil and natural, is so far from untying this, that it consummates it: it conveys the soul into the nearest and fullest enjoyment of God, who is its life, where it shall not need to desire that God would command (or send) his loving kindness, as it were from a distance: it shall be then at the spring-head, and shall be satisfied with his love for ever.

SERMON VII.

GENEROUS GRIEF.

WHEREFORE do you spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfies not? says the prophet. Isaiah lv. 2. All men agree in this, that they would willingly meet with some satisfying good; and yet, if you look aright upon the projects and labors of the greatest part, you shall find them flying from it, and taking much pains to be miserable. And truly, considering the darkness that is upon the soul of man, it is no great wonder to see those miss their way, and continue wandering, who hear not the voice of the gospel to recall them, and see not its light to direct them. But this is somewhat strange, that where true happiness, and the true way to it are propounded and set before men, so few should follow it in good earnest. If the excellency of that good did not allure them, yet one would think that their many disappointments in all other things, should drive them home to it. How often do we run ourselves out of breath after shadows! And when we think we have overtaken them, and would lay hold of them, we find nothing. And yet, still we love to befool ourselves, even against our own experience, which, we say, uses to make fools wiser. Still we choose rather to shift from one vanity to another, than to return to that Sovereign Good, that alone can fill the vastest desires of our souls; rather to run from one broken cistern to another, as the prophet calls them, yea, and to take pains to hew them out, than have recourse to that Fountain of living waters. One main thing that makes men thus rove and wander is, that they do not reflect upon their own course, nor upon themselves, what is the main end they aim at, and then see whether their way be suitable to that end. If they would be happy (as who would not?) then surely, things that are empty, and uncertain, and certainly perishing, will not serve the turn. And truly, as the thought would be seasonable at any time, so especially to us in these times, wherein, beside the common uncertainty of outward things, there is an apparent visible hazard that men's lives and fortunes are likely to be put to. Will you make advantage and gain of your trouble? Thus: The looser you find other things tied to you, and as it were upon a running knot, secure that one thing, and your portion in it, which is worth all the rest; yea, far above them all, and that alone which can be secured, and made certain. Wanting this, what though you had peace, and health, and all imaginable prosperity, you would still be miserable, being liable to the wrath of God, and eternal destruction. But if once united to Christ, and in him reconciled to God, and entitled to heaven, what can fall amiss to you? You shall have joy in the midst of sorrow and affliction, and peace in the midst of war, yea, and life in death. But think not to attain this assurance while you continue profane and Godless, not seeking it in the way of holiness, for there alone it is to be found. And withal beg it of God by humble prayer.

PSALM cxix. 136.

Rivers of waters run down mine eyes: because they keep not thy law.

LOVE is the leading passion of the soul: all the rest follow the measure and motion of it, as the lower heavens are said to be wheeled about with the first.

We have here a clear instance of it in the psalmist, who is testifying his love to God, by his esteem and love of the law or word of God. What is each of the several verses of this Psalm, but a several breathing and vent of this love, either in itself, or in the causes, or in the effects of it? Where he sets forth the excellencies and utilities of God's law, there you have the causes of his love. His observing and studying of it, his desire to know it more and observe it better, these are the effects of his affection to it. The love itself he often expresseth, ver. 47, 48, 113, and 140. Thy word is pure; therefore thy servant loveth it. And ver. 127: I love thy commandments above gold, yea, above fine gold. But as scarcely accounting that love which can be uttered, how much it is, ver. 97, he expresseth it most by intimating that he can not express it: O, how I love thy law! Hence are his desires (which are love in pursuit) so earnest after it. Among many, that is pathetic, verse 20: My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgment at all times. Hence, likewise, his joy and delight (which are love in possession), verse 14: I have rejoiced in the way of thy testimonies as much as in all riches; and ver. 16, I will delight myself in thy statutes; I will not forget thy word. We have his hatred of things opposite (which is love's antipathy), ver. 113, I hate vain thoughts, but thy law do I love;

ver. 163, I hate and abhor lying, but thy law do I love. And in the 139th verse you shall find his zeal (which is no other than the fire of love stirred up or blown into a flame), My zeal hath consumed me; because mine enemies have forgotten thy words. And (to omit the rest) in the 158th verse, his love to the law, shows its sympathy in sorrow for the violation of the law: I beheld the transgressors and was grieved; because they kept not thy word. And here you find this grief swelling to such a height, that it runs over into abundant tears. Rivers of waters run down mine eyes; because they keep not thy law.

The words have briefly, these rivers in their channel and course. They run down mine eyes; and then, in their spring and cause, to wit, the psalmist's sympathy with God's law broken by men, in the latter clause of the verse, because they keep not thy law. But both together clearly teach us, That godly men are affected with deep sorrow for the sins of the ungodly.

More particularly consider, I. The object of this affection. II. The nature of it. III. The degree or measure of it. IV. Its subject.

I. The object is, the transgression of the law, or, to take it (as in the text) in concreto, men transgressors of the law: They keep not thy law. It is true, the whole creation groaneth under the burden of sin, in the effects of it, as the Apostle speaks, Rom. viii. 32; but sin itself is man's enemy, he being that reasonable creature to whom the law was given. Now in the general it is a matter of grief to a godly mind to consider the universal depravedness of man's nature; that he is a transgressor from the womb; that the carnal mind is enmity against God, not subject to his law, neither, while it remains such, can it be. Rom. viii. 6. And this grief will go the deeper by remembering whence he is fallen. When he was new come forth of the hands of his Maker, that image of God which he stamped upon him shined bright in his soul: the whole frame of it was regular and comely, the inferior faculties obeying the higher, and all of them subject unto God. But how soon was he seduced, and then what a great change ensued! Quantum mutatus ab illo! There is ever since, such a tumult and confusion in the soul, that it can not hear the voice of God's law, much less obey and keep it. Hence is that complaint of the psalmist oftener than once, They are all gone out of the way, and become abominable: there is none that doth good, no, not one. Mundus immundus, ἐν σκότειναις, lies buried in it, as the word is used in the inscription of tombs, ἐν σκότειναις. Look abroad in the world, and what shall ye see but a sea of wickedness over the face of the whole, which draws from a godly, discerning eye that beholds it, these rivers of tears? The greatest part not knowing the true God, nor the true religion and the true way of his worship. And for those that do, yet, how unlike are they to it in their lives! The reformed churches this way, how unreformed are they in a great part!

But more particularly to branch this out a little in respect to several sorts of men, this godly grief is a very large sphere; it will extend to remote people, remote every way, not only in place but in manners and religion, even to heathens and gross idolaters. Yea, the very sins of enemies, and of such as are professed enemies to God, yet move the tender-hearted Christian to sorrow and compassion. Of whom I now tell you weeping, says St. Paul, that they are enemies to the cross of Christ. Phil. iii. 8. Enemies, and yet he speaks of them weeping. What he writes concerning them, he would have written in tears, if that had been legible. Thus you see the extension of this grief. But yet, out of all question, it will be more intense in particulars of nearer concernment. It is the burden of the pious man's heart, that his law who made the world and gives being to all things, should be so little regarded, and so much broken through all the world; but yet more especially, that in his own church, among his own people, transgression should abound. Sins within the church are most properly scandals. God manifest himself (so to speak) most sensible of those, and therefore the godly man is so too. Whether they be the continual enormities of licentious and profane persons, which are by external profession in the face of the visible church (though indeed they be in it but as spots and blemishes, as the apostle speaks; 2 Pet. ii. 13), or whether it be the apostasy of hypocrites; or (which sometimes falls out) the gross falls of true converts; all these are the great grief of the godly. The relations of men, either natural or civil, will add something too; this sorrow will in such cases be greater than ordinary in a Christian: he will melt it in a particular tenderness for the sins of his kindred, parents or children, husband or wife; and most of all, ministers will grieve for the sins of their people. How pathetically does this appear in St. Paul! And lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness, which they have committed, 2 Cor. xii. 21. A man can not but be more particularly touched with the sins of that nation, and of that city, and congregation and family, whereof he is a member. So we read of Lot, 2 Pet. ii. 8: For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, veiled his righteous soul, from day to day, with their unlawful deeds. The sins of more eminent persons, either in church or commonwealth, will most affect a prudent Christian, because their inclinations and actions import the public much. Therefore the apostle, when he had exhorted to supplications and prayers for all men, particularly mentions kings, and such as are in authority. 1 Tim. i. 2. And truly, when they are abused by misadvice and corrupt counsel, some of these tears were very well spent, if poured forth before God in their behalf: for in his hand, as that wise king confesseth, are their hearts, there compared to rivers of waters; let their motion be never so impetuous, yet he turneth them whithersoever he pleaseth. Prov. xxi. 1. And who knows but these rivers of waters, these tears, may prevail with the Lord to reduce the violent current of that river, a king's heart, from the wrong channel?

II. But to proceed: the second thing to be considered in this affection, is, the nature of it. (1.) It is not a stoical apathy, and affected carelessness; much less a delightful partaking with sinful practices. (2.) Not a proud setting off of their own goodness, with marking the sin of others, as the Pharisee did in the gospel. (3.) Not the derision and mocking of the folly of men, with laughing philosopher: it comes nearer to the temper of the other who wept always for it. It is not a bitter, bilious anger, breaking forth into railings and reproaches, nor an upbraiding insultation. Nor is it a vindictive desire of punishment, venting itself in cursings and imprecations, which is the rash temper of many, but especially of the vulgar sort. The disciples' motion to Christ was far different from that way, and yet he says to them, You know not of what spirit ye are. They thought they had been of Elijah's spirit, but he told them they were mistaken, and did not know of what spirit they were in that motion. Thus heady zeal often mistakes and flatters itself. We find not here a desire of fire to come down from heaven upon the breakers of the law, but such a grief as would rather bring water to quench it, if it were falling on them. Rivers of waters run down mine eyes.

III. The degree of this sorrow: it is vehement, not a light, transient dislike, but a deep resentment, such as causeth not some few sighs, or some drops of tears, but rivers—Palge maijim. Pelagus aquarum. It is true, the measure and degree of sorrow for sin, whether their own or others, are different in divers persons, who are yet true mourners; and they are also different in the same person, at divers times, not only upon the difference of the cause, but even where the cause is equal, upon the different influence and working of the Spirit of God. Sometimes it pleaseth him to warm and melt the heart more abundantly, and so he raises these rivers, in those eyes, to a higher tide than ordinary; sometimes they remove again. But yet this godly sorrow is always serious and sincere; and that is the other quality here remarkable in it. It is not a histrionical weeping, only in public; for the speech is here directed to God, as a more frequent witness of these tears than any other; who is always the witness of the sincerity of them, even when they can not be hid from the eyes of men. For I deny not but they may, and should, have vent in public, especially at such times as are set apart for solemn mourning and humiliation. Yet, even then, usually these streams run deepest, where they are stillest and most quietly conveyed. But surely they should not be fewer and less frequent, alone, than in company, for that is a little subject to suspicion. See Jer. ix. 1: Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people. And, xiii. 17; But if ye will not hear it, my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride, and mine eyes shall weep sore, and run down with tears, because the Lord's flock is carried away captive.

IV. The subject of this affection is, not to the ungodly themselves, who are professed transgressors of this law; they rather make a sport of sin, as Solomon speaks; they play and make themselves merry with it, as the Philistines did with Samson, till it brings the house down about their ears; but the godly are they that are affected with this sorrow, such as are careful observers of the law themselves, and mourn first for their own breaches: for these are the only fit mourners for the transgression of others.

Now to inquire a little into the cause of this, why the breaking of God's law should cause such sorrow in the godly, as here breaketh forth into abundance of tears. We shall find it very reasonable if we consider, 1. The nature of sin, which is the transgression, or breach of the law, as the apostle defines it. 2. The nature of this sorrow and these tears. 3. The nature of the godly.

1. Sin is the greatest evil in the world; yea, truly, in comparison, it alone is worth the name of evil, and therefore may justly challenge sorrow, and the greatest sorrow. The greatest of evils it is, both formally, in that it alone is the defilement and deformity of the soul, and casually, being the root whence all other evils spring; the fruitful womb that conceives and brings forth all those miseries that either man feels, or hath cause to fear. Whence are all those personal evils incident to men in their estates, or in their bodies, or minds, outward turmoils and diseases, and inward discontents, and death itself, in all the kinds of it; are they not all the fruits of that bitter root? Whence arise those public miseries of nations and kingdoms, but from the epidemic national sins of the people, as the deserving and procuring cause at God's hand, and withal, oftentimes from the ambitious and wicked practices of some particular men, as the working and effecting causes? So that every way, if we follow these evils home to their original, we shall find it to be sin, or the breaking of God's law. Ungodly men, though they meddle not with public affairs at all, yea, though they be faithful and honest in meddling with them, yet, by reason of their impious lives, are traitors to their nation: they are truly the incendiaries of states and kingdoms. And these mourners, though they can do no more, are the most loyal and most serviceable subjects, bringing tears to quench the fire of wrath, rivers of waters. And therefore sorrow and tears are not only most due to sin, as the greatest of evils, but they are best bestowed upon it, if they can do any thing to its redress, because that is both the surest and most compendious way to remedy all the rest, sin being the source and spring of them all.

This is the reason why Jeremiah, ch. ix. 1, when he would weep for the slain of his people, is straightway led from that to bewail the sin of his people, ver. 2, 3. And in his Book of tears and lamentations, he often reduces all these sad evils, to sin as causing them, particularly ch. v. 16, The crown is fallen from our head. Wo unto us, that we have sinned! He turns the complaint more to the sin than to the affliction.

2. Consider the nature of these tears. Tears spent for worldly crosses, are all lost; they run all to waste; they are lachrymæ inanes, empty, fruitless things. But tears shed for the breach of God's law, are the means to quench God's wrath. The prayers and tears of some few, may avert the punishment of many, yea, of a whole land. And if not so, yet they are not lost; the mourners themselves have always benefit by them: as you have it in that known place, Ezek. ix. 4, they that mourned for the common abominations were marked, and the common desolation took not hold on them. This mourning for other men's wickedness, both testifies and preserves the godly man's innocence. I say, it preserves it, as well as testifies it: it keeps him from the contagion of that bad air he lives in; for without this, sin would soon grow familiar. It is good for men to keep up and maintain in their souls a dislike of sin; for when once it ceaseth to be displeasing to a man, it will, before long, begin to be pleasing to him.

3. If we consider the nature of the godly, we shall see this mourning suit with it exceedingly, both in regard of his relation to God, and to man. God is his father, and therefore it can not but grieve him much, to see him offended and dishonored. Love to God, and consequently to his law, and love to men, and desire of their good, are the spring of these rivers. A godly man is tender of God's glory and of his law; every stroke that it receives, striketh his heart: and he hath bowels of compassion to men, and would be glad if they were converted and saved. He considers every man as his brother, and therefore is sorrowful to see him run the hazard of perishing in sin. The former sympathy, whereby the godly man tenders the glory of God, is from his piety: this latter, whereby he pities the misery of man, is from his charity. And from these flow the rivers that run down his eyes.

To be too sensible of worldly crosses, and prodigal of tears upon such slight occasions, is little better than childish or womanish; but these tears that flow from love to God and grief for sin, have neither uncomeliness nor excess in them. Abundance of them will beseem any man who is a Christian. Let profane men judge it a weakness to weep for sin, yet, we see David do it. Men of arms and valor need not fear disparagement by weeping thus: it is the truest magnanimity, to be sensible of the point of God's honor, which is injured by sin.

Again, the consideration of this truth will discover the world guilty of very much ingratitude to godly men. It hath always been the custom of profane persons, to seek to brand religion and godliness with disloyalty and turbulency, and to make it pass for an enemy to the peace and prosperity of states and kingdoms. You see clearly with what affection religion furnishes men toward the public, causing them to mourn for common sins, and so to prevent, as far as in them lies, common calamities. And this is of no little consequence; for truly, it is not foreign power, so much as sin at home, that ruins kingdoms. All the winds that blow without the earth, be they never so violent, stir it not; only that which is within its own bowels, makes an earthquake. It was a grave answer of Epaminondas, being asked what he was doing solitary and pensive in the time of solemn mirth and feasting: While my countrymen, said he, are so peaceably feasting, I am thinking on the best means to preserve that peace to them that it may continue. Which, a little altered, is applicable to the godly. They are oftentimes mourning for the sins and praying for the peace, of the places where they live; when in the mean time, the greatest part are multiplying sin, and so forfeiting their peace.

Rivers of waters. "This is a mournful, melancholy life that these Precisians lead," says the worldling. Yes, truly, if there were no more in it than what we can perceive and judge of. But besides the full joy laid up for them, and the beginnings of it here, there is even in this mourning an unknown sweetness and delight. The philosopher says even of common tears, that there is some kind of pleasure in them, as some things please the taste by their very tartness. But of these tears, they that know them, know it to be eminently true, that they are pleasant. But be this exercise as sad as the profane call it, yet, why observe they not that they themselves are much the cause of it? As they may read here; Because they keep not God's law.

But to pass by divers inferences that the words afford, let us take notice of the duty here practised, and how much we are all obliged to the present practice of it. Who will deny that we have too much matter and occasions of it? Besides the sorrow of Sion, and particularly the bloodshedding and distress of our brethren, and our own danger, what corner of the land, what rank or condition of people is there that abounds not in gross and heinous violations of God's law? They keep not thy law: magistrates and judges turning judgment into gall and wormwood: ministers remiss in that great care, the care of souls; people wallowing in ungodliness and uncleanness, swearing, and other profaneness; the greater oppressing the less, and the less defrauding and wronging the greater; no sensible and notable work of conversion almost to be seen or heard of among us; the Lord absenting himself from his ordinances. O that he would dwell in his house, and fill it with a cloud of his glory!

What vile uncleanness and wantonness! What shameful drunkenness and excess! And some are so far from mourning for others' guiltiness of this sin, that they glory in making others guilty of it, and count it a pastime to make others drunk. And this is a far greater sin than drunkenness itself; for these men, while they make beasts of their companions, make devils of themselves, becoming tempters and provokers to sin. If any such be here, either tremble at the wo that the prophet Habbakkuk (chap. ii.) denounceth, or confess that you believe not the scriptures: Wo to him that gives his neighbor drink, and puts the bottle to him to make him drunken. The cup of the Lord's right hand shall be turned to thee: it is full of heavy vengeance. There is a cup, if you like it, to pay you home the cups you give to others.

Again, how is the land filled with oaths and cursings! How are your streets, and almost all companies where a man can come, defiled, partly with tearing the precious name of God, partly with calling on the devil!

There would be no end of reckoning up all particulars; sabbath-breaking, fraud and covetousness, pride and malice, and envyings one of another, and the rest. But the sum is this, a universal want of the fear of God and his law.

And the cause of this, is, in a great part, ignorance of God and of his law. And truly it is wonderful under so much light and such plentiful preaching, to find so much darkness, not only in the skirts and remote places, but even in the prime parts of this land. Multitudes there are that are strangers to the very principles and fundamentals of that religion which they profess; and they that have knowledge are found abusing it, and sinning against it, continuing in profaneness. And without this true religion, it is as impossible to have renewed hearts and lives, as to have a house without a foundation, or, as we say, a castle in the air. And this atheism and ignorance among people, is in a great part to be imputed to the corruption and sloth of ministers. Would to God there were not many congregations, not altogether destitute, but such as are freezing under a cold and lifeless ministry!

You see, then, we want not causes of mourning and humiliation, on all hands; but our want is inward, of that due disposition for it, softness of heart, and that love to God, which should melt and mollify the heart. Let us then stir up ourselves and one another, to this godly sorrow for the sins of the land. There is need of rivers of tears for these heaps of sin: as they tell of Hercules' letting in a river to that monstrous stable of Augeus, that could not otherwise have been cleansed in the time allotted him.

And truly, as the duty lies upon all the faithful, the ministers of the word ought to be most eminent in it, the chief mourners, the precentors, to take up the tune of these themes. Joel ii. 17. And all that wish the good of church and kingdom, ought to bear a part in them, according to their measure. Have we not much need to entreat reconciliation with God, that he prove not our enemy? Yes, surely, and were we reconciled with him, we should have little need to fear the power of man.

Now, they that would be profitable mourners for others' sins, by all means, must have these two conditions I mentioned; to be careful observers of the law themselves, and to mourn for their own failing and breaking of it. Now, to the observing of the law, it is absolutely needful (1.) To know and understand it, and that not only in the letter and surface, but according to the spiritual sense and meaning of it. For without this knowledge, a man may light upon some duty by guess, as it were in the dark, but observe the law he can not. They are not alone reproveable, who glory in their own sins, and make sport of the sins of others, but they mistake it much, who think it enough to consider their own with grief, and judge the sins of others an impertinency for them to think on. As they mourn not aright for others, who begin not at themselves, so they mourn never aright for themselves, who end in themselves. He who here thus weeps for others, made his bed to swim with those rivers for his own sin. Psalm vi. 6. (2.) As a man must know this law, so he must be inwardly convinced and persuaded of the divinity of it, that it is God's law. (3.) He must have a deep apprehension of the majesty and authority of the Lawgiver, to work reverence, and of his goodness, to beget love; and the due mixture of these two will both strongly command and sweeten obedience to his commandments. And this obedience, though it be not an absolute and perfect fulfilling of any one of the commandments, yet it has a respect to them all, as this Psalm hath it (ver. 6), which is (so to speak) an imperfect kind of perfection. And from this respect to the law, which is the observing of it, will flow that other condition, of grieving when we break it.

And beside all other things that should make a Christian's own sin grievous to him, there is one thing can not but move him much, the consideration of the sorrow and sufferings of Christ. To view the bleedings of the Lord Jesus, can not but pierce a believing soul, and make it say, "Did my Redeemer shed his blood for my sins, and shall not I myself shed tears for them?" I know the natural constitution of some denies them tears; but if it do so to any, make up that want with a sense of inward grief, and it is well enough. The eye of God can discern that as well as the other. But truly, where men have tears for lighter causes (for all other causes are lighter), and none for this, they feel not yet the weight of sin; except that want be through the deepness of sorrow, which sometimes will stop the current of tears, though it used to run at other times: as they say, Cura leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent. But this is a rare and a happy impediment.

And to answer another doubt: If you find sometimes worldly griefs stir you more violently, yet, let this godly sorrow affect you more constantly, that it may have the advantage in continuance, if it fall short in the degree.

But as this grief must begin at home, as they say of charity, it must not be so selfish as to rest there. And truly, where it comes in that order, it may be some way a stronger evidence of sincerity to mourn for others' sins than to mourn for our own; for there seems to be more of God in it, because there is less in it of ourselves, and of our own particular interest.

Now you will possibly think it but an unpleasant duty that you have heard urged all this while; but look forward, and consider the issue of it. That which Christ speaks in particular to his disciples, is generally true of all Christians: Ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice; ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned (or made) into joy. John xvi. 20. The water of those tears shall be turned into wine of consolation. The traffic of these rivers is gainful; they export grief, and import joy. When these tears are called seed, the harvest-crop is called joy. Psalm cxxvi. 5. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. They are here called rivers, and they are answered with a river, for which they shall in the end be perfectly exchanged. Psalm lxxxvi. 8: Thou shalt make them drink of the rivers of thy pleasures. And Rev. vii. 17: The Lamb shall feed them and lead them unto living fountains of waters. Here they run down the eyes, and water the cheeks, and there you read that God shall wipe them away from their eyes. Who would not be content to weep, to have God wipe away their tears with his own hand? Be ambitious, then, to be found among the mourners in Sion; and when ye remove from this valley of tears, God shall at once fully wipe away all the stain of sin from your souls, and all tears for it from your eyes. And as he shall wipe away the tears with the one hand, he will set the crown upon your heads with the other.

SERMON VIII.

THE NAME OF JESUS FRAGRANT.

Preached after the administration of the Lord's Supper.

BLESSED are they that dwell in thy house, saith the psalmist; and he adds this reason, They will be still praising thee. There is indeed always in God's house, both fit opportunity and plentiful matter of his praises. But the greater number of those who frequent his house, do not dwell in it; their delight and affection is not there. Therefore they can not praise him; they come in as strangers, and have no skill in the songs of praise. Yea, and the very children of the family, who worship in spirit and in truth, find their instruments (their hearts) very often quite out of tune for praises, and sometimes most of all when praises are requisite. They find still such abundant cause of complaint in themselves, weighing down their spirits, that they can hardly at all wind them up to magnify that God whose mercy is far more abundant. If we would take a reflex view, and look back upon our carriage this day in the presence of our God, who is there among us who would not find much work for sad thoughts? Would not one find that he had a hard and stony heart, another a light, inconstant, wandering heart to complain of, a third an unbelieving heart, and some all of these? And they (if such there be) who have both deeply sorrowed and been largely comforted, will possibly, for all that, upon former sad experience, be full of fears and jealousies that this sweet temper will not be of long continuance; that before long, the world, or some lust, will find or make a way to creep in, and banish those heavenly thoughts, and trouble that peace and joy which accompanies them. Yet notwithstanding all these causes of grief or fear, our causes of praise are both more and greater. And it is no reason that the sense of our own evil should prejudice that acknowledgment of God's goodness; yea, rather it should stir us up to extol it so much the more. Cease not to bemoan the evils of your own hearts; but withal forget not to magnify the riches of his grace, who hath given himself for you, and to you. These two will not hinder one another, but the due intermixture of them will make a very good harmony. And the fruit of them will be this, you shall have still more cause to praise, and less to complain. When the Lord shall find you humble acknowledgers of his grace, he will delight to bestow more grace upon you, and will subdue those iniquities for you, which you can not. And though he is pleased to do it but gradually, by little and little, yet, in the end, the conquest shall be full; and then, he who is the author and the finisher of your faith, though it is his own work, yet, because it is done in you, he shall account the victory yours, as obtained by you, and give you, as conquerors, the crown of glory. To him that overcometh, saith he, will I give to sit with me in my throne. Rev. iii. 21.

There is nothing here, but from free grace. The courage and strength to fight in this spiritual warfare, the victory by fighting, and the crown by victory, flow all from that fountain. In all these things we are more than conquerors, saith the apostle—but how?—through him that loved us. Therefore, if we desire to be such, let us humble ourselves before the throne of grace, entreating both for grace and glory in the name of Christ our Mediator.

CANT. i. 3.

Because of the savor of thy good ointments, thy name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the virgins love thee.

THE natural workings and desires of things are agreeable to their being. The beasts, according to their sensitive life, seek those things that tend to the good and preservation of that life, and affect nothing higher than those, and they are satisfied. Man (except such men as are in the lowest stage, and border upon the beasts) finds nature, even corrupt nature, raising him to higher desires and designs. And yet, of the best of them, the apostle's maxim holds true, They that are after the flesh mind the things of the flesh; and yet, he subjoins the excellency of some men beyond the best naturalist, They that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit. Rom. viii. 5. They can not be confined to things natural, but are strongly moved toward spiritual blessings, and toward Christ the sum of them. And having once tasted of his sweetness, they can say, Because of the savor of thy good ointments, thy name is as ointment poured forth.

They that are elevated to a supernatural being, can admit nothing into competition with his love: and this it is that lies under these words, Because of the savor of thy good ointments, &c.

Numbers have promiscuously been his guests at this time, and the greatest number think they came to good purpose. But know, that you are so far from partaking of Christ in the sacrament, that you have not so much as smelt its perfumes, if you be not strongly taken with his love. Great are the praises, and many the duties you owe him for so rich favors; and therefore, show your good will, and endeavor some payment. But know, that none of them are current, except they be stamped with love. If you love not, you do nothing; all your labors and services without it, are as so many ciphers, they amount to just nothing. And with it, the meanest of them will find acceptance.

You have briefly in the words, Christ's loveliness and the Christian's love, the former the cause of the latter; both couched under borrowed terms, according to the whole strain of this allegorical song, on which the true experimental knowledge of this Divine love is the best commentary.

In all love, three things are necessary: (1.) Some goodness in the object, either true and real, or apparent and seeming to be so; for the soul, be it never so evil, can affect nothing but what it takes some way to be good. (2.) There must be a knowledge of that goodness; for the most excellent things, if altogether unknown, affect not. (3.) There must be a suitableness or agreement of that good thing with the nature of those who should affect it; otherwise, indeed, how good soever it is, it is not good to them.

Now all these we have clearly in this love. I. The goodness, the excellency of Christ expressed by precious ointments. II. The manifestation and making of it known, signified by the pouring forth of his name. III. His fitness and congruity with them who are here mentioned under this denomination, virgins; such as have the senses of their souls not stopped with the pollutions of the world, but pure and active, and therefore, as the apostle speaks, Heb. v. 14, exercised to discern good and evil. These three requisites, thus happily met, must needs produce love: Therefore the virgins love thee.

I. The excellency of the object: Because of the savor of thy good ointments. How true is the apostle's word, when he calls Christ the believer's All things! And that radical grace of faith, because it apprehends Christ, hath a kind of universality; and it is reasonable, too, it alone being to the soul what all the five senses are to the body. It is the eye, and the mouth; a wonderful eye, it sees him who is invisible, Heb. xi. 27; the mouth, it tastes that the Lord is gracious, 1 Peter ii. 3. Yea, take these two both together in one place. Psalm xxxiv. 8: O! taste and see that the Lord is good. It is the soul's ear; for what else is meant, when it is said, He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear? And was it not that touch which Christ took special notice of, and with good reason distinguished it from the common touch of the multitude that was crowding about him? That touch alone draws virtue from him: Some one hath touched me, for there is virtue gone out of me. And lastly, as it is all those other senses, and Christ is its object in reference to them all, so here, in its smelling, it finds the savor of his fragrant graces, and by that works love: Because of the savor of thy precious ointments.

What strange odds is there between the opinion of Christ's spouse, and that of the world who know him not! They wonder what she sees in him desirable; she wonders that they are not all ravished with his excellencies. They prefer the basest vanities in the world before him: she finds the choicest and richest things in the world too mean to resemble the smallest part of his worth. See in this Song, how busily and skillfully she goes to all the creatures, and crops the rarest pieces in nature and art to set forth her well-beloved, and seems to find them all too poor for her purpose. One while she extols him above all things beautiful and pleasant to the eye; another while, above things delectable to the taste, as in the former verse, Thy loves are better than wine; and here she prefers the perfume of his graces to the most precious ointments.

When a natural eye looks upon the sacrament, to wit, of the Lord's supper, it finds it a bare and mean kind of ceremony. Take heed there be not many of you that come to it, and partake of it with others, who prize it little, have but low conceits of it, and do indeed find as little in it as you look for. But oh, what precious consolation and grace doth a believer meet with at this banquet! How richly is the table furnished to his eye! What plentiful varieties employ his hand and taste, what abundance of rare dainties! Yet, there is nothing but One here; but that One is all things to the believing soul. It finds his love is sweeter than the richest wine to the taste, or best odors to the smell; and that delightful word of his, Thy sins are forgiven thee, is the only music to a distressed conscience.

Thy good ointments. The holy ointment of the sanctuary, under the law, was composed according to God's own prescription. See Exod. xxx. 25. And they were straightly forbid to imitate it, or make any like it, to signify the singular holiness, the matchless worth of the anointing oil of gladness, wherewith our high priest, the Lord Jesus was anointed above his fellows. And in this he is incomparable, that his ointment he hath not from without. It was his own Divine nature that perfumed his manhood with these precious ointments. God and the Spirit of the Lord are said to have anointed him. Psalm xlv. 7: Thou lovest righteousness and hatest wickedness; therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. And Isa. lxi. 1: The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek. But know, that that Spirit and the Father are one in essence with the eternal Son. In that mystical song much like to this, the xlvth Psalm, it is said (ver. 8) his garments smell of myrrh and aloes and cassia [as he comes forth] out of [his] ivory palaces. When he came down from his glorious court above, to dwell among men, he apparelled himself like them: he was clothed with human flesh. But yet, that vesture was so transcendently enriched with all graces, as with costly perfumes, that men might easily know there was more under them than a mere man. Yea, even in that low estate, did such beams of his glory shine through, that all whose eyes were open did clearly behold them, and know him to be no less than the only begotten Son of God, by this, that he was so full of grace and truth. John i. 14. And these are, in a word, the precious ointments whose delightful smell is here commended.

Now, to enumerate and describe these graces, what tongue of men, yea, or of angels, were sufficient? What other is the main subject of the whole Scriptures? What mean all the figures and ceremonies of the law, the costly furniture and ornaments of the temple, the right vestments of the High Priest, that fine linen, that silk and gold, those gems and precious stones? Was any one of them, were they all any other than shadows and dim resemblances of the matchless perfections of Jesus Christ? It is strange that Christians have so low conceits of their high Redeemer! What is the gospel, but a more clear and plentiful pouring forth of those ointments? What was the great labor and business of the holy apostles, but the diffusing of Christ's graces through the world? I determined to know nothing among you, save Christ, and him crucified, says St. Paul to his Corinthians. What are that other sacrament and this, but coverts under which Christ conveys himself and his graces to the believing soul, while the profane and slight-hearted receivers are sent away with empty elements? Thus you see how ample a subject these graces are in the general. And truly, the consideration of any one particular of them might be the employment of many hours. Would you hear of the wisdom of Christ? Look what the apostle says of it, Col. ii. 3: In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Not some drops of wisdom, no, nor streams, but a fountain. Not one treasure, but treasures, many treasures, yea, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; yet, not obvious to every eye, but, as treasures are, hid. The children of wisdom, who are the world's fools, have some knowledge of this his wisdom, and draw from it for their own use; but to sound the depth of it, who can be able!

No less admirable is his holiness. He is both the immaculate Lamb, and the undefiled Sacrifice. Such a high priest became us. Heb. vii. 26. Became us! Yes, holy, harmless and undefiled: the more we were defiled with sin, the more stood we in need of an undefiled and spotless High Priest. It was as expedient that he should be unlike us in that, as that he should be like us in all other things. Therefore, as for the legal priesthood there was a holy consecrating oil, so this immortal High Priest was anointed with most entire and complete holiness. And this perfect holiness of his, is set forth as myrrh, the best ointments and spices—myrrh which is of a virtue preservative from corruption. He was not only of excellent smell, while he lived among men, but this myrrh did likewise preserve and exempt him from contracting any corruption or pollution, by the bad air of sinful company; so that he conversed with sinners, that he might convert them, without any danger of infection.

And as he was thus extraordinarily anointed with the spirit of wisdom and holiness, so likewise with the spirit of meekness; therefore he is called The Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world. His voice was not heard in the streets. Matt. xii. 19. And take in that other grace which he himself mentions together with his meekness, as being near in nature to it, humility: Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart. Matt. xi. 29. Indeed, humility is an odoriferous grace: it is a gracing grace, it adds a kind of sweetness and lustre to all other graces; yea, it serves singularly as a character for the trial of the truth of all other graces. As balsam, which is the chief of precious ointments, used to be tried; that is the truest and best, which, put into any liquor, goes to the bottom; that but slight, which swims above; so those graces are most upright, that are accompanied with most humility. And that this may be out of doubt, you know that Jesus Christ (of whom we now speak), as he had most grace, so was he most exemplary in humility. And certainly, the sweet smell of this good ointment did fill the whole house, when he washed his disciples' feet; as is said of the ointment that Mary poured upon his feet, in the foregoing chapter. John xii. 3.

Among many other of his gracious qualities that might be mentioned, there is one we can not but take particular notice of, his love; rather, because the fragrant smell of his graces is here said to beget love. Now you know that one of the strongest attractives of love, is love. Ἐρως ἑρωτα τικτει: Magnes amoris amor. What made him empty himself of his glory, as the apostle speaks, but because he was full of love? What made him take on the form of a servant, suffer heat, and cold, and hunger, and poverty, but love? What other was it made him digest the persecutions, revilings, and the contradiction of sinners, but love? But the great wonder of his love is this, he died to become our life. Who hath loved me, and given himself for me, says the great apostle St. Paul. Gal. ii. 20. And, Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us, says the beloved apostle St. John. 1 John iii. 16. Was it the nails that held him fast to the cross, when they tauntingly bade him come down? No; it was his love, that was stronger than death. But all this was nothing to the angry countenance of his Father, nor would he ever have ventured upon that, if infinite love had not persuaded him. No wonder if the apostle call it a love that passeth knowledge. That you may know, saith he, the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. Eph. iii. 19. Know it we may, and should, but we must know withal, that we can not know it fully. And this is our comfort, that it is greater than we can comprehend; for if it were not so, it would be less than we stand in need of. So much of his love we may understand, as may abundantly inflame our hearts with love to him. For this purpose hath he revealed it, and made his name like an ointment poured out. And that is the second thing.

II. His name. That is, the report and manifestation of his excellencies. And if you will take it properly of his name, Jesus, and Christ, or the Messiah, it is true of them, for they are significative of these excellencies. Ask an afflicted conscience, if Jesus, that is, a Savior, be not a precious word that hath a sovereign value, both a refreshing smell and a healing virtue. The hammer of the law may break a stony heart in pieces, but it is only the blood of Jesus that can soften it. And where it is effectually poured, either upon a wounded soul, it heals it, or upon a hard heart, it mollifies it. For that other name, Christ, well may it be called an ointment poured out, for it signifies his anointing. And that the sweet savor of this name may affect, read but that one passage, Isa. lxi. 1. The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek, &c. What inestimable riches of consolation are there in each of those effects to which Christ was anointed! And yet, we find not a word among them all for a proud, stiff-necked sinner. Here are good tidings, but it is to the meek; comfortable binding up, but it is for the broken-hearted; liberty, but it is for captives and prisoners groaning under their chains, and desirous to be delivered; not for such as delight in their bondage. There is oil of joy and garments of praise, but they are provided for mourning, dejected spirits that need them; not for the impenitent. On the contrary, there is a terrible word interjected in the midst of these promises. The day of vengeance of our God; and that is the portion of Christ's enemies, and such are all incorrigible sinners.

Thus it is, at the same banquet from which you come, one may be filled with spiritual joy, and the very person that sits next may be filled with a secret curse, and return more miserable than he came. But let the disconsolate, lamenting sinner lift up his head, and behold Christ, the Son of God, anointed a prophet to preach salvation and liberty to such, a priest to purchase it, and a king, to give it.

Now, the pouring out of his name is divers. Before the coming of the Messiah, his name was poured out in prophecies and promises, in types and legal ceremonies; but more fully when the Word was made flesh. Then angels, and holy men, yea, and women, spake clearly of him. What was his Father's voice at his baptism, the Holy Ghost's descending, what was his own preaching, and miracles, and conversation, but all the pouring forth of his precious name? And in his sufferings and death, what think you? Was not his name then poured forth, yea, his blood with it? Yes, truly; being extended on the cross, and his body pierced in divers places, his precious ointments were shed abroad toward all the quarters of the world: their smell reached both heaven and the visible earth. God the Father, as he was said to do in Noah's sacrifice, did much more smell in his sacrifice, a savor of rest, appeasing his wrath; and all believers a savor of peace, a quieting of their consciences. And as aromatic spices, when they are pounded out and beaten, send forth their sweet smells most liberally, so, in these his sufferings, did the obedience, patience, and love, and all the graces, and the name of our Savior, most clearly manifest themselves to the world. After he was dead, they embalmed his body, but they knew not that his own virtue would do more than all the ointments and spices in the world could do, not only by preserving his body from corruption, but by raising it the third day. And truly, after his resurrection, his own disciples knew his name better than ever before; and yet more fully after his ascension, when the Holy Ghost came down upon them; which was poured from heaven on them for this very end; that they might pour forth Christ's name to the ends of the earth. Acts ii. 8. And they did so carrying this precious treasure in earthen vessels, as that elect vessel St. Paul speaks, 1 Cor. iv. 7. And ever since, God hath continued the pouring forth of his name, by the ministry and preaching of the gospel. It is true, there are too many of those that are employed in this work, who seek themselves, and their own ends, rather than his glory whom they preach. And they that are more upright, the very best of them are sinful men. But how mean and unworthy soever they be, despise not the gospel. Let the sweet name which they pour forth, prevail for itself, that so you may reverence and love it, if you would have salvation by it; and there is no other name under heaven, by which that can be obtained.

As this name is poured forth in the gospel preached, so, in the sacraments annexed to it; and particularly in this, when the bread is broken, and the wine poured out. And was not this the earnest desire of the receivers of it this day—it should have been—to have our share in it, for the refreshment and curing of our souls? Nor shall any that came thus, be disappointed. And if not immediately, yet, most certainly, and that in due time, they shall find the sweet fruits of it.

You have heard many ways how the name of Christ is poured out, yet there is one more, without which all the rest are ineffectual: it is this, the secret and powerful working of the Spirit of God in the soul. The ordinances and means of salvation do indeed pour forth the name of Christ round about a man, but until the Spirit concur with them, not one drop falls within the soul. And is he not so much the more miserable, who hears much of Christ, and partakes nothing of him? Yes, surely. A man may have much common knowledge of Christ, and may understand well, yea, may preach well, concerning his worth and graces, and yet not love him. But there is a particular knowledge of him by the infusion of the Spirit, and where the smallest measure of this is, it presently wins the affection. There is a shedding abroad of the love of God in our hearts, that the apostles speaks of, Rom. v. 5; and this draws us after him; for our love to God is nothing else but the reflection of his love to us. So then, though many hear of Christ, yet, because there are but few that have this special knowledge of him, therefore it is, that so few do truly esteem him and love him; and they are such as are here called Virgins: and that is the third thing.

III. The correspondence in the character of those who love Christ: The virgins. Similitude and conformity of nature beget friendship: pure affections delight in a pure object, and it makes them such. For the truth is, Christ doth not find men naturally suitable to himself, but as he took on our nature, so he washeth away the sinfulness of our nature, which he took not on, and makes us that way conformable to his nature. And they who are so changed, though they were formerly lovers of sin, yet, by conversion, which is called regeneration, they are born again, and so become not only chaste, but even virgins, spiritually. For by virgins, here, are not meant such as Romish votaries fancy them to be: no, this virginity may well consist with any lawful state of life.

These virgins are such as be truly holy and pure in heart and life, who, though they are not perfectly free from all sin, yet have affection to no sin. These are singularly delighted with the smell of Christ's name and graces, while the voluptuous person, and the profane worldling, dislike and despise it! Balsama sic suibus, sic male nardus olent. The virgins, they bestow their affection whole and entire upon Christ.

How grossly do you delude yourselves, who make your hearts dens of pride, filthy lust, malice and envy, and thousands of vanities, and yet think to find a corner in them to lodge Christ too! Truly, you would both straiten him in room, and give him very bad neighbors. No; they that think not a whole heart too little for him, shall never enjoy him.

The virgins love thee.] Grace destroys not the natural passions of the soul, but corrects them only, by destroying their corruption, and so they become not merely not contrary to grace, but are made the subject and seat of grace. This of love, which is the chief of them, we see, it abolisheth not, but rectifies it, recalling it to its due object, and turning it into the right channel, by which it may empty itself into the ocean of goodness.

And this love may well consist with the purity of virgins; yea, it is this love that purifies and makes them such. The virgins love—But whom? Thee. And it is as reasonable a love as it is pure; Therefore they love thee, because thou hast made them in some measure apprehensive of thy worth, which commands the love of all that know it: not a cold and indifferent affection, but a superlative, ardent love, far overtopping all their other desires. And with good reason, since Christ doth infinitely, and beyond all comparison, surpass all other things desirable. Ask your own hearts, if you love Christ thus: for if not thus, you love him not at all. The Apostle St. Paul's love was of this size. Phil. iii. 7, 8. But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ; yea, doubtless and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ. This love will not only undergo difficulties and sufferings for Christ without either repining or fainting, but it will even be glad to meet with them, as opportunity is, to exercise and testify itself. Hard things will seem most easy for his sake, and bitter things exceeding sweet. In a word, to him that loves, scarce anything is impossible. Love is the leading passion of the soul: all the rest conform themselves to it, desire, and hope, and fear, and joy, and sorrow.

If, then, you love Christ, the desires and breathings of your soul after him are strong and earnest. If he withdraw himself, or appear angry, if either you see him not, or see him look discontented, your grief will be so deep that it can not be allayed by any worldly employment. Yet, upon some former tokens of his love, which is known to be unchangeable, hope will uphold the soul, till the beams of his grace scatter the cloud, and break through. Though our Joseph seem strange, and speak roughly for awhile, he can not long refrain discovering his affection.

Again, love you him, unspeakable will be your joy when he smiles upon you. As great will be your delight in possession, as your desire is in pursuit; and while you have his presence, it will be too hard a task for any affliction to dismay you. Have you indeed heard Christ speak comfortably to you this day at his holy table? How will this enable the soul, and arm it against dangers, and distracting, distrustful fears! Perfect love casteth out fear, saith St. John: 1 John iv. 18: that is, all base and servile fear; but there is one fear that is in no heart but where love begets it, fear to offend. You know how wary and loath men are naturally to displease those they love; therefore it is, that love to Christ, and a careful observing of his commandments, are inseparable companions. Yea, love itself is the fulfilling of the law, for it gives up the heart to God, and consequently the whole man. Then there is no return of duty which your receiving of Christ calls for (and what doth it not call for)? there is none, I say, but it is comprised under this one of love. Do you owe him praises? Yes, surely. Then love him; that will stir you up to praise him. You never knew, but where much love was in the heart, it made the tongue ready and active upon all occasions to praise the party loved. Love will entertain small courtesies with great thanks; much more where the benefit so far exceeds all possible thankfulness. Ought you to serve and obey him? Doubtless: he hath for that purpose redeemed you with his precious blood. And truly there is no obedience or service so full and so cheerful, as that which flows from love. Should you study conformity to Christ, and labor to be like him? Yes, for this is to walk worthy of Christ. Then there is nothing assimilates to much as love. Men delight in their society whom they love, and by their society they do insensibly contract their customs, and become like them. These Virgins who love Christ for his graces, they love to converse with him, and by conversing with him, they receive of his graces, and have a smell of his perfumes. Not only do they, by the smell of his garments, or such imposed rites, obtain the blessing, but they likewise smell like him by the participation of sanctifying grace, of his wisdom and holiness, in a pure and godly conversation, abstaining from the impure lusts and pollutions of the world; so likewise of his meekness and humility. Never think that one and the same soul can have much pride and much of Christ. Ever, the more grace a man hath, the more sense hath he likewise of his own unworthiness, and God's free mercy, and consequently the more humility.

If you love Christ, you can not choose but be like him in love to your brethren. This is expressly compared by the psalmist to the precious ointment poured upon Aaron's head, that ran down to the very skirts of his garments. Psal. cxxiii. 2. Our Head and High Priest, the Lord Jesus, hath incomparably testified his love to believers, whom he is pleased to call his brethren. They are far from equalling him, either in love to him, or in love one to another, but they do imitate him in both. This is his great commandment, that we love one another, even as he loved us, which is expressed both as a strong motive and a high example. It is not possible that a spirit of malice and implacable hatred can consist with the love of Christ.

Finally, Should you be ready to suffer for Christ? Yes. Then love is that which will enable you; and if you were inflamed with this fire then, though burned for him, that fire would only consume your dross, and be soon extinguished; but this would endure for ever.

By these and the like evidences, try whether you indeed love the Lord Jesus Christ. And by these fruits, you who profess to love him, testify the sincerity of your love; and be assured, that if you be now found among these virgins that love him, you shall one day be of the number of those virgins that are spoken of, Rev. xiv. 3, 4, who sing a new song before the throne of God.

If you hate the defilements of the world, and be not polluted with inordinate affection to the creature, it shall never repent you to have made choice of Christ. He shall fill your hearts with peace and joy in believing. When you come to his house and table, he shall send you home with joy and sweet consolation, such as you would not exchange for crowns and sceptres. And after some few of these running banquets here below, you shall enter into the great marriage-supper of the Lamb, where faith shall end in sight, and hope in possession, and love continue in perpetual and full enjoyment; where you shall be never weary, but for ever happy in beholding the face of the Blessed Trinity: to whom be glory. Amen.

SERMON IX.

THE SINNER A REBEL AGAINST GOD.

How true is that word of our Savior, who is truth itself, Without me, ye can do nothing:—severed from me, as that branch that is not in me. They who are altogether out of Christ, in spiritual exercises do nothing at all. 'Tis true, they may pray and hear the word, yea, and preach it too, and yet in so doing they do nothing, nothing in effect. They have the matter of good actions, but it is the internal form gives being to things. They are but a number of empty words and a dead service to a living God. For all our outward performances and worship of the body are nothing but the body of worship, and therefore nothing but a carcass, except the Lord Jesus by his Spirit, breathe upon it the breath of life. Yea, the worshipper himself is spiritually dead till he receive life from Jesus, and be quickened by his Spirit. If this be true, then it will follow necessarily, that where numbers are met together (as here), pretending to serve and worship God, yet he hath very few that do so indeed, the greatest part being out of Christ; and such being without him, they can do nothing in his service.

ROMANS viii. 7.

Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.

THE ordinary workings and actions of creatures are suitable to their nature, as the ascending of light things, and the moving of heavy things downward; so, the vital and sensitive actions of things that have life and sense. The reasonable creature, it is true, hath more liberty in its actions, freely choosing one thing and rejecting another; yet it can not be denied, that in the acting of that liberty, their choice and refusal follow the sway of their nature and condition. As the angels and glorified souls, their nature being perfectly holy, and unalterably such, they can not sin, they can delight in nothing but in obeying and praising that God, in the enjoyment of whom their happiness consisteth, still ravished in beholding his face. The saints, again, that have not yet reached that home, and are but on their journey, they are not fully defecated and refined from the dross of sin: there are in them two parties, natural corruption, and supernatural grace; and these keep a struggling within them. But the younger shall supplant the elder: grace shall in the end overcome; and in the meanwhile, though it be not free from mixture, yet it is predominant. The main bent of a renewed man, is, obedience and holiness, and any action of that kind he rejoices in; but the sin that escapes him, he can not look upon but with regret and discontent. But alas! they that be so minded, are very thin sown in the world. Even in God's peculiar fields, where the laborage of the gospel is, and the outward profession of true religion unanimously received, yet, the number of true converts, spiritual-minded persons, is very small; the greatest part acting sin with delight, and taking pleasure in unrighteousness, living in disobedience to God, as in their proper element; and the reason is, the contrariety of their nature to our holy Lord. The carnal mind is enmity against God.

The mind, φρονημα. Some render it the prudence or wisdom of the flesh. Here you have it the carnal mind. But the word signifies, indeed, an act of the mind, rather than either the faculty itself, or the habit of prudence in it, so as it discovers what is the frame of both these, the mindings; as it is used, ver. 5, conformably to that of Moses, Gen. vi., Every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart is only evil continually. The word indeed signifies the wise thoughts. So then, take the full latitude of it thus: The carnal mind, in its best and wisest thoughts, is direct enmity against God.

Carnal [της σαρκος.] What is meant by the flesh here? It is the whole corrupt nature of man; and that we may know by its opposition to the Spirit: not to the spirit or soul of a man, for so it hath no thoughts nor mindings, these being proper to the soul, but opposed to the Spirit of God.

Now, the corruption of nature is called the flesh, not without very good reason, not only to signify the baseness of it, the flesh being the more ignoble and meaner part of a man, but because the greatest part of the sins of men's lives, are about sensitive objects and things that concern the flesh or the body. It lets in temptation of sin to the soul by the doors of the senses, and it gives the last perfection or accomplishment to sin, by the external acting of it. The very first sin, that brought in death and misery with it upon mankind, the pleasures of the eye and of the taste, were sharers in the guiltiness of it.

The carnal mind.] Man in regard of his composition, is, as it were, the tie and band of heaven and earth: they meet and are married in him. A body he has taken out of the dust, but a soul is breathed into him from heaven, from the Father of Spirits: a house of clay, but a guest of most noble extraction. But the pity is, it hath forgot its original, and is so drowned in flesh, that it deserves no other than to go under the name of flesh. It is become the slave and drudge of the body, and like the Israelites in Egypt, made perpetually to toil in clay. What is all your merchandise, your trades and manufactures, your tillage and husbandry, but all for the body, in its behalf, for food and raiment? In all these, the mind must be careful and thoughtful, and yet properly they reach it not, for itself hath no interest in them. It is true, the necessity of the body requires much of these things, and superfluous custom far more; but it is lamentable that men force their soul to forget itself and its proper business, to attend to these things only, and be busy in them. They spend all their time, and their choicest pains, upon perishing things, and which is worse, engage their affections to them. They mind earthly things, whose end is destruction. Phil. iii. 18:—the same word is here, φρονιμα της σαρκος.

Will you consider seriously, that your souls run the hazard of perishing, because you consider not their spiritual nature? When that earthly tabernacle of yours shall fall to the ground (and ere long it must), your souls must then enter eternity, and though you had as large a share of earthly things as your earthly hearts now would wish, they will all lose their use in that moment. They are not a proper good for the soul at any time, and least at that time. If you keep it, all your life long, busy about the interest and benefit of the flesh, the body, how poor will it be when they part, having provided nothing at all for itself, but the guiltiness of a sinful life, which will sink it into that bottomless pit! Be forewarned then: For to be carnal-minded is death. Ver. 6, preceding the text.

The carnal mind. Now, as sin hath debased and degenerated the soul of man, making it carnal, so, the Son of God, by taking on our nature, hath sublimated it again, and made it spiritual. The souls that receive him are spiritualized; yea, as sin made the soul carnal, grace makes the very body to become spiritual, making it partaker and co-worker in spiritual things together with the soul, in doing and suffering, and participant of the hopes, too, of an everlasting reward. This is the main Christian character our apostle gives here, that they are spiritually minded, and that their actions suit their minds: They walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. Whereas before, with the rest of the world, they were eager in the pursuit of honors, and profits, and worldly pleasures, the new stream of their desires runs in another channel. They seek after honor, and are very ambitious of it; but it is such honor the apostle speaks of in this epistle, chap. ii. 7. By patient continuance in well doing they seek for glory, and honor, and immortality. Their mind is upon profit and gain; but it is with the same apostle, Phil. iii. 8, that they may win Christ, and they account all other things loss in comparison. And their desires are after pleasure too, but not carnal pleasures; these are both base, and of short continuance, but the pleasures they aim at, are those that are at God's right hand, and for evermore, Psalm xvi. 11; and that path of life which the psalmist there speaks of, that way of holiness which leads thither, is their delight. Spiritual exercises they go to, not as their task only, but more as their joy and refreshment. And this change the Spirit of God works in the soul, making it, yea, and the body wherein it dwells, of carnal, to become spiritual: as fire, to which the Holy Ghost is compared, refines sand and ashes, and makes of them the purest glass, which is so neat and transparent.

Enmity against God.] Sin hath not only made us unlike God, by defacing his beautiful image in us, not only strangers, by making us wander far off from him, but enemies; nor enemies only, but enmity in the abstract; for that is emphatical, The carnal mind is enmity, nothing else but enmity.

Now, this enmity is described in the latter clause of the text, by an antipathy, so to call it, or non-compliance with the law of God: It is not subject to the law of God, neither can it be, to wit, while it remains such. There is an absolute impossibility in it, to suit with the law of God, and consequently with God himself. The reason lies in their opposite qualities. God is spiritual and holy, and so is the law, as our apostle hath it in the preceding chapter; and the opposition he there makes between his unregenerate part and the law, is wholly true of the unregenerate man. The law is holy, says he, ver. 12 and 14, The law is spiritual: to which too he opposes, But I am carnal, sold under sin.

Where are now those who so vilify grace and magnify nature? Or, shall I rather say, nullify grace and deify nature? Here is the best eulogy the apostle will bestow upon the best of natures, Enmity against God. Nay, all the sparkles of virtue and moral goodness in civil men and ancient heathens are no better; beside many other things to be said of the virtues of those philosophers, as ignorance of Christ, by whom alone this enmity is removed.

I should easily confess, nor, I think, can any deny it, that there is, in the very ruins of our nature, some character left of a tendency to God as our chief and only satisfying good, which we may call a kind of love, and when we hear him spoken of, we find it flutter and stir; and hence men so abhor the imputation of hating God and being his enemies. Yet this is so smothered under sensuality and flesh, that until we be made spiritual, nothing appears but practical and (as they call it) interpretative enmity.

There is one thing which stains them enough; they were all, as that Father speaks, animalia gloriæ: they aimed not, in their study of virtue, at God's glory, but at their own; and is not that quarrel enough, and matter of enmity? Says not he, My glory I will not give unto another?

But that is most useful to you, to convince you of that too good conceit which men have of their natural condition. You would take it hardly, the most profane of you all, if any should come to you in particular, and tell you, you are an enemy to God; but I answer, there is none of you, if you believe the Scriptures, but will confess that all men are naturally such, and therefore, except we find in ourselves a notable alteration from the condition of nature, we must take with it, that we are enemies, yea, enmity to God. Of strangers, to become acquainted with him, yea, which is more, of enemies to become friends, is a greater and more remarkable change, than to be incident to a man without any evidence and sign of it. I know there is very great variety in the way and manner of conversion; and to some, especially if it be in their tender years, grace may be instilled and dropped in, as it were, insensibly. But this I may confidently say, that whatsoever be the way of working it, there will be a wide and apparent difference between friendship with God, and the condition of nature, which is enmity against him. Do not flatter yourselves. So long as your minds remain carnal, ardent in love to the world, and cold in love to God, lovers of pleasures more than of God (as the apostle speaks), you are his enemies, for with him there is no neutrality. That which they say, taxing it as a weakness in the sex, Aut amat, aut odit, nihil est tertium, is in this case necessarily true of all. And this is God's prerogative, that he can judge infallibly of the inside. Those shadows of friendship men use one with another, will not pass with him. Deceived he can not be, but men may easily; and, alas! too many do deceive themselves in this matter, to their own ruin.

We may learn hence, how deep sin goes into our nature, and consequently, that the cure and remedy of it must go as deep; that all the parts of our bodies and all the powers of our souls are polluted originally, our very mind and conscience, as the apostle speaks, for it is immersed in flesh, and enslaved to flesh naturally, and therefore it goes under its name. We are become all flesh; that is the spring of our mischiefs. We have lost our likeness to our Father, the Father of Spirits, the purest and most spiritual Spirit, till renewed by participation of his Spirit in our flesh.

And it is the error, not only of natural men, but somewhat of the godly too, that in self-reformation they set themselves against actual sin, but they lay not the axe to the root of the tree, this root of bitterness, (this our inbred and natural enmity against God; and till this be done, the lopping off of some branches will do no good; while the root is in vigor, those will grow again, and possibly faster than before. Bewail every known act of sin, as much as you can, for the least of them deserves it; but withal, let the consideration of them lead you into thoughts of this seed of rebellion, the wickedness of our nature, that takes life with us in the womb, and springs and grows up with us, and this will humble us exceedingly, and raise our godly sorrow to a higher tide. We find David taketh this course in the fifty-first Psalm; where he is lamenting his particular sin of adultery and murder, it leads him to the sintfulness of his nature, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me [or, warm me]; which he mentions, not to extenuate and diminish his sin; no, he is there very far from that strain, but adds it as a main aggravation. Indeed the power of original sin in the regenerate is laid very low, yet is it not altogether extinct, which they find often to their grief, and this makes them cry out with our apostle, in the former chapter, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death! The converted are already delivered (as he there adds) from the dominion of it, but not from the molestation and trouble of it. Though it is not a quiet and uncontrolled master, as it was before, yet it is in the house still, as an unruly servant or slave, ever vexing and annoying them; and this body of death they shall have still cause to bewail, till death release them. This leprosy hath taken so deep root in the walls of this house, that it can not perfectly be cleansed till it be taken down; and it is this, more than any other sorrows or afflictions of life, that makes the godly man not only content to die, but desirous, longing, with our apostle, to be dissolved, and be with Christ, which is far better.

As this teaches us the misery of man's nature, so it sets off and commends exceedingly the riches of God's grace. Are men naturally his enemies? Why then admire, first, his patience and bounty a little, and then we will speak of his saving grace. Could not he very easily ease himself of his adversaries, as he says by the prophet? Isa. i. 24. Wants he power in his right hand to find out and cut off all his enemies? Surely no. Not only he hath power to destroy them all in a moment, but the very withdrawing of his hand, that upholds their being (though they consider it not), would make them fall to nothing. Yet is he pleased not only to spare transgressors, but to give them many outward blessings, rain and fruitful seasons, as the apostle speaks, Acts xiv. 17. And the earth which is so full of man's rebellion, is yet more full of God's goodness: The earth is full of thy goodness, says the psalmist. It is remarkable that that same reason which is given, Gen. vi. 5, of the justice of God in drowning the world, is, in chapter viii. 21, rendered as the reason of God's resolved patience ever since: And the Lord said, I will not curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth.

Then consider his grace, in finding a way of reconciliation, and not sparing his own Son, his only begotten Son, to accomplish it. Nor did the Son spare himself. O matchless love! to lay down his life, not for friends, but for strangers; not only so, but enemies, for unrighteous and ungodly persons, such as be at enmity against him. Romans v. 7, 8. And having done this, he sends his word, the message of reconciliation, to rebels, and sends his Spirit into the hearts of those whom he hath appointed to salvation, to change their spirits, that they perish not in disobedience: he brings them near who were far off, having slain this enmity by the death of his Son.

As many of you, then, as have hitherto heard this message of reconciliation in vain, be persuaded at last to give ear to it. This is all that God's ambassadors require, according to their instructions from himself, that men would lay down their enmity against him, and not be so foolish as wilfully to perish in it: We pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. 2 Cor. v. 20.

Consider that this enmity is, 1st, unjust, 2dly, unhappy. (1.) Unjust it is, being against him who is the chief object of love, who is altogether goodness, both in himself and toward his creatures. It is too much not to love him with most ardent and superlative affection; but to entertain enmity against him is madness. As it was said to one who asked, "Why are the beautiful loved?"—"It is a blind man's question;" certainly we are blind if we see not cause enough, not only to desist from enmity, but to be inflamed with his love. One glance of his amiable countenance is sufficient to cause the most rebellious heart to yield, and lay down arms, and for ever devote itself to his services. No, we know him not, and therefore it is we hold out against him. Is he not the living spring of all our comforts? Have we not from him life, and breath, and all things? And is he not ready to forgive iniquity, transgression, and sin? Let mercy melt our hearts to him, those sweet rays of love. Let his loving kindness overcome these stubborn hearts and spirits of ours. Among enemies, the weaker usually seeks first for peace, but here it is the Mighty; Almighty God comes to entreat agreement with sinful clay.

(2.) But if this prevail not, then think how unhappy this enmity is. You who are so afraid of men, and those weak men, of men like yourselves, whose breath is in their nostrils, will ye not tremble at his power, and be afraid to continue on terms of hostility against him who is the Lord of hosts, who hath power both over soul and body, to kill both and cast them into hell? What is the stoutest of men, but as stubble to the flame of his wrath? Our God is a consuming fire. Heb. xii. 29. The sinners in Zion are afraid, says the prophet. Who shall dwell, say they, with devouring fire and everlasting burnings? Isa. xxxiii. 14. Then, if you would not perish, when his wrath is kindled, take that word of Eliphaz, Job xxii. 21: Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace; thereby good shall come unto thee.

And to you, so many as he hath taken into friendship with himself, look backward to the gulf you have escaped, and forward to the happiness you are appointed to, and let the joint consideration of both awaken your hearts and tongues to praises. How can your hearts contain such a wonder of love as he hath manifested to you, and not run over in songs and praise?

And, as you owe him praises, so study, being made his friends, to become more like him. That same idem velle, et idem nolle, to love and hate the same things with him, will be a sure testimony of friendship. And because carnality, or flesnly and earthly mindedness, is here made the character of enmity, mortify those affections, nail them to that cross of Christ whereby the enmity was taken away. And further, being once admitted into friendship labor for a further degree of intimacy with him, and forbear everything that may hinder that. Use frequent converse with him; for that both entertains and increases friendship. If anything fall out on your part (as it too often does), that may occasion any strangeness between you and your God, rest not till it be removed. And if you walk in this way, it shall undoubtedly, at length, bring you where you shall abide in his presence for ever, and shall no more fear any breach or interruption of enjoying him. To him be praise! Amen.

SERMON X.

THE TRUE CHRISTIAN, THE BEST SUBJECT.

ROMANS xiii. 5, 6, 7, 8.

Wherefore, ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake.

For, for this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending continually upon this very thing.

Render therefore to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor.

Owe no man anything, but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law.

THE wisdom and goodness of God, which shine in the natural order and dependance of things in the frame of the great world, appear likewise, and commend themselves to us, in the civil order he hath instituted in the societies of men, the lesser world. As out of the same mass he made the heavens and the earth, and the other elements between them, one higher than another, and gave them different stations and qualities, yet so different as to be linked and concatenated together, concordia discordiâ, and all for the concern and benefit of the whole; thus, for the good of men, hath the Lord assigned these different stations of rule and subjection (though all are of one race, Acts xviii. 26), raising from among men some above the rest, and clothing them with such authority as hath some repentment of himself, and accordingly communicating to them his own name: I have said, ye are gods. And the very power that is in magistracy to curb and punish those that despise it, the apostle useth as a strong and hard cord to bind on the duty of obedience, a cord of necessity. But he has another of a higher necessity, that binds more strongly, and yet more sweetly, that of conscience. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake.

Observe, 1. This is the main consideration which closes the discourse, the great cord that binds on and fastens all the rest; all the arguments foregoing, therefore, are mainly here to be pressed. Have a reverential and conscientious respect to the ordinance of God in the institution of government, and to the providence of God in his choice of those particular persons whom he calls to it. Contain thyself in thy own station, and submit to those set higher by the Lord, in obedience to him. This, indeed, is the only true spring of all obedience, both to God, and to men for him, and according to his ordinance. To regulate the outward carriage, without the living principle of an enlightened and sanctified conscience within, is to build without a foundation. This is the thing God eyes most. He looks through the surface of men's actions to the bottom, follows them into their source, examines from what motives and reasons they flow. He sees not only the handle of the dial, but all the wheels and weights of the clock that are the cause of its motion, and accordingly judges both men and their actions to be good or evil, as the inward frame and secret motions of the heart are. In his own worship, the outside of it may have the same visage and plausible appearance in a multitude convened to it and concurring in it, and no human eye can trace a difference; and yet, oh, what vast difference doth God's eye discover among them! He sees the multitude of those who are driven to his house by the power of civil and church laws, or carried to it only with the stream of company and custom (and these, I fancy, take up the most room in our churches); but he sees here and there, where such are in any corner, who worship him in singleness of heart, out of conscience to his holy command, and under a sense of their many obligations—those who dare not let pass any opportunity they can reach, of doing service to their Lord, and who dare not slight his word, and thus coming for conscience' sake, they do present their souls to receive his word; give their hearts up to receive the impression of it, put themselves under it, to be stamped by it according to that, Rom. vi. 17: But ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. So, likewise, he sees those who bear his name to his people, the ministers of his word. If they preach constantly, and live blamelessly, and are diligent and irreprovable in all the external parts of their walking, this last satisfies men's questions in their inspection and visitings; but God's inquiry and visiting search deeper. He asks from what heart all this comes, whether from a holy conscience of the weight and high importance of their holy calling, and a faithful respect to the interest of their Master's glory and his people's souls. And thus, he, as supreme Judge, sits and considers the proceedings of judges and magistrates; not only whether they do that which is just (for often they can not, easily or safely, do otherwise); but whether they do it with regard to him or not; that is, whether they judge righteously, for conscience' sake, or not; whether they do consider him, as sitting above them, when they sit down upon the bench or seat of justice, and do indeed truly speak righteousness, Psalm lviii. 1, or whether in heart they work wickedness. If they have any corrupt end, or hearts that are not straight, he sits on their heart and judges it; whether this be done either for base gain, or vain glory, or by compulsion, or outward necessity, or danger of censure, or whether it be this latter, an inward necessity of conscience, which makes a true willingness.

Thus people, if they obey for wrath, that is, for fear of the magistrate's sword, more than for conscience of the Lord's command, God accounts not this obedience, but in his judgment it goes for no better than rebellion. It is to be feared, too many magistrates, and others, have in this nation embraced the reformation, not at all for conscience' sake, but only for wrath, from fear of laws and authority. But although we are not able to follow forth his search to the full, that being the Lord's own prerogative, yet, truly, where it is evident to us that there is nothing of conscience, though in civil things it may pass, yet, in things that are peculiarly matters of conscience in religion, men ought to be somewhat wary, according to the utmost of due discerning; and we are, possibly, somewhat to blame in the promiscuous admitting of such, whose carriage, yea, whose profession and religion speak aloud, that their compliance was wholly constrained obedience, only for wrath, and not for conscience.

If civil authority is to be obeyed most for conscience, then, church authority, that is more symbolical with conscience, and hath nearer reference to it, ought to aim most at that. Conviction and conversion is our work, and not constraint; to bring people, both by the word and by a way of discipline suiting and backing it, to a sense of sin and spiritual thoughts of God and his holy law, that they may be subject more for conscience than for wrath.

And ye people, labor more to find the actings of that holy fear of God and conscience of his will in all your ways. Study to have an inward light, a practical, sanctifying light, directing you; and be not merely held in as beasts, by the authority and laws of men, but learn to know and be sensible of the sovereign authority of the most high God and his law, and to have respect unto all his commandments. If this were once done, how regular a motion would it keep among all superiors and inferiors of all sorts, in families and states, the one commanding, the other obeying, in God! It would be as sweet music in the celestial choir of their lives and affairs. Right-informing and right-moving consciences would be as continual teachers within, directing all in obedience, and would make it both more constant, sweet, and pleasant, as natural motion; whereas that is grievous and violent which is from wrath, or outward power, and therefore lasts not: as the Israelites worshipped God aright while their good judges lived, and ran after idols when they were removed.

Again. This same obedience for conscience ennobles and sublimates men's actions even in civil things, makes them have somewhat Divine, turns all into sacrifice to God, when all is done for God; even servants and children obeying masters and parents, and subjects magistrates, for his command's sake, still thinking, in the whole course of their regular, due carriage, in their very callings, This I do for God; my ordinary labor and works, and my just obedience to men, I offer up to him. This is the philosopher's stone, that turns actions of lower metal into gold; I set the Lord always before me. Psalm xvi. 8.

Obs. 2. Kings, and other powers of the world, who are the enemies, and sometimes the enraged persecutors of our holy religion, mistake their quarrel, and are very wrongfully misprejudiced against it, when, upon that false supposition, they hate and oppose it, suspecting it as an enemy to their dignity and authority; whereas there is nothing that doth so much assert their just power as religion doth. Civil laws may tie the hands and tongue to their obedience, but religion binds all due subjection to them upon the very consciences of their people. Therefore they are both ungrateful and unwise, in using their power against religion, which it so much strengthens. Their power should strengthen it, both by way of due return, to correspond with it in that, and even for its own interest, receiving a new establishment to itself by establishing religion. Even that master of irreligious policy, Machiavel, confesses that the profession of religion is a friend to authority. But if the shadow of it do anything that way, we see, contrary to his profane supposition, the substance and truth of doth it much more.

Obs. 3. If for conscience's sake we are to practise this subjection, then, surely in nothing is it our duty to be subject against the true rule of conscience, and the prime object of conscience, the authority and law of God. That is the first and highest, our perpetual, unalterable engagement to him, binding both kings and subjects, both high and low. And if rulers leave their station, we ought to keep ours still, in a straight subjection to God. For the extent of friendship and all other relations, and of all subjection and obedience, is to be ruled and bounded, usque ad aras. Give to Cesar the things that are Cesar's, but nothing of God's: that is neither ours to give, nor his to receive.

For, for this cause pay you tribute also. This the apostle gives as a sign of that confessed right which magistrates have to the subjection and obedience of the people, that in all nations this homage and acknowledgment is due to them: Tribute to whom tribute is due. Which it may be he rather mentions, because some question might exist, what might Christians do concerning this. However, this, according to the constitution of several places, he takes as granted, to be not only lawful, but due to be rendered. Here we are not to insist on the scanning of this; but certainly, as the power of a magistrate is not in this, nor in any other thing, absolute and unbounded, so, the legal and just paying of tribute and other revenues by the people argues their engagement to those set over them, and is to be rendered, not as wages to a mercenary servant, but as an honorary due to their place and calling, who are the ministers of God in civil government. So, also, convenient yet liberal maintenance to the ministers of God's own house is their right, yet not to enrich them; nor yet ought it to be given grudgingly, as undue, or superciliously, as to servants, but with the cheerfulness and respect agreeable to the Lord's servants, who watch for their souls.

All tribute and obedience still relate to this, and are grounded on it, the Lord's institution of power and government for the good of men. Though it sometimes prove otherwise in the exercise of it, yet the ordinance is pure, and most wisely suited to its end; from which the sin and corruption of men turn it but too often to the hurt of both the ruler himself and of the ruled, Eccl. viii. 9: There is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt; each proving a scourge to the other, in the just judgment of God upon both for their iniquities; making a fire from Abimelech to devour the men of Shechem, and the men of Shechem to deal treacherously with Abimelech. Judg. ix. 20. Yet, still the thing itself remains good. Many skilful physicians may kill instead of curing, yet it is but a caprice to decry all remedies, and the use of things medicinal, which the God of nature hath furnished for that use. Men may, and alas! most men do, prejudice their own health, by either intemperate or in some way irregular diet; yet this makes nothing against the continual necessity and use of food, nor can dissuade any from using it. Thus, the abuses of authority infringe not this, that magistrates are a public good; yea, the unjust are better than none, tyranny is better than anarchy; there is some justice done in the most unjust government.

But thus, they who are exalted to rule, ought to consider who raised them, and for what they are raised, and so faithfully to do justice. They are raised high, as the stars are set in their orbits, for influence and the good of the inferior world, and like the mountains which rise above the valleys, not to be places of prey and ruin, but, by the streams they send out, to refresh them. So, from magistrates, judgment ought to run down as water, and justice as a mighty stream. They ought to consider themselves as ministers; though called magistrates in relation to the people, yet ministers in relation to God [δουλοὶ Θεοῦ], and the people's in him, as the word δουλοὶ imports, being constant laborers for their good; even as the sun is a minister, God's minister of heat and light to the earth. Would they look up thus to God, it would make them look down on their inferiors, not with the ill aspect of pride and cruelty, but with the benign looks of good-will, fidelity, and vigilancy for their welfare, knowing that they are appointed for this very use in the world; not referring to that which is nearest here, and nearest themselves, the receiving of tribute, but the remotest good, which is the chief end for which their tribute and themselves are appointed, the punishing of the wicked and the encouragement of the good.

Render therefore to all their dues, tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor. The apostle enlarges his exhortation to the general rule of equity. The humble, upright mind will willingly comply with this, and pay respect to men, in obedience to God, and therefore primarily to him, which the most neglect. Honor and fear are due to him as to our Father and Master, and yet where is it to be found? If I be a father, where is mine honor? and if I be a master where is my fear? Mal. i. 6. The tribute of praise and glory in all these respects is due, and ought not to be purloined, nor any part detained; but how few are faithful in this. Much uncustomed goods pass among our hands in the course of our lives, many things wherein we are not mindful to give glory, entire glory to God. But he can not be deceived; if we go on, he will take us in our quietest conveyance, and all will be forfeited. We shall certainly lose all, if all glory return not to him. All that we have, and are, should we daily and heartily offer up to him, from whom we have life, and breath, and all things.

Owe no man anything, but to love one another. That which the apostle set before himself, as his own study and exercise, he doth, in the latter part of this epistle, set forth at large, as the duty of every Christian, to keep a conscience void of offence toward God and men. Acts xxiv. 16. And having, in the former part of it, treated amply and excellently of the doctrine of Christian faith and salvation, and ascended to its highest cause, he descends thence to give the rules of a Christian life. And he reduces them to these two; 1. To give the Lord his due, which is ourselves entire: our bodies ought to be a living sacrifice, and that they are not without the soul. And it is love in the soul, that offers up this whole burnt-offering to God, the fire that makes it ascend. 2. Toward men likewise, love is all. Of which, in many several acts of it, he spake likewise in the former chapter, ver. 9, &c.; and having inserted an exhortation to subjection to human authority as a divine institution, he now returns to that main, comprehensive, and universal duty of love, and passes fitly from the mention of other particular dues to superiors, to this, as the general due, or standing debt, which all men owe one to another. So I conceive this is not intended for the further pressing of that particular duty of subjection, by reducing it (as seeming hard in itself) to the sweet and pleasant rule or law of love, but that he passes wholly from that particular to this common duty, so as that it is not excluded, but comprehended here with the rest, though not specially aimed at; a little rivulet running awhile in its own channel, in the foregoing discourse, which falls here in again to the main current of the doctrine of love, begun in the former chapter. And here he chooses, adapting it to the strain of the discourse immediately foregoing it, to express this under the notion of a debt: Owe nothing, but love.

1. Let other debt be removed: Owe nothing. That is, be not willing to continue debtors of anything to any, by undue retaining of such things as, being paid, are not owing.

2. This is a constant debt, which you must still pay, and yet still owe—love. And the reason added, is most enforcing, that we should be willing to continue both payers and yet debtors of it. The dueness of it appears in this, that the law requires it, and the completeness of it, in that it is all the law requires: Love is the fulfilling of the law. Which is amplified in the two subsequent verses.

This is most fully true, take love fully, as it looks on its full object, God and man; and so it is the fulfilling of the whole law which relates to those two in its two tables. Take it particularly, as acting toward men

(as here it is), and so it fulfils that part of the law, that whole table, which respects man. The most of those commandments are expressly here set down (ver. 9), and the omission of one is fully supplied by that addition, If there be any other. Then again, it is cleared by the common aim and result of them all, which is to keep our neighbor undamaged, and that, love doth most surely and fully; therefore it fulfils all. That negative, worketh no ill to his neighbor, answers the strain of all the commandments, which is, to defend our neighbors from our ill, being most of them such, and all of them such, that are here specified; yet both they, and this sum of them, involving the contrary, the working of all possible good to our neighbor; in which, still love suits it, nothing being both more averse from wrong, and more active in good, than love: as the same apostle hath it, 1 Cor. xiii. Besides that it can not do, no, nor so much as think evil, it is naturally carried to bounty and kindness, and can not cease from doing good, a plant that is fruitful all the year long.

The apostle hath very good authority for this abridgment of the law; our Savior himself, Matt. xxii. 40. And he takes it out of the books of the law themselves, and certifies us, that it is the substance and sum both of the law and the prophets. Were this love absolutely perfect, the fulfilling of the law would be so too; and where it is sincere, as the apostle requires it, there is a sincere and evangelical obedience, or fulfilling of the law.

In the text, consider, 1. The largeness of its object. 2. The largeness of its acting. 3. The height of its true original.

1. The largeness of the object. So far as thou canst acquit thyself, owe nothing else to any; but love, owe that to all. Not a like familiar converse necessarily to all, nor a like measure of beneficence, nor a like degree of love, but yet love alike sincere and real to all. Not either a false, or an empty, fair carriage, but holy Christian love, love rooted in thy heart, and springing up in thy actions, even toward all men, as thy opportunity and ability serve thee, and their condition requires of thee; not hating or despising any for their poverty in estate, or deformity of body, or defects of mind, nor for that which works most on men, injuries done to thyself. All they can do, can not give thee an acquittance, or free thee of this debt of love; for thou art bound to another. This is the rule of Jesus Christ, and the badge of Christians, to love their very enemies. But this, oh how rare is it! How few attain it! Yea, how few endeavor to attain it! On the contrary, it is by many given over as a desperate, impossible business, they judging of it not according to that spirit of Christ that is his, but according to the corrupt rancor and bitterness of their own natural perverse spirits. Yea, and too many disdain it as a poorness and sheepishness of spirit to suffer and forgive. Be it so; yet is it such a sheepishness as makes a man like Jesus Christ, who, as a sheep before the shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth, when his heart within was compassionate toward them, as appeared when he opened it concerning them, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. This is true greatness of spirit, to partake of his spirit that is the highest and best of spirits, and it is the spirit of meekness and love. How much is this above the common spirit of the world! Truly base and poor is that which is decomposed and put out of frame with every touch; whereas this is mighty, and triumphs indeed over all provocations and injuries.

2. Let us consider the largeness of its acting: it goes through the law, fulfils it all. That command, the first in the second table, which is not here expressed, is it not love that makes all concerned in it, to fulfil it, that produceth mildness and moderation in superiors, and faithfulness and willing obedience in inferiors; makes both authority and subjection sweet and easy, where love commands and love obeys?

And for the next, Thou shalt not kill, doth not love, as the sunbeams put out the fire, by its divine heat eat out the earthly, yea, the infernal fire of fixed malice or rash anger, that burns naturally in the hearts of men? Such anger is called brutish, Ezek. xxi. 31; burning or brutish; and, on the contrary, the ambiguity, Prov. xvii. 27, is happy, of an excellent or of a cool spirit; for the cool spirit is so, cool from base passion, but burning truly with this love. And then this fire is by very small, and many times merely imaginary causes, so easily blown up, that it flames forth into gross murders, or at least such injuries and violences, or contentions and revilings, as go in God's account, and are writ down in his book, for murders. And he doth not misjudge, nor misname things, but they are really what he accounts them. Love can generously pass over those things about which folly and pride make such a noise, Oh! can I bear this and that? And thou wouldst, by so saying, speak thy stout-heartedness. Fool, is this stoutness and strength? Is it not rather the greatest weakness to be able to bear nothing? Have not the weakest persons much of that kind of stoutness and strength, who are the soonest moved and disquieted, women and children, and sick or aged persons? But love, Christian love to thy brother, makes the mind truly strong and composed, not easily stirred against him for every trifle, nay, not for greater matters. Love can endure much, yea, all things, says the apostle, 1 Cor. xiii. 7; it hath strength to stand under them, and stand firm; whereas base minds, void of love, break all to pieces under a very small weight. Love beareth all things, as the supporters of a strong and firm building; or rather, as a house, it covers all, for so the word signifies. It doth not blaze abroad the failings of men; yea, it hides much, covers a multitude of sins, not only from the eyes of others, but even from a man's own eyes; makes him not behold and look on those things that might provoke him. Yea, it is ingenious and inventive of the fairest constructions of things, to take them by the best side, in the favorable sense; and so long as there is any agreeable way to interpret anything favorably, will not have a hard thought of it, thinks no ill, as there it is. Not only hath it no active evil thoughts of revenge, or returning evil, but willingly it doth not judge ill of what is done by others, and what might be so looked on as to provoke: ὀλογοῖσθαι, doth not reckon wrongs so high as want of charity moves the most to do, it sets them low. And as a healthful constitution is sweet itself, and relishes all things right, so there is more true pleasure and content of mind in forgiving, than ever any man found in revenge. This is but a feverish delight which malice and anger have wrought, working perhaps greedily, but it is indeed a distemper. This love is the very root of peace and concord, a humble grace, that is not lifted up and insolent, as the word there is, and so doth not breed jars about punctilios: it esteems so well of others, and so meanelly of itself, that it can not well be crossed by any in that matter of undervaluing. But vain spirits are puffed up with a little approbation, and as easily kindled up with any affront or apprehended disgrace. Love is not lightly put out of temper, as, in sickly constitutions, a fit of fever or ague is brought on by any blast or wrong touch of diet: it is of a stronger digestion, and firmer health.

Then for that commandment, Thou shalt not commit adultery, all things of that kind, though they spring from a kind of love, yet are not from this love from above, but (as the Apostle James distinguishes wisdom) proceed from the love that is sensual and devilish. Love is not the true name of it, but base and brutish lust. And generally, all profane societies, and sortings of men one with another, are most contrary to this pure love. The drunkards who are cup-friends, as they are full of jars, and have no constancy, but are unstable as that wherein their friendship lies, their liquor, are a vile, despicable society, not worthy of men, much less of Christians. This sin hath affinity with uncleanness, and is usually ranked there. Right love to a tippler, is not to sit down and guzzle with him, but to reprove and labor to reclaim him, and where that can not be done, to avoid him. To wicked persons we owe, not a complacency or delight, which is most contrary to this love, but, hating their sin, we owe them love, and the desiring, and, as far as love can, the procuring of their conversion and salvation. Wicked converse can not consist with this love, which is the fulfilling of the law, and not a combination for the breaking of it, and the joining of their strength together for that end. Love rejoiceth not in iniquity, but in the truth: it makes not men rejoice together in sin. So foul, unclean affections, and a society in order to the gratifying of them, are most contrary to it. True love is most tender of the chastity of others, and can not abide an impure thought in itself.

So, as to the next precept, Thou shalt not steal, love would be loath to enrich or advantage itself upon the damage of others in any kind. It doth most faithfully and singly seek the profit and prosperity of our neighbor even as our own. And if this took place, of how much use were it in the world! But oh! it is rare. This meum and tuum is the grand cause of the ill understanding and discords that are among men, when things are not managed by this love, but by self-love.

And so, as to that, Thou shalt not bear false witness, the cherishing and preserving of the good name of our brethren is a proper and very remarkable fruit of this love, which is so far from forging false, defaming stories, that it will rather excuse, if it may be done, or if not, will pity the real failings of men which tend to their reproach; and, on the contrary, will teach men to rejoice in the good carriage and good esteem of their brethren, as in their own.

In the end, love works such a complacency in the good of others, and such a contentation with our own estate, that it most powerfully banishes that unruly humor of coveting, which looks on the condition of others with envy, and on our own with grudging and discontent. This law of love written within, doth not only rectify and order the hands and the tongue, but the jealousies, the very stirrings of the heart: it corrects the usual disorder of its motion, and bars those uncharitable, inordinate thoughts, that do so abound and swarm in carnal minds.

3. The original of this love, is that other love which corresponds to the other part, the first and chief point of the law, our duty toward God. Love to him is the sum and source of all obedience. When the whole soul and mind is possessed with that, then all is acceptable and sweet that he commands; first, what he commands as immediately referrible to himself, and then, what is the rule of our carriage to men as being prescribed and commanded by him. For so, and no otherwise, is this love the fulfilling of the law, when it flows from that first love, love to God, whose law it is that commands this other love to men. Some men may have somewhat like it, by a mildness and ingenuousness of nature, being inoffensive and well-disposed toward all; but then only doth it fulfil the law, when out of regard to the law of God it obeys, and obeys out of love to him whose law it is. So, then, the love of God in the heart is the spring of right and holy love to our neighbor, both (1.) Because in obedience to him whom we love sovereignly, we shall love others sincerely, because he will have it so. That is reason enough to the soul possessed and taken up with his love. It loves nothing, how lovely soever, but in him and for him, in order and subordination to his love, and in respect to his will; and it loves anything, how unlovely soever, taking it in that contemplation. It loves not the dearest friend but in God, and can love the hatefullest enemy for him: Amicum in Deo, et inimicum propter Deum. [Augustine.] His love can beautify the most unamiable object, and make it lovely. He saith of a worthless, undeserving man, or thy most undeserving enemy, Love him for my sake, because it pleases me; and that is reason enough to one who loves him. (2.) There is that dilating, sweetening virtue in love to God, that it can act in no other way to men but as becomes love. Base self-love contracts the heart, and is the very root of all sin, the chief wickedness in our corrupt nature; but the love of God assimilates the soul to him, makes it divine, and therefore bountiful, full of love to all. So these two contradict not, Love the Lord with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself. If all our love must go to God, what remains, say you, for our neighbor? Indeed, all must go upward, and be all placed on him, and thence it is resounded and regulated downward to men, according to his will. But self-love brings forth pride, and cruelty, and covetousness, and uncleanness, and disdain of others, and all such kind of monsters; so, it is the main breaking of the law.

All that can be said, will not persuade men to this, till the Lord by his love teach it and impress it on the heart. Know that this is the badge of Christ's followers, and his great rule and law given to them; and if you will follow him, that you may come to be where he is, then study this, that as our Lord Christ loved us, so, also, we ought to love one another.

SERMON XI.

GRAPES FROM THORNS.

GREAT and various are the evils that lodge within the heart of man. Hence proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, murders, and many other mischiefs, as our Savior specifies there, Matt. xv. 19: they come forth apace, and yet, the heart is not emptied of them. But was this heart thus at first, when it came newly forth of the hands of its Maker? Surely not. Man was made upright, but he found out many inventions. Eccl. vii. 29. Soon did the heart find the way to corrupt itself; but to renew itself, is as impossible as to have been the author of its own creation. Easily could it deface the precious characters of God's image, but it passes the heart of men and angels to restore them. Only the Son of God, who for that purpose took on him our nature, can make us, according to the apostle's phrase, partakers of the Divine nature. It is he alone that can banish those unclean spirits, and keep possession that they return no more. Have not they made a happy change of guests, who have those infernal troops turned out of doors, and the King of Glory fixing his abode within them? This is the voice of the gospel: Lift up your heads, ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, that the King of Glory may enter in. Psalm xxiv. 7. But small is the number of those who open where this voice is daily sounded. Yea, some there are, who grow worse under the frequent preaching of the word, as if sin were emulous, and, as is said of virtue, would grow by opposition. The truth is, too many of us turn those serious exercises of religion into an idle divertisement. Take heed that formality, and custom, and novelty, do not often help to fill up many rooms in our church. It were indeed a breach of charity, to entertain the fulness of your assemblies with an ill construction: no, it is to be commended. But would to God we were more careful to show our religion in our lives, to study to know better the deceits and impostures of our own hearts, and to gain daily more victory over our secret and best beloved sins! Let our intentions, then be to meet with Christ here, and to admit him gladly to dwell and rule within us. If he conquer our inward enemies, those without shall not be able to hurt us. If he deliver us from our sinful lusts, he will stir our own distrustful fears. And that such may be the fruits of our meeting, let us turn ourselves toward the throne of grace, with humble prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ, the righteous.

PSALM lxxvi. 10.

Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.

What manner of man is this, said the passengers in the ship, that even the winds and the sea obey him? Matt. viii. 27. Christ suddenly turns a great tempest into a greater calm. Surely, those are no ordinary words of command, which swelling waves and boisterous winds, in the midst of their rage, are forced to hear, and taught to understand and obey. Therefore, the holding of the seas in the hollow of his hand, the bridling of the wind, and riding upon the wings of it, we find peculiarly attributed to the Almighty. But no less, if not more wonderful, is another of his prerogatives, to wit, his sovereignty over all mankind, over the divers and strange motions of the heart of man. Admirable is it to govern those, both in respect of their multitude and irregularity. Consider we what millions of men dwell at once upon the face of the earth, and again, what troops of several imaginations will pass through the fancy of any one man, within the compass of one day; it is much to keep eye upon them, and to behold them all at once, but far more to command and control them all. Yet, if they were all loyal and willingly obedient, were they tractable and easily curbed, it were more easy for us to conceive how they might be governed. But to bound and overrule the unruly hearts of men, the most of whom continually are either plotting or acting rebellion against their Lord, to make them all concur and meet at last in one end, can not be done but by a power and a wisdom that are both infinite. That God whose name we often mention, but seldom think on his excellency, is alone the absolute monarch of men's hearts, and the ruler of all their motions. He hath them limited while they seem most free, and works his own glory out of their attempts, while they strive most to dishonor him. Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee.

This Psalm is made up of two different sorts of thoughts; the one arising out of particular experience, and the other out of a general doctrine. Those drawn from experience, are set down in the verses preceding the text: and in it, with those that follow, is contained the doctrine, with a duty annexed to it, which two are faith's main supporters. Past experiences verify the doctrine, and the generality of the doctrine serves to explain the particular experiences to all wise observers. There is not a treasure of the merits of saints in the church, as some dream, but there is a treasure of the precious experiences of the saints, which every believer hath right to make use of; and these we should be versed in, that we may have them in readiness at hand, in time of need, and know how to use them to draw both comfort from them to ourselves, and arguments to use with God.

The words contain clearly two propositions, both of them concerning the wrath of man: the former hath the event of it, Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee; the latter, the limitation of it, The remainder of wrath thou wilt restrain.

That the virtues and graces of men do praise the Lord, all men easily understand, for they flow from him: his image and superscription are upon them, and therefore no wonder if he has from them a tribute of glory. Who knows not that faith praises him? Abraham believed and gave glory to God. Rom. iv. 20. Good works, the fruits of faith, praise him too. Herein is my father glorified, says our Savior, that ye bear much fruit. John xv. 8. But that the inordinate wrath of man should praise him, may seem somewhat strange. Were it God's own wrath (since wrath is attributed to him in Scripture), that might praise him, for it is always most just. Or were it a due and moderate anger of man, upon just cause, that were fit for praising him too, in despite of the stoics. But that wicked and disordered wrath (which is undoubtedly here meant), that the wrath of men, which is both uncomely and dishonorable for themselves, though they think otherwise, that even such a wrath should honor God and praise him, argues well both that he hath good right to praises, when everything, even things that seem contrary to his nature as well as to his law, do pay them to him; and that he hath great power and wisdom, who obtains what is due to him even from those persons and things which of themselves are most unwilling and unfit to pay it. This is the excellent skill of his wisdom, to draw that which shall go into the making up of the precious composition of his praise, out of this poison: for so the word here used for wrathful heat, doth sometimes signify. And this wrath often proves so, a deadly poison both to those it is incensed against, and to the very breast that breeds it, and wherein it is kindled.

But for the clearer understanding of this, I conceive it will be requisite to consider more distinctly, first, what this wrath of man is; secondly, how it can praise God; and lastly, the infallibility of this event, Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee.

I. In the cxlviiith Psalm, where David summons the creatures to meet in that song of praise, to keep that full concert, he calls not only the heavens and the inhabitants of it, angels and lights, but those of the lower world to bear their part in it; and not only men, beasts, cattle, creeping things, and the flying fowl, but those creatures which do most resemble this wrath here spoken of, fire, stormy tempest, and dragons, &c. The tenor of this Psalm doth show, that by the wrath of man is to be understood the undue rage of evil and ungodly men against those whom God owns for his people. The word here used, signifies a hot or inflaming wrath: and indeed such is the feverish, distempered anger of the church's enemies. And as too much heat is an enemy to solid reason, this hot wrath of theirs makes them incapable of wise deliberation in themselves, and inflexible to the good advice of others. It is true they take counsel how to execute their wrath, as we shall hear anon, but they take no counsel that may cool it. Anger, described, by its material cause, is called a boiling of the blood about the heart; but this ariseth from the apprehension of something offensive, kindling a desire of revenge. Now it is a wonder what the powers of the world find in Christ and his harmless flock, that can incense them. St. James says of the tongue, that it is set on fire of hell. The same is the origin of this wrath. Why do the heathen rage? saith the psalmist, Psalm ii. 1. That is, not only to what purpose, intimating that it is a fruitless rage, and void of success, in regard of God's power, but Why, that is, upon what occasion, checking the rage as groundless and without cause, in regard of Christ and his church's innocence. The cause is only within themselves, to wit, that unhappy antipathy of the serpent's seed against the seed of the woman. Thus, this wrath of man is, the causeless, malicious enmity of the wicked against the church of God. And under the name of this passion I take to be here comprised likewise, all the attendants of it, all their crafty complottments and devices for the acting of their wrath. As there is mention of the nation's rage against Christ, in the second Psalm, so, likewise, of the consultations of those who are of quality fit for it: The rulers take counsel together. Further, this wrath is not barely their inward fire, but the vent of it, when it flames into cruel and outrageous practices, including likewise all the instruments they make use of. And of all these it is true, that God shall gain glory by them. Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee.

The wrath of man, says the apostle, accomplisheth not the righteousness of God. Jam. i. 20. How, then, can it accomplish his praises? And this is the II^d thing propounded.

Are grapes gathered of thorns, or figs of thistles? Surely not: Therefore I called this phrase not the fruit or proper effect of man's wrath, but the event or consequent of it, by the efficacy of Divine providence. The wrath of man shall praise thee. That is, the use which thou wilt make of it, shall tend to thy praise. Thou wilt produce such effects from it, both in the church and upon thine enemies, when thou sufferest thy wrath to break forth, as shall furnish more matter of thy praises than if thou hadst altogether restrained it. To instance this in some few particulars:—

It is the fury of the church's enemies, that has made known to the world the invincible courage and patience of the saints. Those ages which have been most monstrous in persecution, have most of all graced Christianity. Had there been no persecuting emperors, who would have heard of those primitive martyrs who triumphed over the cruelty of their torments? Were there no persecution, or peril, nor sword, against believers, we should not have heard the apostle say, immediately after the mention of those, In all these we are more than conquerors. They could not have been so much as conquerors had there been no conflict.

Again, as the wrath of man praises God in the invincible patience of the saints, so, likewise, in the immoveable stability of the church. Is it not wonderful how so small and weak a company as the church hath often been reduced to, yea, hath always been in respect of the world, could escape the mouths of so many lions, so many enraged enemies that were ready to devour it? And that we may see that this tends solely to the praise of her great Protector, look to the church's song penned by the royal prophet; it is the exxivth Psalm: If it had not been the Lord that was on our side, when men rose up against us, then they had swallowed us up quick. The great monarchies and kingdoms of the world, which have risen with so much splendor, have had their periods and been buried in the dust. That golden-headed and silver-bodied image degenerated into worse metal as it went lower, and the brittle feet were the cause of the fall and breaking of all the rest. But the kingdom of Jesus Christ, though despicable in the world, and exposed to the wrath of the world in all ages, stands firm and can not be removed. There is a common emblem of the winds blowing from all quarters, and upon the globe of the earth, being in the middle of them, is written Immobilitas. This fitly resembles the church. Why, it seems to be the sport of all the winds, but is indeed so established, that all of them, yea, the very gates of hell can not prevail against it. Now, the more the church's enemies labor and moil themselves to undo her, the more do their weakness and the power of her Lord appear; so that thus the wrath of man doth praise him.

When was the church free from the world's wrath? To say nothing of the church of the Jews, did not those wicked emperors of Rome think to have made the Christian church short-lived, to have drowned her newly-born in floods of her own blood? And in latter ages, who knows not the cruelties that have been practised by the Turk in the East, and the proud prelate of Rome in the West? By which she hath sometimes been brought to so obscure and low a point, that if you can follow her in history, it is by the track of her blood; and if you would see her, it is by the light of those fires in which her martyrs have been burnt. Yet hath she still come through and survived all that wrath, and still shall survive, till she be made perfectly triumphant.

Further: men's wrath tends to God's praise in this, that God, giving way to it, doth so manage it by his sublime providence, that it often directly crosses their own ends, and conduces manifestly to his. Pharaoh thought that his dealing more cruelly with the Jews in their tasks and burdens, was wisdom: Let us work wisely, says he. But whereas their ordinary servility was become familiar to them, and they were tamed to it, that same accession of new tyranny did prepare and dispose the Israelites for a desire of departure, and their departure made way for Pharaoh's destruction. Undigestible insolency and rage, hastening to be great, make kingdoms cast them off, which would have been far longer troubled with their wickedness, had it been more moderate. Surely, then, the wrath of man commends the wisdom of God, when he makes him by that contrive and afford the means of his own downfall. The steps of his strength shall be straitened, and his own counsel shall cast him down, says Bildad, Job xviii. 7. And that is a sad fall; as that eagle that was shot with an arrow trimmed with her own feathers.

But to close this point. It is out of all question, that the deserved punishment of man's unjust wrath doth always glorify the justice of God; and the more he gives way to their wrath, the more notable shall be both their punishment and the justice of it. And though God seems neglective of his people and of his praise, while man's wrath prevails, yet the truth is, he never comes too late to vindicate his care of both ; and when he defers longest, the enemy pays dear interest for the time of forbearance. In his eternal decree, he resolved to permit the course of man's wrath for his own glory, and when the period which he hath fixed is come, he stops man's wrath, and gives course unto the justice of his own. Nor is there, then, any possibility of escaping. He will right himself, and be known by executing judgment. Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee.

And that is the III^d thing propounded, the infallibility of the event.

The Author of nature governs all his creatures, each in a suitable way to the nature he hath given them. He maintains, in some things, a natural necessity of working, contingency in others, and in others, liberty ; but all of them are subject to this necessity of effecting inevitably his eternal purposes. And this necessity is no way repugnant to the due liberty of man's will. Some entertain and maintain the truth ; some plot, others act and execute, against it ; some please themselves with a wise neutrality, and will appear so indifferent that it would seem they might be accepted of all sides for judges of controversies. And all these find no less liberty to wind and turn themselves whither they please, than if no higher hand had the winding of them. Yet shall not only the zeal of the godly, but even the wrath of the enemy, and the cold discretion of the neutral, all tend to his praise whose supreme will will have a secret, but a sure and infallible sway in all their actions. While some passengers sit, some walk one way, some another, some have their faces toward their journey's end, some their back turned upon it, this wise Pilot does most skillfully guide the ship to arrive with them all at his own glory. Happy they who propound and intend his glory as he himself does, for in them shall the riches of his mercy be glorified ! They who oppose him, lose this happiness, but he is sure not to lose his glory for all that, to wit, the glory of his justice. His right hand shall find out all his enemies. Surely, the wrath of man shall praise thee.

The consideration of this truth, thus in some measure unfolded, may serve to justify the truly wise dispensations of God against our imaginary wisdom. Were the matter referred to our modelling, we should assign the church constant peace and prosperity for her portion, and not consent that the least air of trouble should come near her : we would have no enemies to molest her, nor stir against her, or if they did stir, we would have them to be presently repressed ; and these, in our judgment, would be the fairest and most glorious tokens of his love and power whose spouse she is. But this carnal wisdom is enmity against God, and is opposed to the glory of God, which rises so often out of the wrath of his enemies. Had God caused Pharaoh to yield at the very first to the release of his people, where had been the fame of those miraculous judgments in Egypt, and those mercies on the Israelites, the one setting out and illustrating the other ? Where had been that name and honor which God says he would gain to himself, and which he did gain out of Pharaoh's final destruction, making that stony-hearted king and his troops sink like a stone in the waters, as Moses sings ? Observe his proud boastings immediately foregoings his ruin : I will pursue, says he, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil ; my lust shall be satisfied on them : I will draw my sword, and my hand shall destroy them. Soon after, the sea quenches all this heat. Commonly, big threatenings are unhappy presages of very ill success. That historian [Herodotus] says well of God, Deus neminem alium, quam seipsum, sinit de se magnifice sentire : God suffers no other to think highly of himself, than himself alone. And indeed, as he abhors those boastings, so he delights in the abasing of the lofty heart whence they flow, and it is his prerogative to gain praise to himself out of their wrath. Hast thou an arm like God ? says the Lord to Job, then, look upon the proud and bring them low. Job xl. 9, 12. When Sennacherib came up against Jerusalem, his blasphemies and boastings were no less vast and monstrous than the number of his men and chariots. Good Hezekiah turned over the matter unto God, spreading the letter of blasphemies before him, upon which God undertook the war, and assured Hezekiah that the Assyrian should not so much as shoot an arrow against the city, but return the same way he came. 2 Kings xix. 33. And the deliverance there promised and effected, is conceived to have been the occasion of penning this very Psalm. Surely, when an angel did in one night slay one hundred and eighty-five thousand in their camps, that wrath and those threats tended exceedingly to the praise of the God of Israel. The hook that he put in Sennacherib's nostrils (as the history speaks), to pull him back again, was more remarkable than the fetters would have been, if he had tied him at home, or hindered his march with his army.

Who is he then that will be impatient because of God's patience, and judge him slack in judgment, while the rage of the wicked prevails awhile ? Know, that he is more careful of his own glory than we can be, and the greater height man's wrath arises to, the more honor shall arise to him out of it. Did not his omnipotency shine brighter in the flames of that furnace into which the three children were cast, than if the king's wrath had been at first cooled ? Certainly, the more both it and the furnace had their heat augmented, the more was God glorified. Who is that God, saith he, blasphemously and proudly, that can deliver you out of my hands? Dan. iii. 15. A question, indeed, highly dishonoring the Almighty, but stay till the real answer come; and then, not only shall that wrath praise him, but that very same tongue, though inured to blasphemy, shall be taught to bear a main part in the confession of those praises. Let that apostate emperor [Julian] go taunting the Head and tormenting the members of that mystical body, his closing with Ἐνίκησας Γαλιλαίε, Thou hast overcome, O Galilean (meaning Christ), shall help to verify that, whether its course be shorter or longer, man's wrath ends always in God's praise. In like manner, the closing of the lions' mouth spake louder to his praise who stopped them than if he had stopped Daniel's enemies in the beginning of their wicked design. So hot was their rage, that the king's favorable inclination to Daniel (of which, in other cases, courtiers used to be so devout observers), yea, his contesting and pleading for him, did profit him nothing, but they hurried their king to the execution of their unjust malice, though themselves were convinced that nothing could be found against him, but only concerning the law of his God. Dan. vi. 5. It is said, ver. 14, that King Darius set his heart on Daniel to deliver him, and he labored to do it till the going down of the sun, and then those counsellors and counsels of darkness overcame him. But upon this black night of their prevailing wrath, followed a bright morning of praises to Daniel's God, when the lions that were so quiet company all night to Daniel, made so quick a breakfast of those accursed courtiers who had maliciously accused him. Even so let thine enemies perish, O Lord, and let those that love thee be as the sun when he goes forth in his might!

The other proposition concerns the limiting of his wrath: The remainder of wrath thou wilt restrain.

To take no notice, for the present, of divers other readings of these words, the sense of them, as they are here very well rendered, may be briefly this: that whereas the wrath of man to which God gives way, shall praise him, the rest shall be curbed and bound up, as the word is; no more of it shall break forth than shall contribute to his glory. Here should be considered divers ways and means by which God useth to stop the heady course of man's wrath, and hinder its proceeding any further; but only, for the present, let us take out of it this lesson, that the most compendious way to be safe from the violence of men, is to be on terms of friendship with God.

Is it not an incomparable privilege, to be in the favor and under the protection of ONE, whose power is so transcendent that no enemy can so much as stir without his leave? Be persuaded, then, Christians, in these dangers that are now so near us, every one to draw near to him. Remove what may provoke him. Let no reigning sin be found either in your cities or in your villages, for he is a holy God. Is it a time to multiply provocations now, or is it not rather high time to be humbled for the former? What shameless impiety is it, to be now licentious or intemperate, to be proud, to oppress or extort, to profane God's day, and blasphemise his name! All these sins, and many others, abound among us, and that avowedly. Without abundance of repentance for these, we shall smart, and the wrath of our enemies, though unjust in them, shall praise God in our just punishment; though, doubtless, he will own his church, and be praised likewise in the final punishment of their wrath who rise against it. There is a remarkable expression in the ninety-ninth Psalm, of God's dealing with his people: Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance on their inventions. A good cause and a covenant with God, will not shelter an impenitent people from sharper correction. It is a sad word God speaks by his prophet to his own people: I myself will fight against you, Jer. xxi. 5. A dreadful enemy! and none, indeed, are truly dreadful but he. Oh! prevent his anger, and you are safe enough. If perverse sinners will not hear, yet, let those who are indeed Christians, mourn in secret, not only for their own sins, but let them bestow some tears likewise upon the sins of others. Labor to appease the wrath of God, and he will either appease man's wrath, or, howsoever, will turn it jointly to our benefit and his own glory. Let the fear of the most high God, who hath no less power of the strongest of his enemies, than over the meanest of his servants; let his fear, I say, possess all our hearts, and it will certainly expel that ignoble and base fear of the wrath of man. See how the prophet opposes them, Isa. viii. 12. Fear not their fears, says he, nor be afraid; but sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread. Fear not, yet fear. This holy fear begets the best courage: the breast that is most filled with it, abounds most in true magnanimity. Fear thus, that you may be confident, not in yourselves, though your policy and strength were great, for cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, but confident in that God who is too wise and vigilant to be surprised, too mighty to be foiled, and too rich to be outspent in provision; who can suffer his enemy to come to the highest point of apparent advantage, without any inconvenience, yea, with more renown in his conquest. And so, a Christian who is made once sure of this (as easily he may), is little careful about the rest. His love to God prevailing over all his affections, makes him very indifferent what becomes of himself or his dearest friends, so God may be glorified! What though many fall in the quarrel, (which God avert!) yet, it is sufficient that truth in the end shall be victorious. Have not the saints in all ages been content to convey pure religion to posterity, in streams of their own blood, not of others? Well, hold fast by this conclusion, that God can limit and bind up the most violent wrath of man, so that, though it swell, it will not break forth. The stiffest heart, as the current of the most impetuous rivers, is in his hand, to appoint its channels, and turn it as he pleaseth. Yea, it is he that hath shut up the very sea with bars and doors, and said, Hitherto shall thou come and no farther, here shall thy proud waves be stayed. Job xxxviii. 10, 11. To see the surges of a rough sea come in toward the shore, a man would think that they were hastening to swallow up the land; but they know their limits, and are beaten back into foam. Though the waves thereof toss themselves, as angry at their restraint, yet, the small sand is a check to the great sea, yet can they not prevail: though they roar, yet can they not pass over it. Jer. v. 22.

The sum is this: what God permits his church's enemies to do, is for his own further glory; and reserving this, there is not any wrath of man so great, but he will either sweetly calm it, or strongly restrain it. To him be praise and dominion for ever.

SERMON XII.

THE BELIEVER A HERO.

PSALM cxii. 7.

He shall not be afraid of evil tidings; his heart is fixed, trusting in the LORD.

ALL the special designs of men agree in this; they seek satisfaction and quietness of mind, that is, happiness. This, then, is the great question, Who is the happy man? It is here resolved, ver. 1: Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth in his commandments.

The blessedness is unfolded, like a rich landscape, that we may view the well-mixed colors, the story and tissue of it, through the whole alphabet in capital letters. And take all and set them together, it is a most full and complete blessedness, not a letter wanting to it.* Among the rest, that which we have in these words, is of a greater magnitude and brightness than many of the rest, He shall not be afraid of evil things.

Well may the Psalm begin with a Hallelujah, a note of praise to him in whom this blessedness lies. Oh, what a wretched creature were man, if not provided with such a portion! Without which there is nothing but disappointment, and thence the racking torment and vexation of a disquieted mind, still pursuing somewhat that he never overtakes.

The first words are the inscription, The blessedness of that man, &c. So, the particulars follow; where outward blessings are so set, as that they look and lead higher, pointing at their end, the infinite goodness whence they flow, and whither they return and carry along with them this happy man.

And these promises of outward things are often evidently accomplished to the righteous, and their seed after them, and that, commonly, after they have been brought very low. But when it is otherwise with them, they lose nothing. It is good for many, yea, it is good for all the godly, that they should have less of these lower things, in order to raise their eye to look after higher—the eye of all, both of those who are held somewhat short, and of those that have abundance in the world.

These temporal promises were more abounding, and more frequently fulfilled in their very kind, in the times of the law; yet, still the right is constant, and all ages do give clear examples of the truth of this word. Where it is thus, it is a blessing created by its aspect to this promise, and so differs from the prosperity of ungodly men; and where it is otherwise with the righteous and their seed, it is no shift, but a most solid comfort, to turn their eyes to a higher compensation.

But, howsoever it go with them, this still holds, He shall not be afraid of evil tidings. Notwithstanding the hardest news that can come to his ears, of anything that concerns either himself or his children, or the rest of God's children in his charge, in the world, his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord.

First, let us take a view of the character of this blessed man. Who is it that is thus undaunted? The man that feareth God.

All the passions are but several ebbs and flowings of the soul, and their motions are the signs of its temper, which way it is carried; that is mainly to be remarked by the beating of its pulse. If our desires, and hopes, and fears, be in the things of this world, and the interests of flesh, this is their dystemper and disorder, the soul is in a continual fever. But if they move Godward, then it is composed and calm, in a good temper and healthful state, fearing and loving him, desiring him, and nothing but him, waiting for him, and trusting in him. And when any one affection is right and in a due aspect to God, all the rest are so too; for they are radically one. And he is the life of that soul which is united to him; and so, in him, it moves in a peculiar spiritual manner, as all do naturally in the dependance of their natural life on him who is the Fountain of life.

Thus we have here this fear of God, as often elsewhere, set out as the very substance of holiness and evidence of happiness. And that we may know there is nothing either base or grievous in this fear, we have joined with it, delight and trust: That delighteth greatly in his commandments: which is that badge of love to him, to observe them, and that with delight, and with exceeding great delight. So then, this fear is not that which love casts out, but that which love brings in. This fear follows and flows from love. It is a fear to offend, whereof nothing is so tender as love, and that, in respect of the greatness of God, hath in it withal an humble reverence. There is in all love a kind of reverence, a cautious and respective wariness toward the party loved; but especially in this, where not only we stand in a lower relation, as children to our Father, but the goodness which draws our love doth infinitely transcend our measures and reach: therefore, there is a rejoicing with trembling, and an awful love, a fearing the Lord and his goodness. Hos. iii. 5. This is both fear and trust. The heart touched by the spirit of God, as the needle touched with the loadstone, looks straight and speedily to God, yet still with trembling, being filled with this holy fear.

* This Psalm, in the Hebrew, consists of twenty-two short verses, each of which begins with one of the letters of the alphabet in their order, till they are all ended. No one letter is here omitted, as is the case in the xxvth Psalm, where the same order is observed.

That delighteth. Oh! this is not only to do them, but to do them with delight: there is somewhat within that is connatural and symbolical with them. Yea, this very law itself is writ within, not standing as a hard taskmaster over our head, but impressed within, as a sweet principle in our hearts, and working thence naturally. This makes a soul find pleasure in the purging out of sensual pleasures, and ease in doing violence to corrupt self, even undoing it for God, having no will but his. The remainders of sin and self in our flesh, will be often rising up, but this predominant love dispels them. So, this fear works with delight.

And further, that we may know how serene and sweet a thing it is, it is here likewise joined with confidence, trusting in the Lord; a quickening confidence always accompanying it, and so, undoubtedly, it is a blessed thing. Blessed is he that feareth. Fear sounds rather quite contrary, hath an air of misery; but add, whom? That feareth the Lord. That touch turns it into gold. He that so fears, fears not: He shall not be afraid. All petty fears are swallowed up in this great fear, as a spirit inured with great things, is not stirred nor affected at all with small matters. And this great fear is as sweet and pleasing as those little fears are anxious and vexing. Secure of other things, he can say, If my God be pleased, no matter who is displeased. No matter who despise me, if he account me his. Though all forsake me, my dearest friends grow estranged, and look another way, if he reject me not, that is my only fear, and for that I am not perplexed; I know he will not. As they answered Alexander, when he sent to inquire what they most feared, thinking possibly they would have said, lest he should invade them; but their answer was, We fear nothing but lest heaven should fall upon us; which they did not fear neither: so, a believer hath no fear but of the displeasure of heaven, lest the anger of God should fall upon him; he fears that; that is, accounts that only terrible; but yet, he doth not fear, doth not apprehend it will fall upon him, he is better persuaded of the goodness of his God. So this fear is still joined with trust, as here, so often elsewhere. Psalm xxxiii. 18, xl. 3, and cxlvii. 11.

There is no turbulency in this fear; it is calm and sweet. Even that most terrible evil, that which this fear properly apprehends and flies, sin, yet, the fear of that goes not to a distraction. Though there is little strength, and many and great enemies, mighty Anakims of temptations from without, and corruptions within, and so, good reason for a holy, humble fear and self-distrust, yea, this should not beat us off: yet, it is most fit to put us on to trust in Him who is our strength. Courage! the day shall be ours. Though we may be often foiled and down, and sometimes almost at a hopeless point, yet, our Head is on high. He hath conquered for us, and shall conquer in us. Therefore, so fear as not to fear. Why should I fear in the days of evil, says the psalmist, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about? Psalm xlix. 5. (Which I take is some grievous affliction, and that with a visage of punishment of sin: guiltiness is to be read in it, yet does he not fear.) If I trusted in wealth, and boasted myself in the multitude of riches, then that being in hazard, I must fear: leaning on that, if failing, I might fall. But this is my confidence (ver. 15), God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me. Wealth can not, but he can. It buys not a man out from his hand, but he buys, from the hand of the grave; so the word is. For the visible heavens even in their fall, and the dissolution of nature, would not affright a believer, Si fractus illabatur orbis, &c.

Alas! most persons have dull or dim apprehensions and shallow impressions of God; therefore they have little either of this fear or of this trust. God is not in all their thoughts, but how to compass this or that design, and if they miss one, then how to compass another: they are cast from one wave upon another. And if at any time they attain their purpose, they find it but a wind, a handful of nothing, far from what they fancied it.

Oh, my brethren, my desire is, that the faces of your souls were but once turned about, that they were toward him, looking to him, continually fearing him, delighting, trusting in him, making him your all. Can anything so elevate and ennoble the spirit of a man, as to contemplate and converse with the pure, ever-blessed spring and Father of spirits? Beg that you may know him, that he would reveal himself to you; for otherwise, no teaching can make him known. It is to light candles to seek the sun, to think to attain to this knowledge without his own revealing it. If he hide his face, who then may behold him? Pray for this quickening knowledge, such a knowledge as will effectually work this happy fear and trust.

You who have attained anything of it, desire and follow on to know the Lord; particularly, so that your hearts may repose on him. So fear that you may not fear. He would have our spirits calm and quiet; for when they are in a hurry and confusion, they are then fit for nothing: all within makes a jarring, unpleasant noise, as of an instrument quite out of tune.

This fear of God is not, you see, a perplexing doubting and distrust of his love: on the contrary, it is a fixed resting and trust on his love.

Many who have some truth of grace, are, through weakness, filled with disquieting fears; but possibly, though they perceive it not, it may be in some, a point of wilfulness, a little latent, undiscerned affectation of scrupling and doubting, placing much of religion in it. True, where the soul is really solicitous about its interest in God, that argues some grace; but being vexingly anxious about it, argues that grace is low and weak. A spark there is, even discovered by that smoke; but the great smoke still continuing, and nothing seen but it, argues there is little fire, little faith, little love.

And this, as it is unpleasant to thyself, so it is to God, as smoke to the eyes. What if one should be always questioning with his friend, whether he loved him or not, and upon every little occasion were ready to think he doth not, how would this disrelish their society together, though truly loving each other! The far more excellent way, and more pleasing both to ourselves and to God, were to resolve on humble trust, reverence, and confidence, being most afraid to offend, delighting to walk in his ways, loving him and his will in all, and then, resting persuaded of his love, though he chastise us. And even though we offend him, and see our offences in our chastisements, yet he is good, plenteous in redemption, ready to forgive; therefore let Israel trust and hope. Psalm cxxx. 7. Let my soul roll itself on him, and adventure there all its weight. He bears greater matters, upholding the frame of heaven and earth, and is not troubled nor burdened with it.

The heart of a man is not sufficient for self-support; therefore, naturally, it seeks out some other thing to lean and rest itself on. The unhappiness is, for the most part, that it seeks to things below itself; but these, being both so mean and so uncertain, can not be a firm and certain stay to it. These things are not fixed themselves: how can they then fix the heart? Can a man have firm footing on a quagmire, or moving sands? Therefore, men are forced in these things, still to shift their seat, and seek about from one to another, still rolling and unsettled. The believer only hath this advantage; he hath a rest high enough and sure enough, out of the reach of all hazards. His heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord.

The basis of this happiness is, He trusteth in the Lord. So the heart is fixed; and so fixed, it fears no ill tidings.

This trust is grounded on the word of God, revealing the power and all-sufficiency of God, and withal his goodness, his offer of himself to be the stay of souls, his commanding us to rest on him. People wait on I know not what persuasions and assurances, but I know no other to build faith on, than the word of promise, the truth and faithfulness of God opened up, his wisdom, and power, and goodness, as the stay of all those who, renouncing all other props, will venture on it, and lay all upon him. He that believes, sets to his seal that God is true, John iii. 33, and so, he is sealed for God; his portion and interest are secured. If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established. Isa. vii. 9.

This is the way to have peace and assurance, which many look for first, Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee. Isa. xxvi. 3. So here, the heart is fixed by trusting.

Seek, then, clearer apprehensions of the faithfulness and goodness of God, hearts more established in the notion of free grace, and the absolute trust due to it; thus shall they be more established and fixed in all the rollings and changes of the world.

His heart is fixed, or prepared, ready-dressed and in arms for all services, resolved not to give back, able to meet all adventures, and stand its ground. God is unchangeable, and therefore faith is invincible. That sets the heart on him, fastens it there on the rock of eternity; then, let winds blow, and storms arise, it cares not.

This firm and close cleaving unto God hath in it of the affection which is inseparable from this trust, love, joined with faith, and so, a hatred of all ways and thoughts that alienate and estrange from God, that remove and unsettle the heart. The holiest, wariest heart is surely the most believing and fixed heart. If a believer will adventure on any way of sin, he shall find that it will unfix him, and shake his confidence, more than ten thousand hazards and assaults from without. These are so far from moving, that they settle and fix the heart commonly more, causing it to cleave the closer and nearer unto God; but sinful liberty breeds disquiet, and disturbs all. Where sin is, there will be a storm: the wind within the bowels of the earth, makes the earthquake.

Would you be quiet, and have peace within in troublous times? keep near unto God, beware of anything that may interpose between you and your confidence. It is good for me, says the psalmist, to be near God: not only to draw near, but to keep near, to cleave to him, and dwell in him: so the word imports. Oh, the sweet calm of such a soul amidst all storms! Thus, once trusting and fixed, then no more fear: he is not afraid of evil tidings, not of any ill-hearing. Whatsoever sound is terrible in the ears of men, the noise of war, news of death, or even the sound of the trumpet in the last judgment, he hears all this undisquieted. Nothing is unexpected. Being once fixed on God, then the heart may put cases to itself, and suppose all things imaginable, the most terrible, and look for them; not trouble before trouble comes, with dark and dismal apprehensions, but satisfied in a quiet, unmoved expectation of the hardest things. Whatsoever it is, though particularly not thought on before, yet the heart is not afraid of the news of it, because it is fixed, trusting on the Lord. Nothing can shake that foundation, nor dissolve that union; therefore, no fear. Yea, this assurance stays the heart in all things, how strange and unforeseen soever to it. All are foreseen to my God on whom I trust, yea are forecontrived and ordered by him. This is the impregnable fortress of a soul. All is at the disposal and command of my God; my Father rules all: what need I fear?

Every one trusts to somewhat. As for honor, and esteem, and popularity, they are airy, vain things; but riches seem a more solid work and fence, yet they are but a tower in conceit, not really. Prov. xviii. 11. The rich man's wealth is his strong city, and as a high wall in his own conceit. But (ver. 10), the name of the Lord is a strong tower, indeed. This is the thing that all seek, some fence and fixing; here it is. We call you not to vexation and turmoil, but from it, and, as St. Paul said, Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you. Ye blindly and fruitlessly seek after the show. The true aiming at this fixedness of mind will secure that, though they fall short, yet, by the way they will light on very pretty things that have some virtue in them, as they that seek the philosopher's stone. But the believer hath the thing, the secret itself of tranquillity and joy, and this turns all into gold, their iron chains into a crown of gold: While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18.

This is the blessed and safe estate of believers. Who can think they have a sad, heavy life? Oh! it is the only lightsome, sweet, cheerful condition in the world. The rest of men are poor, rolling, unstayed things, every report shaking them, as the leaves of trees are shaken with the wind; yea, lighter than so, as the chaff that the wind drives to and fro at its pleasure. Isa. vii. 2; Psalm i. 4. Would men but reflect and look in upon their own hearts, it is a wonder what vain, childish things the most would find there, glad and sorry at things as light as the toys of children, at which they laugh and cry in a breath.

How easily is the heart puffed up with a thing or a word that pleaseth us, bladder-like, swelled with a little air, and it shrinks again in discouragements and fear, upon the touch of a needle's point, which gives that air some vent.

What is the life of the greatest part but a continual tossing between vain hopes and fears? All their days are spent in these. Oh! how vain a thing is a man even in his best estate, while he is nothing but himself—while his heart is not united and fixed on God, and he is disquieted in vain. How small a thing will do it! He needs no other than his own heart; it may prove disquietment enough to itself: his thoughts are his tormentors.

I know some men are, by a stronger understanding and by moral principles, somewhat raised above the vulgar, and speak big of a constancy of mind; but these are but flourishes, an acted bravery. Somewhat there may be that will hold out in some trials, but it will fall far short of this fixedness of faith. Troubles may so multiply, as to drive them at length from their posture, and may come on so thick, with such violent blows, as will smite them out of their artificial guard, disorder all their Seneca and Epictetus, and all their own calm thoughts and high resolves. The approach of death, though they make a good mien, and set the best face on it, or if not, yet, some kind of terror, may seize on their spirits, which they are not able to shift off. But the soul trusting on God, is prepared for all, not only for the calamities of war, pestilence, famine, poverty, or death, but when in the saddest apprehensions of the soul beyond hope, believes against hope; even in the darkest night, casts anchor in God, reposes on him when he sees no light. Is. l. 10 Yea, though he slay me, says Job, yet will I trust on him—not merely, though I die, but, though he slay me: when I see his hand lifted up to destroy me, yet, from that same hand will I look for salvation.

My brethren, my desire is, to stir up in your hearts an ambition after this blessed estate of the godly who fear the Lord, and trust in him, and so fear no other thing. The common revolutions and changes of the world, and those which in these late times we ourselves have seen, and the likelihood of more and greater coming on, seem dreadful to weak minds. But let these persuade us the more to prize and seek this fixed, unafrighted station: there is no fixing but here.

Oh! that you would be persuaded to break off from the vile ways of sin, which debase the soul and fill it full of terrors, and to disengage them from the vanities of this world, to take up in God, to live in him wholly, to cleave to and depend on him, to esteem nothing beside him! Excellent was the answer of that holy man to the emperor, on his first essaying him with large proffers of honor and riches to draw him from Christ: Offer these things (says he) to children, I regard them not. Then after he had tried to terrify him with threatening: Threaten (says he) your effeminate courtiers, I fear none of these things.

Seek to have your hearts established on him by the faith of eternal life, and then it will be ashamed to distrust him in any other thing. Yea, truly, you will not much regard, nor be careful for other things how they be. It will be all one, the better and the worse of this moment; the things of it, even the greatest, being both in themselves so little and worthless, and of so short continuance.

Well, choose you; but all reckoned and examined, I had rather be the poorest believer than the greatest king on earth. How small a commotion, small in its beginning, may prove the overturning of the greatest kingdom! But the believer is heir to a kingdom that can not be shaken. The mightiest and most victorious prince, who hath not only lost nothing, but hath been gaining new conquests all his days, is stopped by a small distemper in the middle of his course; he returns to his dust, and then his vast designs fall to nothing. In that very day his thoughts perish. But the believer, in that very day, is sent to the possession of his crown: that is his coronation-day; all his thoughts are accomplished.

How can you affright him? Bring him word that his estate is ruined. "Yet, my inheritance is safe," says he. "Your wife, or child, or dear friend, is dead."—"Yet my Father lives."—"You yourself must die."—"Well, then, I go home to my Father, and to my inheritance."

For the public troubles of the church, doubtless, it is both a pious and a generous temper, to be more deeply affected for these than for all our private ones: and to be alive to the common calamities of any people, but especially of God's own people, hath been the character of men near unto him. Observe the pathetic strains of the prophets' bewailing, when they foretell the desolation even of foreign kingdoms, much more when foretelling that of the Lord's chosen people; they are still mindful of Sion, and mournful for her distresses. See Jer. ix. 1, and the whole book of Lamentations. So the psalmist: If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, &c. Psalm cxxxvii. 5. Pious spirits are always public-spirited, as even brave heathens were for the commonwealth. So he, in that passage of Horace:* "Little regarding himself, but much solicitous for the public." Yet even in this, with much compassion, there is a calm in a believer's mind. How these agree, none can tell but they who feel it. He finds amid all hard news, yet still a fixed heart, trusting, satisfied in this, that deliverance shall come in due time (Psalm cii. 13), and that in those judgments that are inflicted, man shall be humbled and God exalted (Isa. ii. 11; v. 16), and that in all tumults, and changes and subversions of states, still, his throne is fixed, and with that the believer's heart likewise. So Psalm xxix. 10: The Lord sitteth upon the flood: yea, the Lord sitteth king for ever. Or, sat in the flood, possibly referring to the general deluge; yet, then, God sat quiet, and still sitteth king for ever. He steered the ark, and still guides his church through all. So Psalm xlvi., throughout that whole Psalm. In all commotions, the kingdom of Christ shall be spreading and growing, and the close of all shall be full victory on his side: and that is sufficient for the believer.

Of this, a singular example is in Job, who was not daunted with so many ill-hearings, but stood as an unmoved rock amid the winds and waves: Ille velut rupes immota manebat.

In this condition there is so much sweetness that, if known, a man might suspect himself to be rather selfishly taken with it, than to be purely loving God. Such joy in believing, or at least such peace, such a serene calmness, is in no other thing in this world. Nothing either without or within a man is to be named with this trusting on his goodness, who is God, and on his faithfulness, who, giving his promise for thy warrant, commands thee to rely on him. The holy soul still trusts under the darkest apprehensions. If it is suggested that thou art a reprobate, yet will the soul say, "I will see the utmost, and hang by the hold I have, till I feel myself really cast off, and will not willingly fall off. If I must be separated from him, he shall do it himself; he shall shake me off while I would cleave to him. Yea, to the utmost, I will look for mercy, and will hope better: though I found him shaking me off, yet will I think he will not do it." It is good to seek after all possible assurance, but not to fret at the want of it; for even without those assurances which some Christians hang too much upon, there is in simple trust and reliance on God, and in a desire to walk in his ways, such a fortress of peace, as all the assaults in the world are not able to make a breach in. And to this add that unspeakable delight in walking in his fear, joined with this trust. The noble ambition of pleasing him, makes one careless of pleasing or displeasing all the world. Besides, the delight in his commandments, in so pure, so just a law, holiness, victory over lusts, and temperance, hath a sweetness in it that presently pays itself, because it is agreeable to his will.

It is the godly man alone, who, by this fixed consideration in God, looks the grim visage of death in the face with an unappalled mind, which damps all the joys, and defeats all the hopes of the most prosperous, proudest, and wisest worldlings. As Archimedes said, when shot, Avocásti ab optima demonstratione, so it spoils all their figures and fine devices. But to the righteous, there is hope in his death. He goes through it without fear, without Caligula's Quò vadis. Though riches, honors, and all the glories of this world, are with a man, yet he fears; yea, he fears the more for these, because here they must end. But the good man looks death out of countenance, in the words of David, Though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, yet will I fear no evil, for thou art with me. Psalm xxiii. 4.

* *Invenit insomni volentem publica curâ
Fata virum, casusque urbis, cunctisque timentem, Securumque sui.*

SERMON XIII.

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

MATT. xiii. 3.

And he spake many things unto them in parables, saying, Behold a sower went forth to sow.

THE rich bounty of God hath furnished our natural life, not barely for strict necessity, but with great abundance: many kinds of beasts, and fowls, and fishes, and herbs, and fruits, has he provided for the use of man. Thus our spiritual life likewise is supported with a variety: the word, the food of it, hath not only all necessary truths once simply set down, but a great variety of doctrine for our more abundant instruction and consolation. Among the rest, this way of similitudes hath a notable commixture of profit and delight.

Parables not unfolded and understood, are a veil (as here) to the multitude; and in that view, they are a great judgment (as Isa. vi. 9, cited here): but when cleared and made transparent, then they are a glass to behold Divine things in more commodiously and suitably to our way. All things are big with such resemblances, but they require the dexterous hand of an active spirit to bring them forth. This way, beside other advantages, is much graced and commended by our Savior's frequent use of it.

That which is given here, is fitted to the occasion: multitudes were coming to hear him, and many were not a whit the better for it. He instructs us in this point, the great difference between the different hearts of men, so that the same word hath very different success in them.

In this parable we shall consider these three things: 1. The nature of the word itself. 2. The sameness and commonness of the dispensation. 3. The difference of the operation and production.

The word, the seed, hath in it a productive virtue to bring forth fruit according to its kind, that is, the fruit of a new life; not only a new habitude and fashion of life without, but a new nature, a new kind of life within, new thoughts, a new estimate of things, new delights and actions. When the word reveals God, his greatness and holiness, then it begets pious fear and reverence, and study of conformity to him. When it reveals his goodness and mercy, it works love and confidence.

When it holds up to our view Christ crucified, it crucifies the soul to the world, and the world to it. When it represents those rich things which are laid up for us, that blessed inheritance of the saints, then it makes all the lustre of this world vanish, shows how poor it is, weans and calls off the heart from them, raising it to those higher hopes, and sets it on the project of a crown. And so it is a seed of noble thoughts and of a suitable behavior in a Christian, as in the exposition of this parable, as it is called the word of the kingdom; seed, an immortal seed, as St. Peter calls it, 1 Peter i. 23, springing up to no less than eternal life.

This teaches us, 1. Highly to esteem the great goodness of God to those places and times which have been most blessed with it. He showeth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Psalm cxlvii. 19.

2. That the same dispensation is to be preached indifferently to all where it comes, as far as the sound can reach. And thus it was very much extended in the first promulgating of the gospel; their sound went out through all the earth, as the apostle allusively applies that of the psalmist. Romans x. 18; Psalm xix. 4.

3. This teaches also ministers liberally to sow this seed at all times, according to that, In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand, &c. (Ecc. xi. 6), praying earnestly to him who is the Lord, not only of the harvest, but of the seedtime, and of this seed, to make it fruitful. This is his peculiar work. So the apostle acknowledges, I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase. 1 Cor. iii. 6.

4. Hence we also learn the success to be very different. This is most evident in men: while one is cast into the mould and fashion of the word, and so moulded and fashioned by it, another is no whit changed; while one heart is melting before it, another is still hardened under it.

So, then, this is not all, to have the word and to hear it, as if that would serve our turn and save us, as we commonly fancy, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we. Multitudes under the continual sound of the word, yet remain lifeless and fruitless, and die in their sins. Therefore, we must inquire and examine strictly, what becomes of it, how it works, what it brings forth; and for this very end, this parable declares so many are fruitless. We need not press them, they are three to one here; yea, that were too narrow, the odds is far greater, for these are but the kinds of unfruitful grounds, and under each of these are comprised huge multitudes of individuals, so that there may be a hundred to one, and it is to be feared that in many congregations it is more than so.

Whence is then the difference? Not from the seed ; that is the same to all. Not from the sower neither, for though these be divers, and of different abilities, yet it hangs little or nothing on that. Indeed, he is the fittest to preach, who is himself most like his message, and comes forth not only with a handful of this seed in his hand, but with store of it in his heart, the word dwelling richly in him ; yet, howsoever, the seed he sows, being this word of life, depends not on his qualifications in any kind, either of common gifts, or special grace. People mistake this much, and it is a carnal conceit to hang on the advantages of the minister, or to eye that much. The sure way is, to look up to God, and to look into thine own heart. An unchanged, unsoftened heart, like an evil soil, disappoints the fruit. What though sown by a weak hand, yea, possibly a foul one, yet if received into a clean and honest heart, it will fructify much. There is in the world a needless and prejudicial distinguishing of men, out of which people will not come, for all we can say.

The first bad ground is a highway. Now we have a commentary here, whence we may not, and will not depart : it is authentic and full. It is those who hear the word and understand it not. Ver. 19. Gross, brutish spirits, who perceive not what is said, are as if they were not there, sit like blocks, one log of wood upon another ; as he said, Lapis super lapidem in teatro. This is our brutish multitude. What pity is it to see so many, such as have not so much as a natural apprehension of spiritual truths ! Their hearts are the common road of all passengers, of all kinds of foolish, brutish thoughts ; seeking nothing but how to live, and yet they know not to what end, have no design ; trivial, highway hearts, which all temptations pass through at their pleasure ; profane as Esau, which some critics draw from a word signifying the threshold, the outer step that every foul foot treads on.

These retain nothing ; there is no hazard of that ; and yet, the enemy of souls, to make all sure, lest peradventure some word might take root unawares, some grain of this seed, is busy to pick it away ; to take them off from all reflection, all serious thoughts, or the remembrance of anything spoken to them. And if any common word is remembered, yet it doth no good, for that is trodden down like the rest ; though the most is picked up, because it lies on the road. So it is expressed, Mark iv. 4.

The second is stony ground ; hard hearts, not softened and made penetrable to receive in deeply this ingrafted word with meekness, with humble yielding and submission to it ; the rocks. Yet, in these, there is often some receiving of it, and a little slender moisture above them, which the warm air may make spring up a little ; they receive with joy, have a little present delight in it, are moved and taken with the sermon, possibly even to the shedding of some tears : but the misery is, there is want of depth of earth, it sinks not.

No wonder if there is some present delight in these. Therefore, the word of the kingdom, especially if skilfully and sensibly delivered by some more able speaker, pleases. Let it be but a fancy, yet it is a fine pleasant one ; such love as induced the Son of God to die for sinners ; such a rich purchase made as a kingdom ; such glory and sweetness. Therefore the description of the new Jerusalem, Rev. xxi., suppose it to be but a dream, or one of the visions of the night, yet it is passing fine ; it must needs please a mind that heeds what is said of it. There is a natural delight in spiritual things, and thus the word of the prophet, as the Lord tells him (Ezek. xxxiii. 32), was as a minstrel's voice, a fine song so long as it lasted, but which dies out in the air. It may be, the relish and air of it will remain awhile in the imagination, but not long ; even that wears out and is forgotten. So here, it is heard with joy, and some is springing up presently : they commend it, and, it may be, repeat some passages, yea, possibly desire to be like it, to have such and such graces as are recommended, and upon that think they have them, are presently good Christians in their own conceit. And to appearance, some change is wrought, and it appears to be all that it is ; but it is not deep enough. They talk, possibly, too much, more than those whose hearts receive it more deeply ; there it lies hid longer, and little is heard of it ; others may think it is lost, and, possibly, themselves do not perceive that it is there ; they are exercised and humbled at it, and find no good in their own hearts ; yet, there it is hid ; as David says, Thy word have I hid in my heart. And as seed in a manner dies in a silent, smothering way, yet, it is in order to the fructifying and the reviving of it, so it will spring up in time, and be fruitful in its season—with patience, as St. Luke hath it of the good ground ; not so suddenly, but much more surely and solidly.

But the most are present mushroom Christians, soon ripe, soon rotten. The seed goes never deep : it springs up indeed, but anything blasts and withers it. There is little root in some. If trials arise, either the heat of persecution without, or a temptation within, this sudden spring-seed can stand before neither.

Oh, rocky hearts ! How shallow, shallow, are the impressions of Divine things upon you ! Religion goes never farther than the upper surface of your hearts. You have but few deep thoughts of God, and of Jesus Christ, and the things of the world to come ; all are but slight and transient glances.

The third is, thorny ground. This relates to the cares, and pleasures, and all the interests of this life. See Mark iv. 1 ; and Luke viii. 5. All these together are the thorns. And these grow in hearts which do more deeply receive the seed, and send it forth, and in which it springs up more hopefully than in either of the other two, and yet they choke it. Oh, the pity!

Many are thus almost at heaven; there is so much desire of renovation, and some endeavors after it, and yet, the thorns prevail. Miserable thorns, the base things of a perishing life, drawing away the strength of affections, sucking the sap of the soul! Our other seed and harvest, our corn and hay, our shops and ships, our tradings and bargains, our suits and pretensions for places and employments of gain or credit, husband or wife, and children, and house, and train, our feasting and entertainments, and other pleasures of sense, our civilities and compliments, and a world of those in all the world, are these thorns, and they overspread all: the lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life.

And for how long is all the advantage and delight of these? Alas! that so poor things should prejudice us against the rich and blessed increase of this divine seed!

The last is, good ground, a good and honest heart. There is not much fineness here, not many questions and disputes, but honest simplicity, sweet sincerity, that is all; an humble, single desire to eye and to do the will of God, and this from love to himself. This makes the soul abound in the fruits of holiness, receiving the word as the ground of it. Different degrees there are indeed, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundred fold; yet, the lowest are aiming at the highest, not resting satisfied, still growing more fruitful; if thirty last year, desiring to bring forth sixty this.

This is the great point, and we ought to examine it; for much is sown and little brought forth. Our God hath done much for us; (what more could be done?) yet, when grapes were expected, wild grapes are produced. What becomes of all? Who grow to be more spiritual, more humble and meek, more like Christ, more self-denying, fuller of love to God and one to another? Some, but alas! how few. All the land is sown, and that plentifully, with the good seed; but what comes for the most part? Cockle, and no grain. Infelix lolium.

We would do all other things to purpose, and not willingly lose our end: we would not trade and gain nothing, buy and sell, and live by the loss; we would not plough and sow, and reap nothing. How sensibly do we feel one ill year! And shall this alone be lost labor which, well improved, were worth all the rest? Oh! how much more worth than all! Shall we do only the greatest business to the least purpose? Bethink yourselves, what do we here? Why come we here? If we still remain as proud and passionate, as self-willed as before, what will all great bargains, and good years, and full barns, avail within a while? That word, Thou fool, this night shall they fetch away thy soul, how terrible will it be!

We think we are wise in not losing our labor in other things; why, it is all lost, even where most is gained. What am junks it to, when cast up? Vanity and vexation of spirit, is the total sum. And in all our projecting and bustling, what do we but sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind, sow vanity and reap vexation?

This seed alone, being fruitful, makes rich and happy, springs up to eternal life! Oh! that we were wise, that we would at length learn to hear every sermon as on the utmost edge of time, at the very brink of eternity! For anything we know for ourselves, of any of us it may be really so. However, it is wise and safe to do it as if it were so. Will you be persuaded of this? It were a happy sermon, if it could prevail for the more fruitful hearing of all the rest henceforward. We have lost too much of our little time; and thus, with the apostle, I beseech you, I beseech you, receive not the grace of God in vain.

Now, that you may be fruitful, examine well your own hearts: pluck up, weed out, for there are still thorns. Some will grow, but he is the happiest man who hath the sharpest eye and the busiest hand, spying them out, and plucking them up. Take heed how ye hear; think it not so easy a matter. Plough up, and sow not among thorns. Jeremiah iv. 3.

And above all, pray, pray before, after, and in hearing. Dart up desires to God. He is the Lord of the harvest, whose influence doth all. The difference of the soil makes indeed the difference of success: but the Lord hath the privilege of bettering the soil. He who framed the heart changes it when and how he will. There is a curse on all grounds naturally, which fell on the earth for man's sake, but fell more on the ground of man's own heart within him: Thorns and briers shalt thou bring forth. Now it is He that denounceth that curse, who alone hath power to remove it. He is both sovereign owner of the seed, and the changer of the soil; he turns a wilderness into Carmel by his Spirit; and no ground, no heart, can be good, till he change it.

And being changed, much care must be had still in manuring; for still that is in it, which will bring forth many weeds, is a mother to them, and but a step-mother to this seed. Therefore,

Consider it, if you think this concerns you. He that hath an ear to hear, as our Savior closes, let him hear. The Lord apply your hearts to this work; and though discouragements should arise without, or within, and little present fruit appear, but corruption is rather stronger and greater, yet, watch, and pray. Wait on; it shall be better. This fruit is to be brought forth with patience, as St. Luke hath it. And this seed, this word, the Lord calls by that very name, the very word of his patience. Keep it, hide it in thy heart, and in due time it shall spring up. And this patience shall be put to it but for a little while. The day of harvest is at hand, when all who have been in any measure fruitful in grace, shall be gathered into glory.

SERMON XIV.

HOLINESS.

2 COR. vii. 1.

Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

It is a thing both of unspeakable sweetness and usefulness, for a Christian often to consider the excellency of that estate to which he is called. It can not fail to put him upon very high resolutions, and carry him on in the divine ambition of behaving daily more suitably to his high calling and hopes. Therefore, these are often set before Christians in the Scriptures, and are pressed here by the apostle upon a particular occasion, the avoidance of near combinations with unbelievers. He mentions some choice promises which God makes to his own people, and speaks of their near relation to, and communion with, himself; and upon these, he enlarges and raises the exhortation to the universal endeavor of all holiness, and that as aiming at the very top and highest degree of it.

In the words are, I. The thing to which he would persuade. II. The motive.

I. The thing is, holiness in its full extension and intention. Purging ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

The purging out of filthiness, and the perfecting of holiness, express those two parts of renewing grace, mortification and vivification, as usually they are distinguished. But I conceive they are not so truly different parts, as a different notion of the same thing, the decrease of sin and the increase of grace, being truly one thing, as are the dispelling of darkness and the augmenting of light. So here, the one is rendered as the necessary result, yea, as the equivalent of the other, as the same thing indeed: purging from filthiness, and, in so doing, perfecting holiness; perfecting holiness, and, in so doing, purging from filthiness. By perfection is meant a growing, progressive advance toward perfection.

The words, without straining, give us as it were the several dimensions of holiness. The breadth—cleansing from all filthiness; the length, parallel to man's composition, running all along through his soul and body—from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit; the height—perfecting holiness; the depth, that which is the bottom whence it rises up—a deep impress of the fear of God, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

[Let us cleanse ourselves.] It is the Lord who is the sanctifier of his people; he purges away their dross and tin, he pours clean water, according to his promises; yet, doth he call to us to cleanse ourselves. Even, having such promises, let us cleanse ourselves. He puts a new life into us, and causes us to act, and excites us to excite it and call it up into act in the progress of sanctification. Men are strangely inclined to a perverse construction of things. Tell them that we are to act and work, and to give all diligence, then they would fancy a doing in their own strength, and be their own saviors. Again, tell them that God works all our works in us, and for us, then they would take the ease of doing nothing: if they can not have the praise of doing all, they will sit still with folded hands, and use no diligence at all. But this is the corrupt logic of the flesh, its base sophistry. The apostle reasons just contrary, Phil. ii. 12: It is God that worketh in you both to will and do;—therefore, would a carnal heart say, we need not work, or at least, may work very carelessly. But he infers, Therefore let us work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, that is, in the more humble obedience to God, and dependance on him; not obstructing the influence of his grace, and by sloth and negligence provoking him to withdraw or abate it. Certainly, many in whom there is truth of grace, are kept low in the growth of it, by their own slothfulness, sitting still, and not bestirring themselves, and exercising the proper actions of that spiritual life by which it is entertained and advances.

[From all filthiness.] All kinds of sinful pollutions. Not as men commonly do, reform some things, and take to themselves dispensations in others, at least in some one peculiar sin, their mistress, their Herodias, or their Delilah: no parting with that; yea, they rather forego many other things, as a kind of composition for the retaining of it.

[Of flesh and spirit.] The whole man must be purified and consecrated to God; not only refined from the gross outward acts of sin, but from the inward affection to it, and from the secret motions of it, that so the heart, like a weaned child (Psalm cxxxi. 2), go not after it, which when restrained from the outward commission of sin, it may do, and very often does; as the Israelites lusted after the flesh pots, their hearts remained in Egypt still, though their bodies were brought out. This, then, is to be done; affection to sin is to be purged out. That is, we are to cleanse the ground; not only to lop off the branches, but to dig about, and loosen and pluck up the root. Though still fibres of it will stick, yet we ought still to be finding them out, and plucking them up.

Further, this applies not only to the inner part of all sins, but to some sins that are almost wholly inward, that hang not so much on the body, nor are acted by it; those filthinesses of the spirit which are less easily discerned than those of the flesh, and, as more hardly discerned, so, when discerned, more hardly purged out: pride, self-love, unbelief, curiosity, &c., which, though more retired and refined sins, yet are pollutions and defilements, yea, of the worst sort, as being more spiritual, filthiness of the spirit. Fleshly pollutions are things of which the devils are not capable in themselves, though they excite men to them, and so they are called unclean spirits. But the highest rank of sins, are those that are properly spiritual wickednesses. These in men are the chief strengths of Satan, the inner works of his forts, and strong-holds. 2 Corinthians x. 4. Many who are not much tempted to the common gross sensuality, who have, possibly, though inclination to them, yet, a kind of disdain of them, and through education, and morality, and strength of reason, with somewhat of natural conscience, are carried above them, yet, have many of those heights the apostle speaks of, those lofty imaginations that rise against God and the obedience of Christ, all which must be demolished.

Perfecting holiness.] Not content with low measures, with just so much as keeps from hell, but aspiring toward perfection; aiming high at self-victory, self-denial, and the love of God becoming purer and hotter, like a fire, growing, and flaming up, and consuming the earth. Though men fall short of their aim, yet it is good to aim high: they shall shoot so much the higher, though not full so high as they aim. Thus we ought to be setting the state of perfection in our eye, resolving not to rest content below that, and to come as near it as we can, even before we come at it. Not as though I had already attained, says the apostle, but this one thing I do; forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those which are before, I press toward the mark. Phil. iii. 11, 12. This is to act as one who hath such a hope, such a state in view, and is still advancing toward it.

In the fear of God.] There is no working but on firm ground; there are no solid endeavors in holiness where it is not founded in a deeply-felt reverence of God, a desire to please him and to be like him, which springs from love. This most men are either wholly strangers to, or are but slight and shallow in it, and therefore make so little true progress in holiness.

II. Then there is the motive. Having these promises. Being called to so fair an estate, so excellent a condition, to be the people, yea, the sons and daughters of God, therefore they are called to the coming forth from Babel, and the separating themselves from sin, and purging it out. Holiness is his image in his children; the more there is of it, the more suitable are they to that blessed relation and dignity, and the firmer are their hopes of the inheritance of glory.

Consider sin as a filthiness: hate it. Oh, how ugly and vile is lust, how deformed is swelling pride! And all sin is an aversion from God, a casting of the noble soul into the mire, the defacing of all its beauty. Turning to present things, it pollutes itself with them: he who is clad in scarlet, embraces the dung-hill, as Jeremiah in another sense laments.

The purity of things is, an unmixture and simplicity corresponding with their own being; and such is the purity of the soul when elevated above the earth and sense, and united unto God, contemplating him, and delighting in him. All inordinate bent to the creatures, or to itself (which is the first and main disorder), doth defile and debase it. And the more it is sublimed and freed from itself, the purer and more heavenly it grows, and partakes the more of God, and resembles him the more.

This, then, is to be our main study; first, to search out our iniquities, the particular defilements of our nature; not only gross filthiness, drunkenness, lasciviousness, &c., but our love of this earth, or of air, our vanity of mind, our self-will and self-seeking. Most persons, even most Christians, are short-sighted in respect to their own secret evils, the filthiness of the spirit especially, and use little diligence in this inquiry. They do not seek light from God, to go in before him, and to lead them into themselves, as the prophet had in the discovery of idolatries at Jerusalem. Oh! that we could once see what heaps of abominations lie hid in us, one behind another!

Then, having searched out, we must follow on to purge out: we are not to pass over, nor to spare any, but to delight most in casting out the best beloved sin, the choicest idol, that hath had most of our service and sacrifices, to make room for Jesus Christ.

And never cease in this work, for still there is need of more purifying. One day's work in this, disposes for, and engages to a further, to the next; for, as sin is purged out, light comes in, and more clear discoveries are made of remaining pollutions. So, then, still there must be progress, less of the world, and more of God in the heart every day. Oh! this is a sweet course of life. What gain, what preferment is to be compared to it?

And in this, it is good to have our ambition growing; the higher we rise, to aspire still the higher, looking further than before, even toward the perfection of holiness. It is not much we can here attain to, but surely, it is commonly far less than we might; we improve not our condition and advantages as we might do. The world are busy driving forward their designs. Men of spirit are animated both by better and by worse success: if anything miscarry, it sets them on the more eagerly to make it up, in the right management of some other design: and when they prosper in one thing, that enables and encourages them to attempt further. Shall all other things seem worth our pains? Are only grace and glory so cheap in our account, that the least diligence of all goes that way ? Oh, strange delusion !

Now, our cleansing is to be managed by all holy means: the word and sacrament more wisely and spiritually used than commonly they are with us ; and private prayer, which purifies and elevates the soul, takes it up into the mount, and makes it shine ; and particularly, supplicating for the Spirit of holiness and for victory over sin, is not in vain ; —the soul obtains its desires of God, becoming that which it is fixedly set upon ; holy resolution ;—Christians are much wanting in this, are faint and loose in their purposes ; —the consideration of Divine truths, the mysteries of the kingdom, the hope of Christians, yea, rich and great promises, that is particularly here the motive: these are all the means, and holy means they are, as their end is, the perfection of holiness.

Having these promises.] Now consider whether it is better to be the slaves of Satan, or the sons of God. Measure delight in God, with the low, base pleasures of sense. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God: these gradually go on together, and are perfected together.

Why, then, is there such an invincible love of sin in the hearts of men ? At least, why so little love of holiness, and endeavor after it, so mean thoughts of it, as a thing either indecent or unpleasant, when it is the only noble and the only delightful thing in the world ? The soul by other things is drawn below itself, but by holiness it is raised above itself, and made divine. The pleasures of sin are for a season: they are the pleasures of a moment exchanged for those of eternity. But even in the mean time, in this season, the holy soul is fed with communion with God, one hour of which is of more worth than the longest life of the highest of the world's delights.

SERMON XV.

GRACE AND OBEDIENCE.

PSALM CXIX. 32.

I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart.

To desire ease and happiness, under a general representation of it, is a thing of more easy and general persuasion ; there is somewhat in nature to help the argument. But to find beauty in, and be taken with, the very way of holiness that leads to it, is more rare, and depends on a higher principle. Self-love inclines a man to desire the rest of love, but to love and desire the labor of love, is love of a higher and purer strain. To delight and be cheerful in obedience, argues much love as the spring of it. That is the thing the holy psalmist doth so plentifully express in this Psalm, and he is still desiring more of that sweet and lively affection that might make him yet more abundant in action. Thus here, I will run, &c. He presents his desire and his purpose together, q. d., The more of this grace thou bestowest on me, the more service shall I be able to do thee.

This is the top of his ambition, while others are seeking to enlarge their barns, their lands or estates, or their titles ; and kings to enlarge their territories or authority, to encroach on neighboring kingdoms, or be more absolute in their own ; instead of all such enlargements, this is David's great desire, an enlarged heart to run the way of God's commandments.

And these other (how big soever they sound) are poor narrow desires: this one is larger and higher than them all, and gives evidence of a heart already large. But as it is miserable in those desires, so it is happy in this, that much would still have more.

Let others seek more money, or more honor, oh ! the blessed choice of that soul that is still seeking more love to God, more affection, and more ability to do him service ; that counts all days and hours for lost, which are not employed to this improvement ; that hears the word in public, and reads it in private for this purpose, to kindle this love, or to blow the spark, if any there be already in the heart, to raise it to a clear flame, and from a little flame to make it burn yet hotter and purer, and rise higher : but, above all means, is often presenting this in prayer to him on whose influence all depends, in whose hand our hearts are, much more than in our own. It follows him with this desire, and works on him by his own interest. Though there can be really no accession of gain to him by our services, yet, he is pleased so to account with us as if there were. Therefore we may urge this : Lord, give more, and receive more : I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart.

We have here in the words a required disposition, and a suitable resolution. The disposition relates to the resolution, as the means of fulfilling it ; and the resolution relates to the disposition, both as the end of desiring it, and as the motive of obtaining it. The resolution occurs first in the words,

I will run, &c.] The way resolved on, is, that of God's commandments ; not the road of the polluted world, not the crooked ways of his own heart, but the highway, the royal way, the straight way of the kingdom, and that in the notion of subjection and obedience, the way of thy commandments. This, man naturally struggles against, and repines at. To be limited and bounded by a law is a restraint ; and vain man could possibly find in his heart to do many of the same things that are commanded, but he would not be tied, would have his liberty, and do it of his own choice. This is the enmity of the carnal mind against God, as the apostle expresses it : it is not subject to the law of God, neither can it be ; it breaks these bonds, and casts away the cords of his authority. This is sin, the transgression of the law; and this made the first sin so great, though in a matter one would think small, the eating of the fruit of a tree: it was rebellion against the majesty of God, casting off his law and authority, and aspiring to an imagined self-deity. And this is still the treasonable pride or independency, and wickedness of our nature, rising up against God who formed us of nothing.

And this is the power and substance of religion, the new impress of God upon the heart, obedience and resignation to him. To be given up to him as entirely his, to be moulded and ordered as he will, to be subject to his laws and appointments in all things, to have every action, and every word, under a rule and law, and the penalty to be so high, eternal death; all this to a carnal or haughty mind is hard. Not only every action and every word, but even every thought too, must be subject; the soul is not so much as thought-free. Every thought is brought into captivity, as the apostle speaks, 2 Cor. x. 5: and so the licentious mind accounts it. Not only the affections and desires, but the very reasonings and imaginings are brought under this law.

Now, to yield this as reasonable and due to God; to own his sovereignty, and to acknowledge the law to be holy, just, and good; to approve, yea, to love it, even where it most contradicts and controls our own corrupt will and the law of sin in our flesh: this is true spiritual obedience; to study and inquire after the will of God in all our ways, what will please him, and having found it, to follow that which is here called the way of his commandments; to make this our way, and our business in the world, and all other things but accessories and by-works, even those lawful things that may be taken in, and used as helps in our way: as the disciples passing through the corn, plucked the ears and did eat it passing, as a by-work, but their business was to follow their Master. And whatsoever would hinder us in this way, must be watched and guarded against. To effect that, we must either remove and thrust it aside, or if we can not do that, yet we must go over it, and trample it under foot, were it the thing or the person that is dearest to us in the world. Till the heart be brought to this state and purpose, it is either wholly void of, or very low and weak in the truth of, religion.

We place religion much in our accustomed performances, in coming to church, hearing and repeating of sermons, and praying at home, keeping a round of such and such duties. The way of God's commandments is more in doing than in discourse. In many, religion evaporates itself too much out by the tongue, while it appears too little in their ways. Oh! but this is the main: one act of charity, meekness, or humility, speaks more than a day's discourse. All the means we use in religion, are intended for a further end, which if they attain not, they are nothing. This end is to mortify and purify the heart, to mould it to the way of God's commandments in the whole track of our lives; in our private converse one with another, and our retired secret converse with ourselves, to have God still before us, and his law our rule, in all we do, that he may be our meditation day and night, and that his law may be our counsellor, as this Psalm hath it; to regulate all our designs and the works of our callings by it; to walk soberly, and godly, and righteously, in this present world; to curb and cross our own wills where they cross God's; to deny ourselves our own humor and pride, our passions and pleasures, to have all these subdued and brought under by the power of the law of love within us—this, and nothing below this, is the end of religion! Alas! among multitudes who are called Christians, some there may be who speak and appear like it, yet how few are there who make this their business, and aspire to this, the way of God's commandments!

His intended course in this way, the psalmist expresses by running. It is good to be in this way even in the slowest motions. Love will creep where it can not go. But if thou art so indeed, then thou wilt long for a swifter motion. If thou do but creep, be doing, creep on, yet desire to be enabled to go. If thou goest, but yet halting and lamely, desire to be strengthened to walk straight; and if thou walkest, let not that satisfy thee—desire to run. So here David did walk in this way, but he earnestly wishes to mend his pace: he would willingly run, and for that end he desires an enlarged heart.

Some dispute and descant too much whether they go or not, and childishly tell their steps, and would know at every pace whether they advance or not, and how much they advance, and thus amuse themselves, and spend the time of doing and going, in questioning and doubting. Thus it is with many Christians. But it were a more wise and comfortable way, to be endeavoring onward, and, if thou make little progress, at least to be desiring to make more; to be praying and walking, and praying that thou mayest walk faster, and that in the end thou mayest run: not to be satisfied with anything attained, but yet, by that unsatisfiedness, not to be so dejected as to sit down, or stand still, but rather excited to go on. So it was with St. Paul, Phil. iii. 13: Forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press forward. If any one thinks that he hath done well and run far, and will take a pause, the great apostle is of another mind: Not as if I had already attained. Oh, no! far from that, he still sets forward, as if nothing were done: like a runner, not still looking back to see how much he hath run, but forward to what he is to run, stretching forth to that, inflamed with frequent looks at the mark and end.

Some are retarded by looking on what is past, as not satisfied : they have done nothing, as they think, and so stand still discontented. But even in that way, it is not good to look too much to things behind : we must forget them rather, and press onward.

Some, if they have gone on well, and possibly run for a while, yet, if they fall, then they are ready, in a desperate malcontent, to lie still, and think all is lost ; and in this peevish fretting at their falls, some men please themselves, and take it for repentance, whereas indeed it is not that, but rather pride and humor. Repentance is a more submissive, humble thing. But this is what troubles some men at their new falls (especially if after a long time of even walking or running), they think their project is now spoiled, their thoughts are broken off : they would have had somewhat to rejoice in, if they had still gone on to the end, but being disappointed of that, they think they had as good let alone, and give over. Oh ! but the humble Christian is better taught : his falls teach him indeed to abhor himself ; they discover his own weakness to him, and empty him of self-trust ; but they do not dismay him to get up and go on, not boldly and carelessly forgetting his fall, but in the humble sense of it, walking the more warily, yet not the less swiftly ; yea, the more swiftly too, making the more haste to regain the time lost by the fall. So then if you would run in this way, depend on the strength of God, and on his Spirit leading thee, that so thou mayest not fall. And yet if thou dost fall, arise, and, if thou art plunged in the mire, go to the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness, and wash there ; bemoan thyself before thy Lord ; and if hurt and bleeding by thy fall, yet look to him, desire Jesus to pity thee, and bind up and cure thy wound, washing off thy blood, and pouring in of his own.

However it is with thee, give not over, faint not, run on. And that thou mayest run the more easily and expeditely, make thyself as light as may be, lay aside every weight. Hebrews xii. 1, 2. Clog not thyself with unnecessary burdens of earth, and especially lay aside that which, of all things, weighs the heaviest, and cleaves the closest, the sin that so easily besets us, and is so hardly put off us, that folds so connaturally to us, and we therefore think will not hinder us much. And not only the sins that are more outward, but the inner, close-cleaving sins, the sin that most of all sits easily to us ; not only our cloak, but our inner coat, away with that too, as our Savior says in another case ; and run the race set before us, our appointed stage, and that with patience, under all oppositions and discouragements from the world without, and from sin within. And to encourage thee in this, look to such a cloud of witnesses, that compasseth us about to further us, as troubles, temptations, and sin, do to hinder us. They encountered the like sufferings, and were encumbered with the like sins : and yet, they ran on, and got home. Alexander would have run in the Olympic games, if he had had kings to run with : now, in this race, kings and prophets, and righteous persons, run ; yea, all are indeed a kingly generation, each one heir to a crown as the prize of this race.

And if these encourage but little, then look beyond them, above that cloud of witnesses, to the sun, the Sun of Righteousness ; looking off from all things here, that would either entangle thee or discourage thee, taking thine eye off from them, and looking to him who will powerfully draw thee and animate thee. Look to Jesus, not only as thy forerunner in this race, but also as thy undertaker in it, the author and finisher of our faith. His attaining the end of the race, is the pledge of thy attaining, if thou follow him cheerfully on the same encouragements that he looked to : Who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, and despised the shame, and is now set down at the right hand of God.

When thou shalt enlarge my heart.] In all beings, the heart is the principle of motion, and according as it is more or less perfect in its kind, those motions which flow from it, are more or less vigorous. Therefore hath the psalmist good reason, to the end his spiritual course may be the steadfaster and the faster, to desire that the principle of it, the heart, may be more enabled and disposed, which he here expresses by its being enlarged.

What this enlargement of the heart is, a man's own inward sense should easily explain to him. Surely it would, did men reflect on it, and were they acquainted with their own hearts : but the most are not. They would find the carnal natural heart a narrow, contracted, hampered thing, bound with cords and chains of its own twisting and forging, and so incapable of walking, much less of running, in this way of God's commandments, till it be freed and enlarged.

The heart is taken generally in Scripture for the whole soul, the understanding and the will, in its several affections and motions ; and the phrase being here of an enlarged heart, it seems very congruous to take it in the most enlarged sense.

It is said of Solomon, that he had a large heart (the same word that is here), as the sand on the seashore, 1 Kings iv. 29 ; that is, a vast comprehensive spirit, that could fathom much of nature, both its greater and lesser things. He spake of trees, from the cedar in Lebanon, to the hyssop on the wall, and of great beasts, and small creeping things.— Thus, I conceive, the enlargement of the heart compriseth the enlightening of the understanding. There arises a clearer light there, to discern spiritual things in a more spiritual manner ; to see the vast difference between the vain things the world goes after, and the true, solid delight that is the way of God's commandments ; to know the false blush of the pleasures of sin, and what deformity is under that painted mask, and not be allured by it ; to have enlarged apprehensions of God. His excellency, and greatness, and goodness ; how worthy he is to be obeyed and served. This is the great dignity and happiness of the soul ; all other pretensions are low and poor, in respect of this. Here, then, is enlargement, to see the purity and beauty of his law, how just and reasonable, yea, how pleasant and amiable it is ; that his commandments are not grievous ; that they are beds of spices, the more we walk in them, still the more of their fragrant smell and sweetness we find.

And then, consequently, upon the larger and clearer knowledge of these things, the heart dilates itself in affection ; the more it knows of God, still the more it loves him, and the less it loves this present world. Love is the great enlarger of the heart, to all obedience. Then nothing is hard, yea, the harder things become the more delightful.

All love of other things doth pinch and contract the heart, for they are all narrower than itself. It is framed to that wideness in its first creation, capable of enjoying God, though not of a full comprehending of him. Therefore, all other things gather it in, and straiten it from its natural size ; only the love of God stretches and dilates it. He is large enough for it, yea, it, in its fullest enlargement, is infinitely too narrow for him. Do not all find it if they will ask themselves, that in all other loves and pursuits in this world, there is still somewhat that pinches ? The soul is not at its full size, but, as a foot in a strait shoe, is somewhere bound and pained, and can not go freely, much less run : though another who looks on, can not tell where, yet each one feels it. But when the soul is set free from these narrow things, and is raised to the love of God, then is it at ease and at large, and hath room enough : it is both elevated and dilated. And this word signifies a high-raised soul, and is sometimes taken for proud and lofty ; but there is a greatness and height of spirit in the love of God and union with him, that doth not vainly swell and lift it up, but with the deepest humility, joins the highest and truest magnanimity. It sets the soul above the snares that lie here below, in which most men creep and are entangled, in that way of life, which is on high to the just, as Solomon speaks.

Good reason hath David to join these together, and to desire the one as the spring and cause of the other ; an enlarged heart, that he might run the way of God's commandments.

Sensible joys and consolations in God do encourage and enlarge the heart ; but these are not so general to all, nor so constant to any. Love is the abounding fixed spring of ready obedience, and will make the heart cheerful in serving God, even without those felt comforts, when he is pleased to deny or withdraw them.

In that course or race, are understood con- stancy, activity, and alacrity ; and all these flow from the enlargement of the heart.

1. Constancy. A narrow enthralled heart, fettered with the love of lower things, and cleaving to some particular sins, or but some one, and that in secret, may keep foot a while in the way of God's commandments, in some steps of them ; but it must give up quickly, is not able to run on to the end of the goal. But a heart that hath laid aside every weight, and the most close-cleaving and besetting sin (as it is in that forecited place in the epistle to the Hebrews), hath stripped itself of all that may falter or entangle it, it runs, and runs on, without fainting or wearying ; it is at large, hath nothing that pains it in the race.

2. Activity. Not only holding on, but running, which is a swift, nimble race. It stands not bargaining and disputing, but once knowing God's mind, there is no more question or demur. I made haste and delayed not, as in this psalm the word is, did not stay upon why and wherefore : he stood not to reason the matter, but ran on. And this love, enlarging the heart, makes it abundant in the work of the Lord, quick and active, despatching much in a little time.

3. Alacrity. All is done with cheerfulness, so, no other constraint is needful, where this overpowering, sweet constraint of love is. I will run, not be hauled and drawn as by force, but skip and leap ; as the evangelic promise is, that the lame shall leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing ; for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. Isa. xxxv. 6. The Spouse desires her Beloved to hasten as a roe and hind on the mountain of spices, and she, doth so, and each faithful soul runs toward him, to meet him in his way.

It is a sad heavy thing to do anything as in obedience to God, while the heart is straitened, not enlarged toward him by Divine love ; but that once taking possession and enlarging the heart, that inward principle of obedience makes the outward obedience sweet ; it is then a natural motion. Indeed, the soul runs in the ways of God, as the sun in his course, which finds no difficulty, being naturally fitted and carried to that motion ; he goes forth as a bridegroom, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.

This is the great point which our souls should be studious of, to attain more evenness, and nimbleness, and cheerfulness, in the ways of God ; and for this end we ought to seek above all things this enlarged heart. It is the want of this makes us bog, and drive heavily, and run long upon little ground. Oh, my beloved, how shallow and narrow are our thoughts of God ! Most even of those who are truly godly, yet, are led on by a kind of instinct, and carried they scarcely know how, to give some attendance on God's worship, and to the avoidance of gross sin, and go on in a blameness course. It is better thus than to run to excess of riot and open wickedness, with the ungodly world. But, alas! this is but a dull, heavy and languid motion, where the heart is not enlarged by the daily growing love of God. Few, few are acquainted with that delightful contemplation of God, which ventilates and raises this flame of love. Petty things bind and contract our spirits, so that they feel little joy in God, little ardent, active desire to do him service, to crucify sin, to break and undo self-love within us, to root up our own wills to make room for his, that his alone may be ours, that we may have no will of our own, that our daily work may be to grow more like him in the beauty of holiness. You think it a hard saying, to part with your carnal lusts and delights, and the common ways of the world, and to be tied to a strict, exact conversation all your days. But oh! the reason of this is, because the heart is yet straitened and enthralled by the base love of these mean things, and that arises from the ignorance of things higher and better. One glance of God, a touch of his love, will free and enlarge the heart, so that it can deny all, and part with all, and make an entire renouncing of all, to follow him. It sees enough in him, and in him alone, and therefore, can neither quietly rest on, nor earnestly desire anything beside him.

Oh! that you would apply your hearts to consider the excellency of this way of God's commandments! Our wretched hearts are prejudiced; they think it melancholy and sad. Oh! there is no way truly joyous but this. They shall sing in the ways of the Lord, says the psalmist. Psalm cxxxviii. 5. Do not men, when their eyes are opened, see a beauty in meekness, and temperance, and humility, a present delightfulness and quietness in them? Whereas in pride and passion, and intemperance, there is nothing but vexation and disquiet. And then consider the end of this way, and of this race in it, rest and peace for ever. It is the way of peace, both in its own nature, and in respect of its end. Did you believe that joy and glory which are set before you in this way, you would not any of you defer a day longer, but forthwith you would break from all that holds you back, and enter into this way, and run on cheerfully in it. The persuasion of those great things above, would enlarge and greaten the heart, and make the greatest things here very little in your eyes.

But would you attain to this enlarged heart for this race, as you ought to apply your thoughts to these Divine things, and stretch them on the promises made in the world, so, above all, take David's course, seek this enlargement of heart from God's own hand. For it is here propounded and laid before God by way of request: See what is my desire; I would gladly serve thee better, and advance more in the way of thy commandments; now this I can not do till my heart be more enlarged, and that can not be but by thy hand. When thou shalt enlarge my heart. Present this suit often: it is in his power to do it for thee. He can stretch and expand thy straitened heart, can hoist and spread the sails within thee, and then carry thee on swiftly; filling them, not with the vain air of man's applause, which readily runs a soul upon rocks and splits it, but with the sweet breathings and soft gales of his own Spirit, which carry it straight to the desired haven.

Findest thou sin cleaving to thee and clogging thee? Cry to him: "Help, Lord! set me free from my narrow heart.—I strive but in vain without thee; still it continues so.—I know little of thee; my affections are dead and cold toward thee.—Lord, I desire to love thee, here is my heart: and lest it fly out, lay hold on it, and take thine own way with it: though it should be in a painful way, yet, draw it forth, yea, draw it that it may run after thee." All is his own working, and all his motive is his own free grace. Let who will fancy themselves masters of their own hearts, and think to enlarge them by the strength of their own stretches of speculation; they alone, they alone are in the sure and happy way of attaining it, who humbly sue and wait for this enlargement of heart from his hand who made it.

SERMON XVI.

CHRISTIAN TRIUMPH.

ROMANS viii. 33, 34.

Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us.

OTHER men may fancy and boast as they please, but there are none in the world but the godly alone, that are furnished with sufficiently strong supports and comforts against all possible hazards. And of these doth the apostle treat most freely, sweetly, and plentifully, in this chapter. He secures believers in their Christ, touching these two great evils, after condemnation and present affliction, that the one can not befall them, and the other can not hurt them.

For their immunity from the former, they have the clear word of the gospel, and the seal of the Spirit; and that former privilege made sure, as the far greater doth secure the other as the less.

They are freed from condemnation, and not only so, but entitled and ensured to a kingdom. And what hurt then can affliction do? Yea, it doth good; yea, not only it can not rob them of their crown, but it carries them on toward it, is their highway to it: If we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified together. Yea, all things to the children of God do prove advantageous: severally taken in their present sense, they may seem evil, but taken jointly in their after issue, their working together is all for good. In their simple nature, possibly they are poison, yet, contempred, and prepared, they shall prove medicinal. All these things are against me, said old Jacob, and yet he lived to see even all these were for him. The children of God are indeed so happy, that the harshest things in their way change their nature, and become sweet and profitable. This much is effected by their prayers, which have a divine incantation in them. They breathe forth the expressions of their love to God, by which they are characterized, ver. 28, them that love God; and that is put on their hearts, the impression of his love to them, to which they are here led by the apostle, as to the spring-head of all. All their comforts and privileges flow thence, yea, all their love and their faith, appropriating those comforts and privileges. Yea, the very treasury of all together, Jesus Christ himself, is the free gift of this free love. He, as the greatest, ascertainment all things besides as unspeakably less.

These two are such mighty arguments, that no difficulty nor grief can stand before them. The love of God, he is with us; who then can be against us? All the world it may be, but that all is nothing. Once it was nothing; it was that God who is our God, who loves us and is for us, who made it something; and if he will, it may again be nothing. And as it is at its best, it is nothing, being compared with another gift which he hath bestowed on us; and having bestowed that, surely, if there be anything in this world can do us any good, we shall not want it. He that spared not his own Son, but gave him to the death for us, will he not with him give us all things?

And to close all, he makes these two great immunities good to us in Christ. He fixes there. There we are freed from all fear of condemnation, or of being hurt by affliction. No accusation nor guiltiness can annul the righteousness of Christ, and that is made ours. No distress nor suffering can cut us off from the love of God; and if it can not do that, we need not fear it: all other hazards are no hazard, that being sure.

And in confidence of this, the apostle gives the defiance, casts a challenge to angels, to men, to all the world, upon these two points, Who shall accuse?—Who shall separate?—Accuse to God, or separate from him? Whatsoever times may come, the hardest that any can apprehend or foretell, if these two be not sufficient furniture against them, I know not what is.

Men are commonly busied about other events concerning them and theirs, what shall become of this or the other, and what if this or that fall out. But the conscience once raised to this inquiry, the soul being awake to discern the hazard of eternal death, all other fears and questions are drowned and lost in this great question, Am I condemned or not? Is my sin pardoned or not?

And then, a satisfying answer received concerning this, all is quiet; the soul reposes sweetly on God, and puts all its other concerns into his hands. Let him make me poor and despised, let him smite and chastise me, he hath forgiven my sin; all is well. That burden taken off, the soul can go light, yea, can leap and dance under all other burdens. Oh, how it feels itself nimble as a man eased of a load that he was even fainting under! Oh! blessed the man whose sin is taken off, lifted from his shoulders (that is the word, Psalm xxxii. 1), laid over upon Christ, who could bear the whole load, and take it away, take it out of sight, which we could never have done; no, they would have sunk us for ever. That one word, ἀποι. John i. 29, signifies both, and answers to the two, Isa. liii. 4, He hath borne our grief, and carried our sorrows; lifted them away. O how sweet a burden, instead of this, that engagement of obedience and love to him as our Redeemer, and which is all he lays on us! If we follow him, and bear his cross, he is our strength, and bears both it and us. So then, this is the great point, the heart's ease, to be delivered from the condemning weight of sin.

And certainly, while men do not think thus their hearts have very slight impressions of the truth of these things. I fear the most of us scarcely believe this condemnation to come, at least, very shallowly, and so they can not much consider the deliverance from it provided for us in Jesus Christ. I can not see how it is possible for a heart persuaded of these things to be very careful about anything beside. You who eat and drink, and labor and trade, and bestow all your time either in the pains or the pleasures of this earth, what think you of eternity? Is it a light thing for you to perish for ever? After a few days vainly spent, to fall under the wrath of God for ever? Oh, that you would be persuaded to think on these things!

And you who have an interest in this free and blessed estate, why are your spirits so cold, so infrequent in the thoughts of it? Why are you not rejoicing in the Lord, gladdening yourselves in secret when you remember this?—Go the world as it will, my sin is forgiven me. Mistake me, accuse me whoso will, my God hath acquitted me in his Christ, and he loves me, and lives to intercede for me.

Methinks I hear some say, Ay, they who could say that, might be merry indeed; but alas! I have no such assurance. Who can lay anything to the charge of God's elect? That is true, but here is the great point of so hard a resolution, Am I one of these?

That the apostle doth thus specify the owners of this consolation, by this high and hidden character of their election, is not to render it doubtful and dark; for his main aim, on the contrary, is, both to extend it as far as it can go, and to make it as clear as may be to all that have interest in it: but he designates them by the primitive act of love fixing on them, so as it is now manifested to them in the subsequent effects which flow from their election: called, and sanctified, and conformed to Jesus Christ, both by his Spirit with them, and by the sufferings that without arise against them in the world. They are such as, being the sons of God, are led by the Spirit of God, and walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit.

And these things, indeed, considered as their characters, the stamp of God on them, the impressions of their election to life, do check the vain confidence of all carnal, ungodly professors of the name of Christ, and tell them that their pretended title to him is a mere delusion. Certainly, whosoever lives in the love of sin, and takes the flesh for his guide, that accursed, blind guide is leading him into the pit. What gross folly and impudence is it for any man, walking in the lust of his own heart, to fancy and aver himself to be a partner of that redemption, whereof so great a part is, to deliver us from the power of our iniquities, to renew our hearts, and reunite them to God, and possess them with his love!

The great evidence of thy election is, love. Thy love to him, gives certain testimony of his preceding, eternal love to thee: so are they here designated, they that love God. Thy choosing him, is the effect and evidence of his choosing thee. Now, this is not laborious, nor needs to be disputed. Amid all thy frailties, feel the pulse of thine affection, which way it beats, and ask thy heart whether thou love him or not; in this thou hast the character of thy election.

Know you not, that the redeemed of Christ and he are one? They live one life, Christ lives in them, and if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his, as the apostle declares in this chapter. So, then, this we are plainly to tell you, and consider it, you that will not let go your sins and lay hold on Christ, have as yet no share in him.

But on the other side, the truth is, that when souls are once set upon this search, they commonly wind the notion too high, and subtilize too much in the dispute, and so entangle and perplex themselves, and drive themselves farther off from that comfort that they are seeking after: such measures and marks of grace, they set to themselves for their rule and standard; and unless they find those without all controversy in themselves, they will not believe that they have an interest in Christ and this blessed and safe estate in him.

To such I would only say, Are you in a willing league with any known sin? Yea, would you willingly, if you might be saved in that way, give up yourself to voluptuousness, and ungodliness, and not at all desire to follow Jesus Christ in the way of holiness? Then truly, I have not anything as yet to say for your comfort; only there is a salvation provided, and the door is yet open, and your heart may be changed. But, on the other side, are the desires of thy soul after Christ, a whole Christ, to be righteousness, and withal sanctification to thee? Wouldst thou willingly give up thyself to be ruled by him, and have him for thy king? Hadst thou rather choose to suffer the greatest affliction for his sake, to honor him, than to commit the least sin to displease him? Doth thy heart go out after him, when thou hearest him spoken of? Dost thou account him thy treasure, so that all the world sounds but as an empty shell to thee, when he is named? Says thy soul within thee, Oh, that he were mine! and, Oh, that I were his, that I could please him, and live to him! Then, do not toss thy spirit, and jangle and spin out thy thoughtless in fruitless, endless doubtings, but close with this as thy portion, and be of good comfort; thy sins are, or will be forgiven thee.

I add further: if thou sayest still, that thou findest none of all this, yet, I say, there is warrant for thee to believe and lay hold on this righteousness here held forth, to the end that thou mayest then find those things in thee, and find comfort in them. Thou art convinced of ungodliness; then believe on him who justifies the ungodly. Thou art condemned; yet Christ is dead and risen. Flee to him as such, as the Lamb slain, he who was dead, and is alive; and then say, Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, or rather, that is risen. Who shall accuse? It is true, they make clamor and make a noise, both Satan and thy conscience, but how can they fasten any accusation on thee? If they dare accuse, yet they can not condemn, when the Judge hath acquitted thee, and declared thee free, who is greater than all, and hath the absolute power of the sentence. All charges and libels come too late, after he hath once pronounced a soul righteous. And who shall condemn? It is Christ that died. If the sentence of the law be brought forth, yet here is the answer, it ought not to be twice satisfied: now, once it is satisfied in Christ, he hath died, and that stands for the believer. Whosoever flees to him, and lays hold on him for life, he can not die again, nor canst thou die, for whom he died once. Or rather is risen; that raises the assurance higher, and sets it firmer, for this evidences that in his death all was paid. When he, being the surety, and seized on for the debt, and once death's prisoner, yet, was set free, this clears the matter that there is no more to be paid. And yet further, in sign that all is done, he is raised to the height of honor above all principalities and powers, is set at the right hand of the Father, and there he sits and lives to make intercession, to sue out the fulfilling of all for believers, the bringing of them home, lives to see all made good that he died and covenanted for. So, now that his righteousness is thine who believest, any challenge must meet with Christ first, and if it seize not on him, it can not light on thee, for thou art in him, married to him. And the same triumph that he speaks, Isa. l. 8, whence these words are borrowed, is made thine, and thou mayest now speak it in him. I know not what can cast him down, who hath this word to rest upon, and to comfort himself in.

SERMON XVII.

CHRISTIAN TRIUMPH.

ROMANS viii. 35, &c.

Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? &c.

Is this he who so lately cried out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? who now triumphs, O happy man! Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?

Yes, it is the same. Pained, then, with the thoughts of that miserable conjunction with a body of death, and so crying out, who will deliver, who will separate me from that? now, now, he hath found a Deliverer to do that for him, to whom he is for ever united, and he glories now in his inseparable union and unalterable love, which none can divide him from. Yea, it is through him, that presently after that word of complaint he praises God; and now, in him he triumphs. So vast a difference is there between a Christian taken in himself, and in Christ! When he views himself in himself, then he is nothing but a poor, miserable, polluted, perishing wretch; but then he looks again, and sees himself in Christ, and there he is rich, and safe, and happy; he triumphs, and he glories in it, above all the painted prosperities, and against all the horrid adversities of the world; he lives in his Christ, content and happy, and laughs at all enemies.

And he extends his triumph; he makes a common good of it to all believers, speaks it in their name, Who shall separate us? and would have them partake of the same confidence, and speak in the same style with him. It is vain that men fancy these to be expressions of revelations, or some singularly-privileged assurances; then, they would not suit their end, which is clearly, and undoubtedly, the encouragement of all the children of God, upon grounds that are peculiar to them from all the rest of the world, but common to them all, in all ages, and all varieties of condition.

It is true, all of them have not alike clear and firm apprehensions of their happy and sure estate, and scarcely any of them are alike at all times; yet, they have all and always the same right to this estate, and to the comfort of it, and when they stand in a right light to view it, they do see it so, and rejoice in it.

There be indeed some kinds of assurance that are more rare and extraordinary, some immediate glances or coruscations of the love of God upon the soul of a believer, a smile of his countenance; and this doth exceedingly refresh, yea, ravish the soul, and enables it mightily for duties and sufferings. These he dispenses arbitrarily and freely, where and when he will. Some weaker Christians sometimes have them, while stronger are strangers to them, the Lord training them to live more contentedly by faith till the day of vision come.

And that is the other, the less ecstasical, but the more constant and fixing kind of assurance, the proper assurance of faith: the soul, by believing, cleaves unto God in Christ as he offers himself in the gospel, and thence is possessed with a sweet and calm persuasion of his love; that being the proper work, to appropriate him, to make Christ, and in him eternal life, ours. So that it is the proper result and fruit of that its acting, especially when it acts anything strongly, to quiet the soul in him. Then, being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and from that peace, joy, yea, even glorying in tribulation, as there follows. And these springing, not from an extraordinary sense or view, but from the very innate virtue of faith working kindly and according to its own nature.

Therefore many Christians do prejudice their own comfort and darken their spirits, by not giving freedom to faith to act according to its nature and proper principles. They will not believe till they find some evidence, or assurance, which is quite to invert the order of the thing, and to look for fruit without setting a root for it to grow from.

Would you take Christ upon the absolute word of promise, tendering him to you, and rest on him so, this would engraft you into life itself, for that he is, and so those fruits of the Holy Ghost would bud and flourish in your hearts. From that very believing on him, would arise this persuasion, yea, even to a gloriation, and an humble boasting in his love. Who shall accuse—Who shall condemn—Who shall separate?

The undivided companion and undoubted helper and preserver of this confidence of faith, is an active love to Christ, leading to a constant study of holiness and strife against sin, which is the grand enemy of faith, which obstructs the very vital spirits of faith, which makes it sickly and heavy in its actings, and causes the palsy in the hand of faith, so that it can not lay so fast hold. Therefore, this you should be careful of; yea, know that of necessity it attends faith, and as faith grows, holiness will grow, and holiness growing will mutually strengthen and establish faith. The comforts of the Holy Ghost are holy, purifying comforts, and the more the soul is purified and made holy, the more is it cleared and enlarged to receive much of these comforts. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Unholiness is as damps and filthy mists in the soul ; it darkens all.

Hence it is evident in what way Christians may and ought to aspire to this assurance. It is their portion, and in this way they are to aspire to it, and shall find it ; if not immediately, yet, let them wait and go on in this way, they shall not miscarry.

Again, it appears that this assurance is no enemy to holy diligence, nor a friend of carnal security ; on the contrary, it is the only thing that doth eminently ennoble and embolden the soul for all adventures and services. Base fears and doubtings, wherein some place much of religion (and many weak Christians seem to be in that mistake, to think it a kind of holy, spiritual temper to be questioning and doubting), I say these base fears can never produce any thing truly generous, no height of obedience ; they do nothing but entangle and disable the soul for every good work. Perfect love casts out this fear, and works a sweet unperplexing fear, a holy wariness not to offend, which fears nothing else. And this confidence of love is the great secret of comfort, and of ability to do God service. Nothing makes so strong and healthy a constitution of soul, as pure love ; it dares submit to God, and resign itself to him ; it dares venture itself in his hand, and trust his word, and seeks no more than how to please him. A heart thus composed, goes readily and cheerfully unto all service, to do, to suffer, to live, to die, at his pleasure ; and firmly stands to this, that nothing can separate it from that which is sufficient for it, which is all its happiness, the love of God in Christ Jesus. Ver. 39. That is, indeed, his love to us, but it is so as it includes inseparably the inseparableness of our love to him. For observe the things specified as most likely, if anything, to separate us ; Shall tribulation or distress, &c. Now these especially, being endured for his sake, can not immediately have any likely visage of altering his love to us, but rather confirm us in it ; but these shall not separate us, by altering our love to him, by driving us from him, and carrying us into any way of defection, or denial of his name, and so cut us off from our union with him, and interest in his love ; and that is the way wherein the weak Christian will most apprehend the hazard of separation. Now, the apostle speaks his own sense, and would raise in his brethren the same confidence, as to that danger. There is no fear ; not one of these things shall be able to carry us away. These mighty waves shall not unsettle our faith, nor quench the flame of our love. We shall be victors, and more than victors, in all. But how ? Ver. 37 : Through him that hath loved us. Thus his love makes sure ours. He hath such hold of our hearts as he will not let go, nor suffer us to let go our hold : all is fast by his strength. He will not lose us, nor shall any be able to pluck us out of his hand.

Jesus Christ is the medium of this love, the middle link that keeps all safe together between God and man, being so closely united in his personal nature, and the persons of men in and by him, to the Father. So here, it is first called the love of Christ, ver. 35. and then, in the close, The love of God in Christ ; the soul being first carried to him as nearest, but so carried by him into that primitive love of God that flows in Christ, and that gave even Christ to us as before. And this is the bottom-truth, the firm ground of the saints' perseverance, which men not taking aright, must needs question the matter. Yea, we may put it out of question upon their suppositions, for if our own purposes and strength were all we had to rely on, alas ! how soon were we shaken !

So the love of God in Christ is not only here mentioned as the point of happiness, from which we can not be removed, but as the principle of firmness that makes itself sure of us, and us of it, and will not part with us.

Now, it is no pride in a Christian, but the truest humility, to triumph and glory in this. This is it that makes all sure ; this is the great comfort and the victory of the saints. He that loved us and bought us so dear, will not lightly slip from us ; yea, upon no terms will he let us go, unless some stronger than he is, meet with him, and by force bereave him of us ; which we know is impossible. He and his Father, who are one in themselves, and in their strength, and one in this love, are greater and stronger than all ; and he that once overcame for us, always overcomes in us.

Thus he lets temptation and tribulation assault us, and thus neither disproves his love, nor endangers his right to us ; yea, it doth but give proof and evidence of the invincible firmness of both. He suffers others to lie soft, and sit warm, and pamper their flesh at leisure ; but he hath nobler business for his champions, his worthies, and most of all for the stoutest of them : he calls them forth to honorable services, to the hardest encounters ; he sets them on, one to fight with sickness, another with poverty, another with reproaches and persecutions, with prisons and irons, and with death itself. And all this while, loves he them less or they him ? Oh, no. He looks on and rejoices to see them do valiantly ; it is the joy of his heart, no sight on earth so sweet to him ; and it is all the while by his subduing, and in his strength, that they hold out in the conflict, and obtain the conquest.

And thus they are the more endeared to him by these services and these adventures of love for him, and he still likewise is the more endeared to them. Certainly, the more any one suffers for Christ, the more he loves.

Christ: as love doth grow and engage itself by all it does and suffers, and burns hotter by what it encounters and overcomes, as by fuel added to it. As to Jesus Christ, by what he suffered for us we are the dearer to him, so he is to us by all we suffer for his sake.

Love grows most by opposition from others whosoever, when it is sure of acceptance and the correspondence of mutual love in the party loved. Above all, this heavenly, divine love is strong as death, a vehement flame, a flame of God, indeed, as the word is, Cant. viii. 6, and many waters can not quench it; not all these that here follow one another, tribulation, distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, sword. Yea, in the midst of these, I say, it grows: the soul cleaves closer to Christ, the more attempts are made to remove it from him, though killed all the day long. This passage from the Psalms is most fit, both to testify that persecution is not unusually the lot of the saints, and to give instance of their firm adherence to God in all troubles, as the church there professeth. And if the saints in that dispensation could reckon in such a manner, much more ought Christians, upon a clearer discovery of the covenant of grace and their union with God in Christ. The saints are as in a common butchery in the world; yea, not only as sheep for the slaughter, but sometimes as sheep for the altar, men thinking it a sacrifice. They that kill you, says our Savior, shall think they do God service. Yet even this pulls not from him. They part with life? ay, why not? This life is but a death, and he is our life for whom we lose it.

All these things do but increase the victories and triumphs of love, and make it more glorious: as they tell of her multiplying labors to that champion, they are not only conquerors, but more than conquerors, by multiplied victories, and they gain in them all both more honor and more strength; they are the fitter for new adventures, and so more than simple conquerors. We overcome, and are sure not to lose former conquests, but to add more, and conquer on to the end; which other conquerors are not sure of. Oftentimes they outlive their own successes and renown, and lose on a sudden what they have been gaining a whole lifetime. Not so here; we are secured in the author of our victories. It is through him that hath loved us; and he can not grow less, yea, he shall still grow greater, till all his enemies be made his footstool.

Having given the challenge and finding none to answer, and that all, the most apparent, are in a most rhetorical accumulation silenced, tribulation, distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, sword, &c., he goes on confidently in the triumph, and avers his assurance of full and final victory against all imaginable power of all the creatures: neither death nor life, not the fear of the most terrible death, nor the hope or love of the most desirable life. And in the height of this courage and confidence, he supposes impossible enemies, Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers;—unless you take it of the angels of darkness only; but if it could be possible that the others should offer at such a thing, they would be too weak for it. No sense of any present things, nor apprehensions of things to come; not anything within the vast circle of the world above or below; nor any creature, can do it. Here sin is not specified, because he is speaking of outward oppositions and difficulties expressly, and because that is removed by the former challenge, Who shall accuse? that asserting a free and final acquittance of all sin, a pardon of the curse, which yet will never encourage any of those to sin who live in the assurance of this love. Oh, no: and these general words do include it too. Nothing present, nor to come, &c. So it is carried clear, and is the satisfying comfort of all whom Jesus Christ hath drawn after him, and united in his love.

It is enough; whatsoever they may be separated from, the things or persons dearest in this world, it is no matter; the jewel is safe. None can take my Christ from me, and I am safe in him, as his purchase. None can take me from him, and being still in his love, and through him in the Father's love, that is sufficient. What can I fear? What can I want? All other hazards signify nothing. How little value are they of! And for how little a while am I in danger of them! Methinks, all should look on a believer with an emulous eye, and wish his estate more than a king's.

Alas, poor creatures! rich men, great men, princes and kings, what vain things are they that you embrace and cleave to! Whatsoever they be, soon must you part. Can you say of any of them, Who shall separate us? Storms may arise and scatter ships that sail smoothly together in fair weather. Thou mayest be removed, by public commotions and calamities, from thy sweet dwellings, and societies, and estates. You may even live to see and seek your parting. At last you must part, for you must die. Then, farewell parks and palaces, gardens and honors, and even crowns themselves. Then, dearest friends, children and wife must be parted with. Linquenda tellus, et domus et placens uxor. And what hast thou left, poor soul, who hast not Christ, but that which thou wouldst gladly part with and canst not, the condemning guilt of all thy sins?

But the soul that is in Christ, when other things are pulled away, feels little or nothing: he cleaves to Christ, and these separations pain him not. Yea, when that great separatist death, comes, that breaks all other unions, even that of the soul and body, yet, so far is it from separating the believer's soul from its beloved Lord Jesus, that, on the contrary, it carries it into the nearest union with him, and the fullest enjoyment of him for ever.

SERMON XVIII.

GOODNESS OF GOD, AND WICKEDNESS OF MAN.

ISAIAH lix. 1, 2.

Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it can not save, neither his ear heavy, that it can not hear. But your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear.

OUR vain minds are naturally fruitful in nothing more than in mistakes of God. For the most part we think not on him, and when we do it, we fancy him according to our own affections, which are wholly perverse and crooked.

Men commonly judge it a vain thing to spend much pains and time in worshipping him; and if they are convinced of this, and tied to it by the professions of his name, then they think all religion is a shell of external diligences and observances, and count it strange if this be not accepted. In the former chapter we find this, in the prophet's contest with the people about their fasting, and their opinion of it; he cuts up their sacrifices, and lets them see what was within; the skin was sound and looked well, but being opened, the entrails were found rotten. And here he enters into another contest, against the latent atheism of their hearts, who after their manner of seeking God, not finding him, and not being delivered, are ready to think that he either can not, or will not help, and rather rest on that gross mistake, than inquire into themselves for the true cause of their continuing calamities: they incline rather to think it is some indisposition in God to help, than what it truly is, a want of reformation in themselves that hinders it. It is not likely that they would say thus, or speak it out in plain terms; no, nor possibly speak it formally and distinctly within, not so much as in their thoughts; and yet, they might have a confused, dark conceit of this. And much of the atheism of man's heart is of this fashion: not formed into resolved propositions, but latent,* in confused notions of it, scarcely discernible by himself; at least, not searched out and discerned in his own breast: there they are, and he sees them not, not written assertions, but flying fumes, filling the soul, and hindering it to read the characters of God that are writ upon the conscience.

The impenitency of men, in any condition, and particularly under distress, is from the want of clear apprehensions and deep persuasions of God, of his just anger provoked by their sin, and of his sweetness and readiness to forgive and embrace a returning sinner; of his sovereign power, able to rid them out of the greatest trouble, his ear, quick enough to hear the cries, yea, the least whispering of an humbled heart in the lowest deep of his sorrow, and his arm, long enough to reach them, and strong enough to draw them forth. He that comes unto God, must believe that he is, says the apostle, Heb. xi. 6. So, certainly, he who believes that, must come; it will sweetly constrain him: he can not but come, who is so persuaded. Were men's hearts much impressed with that belief in all their troubles, they would eye men less, and God more, and without delay they would fasten upon the church's resolution, Hos. vi. 1: Come and let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn, and he will heal us, he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. And this is the very thing that the prophet would here persuade to by his present doctrine; and having impleaded them guilty, he sets them a copy of humble confession, ver. 12, &c. Hence the frequent complaints in the Psalms, Why hidest thou thyself? So Psalm xxii. 2: I cry, but thou hearest not.

* Ezek. viii. 7. Behind the wall.

In the words of these two verses, these two things appear: a sad condition, and the true cause of it.

The condition, I think, I have reason to call sad: it is God hiding his face that he will not hear. This may be either the personal estate of his children, or the public estate of his church. From a soul, he hides his face, not so much in the withdrawing of sensible comforts and sweet tastes of joy, which to many are scarcely known, and to such as do know them, commonly do not continue very long, but it is a suspension of that lively influence of his Divine power, for raising the mind in the contemplation of him and communion with him in prayer and meditation, which yet may be, where those relishes and senses of joy are not. And the returns of it appear in beating down the power of sin, or abating and subduing it, making the heart more pure and heavenly, making it more to live by faith in Christ, to be often at the throne of grace, and to receive gracious answers, supplies of wants, and assistances against temptations. Now, when there is a cessation and obstruction of these and such like workings, the face of God is hid; the soul is at a loss, seeks still and can not find him whom it loveth. And in this condition it can not take comfort in other things: they are too low. It is a higher and nobler desire than to be satisfied, or diverted, with the childish things that even men delight in who know not God. It is a love-sickness, which nothing can cure but the presence and love of the party loved. Yea, nothing can so much as allay the pain, and give an interval of ease, or recover a fainting fit, but some good word or look, or at least some kind message from him. Set thee in a palace, and all delights about thee, and a crown on thy head, yet, if his love has ceased on thy heart, these are all nothing without him. It was after David was advanced to his kingdom, and is in the Psalm of the dedication of his royal house, that he said, Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. Ps. xxx. 7. g. d. All is dark ; all the shining marble, and the gold, and the azure, lose their lustre, when thou art not here dwelling with me.

And thus for the church ; God is the proper light, the beauty, the life of it. Deck it with all this world's splendor, with all the dresses of pompous worship, these are not its genuine beauty ; and they provoke Him who is its ornament (as is Jer. ii. 32) to depart. But give it the native purity and beauty of holy ministers and ordinances well regulated, yet, even that is but a dead comeliness, proportion and feature without life, when God is absent.

And as for the matter of deliverances and working for her, which is here the thing in hand, none can do anything in that, not the wisest, nor the best of men, with all their combined wit and strength, when he retires and comes not forth, doth not show himself on the behalf of his people, and work their works for them. These have, it may be, some kind of prayer possibly ; they offer at extraordinaries, and yet obtain nothing, are not heard. The saddest note in all the Song of Lamentations, is that at chapter iii. 43, 44 : Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us ; thou hast slain, thou hast not pitied ; thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through. Still, while that door stands open, there is hope and remedy for other evils ; but that being shut, what can a people, or a soul expect, but growing troubles, one sorrow upon the back of another ? Yea, that is the great trouble, the hiding of his face, and his refusing to hear. Observe Job xxxiv. 29 : When he giveth peace, who then can make trouble ? Now the other, in the same terms, would have been, When he makes trouble, who can give peace ? But instead of this, it is, When he hides his face, who then can behold him ? No peace but in beholding him, and nothing but trouble, that is the grand trouble, when he hides his face. And it is expressed in both cases, whether it be personal or national, whether against a nation or a man only.

This is the thing wherein the strength of other troubles lie, that which gives them weight, when they impart and signify thus much, that the face of God is hid from a soul or a people.

We ought to inquire if this be not our condition at this time. Hath he not hid his face from us ? Are we not left in the dark, that we know not which way to turn us ? Either we must sit still and do nothing, or, if we stir, we do but rush one upon another, as in darkness, contesting each to have the way, and yet, when we have it given us, we know not well which way to go. And we think to be cleared, but it fails us ; as in this chapter, ver. 9 : We wait for light, but behold obscurity, for brightness, but we walk in darkness : we grope for the wall like the blind, and stumble at noonday as in the night. Our counsels are strangely darkened, and there is no right understanding one of another. By all our debates, little or no clearing of things is attained, but our passions are more inflamed, and parties are further off ; the light of sound judgment gone, and with it the heat of love, instead of which, that miserable infernal heat, heat without light, mutual hatreds and revilings ; both sides (verbally at least) agreeing in the general terms both of their desires and designs, and yet falling out about modes and fashions of them. And to say no more of parties, the enemies of religion on both hands, right and left, are in action and in power, and only those who love that which we conceive is the way of truth, standing as a naked prey to whether of the two shall prevail. Desires and prayers we have presented, and see as yet no appearance of an issue, but further confusion, even fasting to strife and debate. And where are there any that look like persons to stand in the gap, lifting up holy hands, without wrath or doubting ? Hearts are still as unhumbed, and live as unreformed as ever ! New intestine troubles are most likely to arise, few or none laying it to heart, and with calm, lowly spirits mourning before God for it. Ephraim against Manasseh, and Manasseh against Ephraim, and they both against Judah ; and for all this, his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. Isa. ix. 21.

But generally, men ought to be less in desecanting one on another, and more in searching and inquiring each into himself. Even where it may seem zeal, yet, nature and passion may more easily let in the other ; but this self-search and self-censure is an uneasy task, the most unpleasant of all things to our carnal, self-loving hearts. But the heavy hand of God shall never turn from us, nor his gracious face turn toward us, till there is more of this among us. Most say their prayers, and as they are little worth, they look little after them, inquire not what becomes of them. But, my brethren, would we continue to call, and find favorable answers, we must be more within. The heart must be made a temple to God, wherein sacrifices do ascend ; but that they may be accepted, it must be purged of idols, nothing left in any corner though never so secret, to stir the jealousy of our God, who sees through all. Oh, happy that heart that is, as Jacob's house, purged, in which no more idols are to be found, but the Holy God dwelling there alone as in his holy temple !

Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened.] Much of all knowledge lies in the knowledge of causes ; and in practical things, much of the right ordering of them depends on it. The true cause of a disease found out, is half the cure. Here we have the miseries of an afflicted people reduced to their real cause : that which is not the cause, is first removed. Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it can not save ; but your iniquities have separated between you and your God.

We are not only to be untaught this error, that we think not so, but are to be taught to believe and think on that truth, that God is still the same in power and goodness, to keep up the motion of it in our hearts. So we may call in past experiences and relations of God's former workings for his people, and that with much use and comfort. He who brought forth his people out of Egypt with an outstretched arm (as still they are reminded of that deliverance by the prophets, and called to look on it as the great instance and pledge of their restoration by the same hand), can again deliver his people when at the lowest. Isaiah l. 2.

And with this belief, we shall not faint in the time of deep distress, whether our own, or the church's, knowing the unalterable, invincible, infinite power of our God: that all the strength of all enemies is nothing, and less than nothing, to his: their devices, knots of straw. What is it that is to be done for his church, if her and his glory be interested in it? There remains no question in point of difficulty: that hath no place with him. The more difficult, yea, if impossible for us or any human strength, the more fit work for him. Because it is hard for you, shall it also be hard for me? saith the Lord in the prophet. And where Jeremy uses that argument in prayer, he hath his answer returned in the same words, as the echo to the prayer, resounding from heaven (chap. xxxii. 17, compared with ver. 27), and that in relation to the great restoration of the Jews from Babylon, as is expressly promised, ver. 36, &c. And there the prophet gives that first great example of Divine power, the forming of the world, ver. 17: Behold, thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power.

Men think it is an easy, common belief, and that none doubt of the omnipotency of God. But oh, the undaunted confidence it would give to the heart, being indeed firmly believed, and wisely used and applied to particular exigencies! Men either doubt, or (which, upon the matter, for the use of it, is all one) they forget who the Lord is, when their hearts misgive them because of the church's weakness, and the enemy's power. What is that upon the matter? Remember whose is the church, God's, and what his power is, and then see if thou canst find any cause of fear. See Isa. xli. 14: Fear not, thou worm Jacob, and ye men—few or weak men—(so the word is)—of Israel: I will help thee, saith the Lord, and thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel. So Isa. li. 12, 13: I, even I, am he that comforteth you. There is the strength of it. Who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man, which shall be made as grass; and forgettest the Lord thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth? Do but think aright on him, and then see if it be possible for thee to fear. All thy little doubts and dependencies of mind will fly and vanish away before one clear thought of thy God. Though the world were turning upside down, it shall go well with them who fear him.

And as this apprehension of God strengthens faith, so it quickens prayer. It stirs thee up to seek to him for help, when thou knowest and rememberest that there it is. There is help in him, power enough, and no want of readiness and good will neither. If we apply ourselves to seek him aright, his hand is as strong to save, and his ear as quick to hear, as ever. And in this, that his ear is not heavy, is signified both his speedy and certain knowledge of all requests sent up to him, and his gracious inclination to receive them. Now, these persuasions do undoubtedly draw up the heart toward him.

Again, as they strengthen faith, and quicken prayer, so they teach us repentance, direct us inward to self-examination, to the searching, and finding out, and purging out of sin, when deliverance is delayed; for we are sure it stops not upon either of these on God's part, either the shortness of his hand, or the dullness of his ear. Whence is it then? Certainly, it must be somewhat on our side, that works against us, and prejudices our desires. So here, thus you see the clear aim of it: Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it can not save, nor his ear heavy, that it can not hear. What is it then that hinders? Oh! it is this, out of all doubt—Your iniquities separate, old sins unrepented of, and new sins still added, as all impenitent sinners do. Now this separates between you and God, for he is a holy God, a just God: who hates iniquity. And between you and your God: that pleads no connivance at your sins, but rather calls for nearer inspection and sharper punishment. He will be sanctified in those that are near him, in them especially. Their sin is aggravated much by that relation, your God. To sin against him so grossly, so continually, with so high a hand, and so impenitent hearts; not reclaimed by all his mercies, by the remembrance of his covenant made with you, and mercies bestowed on you, nor by the fear of his judgments threatened, nor by the feeling of them inflicted; no returning or relenting, not of his own people to their God—surely, you must be yet more punished. Amos iii. 2: You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore will I punish you for all your iniquities, q. d. I let others escape with many things that I can not pass over in you. You fast and pray, it may be, you howl and keep a noise, but you amend nothing, forsake not one sin for all your sufferings, and for all your moanings and cries. You would be delivered, but do not part with one of your lusts or wicked customs, even for a deliverance; and so the quarrel remains still. It is that which separates, is as a huge wall between us, between me and your prayers, and between you and my helping hand; and though I do hear, and could help, yet, I will not: till this wall be down, you shall not see me, nor find by any gracious sign that I hear you. This hides his face, that he will not hear.

This way God hath established in his ordinary methods with his people: though sometimes he uses his own privilege, yet, usually he links sin and calamity together, and repentance and deliverance together.

Sin separates and hides his face, not only from a people that professes his name, but even from a soul that really bears his name stamped upon it. Though it can not fully, and for ever, cut off such a soul, yet, in part, and for a time, it may, yea, to be sure, it will separate, and hide the face of God from them. Their daily inevitable frailties do not this: but either a course of careless walking, and many little unlawful liberties taken to themselves, that will rise and gather as a cloud, and hide the face of God; or some one gross sin, especially if often reiterated, will prove as a firm stone-wall, or rather as a brazen-wall, built up by their own hands between them and heaven, and will not be so easily dissolved or broken down; and yet, till that be, the light of His countenance, who is the life of the soul, will be eclipsed and withheld from it.

And this considered, besides that law of love that will forbid so foul ingratitude, yet, I say, this considered, even our own interest will make us wary of sinning. Though we were sure not to be yet altogether separated from the love of God by it, yet, thou who hast any persuasion of that love, darest thou venture upon any known sin? Thou art not hazardless and free from all damage by it, if thou hast need of that argument to restrain thee. Then, before thou run upon it, sit down and reckon the expense; see what will it cost thee if thou do commit it. Thou knowest that once it cost the heart-blood of thy Redeemer to expiate it, and is that a light matter to thee? And though that paid all that score, nothing thou canst suffer being able to do anything that way, yet, as an unavoidable present fruit of it, it will draw on this damage; thou shalt be sure for a time, it may be for a long time, possibly most of thy time, nearly all thy days, it may darken much that love of God to thee, which if thou dost but esteem, think on it. It changes not in him, but a sad change will sin bring on thee, as to thy sight and apprehension of it. Many a sweet hour of blessed communion with thy God shalt thou miss, and either be dead and stupid in that want, or mourn after him, and yet find, though sighs and tears continue, the door shut, yea, a dead wall raised between thee and him, and at best much straitening and pains to take it down again; contrary to other walls and buildings, which are far more easily pulled down than built up, but this is a great deal easier built up than pulled down. True, thy God could cast it down with a word, and it is his free grace that must do it, otherwise thou couldst never remove it: yet will he have thee feel thy own handiwork, and know thy folly. Thou must be at pains to dig at it, and may be it will cost thee broken bones in taking it down, pieces of it falling heavy and sad upon thy conscience, and crushing thee; as David cried out at that work, for a healing word from God, Make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. Psalm li. 8. It will force thee to say, O fool that I was, what meant I! Oh! it is good, keeping near God, and raising no divisions. What are sins? False delights, by which a man but provides his own vexation. Now, this distance from God, and all this turmoiling, and breaking, and crying before he appears again, consider if any pleasure of sin can countervail this damage. Surely, when thou art not out of thy wits, thou wilt never make such a bargain for all the pleasure thou canst make out of any sin, to breed thyself all this pains, and all this grief, at once to displease thy God, and displease thyself, and make a partition between him and thee. Oh, sweet and safe ways of holiness, walking with God in his company and favor! He that orders his conversation aright, he sees the loving kindness of the Lord: It is shown to him; he lives in the sight of it. Psalm l. 23.

But if any such separation is made, yet, is it thy great desire to have it removed? Why then there is hope. See to it, labor to break it down, and pray to him to help thee, and he will put forth his hand, and then it must fall. And in all thy sense of separation, look to him who brake down the middle wall of partition, Eph. ii. 14. There it is spoken of as between men, Jews and Gentiles, but so as it was also between the Gentiles and God, who were separated from his people, and from himself. See ver. 16: That he might reconcile both to God in one body; and ver. 18: Through him we have access by one Spirit to the Father. And then he adds, that they were no more strangers and foreigners, dwelling on the other side of the wall, ἑτεροίκοι, as the word is, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God.

Oh, that we knew more what it were to live in this sweet society, in undivided fellowship with God! Alas! how little is understood this living in him, separated from sin and this world, which otherwise do separate from him; solacing our hearts in his love, and despising the base muddy delights that the world admires; hoping for that New Jerusalem, where none of these walls of sin are, nor any one stone of them, and for that bright day wherein there is no cloud nor mist to hide our Sun from us.

Now, for the condition of the church, know sin to be the great obstructor of its peace, making him to withdraw his hand, and hide his face, and to turn away his ear from our prayers, and loath our fasts : as Isa. i. 15, and Jer. xiv. 12. The quarrel stands : sin not repented of and removed. The wall is still standing ; oaths, and sabbath-breaking, and pride, and oppression, and heart-burnings still remaining. Oh, what a noise of religion and reformation ! All sides are for the name of it, and how little of the thing ! The gospel itself is despised, grown stale, as trivial doctrine. Oh, my beloved ! if I could speak many hours without intermission, all my cry would be, Repent and pray. Let us search and try our ways, and turn unto the Lord our God. Oh, what walls of every one's sin are set to it ! Dig diligently to bring down thine own ; and for those huge walls of public national guiltinesses, if thou canst do nothing to them more, compass them about as Jericho, and look up to heaven for their downfall. Cry, Lord, these we ourselves have reared, but without thee who can bring them down ? Lord, throw them down for us. A touch of thy hand, a word of thy mouth, will make them fall. Were we less busied in impertinences, and more in this most needful work, it might do some good. Who knows but the Lord might make his own way clear, and return and visit us, and make his face to shine, that we might be saved !

SERMON XIX.

TIME TO AWAKE.

ROMANS xiii. 11, 12, 13, 14.

And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep ; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.

The night is far spent, the day is at hand : let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light.

Let us walk honestly as in the day ; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying.

But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

THE highest beauty of the soul, the very image of God upon it, is holiness. He that is aspiring to it himself, is upon a most excellent design ; and if he can do anything to excite and call up others to it, he performs a work of the greatest charity.

This, St. Paul doth frequently and pressingly in his writings. This epistle, as it doth admirably clear the doctrine of justification, it doth not less earnestly urge the doctrine of sanctification. That one sentence about the middle thereof, does excellently unite them, and so is the summary of all that goes before, and all that follows : ch. viii. 1 : There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

The present words are as an alarm, or morning watch-bell, of singular use, not only awaking a Christian to his day's work, but withal reminding him what it is. And these two shall be all our division of them. 1. Our awaking sounded. 2. Our walking directed. The former, ver. 11, 12, tells us, it is time to rise, and calls us up to put on our clothes, and, being soldiers, our arms. The latter, ver. 13, directeth our behavior and employment throughout the day. The last verse doth shortly, and that fully and clearly, fold up both together. We shall take the words just as they lie.

And that, knowing the time. This imports much in all actions, and here it is the apostle's great argument. Now it is unfit to sleep, knowing the time : however it might have been before, now it is very unseasonable and unsuitable, that you lie snoring as at midnight. Do you know what o'clock it is (ή ώρα) ? It is time to rise : it is morning, the day begins to appear.

[Observation.] All the days of sinful nature are dark night, in which there is no right discerning of spiritual things. Some light there is of reason, to direct natural and civil actions, but no daylight. Till the sun arise it is night still, for all the stars, and the moon to help them. Notwithstanding natural speculations, that are more remote, and all prudence and policy for affairs, that come somewhat nearer to action, yet we are still in the night. And you do think that a sad life, but the truth is, we sleep on in it, and our heads are still full of new dreams which keep us sleeping. We are constantly drunk with cares or desires of sense, and so our sleep continues. Sometimes it is called death—dead in sins, &c. Now sleep is brother to death ; and so, by it not unfitly is the same state resembled. No spiritual life we have at all, and therefore in that sense are truly dead. But because there is in us a natural life, and in that, a capacity of spiritual life, therefore we are said to be asleep. As in a deep sleep, our soul is bound up and drowned in flesh, through a surcharge of the vapors of gross, sensible things that we glut ourselves withal ; and the condition of our wisest thoughts, in relation to our highest good, are nothing but dreams and reveries. Your projectings, and bargainings, and buildings, these be a better sort of dreams ; but your envyings, and mutual despising and discontents, your detracting and evil-speaking, these are more impertinent, and to yourselves more perplexing. And your sweetest enjoyments in this life, which you think most real, are but shadows of delight, a more pleasant sort of dreams. All pomps and royal solemnities, the Scripture calls φαντασιαι, phantasies, Acts xxv. 23. A man will not readily think so while he is in them. Somnium narrare vigilantis est. We do not perceive the vanity of our dreams, and know that they are so, till we be awaked. Sometimes in a dream a man will have such a thought that it is but a dream, yet doth he not thoroughly see the folly thereof, but goes on in it. The natural man may have sometimes a glance of such thoughts, that all these things he is either turmoiling or delighting in, are vanity and nothing to the purpose; yet, he awakes not, but raves on still in them; he shifts a little, turns on his bed as a door on its hinges, but turns not off, does not rise.

But the spiritual-minded Christian, who is indeed awake, and looks back on his former thoughts and ways, oh, how does he disdain himself, and all his former high fancies that he was most pleased with, finding them dreams! Oh, what a fool, what a wretch was I, while my head was full of such stuff, building castles in the air, imagining and catching at such gains, and such preferments and pleasures, and either they still running before me, and I could not overtake them, or, if I thought I did, what have I now, when I see what it is, and find that I have embraced a shadow, false hopes, and fears, and joys! He thinks he hath eaten, and his soul is empty. Isa. xxix. 8. And you that will sleep on, may; but sure I am, when you come to your death-bed, if possibly you awake then, then shall you look back, with sad regret, upon whatsoever you most esteemed and gloried in under the sun. While they are coming toward you, they have some show; but, as a dream that is past, when these gay things are flown by, then we see how vain they are. As that luxurious king who caused to be painted on his tomb two fingers, as sounding one upon another, with that word, All is not worth so much, Non tanti est. I know not how men make a shift to satisfy themselves; but, take a sober and awakened Christian, and set him in the midst of the best of all things that are here, his heart would burst with despair of satisfaction, were it not for a hope that he hath, beyond all that this poor world either attains or is seeking after, and that hope is, indeed, the dawning of the day that is here spoken of.

It is time to awake, says he; your salvation is nearer than when ye believed. That bright day you look for, is hastening forward; it is nearer than when you began to believe. The night is far spent, the gross darkness is already past, some daylight there is, and it is every moment growing, and the perfect, full morning-light of it is very near.

[Observation.] Grace, and the gospel that works it, compared with the dark night of nature, is the day, and it is often so called: the apostle here calls it so, Let us walk honestly as in the day. But yet, that same light of the gospel shining to us in the word, and within us by the Spirit, is but the appearance or approaching of the day, a certain pledge of it, yea, a kind of beginning of it, telling us that it is near. It is one and the same light, and where it enters into any soul, it makes sure that eternal full day to it, that it shall not be disappointed of, more than the day can go back, and the sun fail to rise when the dawn is begun. And this begun light is still growing clearer, and tending to the perfect day. Prov. iv. 18. And at the first peep or appearance of it, so much it is, that the soul is called to awake and arise, and put on day-clothes, and apply itself to the actions of the day; and that is the thing the apostle here presses by it.

Oh, the blessed gospel, revealing God in Christ, and calling up sinners to communion with him, dispelling that black night of ignorance and accursed darkness that otherwise had never ended, but passed on to an endless night of eternal misery! Says not Zacharias with good reason in his song, that it was through the tender mercy of God that this day spring from on high did visit us?

Now, says the apostle, this day appearing, it is time to awake. And the longer it is since it began to appear, and the clearer the light grows, the more high time is it to awake and rise, and cast off night-clothes and night-works, works of darkness, and to put on garments, yea, armor of light. He that is a soldier, his garments are not on till his arms be on and his sword about him; then he is ready: especially in a time and posture of war, and the enemy lying nigh, even round about him; and this is every Christian's state while he is here. An armor of light, not only strong and useful, but comely and graceful, fit to walk abroad in, bright shining armor; as your old poets describe their champions, dazzling their enemies' eyes.

And thus apparelled, we are to behave ourselves suitably, to walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness. That is a night-work, as the apostle hath it, 1 Thess. v. 7. To stagger and reel in the streets in daylight, to be drunk in the morning, is most shameful: so is that spirit of drunkenness as unbecoming a Christian; to see them hurrying and jostling one another, as drunk with love of earthly things, and their spirits by that besotted and unfitted for spiritual things, that they find no pleasure in them.

Chambering and wantonness. All impure, lascivious conversation, how vile are these, and unfit for the light! Even nature is ashamed to be seen in these things, in the natural light of the day; much more will grace in the spiritual light of the gospel.

Strife and envy. Asscuffles and hot quarrels are most of all unseemly in the streets in daylight, so, the quarrels and jarrings of Christians are very shameful before the light wherein they walk. The gospel of Christ, the grand doctrine thereof, is meekness and love. But oh! where are they, those graces that so abound in the doctrine of Christianity, and yet are so scarce in the lives of Christians? Where are they who look gladly on the good of others, and bear evils and injuries from their neighbors patiently, and repay evil with good? Thus it ought to be; but, on the contrary, how ready are the most to part on the least occasions, to bite and snarl at each other! There is more still of the spirit of the dragon, than of the dove. My brethren, remember and consider, that the gospel-light shines among us, and that more clearly than in former times, and more clearly than to most people in the world in these times; and do not outface and affront the blessed light with the accursed works of darkness. You might have been profane in former times, or in some other place, at a cheaper rate.

Know, that if this glorious light do not break off your course of sin, it will increase your load of judgment. The heaviest of all condemnations, is to live in darkness, and to live and die in it, in the midst of light. Among all your desperate accursed wishes, this shall be one, and a chief one, that either the Son of God had never come into the world, or that you had never heard of him.

Much of what we aim at, were gained, if Christians could be brought to consider who they are, and to walk like themselves: it would raise them above the base pleasures of sin, and the snares of the world. The way of life is on high to the just: there is a holy loftiness, a disdain of all impure sordid ways. It is said of Jehoshaphat, that his heart was lift up in the ways of the Lord. 2 Chron. xvii. 6. As a vain, self-conceited lifting up of the heart is the great enemy of our welfare (as it is written of another, even of a good king, Hezekiah, that his heart was lift up, therefore was wrath upon him); so there is a happy exaltation of the heart, when it is raised in God, to despise all communion with the unholy, and the unholy ways of the world. This, my brethren, is that which I would were wrought in you by the consideration of our holy calling. We are called to holiness, and not to uncleanness.—Ye are the children of the light and of the day. 1 Thess. iv. 7; v. 5. Base night ways, such as can not endure the light, do not become you. O that comeliness which the saints should study, that decorum which they should keep in all their ways, ἑναχρημοῦσθαι, one action like another, and all like Christ, living as in the light. They that converse with the best company, such persons are obliged to more decency in apparel. We live in the light, in the company of angels of God, and Jesus Christ; and therefore should not act anything that is low or mean, unbecoming the rank we keep, and the presence of those with whom we associate. When the king passes through the country in progress, they who see him seldom, being either to attend him in his way, or to receive him into their houses, will labor to have all things in the best order they can for the time; but they that live at court, and are daily in the king's presence, are constantly courtlike in their habit and carriage, and all about them. O followers of the Lamb, let your garments be always white; yea, let him be your garment; clothe yourselves with himself; have your robes made of his spotless fleece.

Put on the Lord Jesus. No resemblance is more usual than that of people's customs to their clothes, their habitudes to their habits. This the apostle used in the foregoing words, Put on the [furniture, or] armor of light, having cast off the works of darkness, as clothes of darkness, night-clothes. And the word, walking decently, has something of the same resemblance contained in it. And here we have the proper beauty and ornament of Christians, even the Lord Jesus, recommended to them under the same notion, Put on the Lord Jesus Christ. Him we put on by faith, and are clothed with him as our righteousness. We come unto our Father in our Elder Brother's perfumed garments, and so obtain the blessing which he, in a manner, was stripped of for our sakes. He did undergo the curse, and was made a curse for our sakes: so the apostle speaks of him, Gal. iii. 13. We put him on, as the Lord our righteousness, and are made the righteousness of God in him. This investiture is first, when our persons are made acceptable, and we come into court. But there is another putting of him on in the conformity of holiness, which always accompanies the former; and that is it which is here meant. And this I declare unto you, that whosoever does not thus put him on, shall find themselves deceived in the other, if they imagine it belongs to them.

They who are the sons of God, and have the hope of inheriting with Christ, do really become like him, are even heirs in some degree now; and that blessed expectation they have, is to be fully like him. 1 John iii. 3. When he appears, we shall be like him, saith the apostle. And in the meanwhile, they are endeavoring to be so, and somewhat attaining it; as he adds, Every one that hath this hope, purifieth himself, as he is pure. He is the only begotten Son, and we are so restored in him to the dignity of sons, that withal we are really changed into his likeness. He is the image of the Father that is renewed upon us.

It is the substance of religion, to be like him whom we worship.* Man's end and perfection is likeness to God. But oh, the distance, the unlikeness, yea, the contrariety, that is fallen upon our nature! The carnal mind is enmity to God: the soul is, as it were, become flesh, and so most unsuitable to the Father of Spirits; it is become like the beast that perishes. Now, to repair and raise us, this was the course taken: we could not rise up to God, he came down to us, yea into us, to raise and draw us up again to him. He became like us, that we might become like him. God first put on man, that man might put on God. Putting on the Lord Jesus, we put on man; but that man is God, and so, in putting on man, we put on God. Thus, putting on Christ, we put on all grace: we do this, not only by studying him as our copy and example, but by real participation of his Spirit; and that, so as that daily the likeness is growing, while we are carried by that Spirit to study his example, and enabled in some measure to conform to it; so that these two grow together, growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. He is the armor of light before spoken of: all our ornament and safety is in him. Some pictures of great persons you have seen, with arms and robes on at once: thus we, when clothed with Christ, have our arms and robes both on at once, yea, both in one, for he is both. So this is the great study of a Christian, to eye and read Christ much, and, by looking on him, to become more and more like him, making the impression deeper by each day's meditation and beholding of him. His Spirit in us, and that love his Spirit works, make the work easy, as sympathies do. And still the more the change is wrought, it becomes still the more easy to work it. This is excellently described by this apostle, 2 Corinthians iii. 18.

* Summa religionis imitari quem colis.

Now we see our business: oh that we had hearts to it! It is high, it is sweet, to be growing more and more Christ-like every day. What is the purchase or conquest of kingdoms to this? Oh, what are we doing, who mind not this more? Even they whose proper work it is, how remiss are they in it, and what small progress do they make! Are we less for the world and ourselves, and more for God, this year than the former?—more meek and gentle, abler to bear wrongs, and to do good for them, more holy and spiritual in our thoughts and ways, more abundant and fervent in prayer? I know there will be times of deadness, and winter seasons, even in the souls of living Christians; but it is not always so, it will come about yet; so that, take the whole course of a Christian together, he is advancing, putting on still more of Christ, and living more in him. There is a closer union between the soul and this its spiritual clothing, than between the body and its garments: that doth import a transformation into Christ, put on as a new life, or a new self. The Christian by faith doth this: he puts off himself, old carnal self, and instead thereof, puts on Jesus Christ, and thenceforward hath no more regard of that old self, than of old cast clothes, but is all for Christ, joys in nothing else. This is a mystery which can not be understood but by partaking of it.

My brethren, learn to have these thoughts frequent and occurrent with you on all occasions. Think, when about anything, how would Christ behave himself in this? Even so let me endeavor.

You will possibly say, they that speak thus, and advise thus, do not do thus. Oh, that that were not too true! Yet there be some that be sincere in it, and although it be but little that is attained, yet the very aim is excellent, and somewhat there is that is done by it. It is better to have such thoughts and desires, than altogether to give it up; and the very desire, being serious and sincere, does so much change the habitude and usage of the soul and life, that it is not to be despised.

Now follows, And make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof. And it will follow necessarily. We hear much to little purpose. Oh, to have the heart touched by the Spirit with such a word as is here! It would untie it from all these things. These are the words, the very reading of which wrought so with Augustine, that, of a licentious young man, he turned a holy faithful servant of Jesus Christ. While you were without Christ, you had no higher nor other business to do, than to attend and serve the flesh; but once having put him on, you are other men, and other manners do become you. Alia ætas alios mores postulat.

This forbids not eating, and drinking, and clothing, and providing for these, nor decency and comeliness in them. The putting on of Christ does not bar the sober use of them: yea, the moderate providing for the necessities of the flesh, while thou art tied to dwell in it, that may be done in such a way as shall be a part of thy obedience and service to God. But to lay in provision for the lusts of it, is to victual and furnish his enemy and thine own; for the lusts of the flesh do strive against God's Spirit, and war against thy soul. Gal. v. 17; 1 Pet. ii. 11.

This was the quarrel between God and his own people in the wilderness. Bread for their necessities, he gave them, but they required meat for their lusts (which should rather have been starved to death than fed), and many of them fell in the quarrel. He gave them their desire, but gave them a plague with it, and they died with the meat between their teeth. Many who seem to follow God, and to have put on Christ, yet continuing in league with their lusts, and providing for them, they are permitted awhile so to do, and are not withheld from their desire, and seem to prosper in the business; but though not so sudden and sensible as that of the Israelites, there is no less certain a curse joined with all they purchase and provide for that unhallowed use. It is certainly the posture and employment of most of us, even who are called Christians, to be purveyors for the flesh, even for the lusts of it (ad supervacuum sudare); these lusts comprehending all sensual, and all worldly, fleshly, self-pleasing projects. Even some things that seem a little more decent and refined come under this account. What are men commonly doing but projecting and laboring, beyond necessity, for fuller and finer provision for back and belly, and to feed their pride, and raise themselves and theirs somewhat above the condition of others about them? And where men's interests meet in the teeth, and cross each other, there arise heart-burnings and debates, and an evil eye one against another, even on fancied prejudice, where there is nothing but crossing a humor. So the grand idol is their own will, that must be provided for and served in all things, that takes them up early and late, how they may be at ease, and pleased, and esteemed, and honored. This is the making provision for the flesh and its lusts, and from this are they all called who have put on Christ; not to a hard, mean, unpleasant life, instead of that other, but to a far more high and more truly pleasant life, that disgraces all those their former pursuits which they thought so gay while they knew no better. There is a transcendent sweetness in Christ, that puts the flesh out of credit. Put on Christ, thy robe royal, and make no provision for the flesh; surely thou wilt not then go and turmoil in the kitchen. A soul clothed with Christ, stooping to any sinful delight, or an ardent pursuit of anything earthly, though lawful, doth wonderfully degrade itself. Methinks it is as a king's son in his princely apparel, playing the scullion, sitting down to turn the spits. A soul living in Christ indeed, hath no vacancy for the superfluous, luxurious demands of flesh, yea, supplies the very necessities of it with a kind of regret. A necessitatibus meis libera me, Domine, said one: Deliver me, Lord, from my necessities.

Oh, raise up your spirits, you that pretend to anything in Christ; delight in him, and let his love satisfy you at all times. What need you go a begging elsewhere? All you would add, makes you the poorer, abates so much of your enjoyment of him; and what can compensate that? Put on the Lord Jesus, and then view yourselves, and see if you be fit to be the slaves of flesh and earth.

These two, Put on the Lord Jesus, and Make no provision, are directly the representation of the church, Apoc. xii. A woman clothed with the sun, and having the moon under her feet, needed borrow no beauty from it, or anything under it. She left the scarlet, and the purple, and the gold, to the harlot after spoken of, for her dressing.

The service of the flesh is a work the Christian can not fold to, till he forgets what clothes he has on. This is all, my brethren. Oh that we could be once persuaded to put on Christ, and then resolve and remember to do nothing unbecoming that attire!

SERMON XX.

OBSERVATION OF PROVIDENCE.

PSALM cvii. 43.

Who is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord.

MOST men live in a brutal sensitive life, live not so much as the life of reason; but far fewer the Divine life of faith, which is farther above common reason than that is above sense. The spiritual light of grace is that which makes day in the soul: all other wisdom is but night-light. Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness. Eccl. ii. 13. This higher sort of knowledge is that the prophet speaks of.

Having discoursed excellently through the Psalm of the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, so legible in his providence toward men, and often called up the dull minds of men to consider these his works, and bless him for them, he closes with this applause of their happiness that truly do so, Whoso is wise, &c.

They that spake it knew not how true their speech is, who have called the world a nest of fools. It is true, there is very little even of natural clearness of judgment among men, but surely far less of this true spiritual wisdom. So that if we read this as a question, Whoso is wise?—Oh, how few are there! And yet, most imagine they are; few are convinced they are fools, and that is the height of their folly. That word is most true, Job xi. 12; Vain man would be wise, though he be born as the wild ass's colt. In youth, he runs wild, unbroken, and unuseful; and in fuller age, hath but a brutish, slavish life, yokes in with beasts in the same kind of labor; or in little better; turmoiling and drudging to serve his base lusts, his gain, his pleasure, and forgets quite what high condition the soul that sparkles within him is born to, and made capable of. In a word, he knows not God. That is both his folly and his misery. How much of life passes ere we consider what we live for! And though all applied, how incapable are a great many to know anything! Inter homines quid homine rarius! Among men what more rare than man, a truly rational being? To this purpose there is a notable word, Job xi. 8, 9.

Now, to stir up your desires and endeavors after this wisdom, consider that it is the proper excellency of the rational nature, the true elevation of human nature, to be wise. And they are not such, and know somewhat of their own defect, yet would willingly pass for such, and had rather be accounted uncomely, yea, even dishonest, than unwise (call a man anything rather than a fool); but yet, if they could, would rather have the thing than the reputation of it, and desire really to be wise if it were in their power.

Now it were good to work on this design within us, and to have it drawn into the right channel. Would you be wise? Then, seek true wisdom. What most men seek and admire in themselves and others are but false shadows and appearances of wisdom; the knowledge either of base, low things, as to scrape and gather together, or else of vain, unprofitable things, and such knowledge as is for the most part but imaginary. For most things in state affairs take another bias and course, are not so much modelled by wit, as most men imagine. And for the secrets of nature we have little certain knowledge of them.

How short is our life to attain any knowledge! That is an excellent word, Job viii. 8. But the knowledge here set before us, is the best kind of knowledge, that of the highest things, Divine things. I say the best kind of knowledge of them, for there are notions even of these things, that have little in them; either curious, fruitless disputations of such points as are most removed both from our notice and our use, or a useless knowledge of useful things. But this is a well-regulated and sure-footed knowledge of Divine things, as God himself hath revealed them.

This wisdom descends from above; therefore for the attainment of it, these two things are necessary: 1st, To know that we want it, sensibly and feelingly to know this, that we know nothing of the things of God. Mul-ti ad sapientiam pervenirent, nisi se jamjam pervenisse arbitrantur: Many men would have attained to wisdom, if they had not fancied or imagined that they had already attained it. I speak not now of the lowest sort, the grossly, the brutishly ignorant even of the letter of Divine truths, but such as can give themselves or others, if put to it, a good account of the principles of faith and holiness, have read and heard much, and possibly learned and retained not a little that way, yet still are but ignorants, strangers to this heavenly wisdom. Therefore men must first know this, that they must go anew to school again, and become as little children. Wisdom invites no other. Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither. Prov. ix. 4. The strange woman, and so, all the enticements to sin, they invite the same persons (ver. 16), but to a directly opposite end: she calls the fools to befool them, to drown them in folly and wretchedness; but wisdom calls them, to unfool them, to recover them and teach them the way of life.

2dly. Being convinced and sensible of the want of it, to use the right way to attain it, to give all diligent attendance on the word and ordinances of God, to desire it of him. Desire is all: if you desire much, you shall have much. Vent thy desire this way heavenward, whence this wisdom descends. This light springs from on high. Man can not raise himself to it without another. James i. 5. If any man lack wisdom—if he is but once sensible of that, why then the sweetest, easiest way to attain it than can be desired, is pointed out—let him ask it of God, who giveth liberally, and upbraideth not; does neither harshly refuse, nor upbraidingly give it, but delights to give it to them that ask it, even his own Holy Spirit, the spring of this wisdom, as he hath promised.

We are all too little in this humble seeking and begging of this Divine knowledge, and that is the cause we are so shallow and small proficient. If thou cry, and lift up thy voice for understanding, if thou search for it as for hid treasures. Prov. ii. 3. Sit down upon thy knees and dig for it; that is the best posture to fall right upon the golden vein and go deepest to know the mind of God, in searching the Scriptures, to be directed and regulated in his ways, to be made skilful in ways of honoring him, and doing him service. This neither men nor angels can teach him, but God alone. For the Lord giveth wisdom. Ver. 6.

Of this wisdom we have here the character and the privilege.

I. The character: Whoso will observe these things. That looks back to the doctrine of the psalmist, which is very divinely sweet. He had been extolling the goodness of God in general, in his dealings with men, and instancing, in divers occurrent and remarkable particulars, the fitness and mildness of his chastisements, the seasonableness and sweetness of his deliverances, as correcting us for our greater good, and relieving us in our greatest need, when we are nearest despairing of relief. This is exemplified in travellers and prisoners, in sick men and seamen, and in the various disposal of the state of all sorts of persons, the highest and the meanest; and the repeated sweet burden of the song is, O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! And in the end, he declares the result of all, ver. 42, the joy of the godly, the shame and silencing of the wicked, who usually either mistake, or slight, or despise the providence of God in the rule of human affairs, who readily speak big their own thoughts, which are vain, promising themselves continual success. In the end he shall clear himself, and gladden the souls of his people, and clothe his enemies with shame. Wait a while, and thus it shall be; they shall change places. He pours contempt upon princes, and sets the poor on high from affliction, and so rights himself and them that wait on him. Then the righteous shall see it and rejoice, and all iniquity shall stop her mouth. And it is a great point of true wisdom, rightly to observe these things.

This observing hath in it, first, a believing notice of these things, to take such instances aright, when they meet our eye, to know these things to be indeed the Lord's doings: and so, when we are in any present strait, to believe, accordingly, the same inspection of his eye, and secret conduct of his hand, to be in all. Now it is a great point to have the heart established in these persuasions. We are generally much defective in this, and they most who least suspect themselves of it. But withal, the observing or keeping of these things (so the word is), this firm believing, hath in it these two following on it, and flowing from it, serious contemplation and suitable action.

1. To observe these things, is often to turn our eye to the view of these things, and to keep it on them, so as to have our hearts warmed with them, to be deeply taken with wonder and love. But alas! our souls are drowned in flesh, dragged down from things that become them, and are worthy of them, to drudge and weary themselves in the mire and clay. How few are there who make it a great part of their daily business to behold God in his works and ways with themselves and others! Some, in respect of others, are called great spirits; but oh, what are they? What a poor greatness is it to project, for a great estate, or great places and titles, or to conceive great revenges of little wrongs! There is something, even in nature, of greatness of spirit, very far beyond the bastard, false character that most take of it, and that is above most things others imagine great, and despise them. But true greatness is this, to have a mind much taken up with the greatness of God, admiring and adoring him, and exciting others to do so; grieved, and holily angry, that men regard him so little, breathing forth such wishes as these of the psalmist, both to express their own thoughts, and to awake sleeping besotted men about them: O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, &c. They could wish a voice that could reach many thousands; and if they had one audible to all the world, would use it no otherwise than to be precursors of the praises of God, to call up and begin the song, O that men would praise, &c.

Consider yourselves, my brethren, and trace yourselves into your own hearts, whether often in the day your thoughts run this way, finding the meditation of God sweet to you, or whether they do not run out much more to vain things, and are seldom here: either hurried and busied in a surcharge of affairs, or, if vacant, yet spinning themselves out in frothy, foolish fancies, that you would be ashamed to look back upon. You might entertain Divine and heavenly thoughts even while about your earthly employments and refreshments; but this is little known and little sought after. Make it your business to learn more of this wisdom. Call in your hearts, commune often with yourselves and with God; be less abroad, and more within, and more above. It is by far the sweetest life. Beg of God to wind up your hearts, when you find them heavy and dull, that they follow you slowly in this, and need much pulling and hauling from your hand: a touch from his hand will make them mount up easily and nimbly. Oh! seek his drawing: Draw me, I will run after thee. And when you meet together, let this be your business, to speak of Him who alone is to be exalted, who doth and disposeth all as he pleases. Say to friends, and kindred, and neighbors, "Oh, how great and how gracious a God have we! Oh, that we could bless him!"

2. To keep these things is to walk according to the firm belief and frequent thoughts of them; to fear him, and to walk humbly and warily, because our follies draw on his rods, and to study to please him, and no matter who be displeased; and when he corrects, to fall down humbly under his hand, who hath our sickness and health, our life and death, and all that concerns us, in his absolute power. If anything advance or advantage us before others, endeavor to be the more lowly and serviceable to him. If in a low condition, still bless and reverence him, for his presence will turn the meanest cottage, yea, the darkest dungeon, into a palace.

The chief delight of the saints is, to offer praises to God, to gather them in from all his works, to send up to him. And his chief delight in all his works is to receive these praises of them from their hands: they articulate them, make a reasonable sacrifice of them. Psalm cxlv. 10: All thy works shall praise thee, and thy saints shall bless thee. We are called to this high work, yet lie behind, and most unworthily and foolishly debase ourselves in other things. But they that are wise, if there be any, will mind this, will not let the Lord's marvellous and gracious doings pass without notice.

II. The privilege of this wisdom. It is a high proof of his love to us, that he loves to be seen working by us, and stoops to take our acclamations and approbation, hath such regard to them, and rewards them so richly, even thus: Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord. Observe, They that are wise, and observe, shall understand further. To him that hath, shall be given; to him that usefully hath. That is to have, and so it is there meant; to him that improves it to his advantage who gave it. The greatest difficulty is to begin: as one said of his growing rich, that "He came hardly by a little riches, and easily by great riches." Having once got a stock, he grew rich apace. So once taking, be it but the first lessons of this wisdom, learning these well, shall facilitate thy knowledge exceedingly. The wise increaseth learning. Prov. i. 5. Wouldst thou but receive and hearken to the easiest things represented by God, these would enlighten and enlarge thy soul to receive more; especially, walking by the light thou hast, be it ever so little, that invites and draws in more. Be diligent in the practice of what you know, if you would know more. Believe it, that is the way to grow. Whoso observes, keeps these things, acts according to the knowledge of them (as John vii. 17), he shall understand, shall understand it by finding it. They shall understand it in themselves (the word is in the reciprocal mood, Hithpahel); it shall be particularly and effectually shown unto them; they shall experience it, and so understand it, and that is the only lively understanding of it. Men may hear, yea, deliver large discourses of it, and yet not understand the thing. Happy are they to whom this is given! Solus docet qui dat, et discit qui recipit: He alone teaches who gives, and he learns who receives.

Loving kindness. (Heb. graciousness.) All sorts of kindnesses, even outward and common mercies, in those shall he understand his goodness: in recoveries and deliverances from dangers, and temporal blessings, be their portion in them less or more, though the things be common, yet they come to be his own by a particular stamp of love, which to others they have not. And the children of God know it, they can find it out, and can read it, though the world that looks on it can not. And indeed, to them, the lowest things are disposed of, in order to the highest: their daily bread is given them by that same love that gives them Christ: all is given in him. So the curse is taken away, and all is sweetened with a blessing. A little that a righteous man hath, is better than the abundance of the wicked.

But the things they chiefly prize and desire, as indeed they deserve so to be, are of another sort: in their very being and nature, are love-tokens, effects of that peculiar free-grace that chose them to life. And this is called the light of God's countenance. His everlasting love. Now they that are wise, and observe these things, they shall understand this loving kindness. Not that they first are thus wise, before they partake of this loving kindness; no: by it this wisdom was given them; but this promise is made to their improvement of that gift, and walking in those ways of wisdom. Not only are they loved of God, but they shall understand it. He will manifest himself to them, and tell them he loves them. And the more they walk in these ways, the more clearly shall they perceive and powerfully find his love manifested to them.

This is the highest inducement that can be to such as have any interest in it. When this love hath but once touched them, though as yet they know it not certainly, yet it works that esteem and affection that nothing can be admitted into comparison with it. While carnal men wallow in the puddle, these are the crystal streams a renewed soul desires to bathe in, even the love of God. O! let me find that; no matter what I have, or what I want. In poverty, or any distressed, forsaken condition, one good word or good look from him, makes me up. I can sit down content and cheerful, and rejoice in that, though all the world frown on me, and all things look dark and comfortless about me, that is a piece of heaven within the soul. Now, of this experimental, understanding knowledge of this love, there are different degrees; there is a great latitude in this. To some are afforded, at some times, little glimpses and inlets of it in a more immediate way; but these stay not: Suavis hora, sed brevis mora. Others are upheld in the belief of it, and live on it by faith; though it shine not so clear, yet a light they have to walk by. Though the sun shines not bright out to them all their life, yet they are led home, and understand so much love in their way, as shall bring them to the fullness of it in the end. Others, having passed most of the day, have a fair glimpse in the very evening or close of it. But, howsoever, they that walk in this way by this light, whatsoever measure they have of it, are led by it to the land of light. The connexion here made, you see, They that wisely observe these things, shall understand this loving kindness. A wise man observing of God's ways, and ordering our own to his mind, is the certain way to attain much experienced knowledge or his love.

This love is most free, and, from the beginning to the end, works of itself; but in the method of it, God hath thus linked things together, made one portion of grace, in the use of it, draw on another. And this his children should prudently consider. There is such a like speech, Ps. l. 23: Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me: and to him that ordereth his conversation aright, will I show the salvation of God.

The contemplation of God in his works sets the soul open to receive the influences of this love: by looking toward him, it draws his eye toward it, as one look of love draws on another. Certainly many that have some desire of the light of God's countenance, and evidences of his love, yet, in not applying their souls to consider him, do much injure themselves.

Heavenly thoughts do refine the soul, as fire works itself higher and to a purer flame by stirring. To be blessing God for his goodness, giving him praise in the view of his works in the world, and for his church, and particularly for ourselves, this both disposes the heart to a more suitable temper for receiving Divine comforts, and invites him to let them flow into it. For if he have such acknowledgments for general goodness and common mercies, how much larger returns shall he have upon the discoveries of special love! Is it a sight of God as reconciled thou wouldst have? Now, praise sets a man among the angels, and they behold his face.

Again, action, walking in his ways humbly and carefully, and so waiting, never wants a successful return of much love. How can he who is goodness itself, hide and reserve himself from a soul that yields up itself to him, hath no delight but to please him, hates and avoids what may offend him? This, surely, is the way, if there is any under heaven, to enjoy communion with him.

They that forget him, and disregard their ways, and are no way careful to order them to his liking, do but delude themselves with mistaken fancies of mercy. I beseech you, be warned. There can not be solid peace in the ways of sin: no peace to the wicked, saith my God. Outward common favors you may share for a time; but these have a curse with them to you, and you shall quickly be at an end of these receipts; and then you would look toward him for some persuasions of his loving kindness, but are likely to find nothing but frowns and displeasure. O! consider this, ye that forget God, lest he tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver you.

Even they who have some title to this love of God, and are desiring further evidence of it, yet do often sit exceedingly in their own light, and work against their end, still bent on that assurance they would have, and yet neglecting the way to it, which certainly is in a manner to neglect itself. Were they more busied in honoring God, doing him what service they can in their station, striving against sin, acknowledging his goodness to the world, and even to themselves, that they are yet in the region of hope, not cut off in their iniquities, thus offering praise, and ordering their conversation aright, submitting unto him, and giving him glory; their assurances and comforts, in the measure he thinks fit, would come in due time, and sooner in this way than in any other they could take.

Observe these things, beware of sin, and ye shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord. It is true, this love of God changes not, nor hangs on thy carriage, nor on anything without itself; yea, all our good hangs on it; but know, as to the knowledge and apprehension of it, it depends much on the holy frame of thy heart and the exact regulation of thy ways. Sin obstructs and darkens all; those are the clouds and mists; and where any believer is adventurous on the ways of sin, he shall smart for it. Where sin is, there will be a storm, as Chrysostom's word is of Joshua.* The experience of all witnesseth this. No strength of faith will keep out floods of doubting and troublous thoughts, where any novel sin hath opened a gap for them to rush in by. See David, Psalm li., expressing himself as if all were to begin again, his joy taken away, and his bones broken, and to sense all undone: nothing will serve but a new creature. Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me.

There is a congruity in the thing itself, and God hath so ordered it, that vexation and anguish should still attend sin, and the ways of holiness be ways of peace. Say men what they will, great falls leave wounds and smart behind them, and they must be washed with sharper liquor before balm and oil be poured into them. And not only will more notorious breaches disturb thy peace, but a tract of careless and fruitless walking. If thou abate of thy attendance on God, and thy fear cool toward him, lagging and falling downward to something you are caring for and taken with, you shall find an estrangement: it may be insensible at first and for a while because of thy sloth, that thou dost not observe diligently how it is with thee; but after a time, it shall be more easily known, but more hardly mended. And there are none of us but might find much more of God in this our way homeward, if the foolishness and wanderings of our hearts did not prevent us.

Be persuaded, then, you whose hearts he hath wrought for himself, to attend better on him, and the advantage shall be yours, doubt it not. And though for a time you find it not, yet wait on, and go on in that way; it shall not disappoint you. The more you let go of the false, vain comforts of the world for his sake, the more richly you shall be furnished with his. Oh! we make not room for them; that is the great hinderance. Consider him, behold his works, bless him, confess him always worthy of praise for his goodness and his wonderful works to the children of men, however he deal with thee in particular; and assuredly, he shall deal graciously with thee, and ere long thou shalt find it, and be forced to acknowledge it. Though it may be thou want these bright shinings of comforts thou wouldst have, yet, looking to him, and walking before him, observing these things, thou shalt have of his light to lead thee on, and a calm within; sweet peace, not that height of joy thou desirest.

There are often calm, fair days without storm, though it be not so clear sunshine; and in such days a man may travel comfortably. I would have Christians called off from a perplexed over-pressing of this point of their particular assurance. If we were more studious to please him, forgetting ourselves, we should find him remember us the more; yet, we should not do so for this either, but simply for himself. In a word, this is thy wisdom; mind thy duty, and refer to him thy comfort.

SERMON XXI.

IMPERFECTION AND PERFECTION.

PSALM cxix. 96.

I have seen an end of all perfection; but thy commandment is exceeding broad.

GRACE is a divine light in the soul, and shows the true colors of things. The apostle overshoots not when he says, The spiritual man judgeth all things. He hath undeniably the advantage: he may judge of natural things, but the natural man can not judge of spiritual things. Yea, the truest judgment of natural things, in respect to our chiefest end, springs particularly from spiritual wisdom: that makes the true parallel of things, and gives a just account of their differences, as here.

I have seen an end, &c.] All that have any measure of spiritual light, are of this mind; but certainly, they that are more eminently blessed with it, have a more high and clearer view of both parts. David, who is generally, and with greatest likelihood, supposed to the author of this Psalm, was singularly advantaged to make this judgment of things. He had, no doubt, a large measure of the knowledge of God, and of his law, which here he declares to be so large; and being both a wise and a great man, might know more than most others, even of all other perfections—might trace them to their utmost, and see their end, as he expresses it. This same verdict we have from his son Solomon, after much experience in all things; who, having the advantage of peace and riches, did particularly set himself to this work, to a most exact inquiry after all things of this earth. He set nature on the rack, to confess its utmost strength for the delighting and satisfying of man; with much pains and art, he extracted the very spirit of all, and after all, he gives the same judgment we have here; his book writ on that subject, being a paraphrase on this sentence, dilating the sense, and confirming the truth of it. It carries its own sum in those two words which begin and end it; the one, Vanity of vanities all is vanity, and the other, Fear God and keep his commandments, for that is the whole duty of man. And these here are just the equivalent of those two; the former of that beginning word, I have seen an end of all perfection; and the latter of that concluding one, But thy commandment is exceeding broad.

* Ὅπου ἀπαρτῖα ἐκεί χρισμῶν.

When mean men speak of this world's greatness, and poor men cry down riches, it passes but for a querulous, peevish humor, to discredit things they can not reach, or else an ignorant contempt of things they do not understand; or, taking it a little further, but a self-pleasing shift, a willingly undervaluing of those things of purpose to allay the displeasure of the want of them; or at the best, if something of truth and goodness be in the opinion, yet, that the assent of such persons is (like the temperance of sickly bodies), rather a virtue made of necessity, than embraced of free choice. But to hear a wise man, in the height of these advantages, proclaim their vanity, yea, kings from the very thrones whereon they sit in their royal robes, give forth this sentence upon all the glories and delights about them, is certainly above all exception. Here are two, the father and the son; the one raised from a mean condition to the crown, instead of a shepherd's staff, to wield a sceptre, and that, after many afflictions and dangers in the way to it, which, to some palates, gives a higher relish and sweetness to honor, than if it had slid on them before they could feel it, in the cheap, easy way of an undoubted succession. Or, if any think David's best days a little cloudy, by the remains of insurrections and oppositions, in that case usual; as the jumbling of the water is not fully quieted for a while after the same is over; then, take the son, succeeding to as fair a day as heart can wish, both a complete calm of peace, and a bright sunshine of riches and regal pomp, and he able to improve these to the highest. And yet, both these are perfectly of the same mind in this great point. The son having peace and time for it, though a king, would make his throne a pulpit, and be a preacher of this one doctrine, to which the fathers sentence is the fittest text I have seen.

The words give an account of a double prospect; the latter being, as it were, the discovery of a new world after the travelling over the old, expressed in the former clause: I have seen an end of all perfection, i. e., taken in an exact view of all other things, and seen their end; but thy commandment is of exceeding extent and perfection, and I see but a part, and there is no end of it.

I have seen an end.] I have tried and made experiment of much of what this world affords, and the rest I see to the uttermost of it, how far it reaches. The psalmist, as standing on a vantage ground, sees clearly round about him the farthest horizon of earthly excellencies and advantages, and finds them not to be infinite or unmeasurable; sees that they are bounded, yea, what their bounds are, how far they go at their very farthest, an end of all, even of perfection. And this is in effect what I find, that their end stops short of satisfaction. A man may think and desire beyond them, yea, not only may, but must: he can not be terminated by their bounds, will still have a stretch farther, and feels them leave him, and then finds a void. All which he says most ponderously in these short words, giving the world the slight thus: It is not so great a matter as men imagine it; the best of it I have examined, and considered it to the full, taken the whole dimension: all the profits and pleasures under the sun, their utmost goes but a short way; the soul is vaster than all, can look and go much farther.

I will not attempt the particulars, to reckon all, or be large in any: the preacher, Solomon, hath done this matchlessly, and who is he that can come after the king? If any be sick of that poor disease, esteem of riches, he can tell you the utmost of these, that when they increase, they are increased that eat them, and what good is to the owners thereof, save the beholding of them with their eyes? Eccl. v. 11. Yea, locking them up, and not using them, and still gathering, and all to no use, this is a madness: it is all one as if they were still in the mines under the ground, and the difference none, but in turmoiling pains in gathering and tormenting care in keeping. But take the best view of them, supposing that they be used, that is, spent on family and retinue, why then, what hath the owner but the sight of them for himself? Out of all his dishes, he fills but one belly. Of all his fair houses and richly-furnished rooms, he lodges but in one at once. And if his great rent be needful for his great train, or any other ways of expense, is it an advantage to need much? Or is he not rather poorer who needs five or six thousand pounds by year, than he that needs but one hundred?

Of all the festivities of the world and delights of sense, the result is, laughter is mad; and mirth, and orchards, and music, these things pass away as a dream, and are still to begin again. And so gross and earthly are they, that for the beasts they may be a fit good, but for a divine, immortal soul, they can not. A horse lying at ease in a fat pasture, may be compared with those that take delight in them.

Honor and esteem are yet vainer than those pleasures and riches that furnish them. Though they be nothing but wind, compared to solid soul-delights, yet, as to nature, there is in them somewhat more real than in the fame of honor: which is no more, indeed, than an airy, imaginary thing, and hangs more on others than anything else, and not only on persons above them, but even those below; especially that kind which the vanity of man is much taken with, all popular opinion, than which there is nothing more light and poor, and that is more despised by the elevated sort of natural spirits, a thing as unworthy as it is inconstant. No slavery like the affecting of vulgar esteem; it enthral the mind to all sorts. Often the worthiest share least in it. See Eccl. ix. 11–15. True worth is but sometimes honored, but always envied. Eccl. iv. 4, Again, I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbor. And with whomsoever it is thou seekest to be esteemed, be it with the multitude, or more chiefly with the wiser and better sort, what a narrow thing is it at largest! How many nations know neither thee, nor those who know thee!

Beyond all these things is inward worth, and even that natural wisdom such as some minds have to a far more refined height than others. A man by it sees round about him, yea, and within himself. That Solomon grants to be an excellent thing, Eccl. iv., yet presently finds the end of that perfection. ver. 16. That guards not from disasters and vexations; yea, there is in it an innate grief, amid so many follies. Eccl. i. 18. In much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow. Yea, give a man the confluence of all these, which is so rare, make him at once rich, and honorable, and healthful, and encompassed with all the delights of nature and art, and wise to make the best improvement of all they can well afford (and there is much in that), yet there is an end of these perfections. For there is quickly an end of himself who hath them: he dies, and that spoils all. Death breaks the strings, and that ends the music. And the highest of natural wisdom, which is the soul of all nature's advantages, that ends them, whether practical or political. In that day are all state projects and high thoughts laid low, if speculative. For, in spite of all sciences and knowledge of nature, a man goes out in the dark; and if thou art learned in many languages, one death silences all thy tongues at once. So says Solomon, Eccl. ii. 16, And how dieth the wise man? as a fool. Yea, suppose a man were not broken off, but continued still in the top of all these perfections; yea, imagine much more, the chiefest delights of sense that have ever been found out, more solid and certain knowledge of nature's secrets, all moral composure of spirit, the highest dominion, not only over men, but a deputed command over nature's frame, the course of all the heavens, and the affairs of all the earth, and that he was to abide in this estate; yet would he see an end of this perfection, that is, it would come short of making him happy. It is a union with a Higher Good by that love that subjects all things to him, that alone is the endless perfection: Thy commandment is exceeding broad.

You may think this a beaten subject, and possibly, that some other cases or questions were fitter for Christians. I wish it were more needless. But, oh, the deceitfulness of our hearts! Even such as have shut out the vanities of this world at the fore-gate, let them in again, or some part of them at least, at the postern. Few hearts clearly come off untied from all, but are still lagging after somewhat; and thence so little delight in God, in prayer and holy things. And though there be no fixed esteem of other things, yet that indisposition to holy ways, argues some sickly humor latent in the soul; and therefore this is almost generally needful, that men be called to consider what they seek after. Amid all thy pursuits, stop and ask thy soul, For what end is all this? At what do I aim? For surely, by men's heat in these lower things, and their cold indifference for heaven, it would seem we take our portion to be here. But, oh, miserable portion at the best! Oh! short-lived happiness! Look on them and learn to see this, the end of all perfections, and to have an eye beyond them, till your hearts be well weaned from all things under the sun. Oh! there is little acquaintance with the things that are above it, little love of them, still some pretensions, some hopes that flatter us—"I will attain this or that; and then"—Then what? What if this night, thou fool, thy soul shall be required of thee?

But thy commandment.] The former part of this sentence hath within every man's breast somewhat to suit with it and own it. Readily, each man according to his experience and the capacity of his soul, hath his sense, if awake, of the unsatisfactoriness of all this world. Give him what thou wilt, yet, still there is empty room within, and a pain in that emptiness, and so, vexation, a tormenting windiness in all. And men of more contemplative minds have higher and clearer thoughts of this argument and matter, and may rise to a very high moral contempt of the world; and some of them have done so.

But this other part is more sublime, and peculiar to a divine illumination. That which we find not without, we would have within, and would work out of ourselves what can not be extracted from things about us. Philosophy is much set on this, but it is upon a false scent, and so still deluded. No, it is without us; not within us, but above us. That fulness is in God, and there is no communion with him, or enjoyment of him, but in the way of his commandment. Therefore, this is the discovery that answers and satisfies, Thy commandment is exceeding broad.

[Commandment.] He speaks of all as one, I conceive, for that tie and connexion of them all, on account of which he that breaks one, is guilty of all. A rule they are, and are so one, as a rule must be. One authority runs through all: that is the golden thread they are strung on. Break that anywhere, and all the pearls drop off. Psalm cxix. 6: Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect to all thy commandments. Otherwise one piece shames another, like uneven and incongruous ways. The legs of the lame not being even, make an unseemly going. And as it is here, so a plural word is joined with the singular, ver. 137, and Psalm cxxiii.* And it is fitly here spoken of as one opposed to all varieties and multitudes of things beside. Thy commandment, each linked to one another, and that one chain reaches beyond all the incoherent perfections in the world, if one were added to another, and drawn to a length. This commandment is exceeding broad; the very breadth immense, and therefore the length must be much more so, no end of it. That good to which it leads and joins the soul, is enough for it: it is complete and full in its nature, and endless in its continuance, so that there is no measuring, no end of it any way. But all other perfections have their bounds of being, and period of duration, so that each way an end is to be found of them. Now, in this, the opposition is the more admirable, that he speaks not expressly of the enjoyment of God, but of the commandment of God: he extols that above all the perfections of the world. Which is much to be remarked, as having in it a clear character of the purest and highest love. It had been more obvious to all, had he said, I have seen the utmost of all besides thee, but thou, O God, the light of thy countenance, the blessed vision of thy face, that alone is boundless and endless happiness. Or, to have taken it below the full perfect enjoyment of glory, but some glances let into the soul here, a comfortable word from God, a look of love, oh, how far surpassing all the continued caresses and delights of the world! He speaks not of that neither, but Thy commandment is exceeding broad. As the apostle says, The foolishness of God is wiser than man's wisdom, 1 Cor. i. 25, so here, that of God which seems lowest and hardest, is infinitely beyond whatsoever is highest and sweetest in the world. The obeying of his commands, his very service, is more profitable than the world's rewards; his commands more excellent than the perfection of the world's enjoyments. To be subject to him, is truer happiness than to command the whole world. Pure love reckons thus: Though no further reward were to follow obedience to God, the perfection of his creature and its very happiness, carries its full recompense in its own bosom. Yea, love delights most in the hardest services. It is self-love, to love the embraces and rest of love; but it is love to him indeed to love the love the labor of love, and the service of it, and that, not so much because it leads to rest, and ends in it, but because it is service to him whom we love. Yea, that labor is itself a rest, it is so natural and sweet to a soul that loves. As the revolution of the heavens, which is a motion in rest, and rest in motion, changes not place, though running still; so, the motion of love is truly heavenly, and circular still in God, beginning in him, and ending in him, and so, not ending, but still moving without weariness.

* Deum tradunt Hebræi, unâ voce, eloquio uno, hoc est, uno spiritu et habitu, sine ullâ interspiratione, morâ, pausâ, vel distinctione, ita ut omnia verba, tanquam verbum unum, et vox una, fuerant, elocutum. Atque hinc volunt duplicem illam accentuum rationem in Decalogo ortam, ut altera una, illa Dei continuata elocutio, altera hominum tarda et distincta, judicaretur.

Let us see what the commandment is, and that will clear it, for it is nothing but love. All is in that one, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, &c. So, the command that is here called so broad, is love. There is no measuring that, for its object is immeasurable. We readily exceed in the love of any other thing; but in the love of God there is no danger of exceeding. Its true measure is, to know no measure.

According as the love is, so is the soul: it is made like to, yea, it is made one with, that which it loves. Si terram amas, terra es: si Deum amas, quid vis ut dicam, Deus es? [AUGUSTINE.] By loving gross, base things, it becomes gross, and turns to flesh, or earth; and so, by the love of God, it is made divine, is one with him. So this is the excellency of the command enjoining love. God hath a good-will to all his creatures; but that he should make a creature capable of loving him, and appoint this for his command, oh! herein his goodness shines brightest. Now, though fallen from this, we are again invited to it; though degenerated and accursed in our sinful nature, yet we are renewed in Christ, and this command is renewed in him, and a new way of fulfilling it is pointed out.

This command is broad. There is room enough for the soul in God, that is hampered and pinched in all other things. Here, love with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. Stretch it to the utmost; there is enough for it here, while it must contract and draw itself to other things. I will walk at liberty, says David, for I seek thy precepts. That which perverse nature judges thralldom, once truly known, is only freedom. This is because the law is love, and such a love as brings full content to the soul. Man hath not an object of love besides God; too many he hath that can torment and trouble him, but not one that by being loved by him, satisfies and quiets him. Whether he loves things without him, or himself, still he is pained and restless. All other things he loves naturally, in reference to himself: but himself is not a sufficient object for him. It must be something that adds to, and perfects his nature, to which he must be united in love: somewhat higher than himself, yea, the highest of all, the Father of Spirits. That alone completes a spirit and blesses it, to love him, the spring of spirits.

Now this love, as including obedience to his commands, is a thing in itself due and expressly commanded too. This is the thing which surpasseth all pursuits and all enjoyments under heaven, not only to be loved of God, but to love him. Yea, could these be severed, this rather would be the deformity and misery of the creature, to hate him: this is the hell of hell.

And to love him, not only with complacency, a desire to enjoy him, but, moreover, wishing him glory, doing him service, desiring he may be honored by all his creatures, and endeavoring ourselves to honor him, that is our work; applauding the praises of angels and all creatures, and adding our (as Psalm ciii. 22) sweet, willing, entire submission to his will, ready to do, to suffer anything for him. Oh! away all base, muddy pleasures, all false night-shows of earthly glories, all high attempts and heroic virtues! These have their measure and their close, and prove in the end but lies. This command, this love alone, is the endless perfection and delight of souls, which begins here, and is completed above. The happiness of glory is the perfection of holiness: that is the full beauty and loveliness of the Spouse, the Lamb's wife.

Oh! how much are the multitudes of men to be pitied, who are hunting they know not what, still pursuing content, and it still flying before, and they at as great a distance as when they promised themselves to lay hold on it! It is strange what men are doing. Ephraim feedeth on the wind. Hos. xii. 1. The most serious designs of men are more foolish than the play of children; all the difference is, that these are tristes ineptia, sourer and more sad trifles.

Oh, that ye would turn this way, and not still lay out your money for that which is not bread! You would find the saddest part of a spiritual course of life hath under it more true sweetness than all your empty mirths, which sound much, and are nothing, like the crackling of thorns under the pot. There is more joy in enduring a cross for God, than in the smiles of the world; in a private, despised affliction, without the name of suffering for his cause, or anything it like martyrdom, but only as coming from his hand, kissing it, and bearing it patiently, yea, gladly for his sake, out of love to him because it is his will so to try thee. What can come amiss to a soul thus composed?

I wish that they who have renounced the vain world, and have the face of their hearts turned Godward, would learn more this happy life and enjoy it more, not to hang so much upon sensible comforts, as to delight in obedience, and to wait for those at his pleasure, whether he gives much or little, any or none. Learn to be still finding the sweetness of his commands, which no outward or inward change can disrelish, rejoicing in the actings of that Divine love within thee. Continue thy conflicts with sin, and though thou mayest at times be foiled, yet, cry to him for help, and getting up, redouble thy hatred of it and attempts against it. Still stir this flame of God. That will overcome: Many waters can not quench it. It is a renewed pleasure, to be offering up thyself every day to God. Oh! the sweetest life in the world, is, to be crossing thyself, to please him; trampling on thy own will, to follow his.

SERMON XXII.

CONFIDENCE OF FAITH.

HABAKKUK iii. 17, 18.

Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vine; the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flocks shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls:

Yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation.

MOST men's industries and employments are chiefly without them, but certainly our main and worthiest business lies within us; nor is ever a man fit for the varieties and vicissitudes of time and affairs without, till he have taken some pains to some good purpose within himself. A distempered, discomposed mind is as a limb out of joint, which is fit for no action, and moves both deformedly and painfully. That which we have to do, my brethren, for which these our meetings are commanded of God, and should be attended by us, and which we should follow out when we are gone hence, is this, the reducing of our souls to God. Their disunion from him is their disjointing, and they are never right till they refix on him; and being there, they are so right, that nothing can come wrong to them. As they are not readily ensnared with ease and plenty, so, neither are they lightly astonished with want and trouble, but, in the ebb of all other comforts, they can hold the prophet's purpose, to joy in the Lord, and rejoice in the God of their salvation.

This, we may hear and speak of, but truly, few attain it. I fear, many of us are not so much as seeking after it and aspiring to it. A soul really conversant with God, is taken up with him, all its affections work and move toward him, as the prophet's here; his fear, his joy, his trust, ver. 16-19. This is a prayer, as it is entitled, but it is both a prophetic and an unusual one; a prophecy and a song (as the word added imports) of Habakkuk the prophet on Neginoth. The strain of it is high, and full of sudden raptures and changes, as that word signifies; as here, having expressed much fear in the foregoing words, a shivering, trembling horror, he yet adds such a height of an invincible kind of joy—like the needle of the compass, fixedly looking toward him, yet, not without a trembling motion. Thus, we have the temper of the psalmist, Psalm ii. 11: Rejoice with trembling. Which suits well to so sublime an object; joying in God, because he is good, yet with joy still mixed with holy awe, because he is great. And this especially in a time of great judgments, or in the lively apprehensions or representations of them, whether before or after their inflicting; whether they be on the people of God for their iniquities, or on the enemies of God for their oppressions and cruelties to his people while he made them instruments for their correction. In both, God is formidable, and greatly to be feared, even by those that are nearest to him. This we find in the prophets when seeing judgments afar off, long before their day, which they had commission to denounce. So, this prophet here not only discovers great awe and fear at what he saw and foretold concerning God's own people, the Jews, but at the after-reckoning with the Chaldeans, his and their enemies. When God comes to do judgment on the wicked, this will make them who stand by and suffer not with them, yet to tremble; yea, such as are advantaged by it, as usually the people of God are, their enemies' ruin proving their deliverance. The majesty and greatness of God, and the terribleness of his march toward them and seizing on them, as it is here highly set forth, this works an awful fear in the hearts of his own children. They can not see their Father angry but it makes them quake, though it be not against them, but on their behalf. And this were our right temper, when we see or hear of the hand of God against wicked men, who run their own courses against all warning;—not to entertain these things with carnal rejoicings and lightness of mind, or with boasting insults; to applaud indeed the righteousness of God, and to give him his glory, but withal, to fear before him, though they were strangers and no way a part of ourselves, and to have an humble sense of the Lord's dealing in it; so, Psalm lii. 6; and to learn to reverence God; in all our ways to acknowledge him; to be sure to take him along with us, and to undertake nothing without him.

And this fear of judgments falling upon others, is the way not to feel them on ourselves. When God sees that the sound of the rod on others' backs will humble a soul or a people, he will spare the stroke of it. They who have most of this holy fear of God's anger, fall least under the dint of it. Blessed is he that feareth always; but he that hardens his heart, shall fall into mischief. Prov. xxviii. 14. He that fears it not, shall fall into it; he that fears and trembles at it, shall escape. So the prophet here trusts for himself: ver. 16: I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble, and upon this confidence, he rises to this high resolution, Yet I will rejoice in the Lord.

The words, to make no other division of them, are a conjuncture of a sad supposition, and a cheerful position, or purpose.

Although the fig-tree shall not blossom.] This is a thing that may come, and, possibly, which the prophet did foresee would come, among other judgments; and it is of all other outward scourges the sorest, most smarting, and most sweeping; cuts off most people, and can least be suffered and shifted. It lieth among the rest in the storehouse of Divine judgments. He who furnished the earth, and gave being by the word of his mouth to all these things, hath still the sole, absolute power of them: they obey his word of command, and, rightly looked upon, in our use of them, and the sweetness we find in them, lead us to him as the spring of being and goodness. He is invisible in his nature; in his works, most visible and legible. Not only the spacious heavens and the glorious lights in them, but the meanest things on earth, every plant and flower in their being and growing, yea, every pile of grass, declare God to us.

And it is a supernatural light in natural things to see and taste him in them. It is more pleasant than their natural relish; it is the chief inner sweetness, the kernel and marrow of all; and they that take not the pains, and have not the skill to draw it forth, lose the far better half of their enjoyments, even of the things of this earth. To think, how wise he is who devised such a frame, how powerful he who made all these things, how rich he must be who still continues to furnish the earth with these varieties of provisions, how sweet must he be, whence all these things draw their sweetness! But, alas! we are brutish, and in our use of these things, we differ little or nothing from the beast. We are called to a higher life, but we live it not. Man is in honor, but he understands it not; he is as the beast that perishes. Psalm xlix. 20.

Now, because we acknowledge God so little in the use of these things, therefore he is put to it (so to speak) to teach us our lesson in the want and deprivation of them, which our dulness is more sensible of. We know things a great deal better by wanting them, than by having them, and take more notice of that hand which hath power of them, when he withdraws, than when he bestows them.

Besides all other provocations, and particular abuses of these things by intemperance and luxury, were it no more than the very neglecting of God in his goodness, this calls for a famine, to diet us into wiser thoughts, and to remind us of our own and all other creatures' dependance on that God whom we so forget, as to serve our idols and lusts upon his bounty. This was the case of Judah and Israel. See Hos. ii. 8-13. But when more sparingly fed, and better taught, in the wilderness, those mercies were restored again, and then, all acknowledged the dowry of that blessed marriage with himself, which is so far beyond all account. Ver. 14-16.

How wretched ingratitude is it, not to regard and love him in the use of all his mercies! But it is horrid stupidity, not to consider and seek to him in their withdrawalment, or in the threatening of it. Few have a right sense of his hand in anything. They grumble and cry out, but not to him. As in the case of oppression, it is said, Job xxxv. 9, 10, By reason of the multitude of oppressions, they make the oppressed to cry; they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty, but none sayeth, Where is God my maker?—so, of this very judgment of famine, the prophet speaks, Hos. vii. 14: And they have not cried unto me with their hearts, when they howled upon their beds: they assembled themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me. They did not humbly and repentingly seek to God by prayer, but a natural brutish sense of their wants pressed out complaints; they howled as a hungry dog would do for bread. This is all the most do, in years of dearth, or harvests threatening it. No beast in the mountain or wilderness is so untamed as the heart of man, which, when caught in God's judgments, lies and cries as a wild bull in a net. It is true, they are somewhat nearer sober thoughts in distress; and their grief though merely natural, yet is nearer spiritual grief, than their mirth and laughter; but it must have a touch of that Spirit above, to make it spiritual, to made it change to gold, to turn it to godly sorrow. No scourge carries a power of changing the heart with it; that is a superadded work. Many people, and particular persons, have been beat as in a mortar with variety of afflictions, one coming thick upon another, and yet, are never the wiser, and yet, have not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

Therefore, if you be afflicted, join prayer with your correction, and beg by it, that God would join his Spirit with it. Seek this in earnest, else you shall be not a whit the better, but shall still endure the smart, and not reap the fruit thereof. Yea, I believe, some are the worse, even by falsely imagining they are better, partly presuming it must be so, and partly, may be, feeling some present motions and meltings in the time of afflictions, which vanish and presently cool when they are off the fire. Ay, but these two together make a happy man; Blessed is he whom thou correctest, and teachest out of thy law. Psalm xciv. 12.

Although the fig-tree shall not blossom.] This sometimes does, and at any time may, befall a land; but, however, it is very useful to put such cases. It is true, there is great odds between real and imagined distresses; yet, certainly, the frequent viewing of its picture, though it is only in the imagination, hath so much likeness as somewhat abates the strangeness and frightfulness of its true visage when it comes.

There is a foolish pre-apprehension of possible evils, which, whether they come or not, does no good, but makes evils to come perplexingly beforehand, and antedates their misery, and adds the pain of many others that will never come. These are the fumes of a dark, distempered humor, vain fears, which vex and trouble some minds at present, and do not waste anything of any grief to come after. But calmly and composedly to sit down and consider evil days coming, any kind of trials that probably, yea, or possibly, may arrive, so as to be ready to entertain them without astonishment: this is a wise and useful exercise of the mind, and takes off much of the weight of such things, breaks them in falling on us, that they come not so sad down, when they light first upon the apprehension. Thus, it is true, nothing comes unawares to a wise man. He hath supposed all, or as bad as anything that can come, hath acquainted his mind with the horrid shapes, and, therefore, when such things appear, will not so readily start at them.

This I would advise to be done, not only in things we can more easily suffer, but in those we think would prove hardest and most indigestible, to inure thy heart to them; not to be like some, who are so tender-fancied, that they dare not so much as think of some things, the death of a dear friend, or husband, or wife, or child. That is oftener to be viewed, rather than any other event. Bring thy mind to it, as a starting-horse to that whereat it does most startle—"What if I should be bereft of such a person, such a thing?" This would make it much more tolerable when thou art put to it. "What if the place where I live, were visited with all at once in some degree, pestilence, and sword, and famine? How should I look on them? Could my mind keep its own place and standing, fixed on God in such a case? What if I were turned out of my good furniture and warm house, and stripped not only of accessory, but necessary things" (as here he supposes not only the failing of delicacies, the fig-tree, wine, and olives, but of common necessary food, the fields not yielding meat, and the flocks cut off); thy little ones crying for bread, and thou hast none for them? You little know what the tenderest and delicatest among you may be put to. These times have given many real instances, within these kingdoms, of strange changes in the condition of all ranks of persons. Or think, if thou blottest that, "What if I were smitten with blanches or loathsome sores on my flesh, or if, by any accident, I should lose an arm, or an eye, or both eyes? What if extreme poverty, and sickness, and forsaking of friends come all at once? Could I welcome these, and make up all in God—find riches, and friends, and fulness in him?" Most men, if they would speak truly to such a case, must declare them insufferable: "I were undone if such a thing befell me, or such a comfort were taken from me." Most would cry out, as Micah did, Judges xviii.*24: Ye have taken away my gods; for so are these things our hearts cleave to and principally delight in. He that worships mammon, his purse is the sensiblest piece of him: he is broke, if fire, or ravage of war, throw him out of his nest, and empty it. He that makes his belly his god (such they are the apostle speaks of, Phil. iii. 19), how could he endure this case the prophet puts here, the failing of vines, of flocks and herds?

It were good to add to the supposition of want, somewhat of the reality of it; sometimes to abridge thyself of things thou desirest and lovest, to inure thy appetite to a refusal of what it calls for; to practise somewhat of poverty, to learn to need few things.

It is strange, men should be so foolish as to tie themselves to these things, which have neither satisfying content in them, nor certain abode. And why shouldst thou set thine eyes on things which are not? says Solomon, Proverbs xxiii. 5—a nonens, a fancy? How soon may you be parted! He who is the true God, God alone, how soon can he pull the false gods from you, or you from them!—as in that word, Job xxvii. 8: What is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul? Like that case in the parable, Luke xii. 19: Soul, take thine ease. A strange inference from full barns! That were sufficient provision for a horse, a fit happiness for it; but for a soul, though it were to stay, how gross and base a portion! But it can not stay neither: This night thy soul shall be required of thee.

The only firm position is that of the prophet, Yet will I rejoice in the Lord. And such times indeed are fit to give proof of this, to tell thee whether it be so indeed, where thy heart is built. While thy honor, and wealth, and friends, are about thee, it is hard to know whether these props bear thee up, or another, an Invisible supporter; but when these are plucked away, and thou art destitute round about, then it will appear if thy strength be in God, if these other things were but flourishes about thee, and thou laidst no weight on them at all. He that leans on these, must fall when these fall, and his hope is cut off, and his trust as a spider's web. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand. Job viii. 14, 15. They that clasp their hearts about their houses or estates, within a while they are either sadly pulled asunder, or swept away together.

But, oh! the blessed, the high condition of a soul set on God, untied, independent from all things beside him, its whole dependance and rest placed on him alone, sitting loose to all the world, and so not stirred with alterations! Yea, amid the turnings upside-down of human things, if the frame of the heaven and earth were falling to pieces,* the heart founded on him who made it, abides unmoved; the everlasting arms are under it, and bear it up.

Do ye believe, my brethren, that there is such a thing, that it is no fancy? Yea, all is but fancy beside it. Do you believe this? Why, then, is one day after another put off, and this not attained, nor the soul so much as entered or engaged to a serious endeavor after it, looking on all things else, compared to this noble design, as vanity? How often, and how easily are their joys damped, who rejoice in other things, and their hopes broken! What they expected most, soon proves a lie, as the word spoken of the olive here signifies; as if the labor of it should lie (spem mentita seges)—a fair vintage or harvest promised, and either withered with drought, or drowned with rain; indeed, it lies at the best! But the soul that places its joy on God, is still fresh and green when all are withered about it. Jer. xvii. 8: Acquaint thyself with him betimes in case. It is a sad case, to be making acquaintance with him, when thou shouldst most make use of his friendship, and find comfort in his love.

Now this joy in God can not remain in an impure, unholy soul, no more than heaven and hell can mix together. An impure, unholy soul, I call not that which is stained with sin, for no other are under the sun; all must then quit all pretensions to that estate; but such a one as willingly entertains any sinful lust or way of wickedness. That delight and this are directly opposite. And certainly the more the soul is refined from all delights of sin, yea, even from sinless delights of sense and of this present world, it hath the more capacity, the fitter and the larger room, for this pure, heavenly delight.

No language can make a natural man understand what this thing is, to rejoice in God. Oh! it is a mystery. Most men mind poor childish things, laughing and crying in a breath, at trifles; easily puffed up, and as easily cast down. But even the children of God are too little acquainted with this their portion. Which of you find this power in the remembrance of God, that it doth overflow and drown all other things, both your worldly joys and worldly sorrows, that you find them not? And thus it would be, if we knew him. Is he, then, our Father, and yet we know him not?

Although all should fail, yet, rejoice in him who fails not, who alters not. He is still the same in himself, and to the sense of the soul that is knit to him, is then sweetest when the world is bitterest. When other comforts are withdrawn, the loss of them brings this great gain, so much the more of God and his love imparted, to make all up. They that ever found this, could almost wish for things that others are afraid of. If we knew how to improve them, his sharpest visits would be his sweetest; thou wouldst be glad to catch a kiss of his hand while he is beating thee, or pulling away something from thee that thou lovest, and bless him while he is doing so.

* Si fractus illibatur orbis.

Rejoice in God, although the fig-tree blossom not, &c. Yea, rejoice in these hardest things, as his doing. A heart rejoicing in him, delights in all his will, and is surely provided for the most firm joy in all estates; for if nothing can come to pass beside, or against his will, then can not that soul be vexed with delights in him, and hath no will but his, but follows him in all times, in all estates, not only when he shines bright on them, but when they are clouded. That flower which follows the sun, doth so even in cloudy days: when it doth not shine forth, yet it follows the hidden course and motion of it. So, the soul that moves after God, keeps that course when he hides his face; is content, yea, is glad at his will in all estates, or conditions, or events. And though not only all be withered and blasted without, but the face of the soul little better within to sense, no flourishing of graces for the present, yet it rejoices in him, and in that everlasting covenant that still holds, ordered in all things and sure, as the sweet singer of Israel sweetly expresses it, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5: For this, says he, is all my salvation and all my desire, ALTHOUGH he make it not to grow. That is a strange although, and yet is he satisfied even in that.

This joy in God, as my God, the God of my salvation, ought to exercise the soul in the darkest and worst times; and it ought to stiek to it, not to let go this confidence, still expecting salvation from him, and resting on him for it, though not having those senses and assurances that thou desirest. This, weak believers are easily beaten from, by temptation. But we are to stand to our right in him, even when we see it not. And when it is said to thee, as in Psalm iii., that there is no help for thee in God, tell all that say so, they lie: He is my God, my glory, and the lifter-up of my head; as there he speaks.

Rejoice in him still as thy God; and however, rejoice in him as God. I will rejoice in Jehovah, glad that he is God, that his enemies can not unsettle nor reach his throne, that he rules, and is glorious in all things, that he is self-blessed, and needs nothing. This is the purest and highest kind of rejoicing in him, and is certainly most distant and most free from alteration, and hath, indeed, most of heaven in it.

SERMON XXIII.

SPIRITUAL PRIVILEGES.

1 Cor. i. 30.

But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

THE great design of the gospel is, to bring men to Jesus Christ; and, next to that, to instruct those who are brought to him, in the clearest knowledge, and to keep them in the fresh remembrance of the privileges and happiness they have in him. This the apostles, writing to new converts, much insist upon, and Paul most abundantly; but nowhere more excellently and fully than in these words.

As that is a great and much commended oracle, γινῶθι σεαυτον, Know thyself, so, also, there can be nothing more comfortable and profitable for a Christian than this point, to understand his new being, to know himself as out of himself in Christ, to study what he is there. Oh! what joy, what humility, what holiness would it work, were we well seen and much conversant in this subject, viewing ourselves in this light, as here the apostle represents a believer to himself, Of him are ye in Christ Jesus, &c.

If we look back a little, we see his aim is, to vindicate the doctrine of Christ from contempt in that chief point which is the believer's greatest comfort and glory, yet lies openest to the world's misprison, the doctrine of the cross, Christ crucified. Him we preach, says he, let men take it as they please: be he a stumbling-block to the Jews, and foolishness to the Gentiles, yet, to them that believe among both, he is the power of God, and the wisdom of God.

As, in the person of Christ, glory was wrapped up in meanness, so it was in his sufferings and death. And in the doctrine of it, and in the way of preaching of it, they are not dressed with human wisdom, or excellency of speech: this would be as incongruous as that rich, gaudy attire they cover the image of the Virgin with, and her Child lying in a stable. And that all might be suitable, so is it in the persons of those that believe on him. Brethren, you see your calling, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called. And God's purpose in this, is, that no flesh should glory before him.

This is the grand disease of flesh, to swell in conceit of any little advantages, real or imagined, forgetting itself and him from whom it receives all, receives its very self, the being it hath, and all superadded good. Now, God is pleased, in justice on some, and in great mercy to others, so to order most things in the world, as to allay this tumor; often bringing down high things, and raising the low, and so tempering and levelling disparities as to take men off from self-glorying. Proud undertakings, we see, are commonly most disgracefully broken. Nor is there any surer passage of the speedy ruin of any affairs or persons, than presumptuous boasting. This is God's work among men, as even natural men have observed, to abase high things, and exalt low things. He goes from one thing to another, pulling down the crest and blasting the glory of all human excellency, breaking the likeliest projects, and effecting what is least to be expected, withdrawing man from his purpose, to hide pride from his eyes, as Elihu speaks, Job xxxiii. 17. To this purpose, see Job x. 11, 12; 1 Sam. ii. 4, 5; and the Virgin in her song, Luke i. 51. Whatsoever men bear themselves big upon, and begin to glory in, they call the hand of God to crush it, raising an idol of jealousy in his sight. All high things have their day: The day of the Lord shall be on all the cedars of Lebanon, and he alone exalted. Isa. ii. 13, 17. If ever this was the case in any time, we may see it is legible in ours, in great letters. This is the very result of his ways, staining the pride of all glory, defeating witty counsels, making counsellors mad, throwing down all plumes and trampling them in the mire, that no party or persons in the kingdom can set out for any triumph of courage, or wit, or any other excellency, but somewhat shall be clearly seen to meet and dash it in pieces, that no flesh may glory before him. And this, to souls that love God, is the main happiness of the times, and that wherein they will chiefly rejoice.

The particular here spoken of, is eminent-ly suited to this end, the choice and calling of persons to the dignity of Christians: Not many wise, not many mighty, or noble, but the mean things, the foolish things, and the most insignificant, things that are not, non-entia, very nothings, to annul things that seem most to be something. Thus it was in the first times; and though afterward, by means of these meaner persons, greater were caught and drawn into Christ, philosophers and kings, yet still it remains true in all times, that predominantly the choice is of the meaner sort; God testifying how little he esteems those things which men account great. Those endowments of wit and eloquence which men admire in some, alas! how poor are they to him! he respecteth not any who are wise in heart: they are nothing, and less than nothing in his eyes. He is the author of all these. Will he esteem thy riches? No, not gold, nor all the forces of strength. Job xxxvi. 19. Even wise men admire how little it is that men know, how small a matter lies under the sound of those popular wonders, a learned man, a great scholar, a great statesman: how much more doth the all-wise God meanly account of these! He often discovers, even to the world, their meanness; he befools them. So valor, or birth, or worldly greatness, these he gives, and gives as things he makes no great reckoning of, to such as shall never see his face; and calls to the inheritance of glory poor despised creatures who are looked on as the offscourings and refuse of the world: these are raised from the dunghill, and set with princes, made the sons and daughters of God, entitled each of them to a crown that fades not. Oh the wonder!

Now, they are not puffed up with this, but the more assurance they have, and the clearer their view is of the state they are called to, the more humble they are; still laying these together, What was I in myself? and what am I in Christ? And, in comparing these, they are swallowed up with amazement at that love which made this change; and for this very end doth the apostle express thus their estate, Ye are of him in Christ Jesus.

This is a new being, a creation; for, in relation to this being, we are nothing in our state of nature; and then, considering that in relation to others, the meanest are often chosen and made partakers of this being, such as have nothing naturally great of nobility, or morality, or high intellectuals; the most nothings are often chosen and made partakers of this being, to illustrate the power of Him who makes them exist. In kings somewhat may be observed of this in their choice of favorites, and raising men who are not of highest deserving, as affecting to show their freedom in choice, and their power in making out of nothing, and so they love to have them called their creatures. But these are but shadows: both are poor creatures, both are easily thrown down. But God doth indeed show, in his choice, his freedom and power in his new creature: he draws them out of the lowest bottom of nothing, and raises them to the most excellent kind of being that creatures are capable of, to be the sons of God, and so heirs, joint heirs with Christ Jesus. Rom. viii. 17.

Ye are of him in Christ Jesus.] This must be taken in an eminent sense. All the creatures are of God; but man, even in his first creation, for the dignity of his being, and the slow way of forming him, was accounted to be of God, in a peculiar manner: formed to his own likeness, and therefore called the Son of God, called his offspring. Acts xvii. 28. But in this new being, much more are we so: we are of him as his children, partakers of the divine nature, and that so fastened that it abideth. And the medium of this excellent and permanent being is primarily to be considered; for in him it becomes so. It is both high and firm, being in the essential Son, as the foundation of it; therefore here expressed, as bearing the whole weight of this happy fabric.

Of him ye are in Christ Jesus. The life which believers derive from God is through him. He is that eternal Word, by which all things were made in their first creation, and do still subsist. Heb. i.; John i. And he is made the basis of the second creation, in a wonderful way, becoming himself a creature; and so, the root of the new progeny is from heaven, the sons of God: so it follows in both these cited scriptures. John i. 12-14. The word was made flesh, and so, they that receive him are made the sons of God. And so, Heb. ii. 10, 11, amply and excellently is that mystery unfolded. The first frame of man, at least the excellency and beauty of it, was broken by his fall; therefore a new model is framed of a selected number, to be a new world, more firm than the former, united unto God so close, as never to be severed again. Man, though he was made holy and God-like, continued not in that honor. Now God himself becomes a man, to make all sure: that is the foundation of an indissoluble union. Man is knit to God in the person of Christ so close, that there is no possibility of dividing them any more; and this union of our nature in his person is made the ground of the union of our persons with God. We find our own flesh catch hold in Christ of a man, and in that man may find God, and are made one with him by faith in Christ. And this all the powers of hell can not dissolve. Our life none can cut off from his, more than a man can cut a beam from off the sun. We are and subsist of God in Christ. This is an unknown mystery, but, were it known, it would prove a depth of rich, inexhaustible consolation. The world doth not know what Christians are. This is no wonder; for truly they know not themselves, or but very little. How would it elevate their spirits, but not in pride! Oh! nothing is more humbling than this, as the apostle here implies. But it would raise them above the world, and suit their desires and their actions to their condition, having all under foot that the world accounts great, walking as heirs of heaven, led and moved by the spirit of Christ in them; thinking, when solicited to any base way, how doth this become the sons of God? Shall one who lives in Christ, degrade him so much, as to borrow comfort or pleasure from any sin, for the killing and destruction whereof he laid down his precious life?

Oh, my brethren, that this divine ambition were kindled in your breasts, to partake of this high and happy being, and leave all your pursuits to follow this, restless till you be in Christ! For solid, abiding rest, sure I am, out of him there is none. And then, being in him, remember where you are, and what you are. Walk in Christ, and live like him, as one with him indeed: let his thoughts and desires be yours. What was his work, yea, what his refreshment, his meat and drink? To do his Father's will. Oh! when shall we find ourselves so minded, as the Apostle's word is, the same mind in us that was in Christ?

Who of God is made unto us wisdom.] Known unto God are all his works from the beginning. It was not an accidental after-device in God (for in him there can be no such thing), but was his great forethought project, out of the ruins of man's first estate, to raise a fairer and firmer fabric, new from the very foundation. And in the new foundation lies the model, and excellency, and stability of the whole structure. This is the choicest of all his works, wherein he chiefly glories; his masterpiece, which great angels admire; and this is it, who of God is made unto us wisdom. And this is one letter of his name. He is called Wonderful, who is here spoken of: so all is wonderful in this work: wonderful, first, that he should be made anything, the Maker of all things himself made something which before he was not; then made to us—that he should be made anything to our interest and advantage, who are a company of traitors; and made unto us of God, the God against whom we rebelled and continued naturally enemies! The purpose was bred in the Father's own breast, to give out his Son, thence to recover us and bring us back. Oh, astonishing depth of love! Then, made unto us what? Rather, what not? We are made up in him for ever rich and happy; he being made all unto us, all we need, or can desire, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. Without him, we are undone, forlorn caitiffs, masses of misery, as you say, having nothing either in us or on us, nothing but poverty and wretchedness, blindness and nakedness, altogether ignorant of the way to happiness, yea, ignorant of our very misery, a nest of fools, natural fools, children of folly (as they who are renewed by, and provided with, this wisdom, are called children of wisdom), guilty, filthy, condemned slaves.

This is the godly posture we are in, out of Christ; yet, who is sensible of it? How few can be brought to serious thoughts about it! Nay, are not the most in the midst of this misery, yet full of high conceits of their worth, wit, freedom, &c.? As frantic bedlamites, lying naked and filthy in their chains, yet dream they are great and wise persons, commanding and ordering all about them; fancying, possibly, that they are kings, a stick in their hands a sceptre, and their iron chains of gold. This is a pleasing madness for the time; yet, who does not pity it that looks on?

Methinks I see one of this sort, when I see one evidently destitute of Christ, bearing himself big upon the fancy of his parts, and birth, and riches, or stoutness; see such, upon any cross word, swelling against others, threatening high, and protesting they will be slaves to none; not knowing that, even while they speak thus, they are wretched caitiffs, under the hardest and basest kind of slavery. Inquire, my brethren, if ever you had a right and clear view of your natural misery: otherwise you are, it is likely, still in it, and though you profess to believe in Christ, are not yet gone out of yourself to him, and not knowing your great need of him, do certainly make little esteem and little use of him. You are full, and reign without him; all is well and in quiet; but it is owing to the strong man's yet possessing the house, and keeping you captives as quiet as he can, that you look not out, or cry for a deliverer. He is afraid of him, to be dispossessed and turned out by Him who is stronger, the mighty redeemer that came out of Zion. Oh, that many among you were crying to him, and waiting for him, to come unto you for your rescue!

Made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.] To supply and help all, he is our magazine whither to have recourse to: for this end, he is replenished with all the fulness of God, the very fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him, the Spirit being not given to him by measure. He is fit to be made our wisdom, who is the wisdom of the Father; as here in this place, the apostle lately called him, the wisdom of God. In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, Col. ii. 3. They that find him, and come unto him, find it so: but the most look but on the surface: they hear his name, and know not what is under it.

Made unto us righteousness. By fulfilling the whole law, and all righteousness, Matt. iii. 15, and yet, suffering the rigor of it, as if he had transgressed it. No guile, no spot was found on him: he was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and yet, the greatest sinner by imputation: The Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all, Isa. liii. 6. And so, Psalm xl. 12, which is prophesied of him: Mine iniquities have taken hold of me. He owns them as his, though not his. He endured all that justice could require, entered and paid the debt, and is acquitted and set free again, and exalted at the right hand of God. So it is evident that he is righteous, even in that representative and sponsional person he put on.

Sanctification. Christ is a living spring of that; anointed above his fellows. In him is no mixture of any iniquity. The Holy Ghost descended on the apostles in the shape of fire: there was somewhat to be purged in them: they were to be quickened and enabled by it for their calling. But on him it descended as a dove: there was no need of cleansing or purging out anything. That was a symbol of the spotless purity of his nature, and of the fulness of the Spirit dwelling in him.

And redemption. Christ is mighty to save, and having a right to save: a kinsman; a brother. And as he hath bought freedom for sinners, so, he will put them in possession of it, will effect and complete it. All that are in him, are really delivered from the power of sin and death, and shall, ere long, be perfectly and fully so: they shall be lifted up above them, no longer to be molested with any remainders of either, or with the fear of them, or so much as any grief for them. And that day is called the day of redemption, to which we are beforehand made sure and sealed by the Spirit. Ephes. iv. 30.

We can not then doubt of his fitness and fulness to be these, and these for us; but withal, we must know that he is designed so to be made unto us, and that he came, and did, and suffered all for this purpose, and having done, returned, and now lives, to be these to us. It is his place and office, and so his delight: he loves to be put upon the performance of this, to be their wisdom and righteousness. Made of God to us. It is agreed between the Father and him, that he should be so. He is the wisdom of God, and made of God our wisdom. Wonderful! that the same which is his own wisdom, and no less, he would make ours. And now, under a sense of all our ignorances and follies, it becomes us to go to him, to apply ourselves to him, and apply him to us. He is called our Head, and called so most fitly, for it is the place of all our wisdom; that lies in our head. And so, as to all the rest, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. If he be righteousness in himself, and holy, and victor over his enemies, and set free from wrath and death, then are we so too, in him; for he is ours, and so ours, that we become what he is, are inrighted to all he hath, and endowed with all his goods; though poor and base in ourselves, yet married to him: that is the title. We are made rich, and noble, and free, we are righteous and holy, because he is. Uxor fulget radiis mariti. The wife shines with the rays of her husband. All debts and pleas are taken off, he stands between us and all hazard, and in him we stand acquitted and justified before God.

That which makes up the match, and ties the knot of this union, is faith. He is made of God unto us wisdom, righteousness, &c. He is tendered and held out as all these, in the promise of the gospel: not only declared to be really furnished and fit so to be, but offered to be so, and we warranted, yea, invited and entreated, to receive him as such. But he is effectually made to be this to us, to me, by believing, the promise being brought home and applied of God, and faith wrought in the heart to entertain and unite to him. Ἡ πίστις ἰσονομίαι: Faith closes the bargain, and makes him ours. Now, in that, he is made unto us, not of ourselves, but God, for that is his gift and work: we can not believe, any more than we can fulfil the whole law. And though men think it a common and easy thing, to accept of so sweet an offer at so cheap a rate, nothing being required but to receive him, yet, this is a thing that naturally all refuse. No man cometh, says he, except the Father draw him. John vi. 44. Though men be beseeched to come, yet, the most will not come unto him, that they may have life. To as many as received him, he gave the privilege to become the sons of God. John i. 12; and yet, for all that, many did not receive him; yea, as there it is expressed, He came to his own, but his own received him not. They who were nearest to him in natural relation and interest, yet refused him, for the most part, and attained not this blessed spiritual interest in him unto life.

It should be considered, my brethren, Christ is daily held out, and none are excluded or excepted, all are invited, be they what they will, who have need of him and use for him; and yet, who is persuaded? Oh, who hath believed our report? One hath his farm, another his oxen, each some engagement or another. Men are not at leisure for Christ. Why? You think, may be, you have received him. If it be so, you are happy. Be not deluded. Have you received him? Do you find him then living and ruling within you? Are your eyes upon him? Do you wait on him, early and late, to see what his will is? Is your soul glad in him? Can you, in distress, sickness, or poverty, clasp to him, and find him sweet, and allay all with this thought, However things go with me, yet, Christ is in me? Doth your heart cleave to him? Certainly, if he be in you, it will be thus; or, at least, your most earnest desire will be, that it may be thus.

Men will not believe how hard a matter it is, to believe the fulness and sufficiency of Jesus Christ, till they be put to it in earnest to make use of him, and then they find it; when sin and death are set before their view, and discovered in their native colors unto the soul, when a man is driven to that, What shall I do to be saved? then, then is the time to know what notion he hath of Christ. And as the difficulty lies in this, in the first awakening of the conscience from sin, so, in after-times of temptation and apprehension of wrath, when, upon some new-added guiltiness, or a new sight of the old, in a frightful manner, sin revives and the soul dies, it is struck dead with the terrors of the law—then to keep thy hold, and find another life in Christ, the law and justice satisfied, and so the conscience quieted in him; this is indeed to believe.

It is a thing of huge difficulty, to bring men to a sense of their natural misery, to see that they have need of a Savior, and to look out for one: but then, being brought to that, it is no less, if not more difficult, to persuade them that Christ is he; that, as they have need of him, so they need no more, he being able and sufficient for them. All the waverings and fears of misbelieving minds, do spring from dark and narrow apprehensions of Jesus Christ. All the doubt is, not of their interest, as they imagine: they who say so, and think it so, do not perceive the bottom and root of their own malady. They say, they do no whit doubt but that he is able enough, and his righteousness large enough, but that all the doubt is, if he belong to me. Now, I say, this doubt arises from a defect and doubt of the former, wherein you suspect it not. Why doubtest thou that he belongs to thee? Dost thou flee to him, as lost and undone in thyself? Dost thou renounce all that can be called thine, and seek thy life in him? Then he is thine. He came to seek and to save that which was lost. Oh, but I find so much, not only former, but still daily renewed and increasing guiltiness. Why, is he a sufficient Savior, or is he not? If thou dost say, he is not, then it is manifest that here lies the defect and mistake. If thou sayest, he is, then hast thou answered all thy objections of that kind: much guiltiness, much or little, old or new, neither helps nor hinders, as to thy interest in him and salvation by him. And for dispelling of these mists, nothing can be more effectual than the letting in of those gospel beams, the clear expressions of his riches and fulness in the Scriptures, and eminently this, Made of God wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

Wisdom. Both objectively and effectively. Objectively, I mean, our wisdom, as all our wisdom lies in the right knowledge and apprehension of him. And this suits to the apostle's present discourse. The Jews would have a sign, and the Gentiles, wisdom; but we, says he, preach Christ. So, ch. ii. 2: I determined to know nothing, save Christ crucified. He was learnedly bred, and knew many things beside, much of nature, and much of the law; but all this was, to him, obsolete, useless stuff: it was as if he never had heard of or known anything else but Jesus Christ. We may know other things, but this, and this alone, is our wisdom, to know him, and him crucified. Particularly, we may have knowledge of the law, and by it the knowledge of sin; but in relation to our standing before God, and so, our happiness, which is the greatest point of wisdom, Jesus Christ is alone, and is all. And the more firmly a soul eyes Christ, and loses all other knowledge and itself in contemplating him, the more truly wise and heavenly it is.

And effectively he is our wisdom. All our right knowledge of him and belief in him, flow from himself, are derived from him, and sent into our souls. His spirit is conveyed into ours; a beam of himself, as of the sun. The Sun of righteousness is not seen but by his own light; so that every soul that is made wise unto salvation, that is brought to apprehend Christ, to cleave to him, and repose on him, it is by an emission of Divine light from himself, that shows him, and leads unto him. And so we know God in him. There is no right knowledge of the Father but in the Son. God dwelling in the man, Christ, will be found or known nowhere else; and they that consider and worship God out of Christ, do not know or worship the true God; but a false notion and fancy of their own.

The Shechinah, the habitation of the Majesty, is Jesus Christ; there he dwells as between the cherubims over the mercy-seat.

To apprehend God so as to love him, and trust in him all our life, to hope to find favor and bliss with him, this is the only wise knowledge of him. Now, this alone is in Christ, and from him. He contains this representation of God, and gives his own light to see it. So that a Christian's desire should be, in relation to Jesus Christ, that of David in reference to the temple, as a figure of him, One thing have I desired of him, and that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord; that I may get in to Christ, to know God there, to behold the beauty of the Lord. There we see beauty indeed, the Father's glory, and so, as our Father reconciled to us, we see him merciful and gracious. And as we should desire to behold, so, still, to inquire in his temple, to advance in the knowledge of God, studying him in Christ: we are to admire what we see, and to seek still to see more. And know, that this knowledge of God, as we have it in Christ, so it is from him. He reveals the Father: he came from his bosom for that purpose. We can not believe on him, can not come near God through him, but as he lets forth of his light, to conduct and lead us in, yea, powerfully to draw in, for his light does so. Now, knowing and apprehending him by his own light, his Spirit, the apostle clears it, that this is our wisdom, by those rich titles added, according to which we find him to us, when we receive from him that wisdom by which we apprehend him aright and lay hold on him, then made unto us righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.

Righteousness. This doubtless is meant of the righteousness by which we are justified before God. And he is made this to us: applied by faith, his righteousness becomes ours. That exchange made, our sins are laid over upon him, and his obedience put upon us. This is the great glad tidings, that we are made righteous by Christ. It is not a righteousness wrought by us, but given to us, and put upon us. This carnal reason can not comprehend, and being proud, therefore rejects and argues against it; says, How can this thing be? But faith closes with it, and rejoices in it. Without either doing or suffering, the sinner is acquitted and justified, and stands as guiltless of breach, yea, as having fulfilled the whole law. And happy they who thus fasten upon this righteousness! They may lift up their faces with gladness and boldness before God; whereas the most industrious, self-saving justiciary, though in other men's eyes and his own, possibly, for the present, he makes a glittering show, yet, when he shall come to be examined of God, and tried according to the law, he shall be covered with shame, and confounded in his folly and guiltiness. But faith triumphs over self-unworthiness, and sin, and death, and the law, shrouding the soul under the mantle of Jesus Christ; and there it is safe. All accusations fall off, having nowhere to fasten, unless some blemish could be found in that righteousness in which faith hath wrapt itself. This is the very spring of solid peace, and fills the soul with peace and joy. But still men would have something within themselves to make out the matter, as if this robe needed any such piecing; and not finding what they desire, thence disquiet and unsettlement of mind arise.

True it is, that this faith purifies the heart, and works holiness, and all graces flow from it; but in this work of justifying the sinner, it is alone, and can not admit of any mixture. As Luther's resemblance is, "Faith is as the bride with Christ in the bed-chamber alone; but when she cometh forth, hath the attendance and train of other graces with her." This well understood, the soul that believes on Jesus Christ, will not let go for all deficiency in itself; and yet, so resting on him, will not be slothful nor regardless of any duty of holiness. Yea, this is the way to abound in all the fruits of the Spirit, first to have that wisdom from him, rightly to apprehend and apply him as our righteousness, and then shall we find all furniture of grace in him; he will likewise be sanctification. Say not, Unless I find some measure of sanctification, what right have I to apply him as my righteousness? This inverts the order, and disappoints thee of both. Thou must first, without finding, yea, or seeking anything in thyself but misery and guiltiness, lay hold on him as thy righteousness; or else thou shalt never find sanctification by any other endeavor or pursuit.

He it is that is made sanctification to us, and out of him we seek it in vain. Now, first he must be thy righteousness, before thou find him thy sanctification. Simply as a guilty sinner, thou must flee to him for shelter; and then, being come in, thou shalt be furnished out of his fulness, with grace for grace. As a poor man pursued by the justiciary, fleeing to a strong castle for safety, and being in it, finds it a rich palace, and all his wants supplied there.

This misunderstanding of that method, is the cause of that darkness and discomfort, and withal of that deadness and defect of graces, that many persons go drooping under, who will not take this way, the only straight and sure way of life and comfort. Now, Sanctification he is to us, not only as a perfect pattern, but as a powerful principle. It is really the spirit of Christ in a believer, that crucifies the world, and purges out sin, and forms the soul to his likeness. It is impossible to be holy, not being in him; and being truly in him, it is as impossible not to be holy. Our pothering and turmouling without him makes us lose our labor; and in this point, indeed, little wit makes much labor.

Redemption. Sin is often prevailing even in believers, and therewithal discomforts and doubts arising, as it can not otherwise choose. Oh, how do they groan and sigh as captives still to the law of sin and death! Well, there is in our Lord Jesus help for that too. He is redemption; that is, the complement and fullness of deliverance. The price he paid once for all: now he goes on to work that deliverance by conquest, which he bought by ransom. It is going on even when we feel it not, and within a little while it shall be perfected, and we shall see all the host of our enemies who pursued us, as Israel saw the Egyptians lie dead upon the shore. Courage! that day is coming.

And all this is, That he that glories, may glory in the Lord. Is it reasonable? No self-glorying: the more faith, the less will there be still of that. A believer is nothing in himself: all is Christ's, Christ is his all. That treasurer who, being called to an account, because that out of nothing he had enriched himself suddenly, many thought he would have been puzzled with it; but he, without being much moved, next morning came before the king in an old suit that he wore before he got that office, and said, "Sir, this suit on my back is mine, but all the rest is thine." So, our old suit is ours, all the rest Christ's, and he allows it well. And in the full and pure glory that ascends to God in this work, are we to rejoice more than in the work itself as our salvation. There is an humble kind of boasting that becomes a Christian. My soul shall glory (or make her boast) in God, says David, all the day long. "What was I before I met with Christ," thinks a believer, "and now what am I?" And, upon that thought, he wonders and loves. But most of the wonder is yet to come; for he conceives but little what we shall be.

SERMON XXIV.

THE FOLLY OF MAN, AND THE TEACHING OF GOD.

JEREMIAH x. 23, 24.

- O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh, to direct his steps.
O Lord, correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing.

It can not be expressed what an advantage a heart acquainted with God hath, in all the revolutions and changes of the world, when it turns unto him, and gives vent to its griefs and desires into his bosom, and so finds ease. This the prophet does here: after the denouncing of a heavy judgment, he turns toward him from whom he brought that message, to entreat for them to whom he brought it. After a very sad close of his sermon, he adds this short but very sweet prayer; presents himself, and speaks in that style, as representing the whole people: Correct me, O Lord; he makes their calamity, as it were, all his own; bears their person, and presents his petition for them in his own name. The prophets, though they could not but applaud and approve the justice of God who sent them, in the harshest news they brought, yet, withal, could not be insensible to the miseries of his people; and so we find them mixing pathetic complaints and prayers for them, with the predictions of judgments against them.

Observe. And thus are all his faithful ministers affected toward his church. The Lord himself is pleased to express a kind of regret, sometimes, in the punishing of them; as the tender-hearted father feels the lashes he lays on, though highly deserved by the stubbornness of his children. How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? How shall I make thee as Admah? How shall I make thee as Zeboim? My heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together. Hosea xi. 8. So it well becomes his servants to be thus affected when they deliver sad news to his people, to return praying for them; thus going as angels between heaven and earth, beseeching the people to return unto God, and beseeching God to return to his people, and spare them.

The prophet, in this prayer, first premises a position suiting his purpose, and then, upon that, presents his supplication. The position he lays, to make a double benefit of it in order to his petition. It is both a sure ground for himself to stand on, and a fit argument to move God by. Thus it is, and thus he intends and uses it, at once to support his own faith, and to work on the goodness of God by it. Beside the fitness of the truth itself for both these ends, we find some print of both in the very way of expressing it, O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself; so expressing both his own persuasion of the truth of it, I know, and representing it to God as a fit truth to urge his suit by, O Lord, I know.

Observe. A great part of the strength and art of prayer, lies in this: first, to have the mind furnished with fit conceptions of God, and established in the firm persuasions of them; in that is much of the strength of prayer: then, fily to call up and use these conceptions and persuasions for our own supporting and prevailing with God; in that lies the art of it.

We possibly think that we do sufficiently believe both the goodness and power of God, especially his power, none suspecting himself of the least doubt of it; yet our perplexing doubts and fears, our feeble staggerings in faith and prayer, upon particular pressing difficulties, discover evidently a defect here, though still we will not own it. And alas! how little faculty have we in the most needful times, to rest on his strength, and to stir up ourselves to stir him up by prayer, to do for us, holding firm to that great point of his absolute sovereignty and power over all things, and holding it up to him, entreating him by it to appear and work for us. Lord, it is in thy hand; that I know, and that is enough to me: thy good will I dare trust. (For there is implied a secret confidence of that.) This contents me, that thou hast full power of the business. That is the thing which here the prophet fixes on. O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself. g. d. As there is in us no power to turn off the judgment determined, all our wit and strength can do nothing to that, so we are sure there is no power in our enemies to do anything either beyond or beside thy appointment, in the execution of it. And upon this, Lord, we come to supplicate thee for mitigation. With men it often falls out, either in just punishments, or unjust oppressions, that the ministers and under-officers do exceed their commission, and overdo their business; yea, sometimes add little less of their own, than all that comes to which is appointed to them. But with thee, O Lord, it is not so. As our enemies can not stir of themselves without order from thee, and as thy commissions are always all just, so thou seest to the performance, art present at it, which often men can not be; and so nothing is, or can be, done beside thy notice and allowance.

I. His position is this: The way of man is not in himself, and repeated more plainly, It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps; thus, by a double negation, putting it altogether out of his power. And under this, the positive truth is couched, that the absolute disposal of all the ways of man is wholly in the supreme hand of God; according to that, Prov. xx. 24, Man's goings are of the Lord; how can a man, then, understand his own way? He doth not certainly know anything of his own doings. Even he who seems to know most, to advise and deliberate upon all he does, yet hath no power of his contrivements, knows not which way they will turn, till the event doth clear it, and even then, on looking back, is often amazed at the strange course of things, so far different from, and possibly contrary to all his witty projectings and models. He often does not attain his own, but he never fails to accomplish God's purpose, even when his intentions are least from it, yea, when they are most against it. Let us build a tower, said they, lest we be scattered abroad, Gen. xi.; and that was the very thing which caused their scattering. Joseph was sold by his brethren, that they might not bow before him, as he had dreamed; and this brought it to pass. Pharaoh says, Let us deal wisely; and that way of oppressing them, lest they should go away, both stirred up God to deliver them, and disposed them to depart. And not to multiply instances, generally in all the ways of men, they have their designs at most times eccentric to God's, but his design holds always, and theirs no further than they are his. Have we not ourselves seen instances of this?

Man consults and determines freely, yet

even those inward actings of the mind and will, are ordered and framed by the hand of God; and it can not otherwise be. It is a most vain fancy, to imagine that anything in this is inconsistent with the natural liberty of the will, or that any such liberty can be in any creature, as consists not with his. But because in these inward actings, man finds himself more at his choice, though all is secretly overruled, and in the event of things, God's sovereign disposal is more legible; therefore, these two are expressed with some kind of difference, Proverbs xvi. 9: A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directs his steps. That is, when he hath devised, that does not carry it: he may devise and fancy things twenty ways, and think he is taking freely his own course, but he shall find in the issue another hand than his own. It is not in man that walks, as the word is here; he walketh, and yet the direction of his steps is in another hand. But in the devisings, too, the Lord so acts upon man, that he is turned which way it pleaseth him. Even the heart, and that of the most uncontrolled, the most impetuous torrent, the king's heart is in his hand, as the rivers of waters: he turneth it whithersoever he will, Proverbs xxi. 1. When men either determine themselves, or follow unallowed ways for determination (as those, Ezek. xxi. 21,) yet are they ordered of God. This he does infallibly and uncontrollably, yet in such a way as there is nothing distorted or violented. Fortiter et suaviter—all is so done. Things are in their own course, and men are in their voluntary choice; yet, all subserving the great Lord, and his ends, and his glory, who made them all for himself: as the lower orbs have each their motion, but are all wheeled about with the first. Men know not what he is doing by them, and what in the end he will do with them. With the rod of Assyria he scourges his children, and then throws the rod in the fire. Isa. x. 5 and 16. The horseleech draws the blood to fill itself, but the physician intends the patient's health. Men are drawn on by temporal prosperings and successes to drive proudly and furiously, till they drive themselves over the edge of the precipice appointed for their ruin; and all his exalting them for a season, is, in the end, to exalt himself in their greater and more remarkable destruction. I will get me a name upon Pharaoh, and all his host. Men are busy, consulting or acting with or against one another, and he sits and laughs at their wisest plots: he alone is in all affairs, doing all his own will in heaven and in earth.

Oh! the folly and blindness of men, who think to carry all to their minds, and walk as masters of their own designs, and never have any serious thought of him in whose hands both they and all their business, and all the affairs of states and kingdoms of this world, are as a piece of wax, to frame them to what he pleases—he who destroys the counsels of the wise, and makes the diviners mad, who pours contempt upon princes, leads counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools; he who hath set limits to all things, to the raging of the sea, making the small sand give check to the great ocean: when it brake out of the womb, he had a cradle provided for it, and swaddling-bands, Job xxxviii., and there, though it rolls to and fro, yet it can not get out. Oh! it is ignorance of God makes men rush on, and not inquire whether he be with them or no. Moses was wise and stout, and leader of a numerous people, yet he would not stir on other terms: If thou go not with us, let us not go up hence. Well, if men will on their peril, be it: let us reverence God. For even this is for him, and he will gain his glory out of it. The way of man is not in himself. If we see their folly, let us learn to be wiser, to keep close to him, and desire his gracious direction to our ways; for it is not in our hands, even when we intend best. And for public affairs, let us rest satisfied in his part. Amid all disorders, he is ordering all wisely and justly, and to them who love him, graciously: therefore we ought not to be dismayed. Let us calm our thoughts with this, remember who it is that rules all, and disposes of peace and war, and all affairs, and we can not wish them in a better hand. I am persuaded that in all the commotions of the world, when a believer thinks on this, it can not but calm and compose his spirit exceedingly: My Father rules all. Let this so quiet our fears, as that withal it quicken our prayers, and stir us up to the work of this day—repentant, humble, seeking unto God; seeing all is in his hands, our peace, our liberties, and our enemies, that threaten to bereave us of both. Oh! that the effect of all our troubles and dangers were to drive us more to God, to make us throng more about the throne of grace, to draw forth our King for our help! Oh, our impotence and unformedness! That turns him to be our enemy, and that only. Men are nothing. And now, in so great straits, yet so little calling on him! Oh, my brethren, what are we doing? Oh! pray, pray. It is our God that commands all, and we may say it upon his own warrant, it is prayer that commands him.

II. The petition: Correct me, &c. When the hand of God is stretched out against a people or a person, certainly there is no running from him. The only wise and safe course is, to run unto him. This the prophet does in behalf of his people, and by his example teaches them so to do. As the prophet utters his own sense and desires in this prayer, so he sets it as a copy to the people of God in time of judgment to pray by; shows them the way, which is, not vainly to offer to flee from him, or proudly to stand out against him, to their undoing, but to humble themselves under his mighty hand, supplicating him, yielding themselves, and begging quarter. Correct me, O Lord, with judgment, not in anger, lest thou bring me to nothing. That I should suffer for my rebellion, there is good reason; yet, Lord, do not utterly destroy me, which will be, if the weight of thine anger fall upon me. And for that, though indeed we have deserved it, yet there is another vent for it, and, pardon us to say so, fitter matter for it: Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen: ver. 25: let it go out that way. So we see the supplication hath these two particulars in it, an aversion and a diversion; an aversion of the anger of God upon his own people under correction, and a diversion of it upon his and their enemies; Lord, turn from us, and pour it out there. The aversion is presented qualified with an humble submission, declaring expressly they decline not that correction of God, but only deprecate his consuming anger. Correct me, O Lord, but with judgment, that is, with measure: such as the discretion and love of a father resolves on toward a child, Thus much will I correct him for his good, and no further.

Not in thine anger. God is pleased to express his displeasure against sin by wrath and anger, even toward his own children. But the anger which here the prophet entreats exception from, for the church, is anger opposed to judgment, unbounded, destroying anger, that knows no limits nor stop, but the devouring of those against whom it is kindled. This is spoken in our language, but it is to be understood in a way suiting the purity of God. In him truly is no passion at all, much less any that is not ordered by wisdom and judgment. He is not carried in heat beyond his purposed measure, but knows well how far he intends to go with any, and goes no farther. But as his anger means his just punishing of sin, so his unlimited anger signifies no other than his just proceeding in punishment, to the utter destruction of inflexible sinners; and to this is opposed here, his correcting with judgment, that is, in a fatherly, gracious moderation, such as does not utterly ruin and cut off, but indeed reclaims and converts sinners unto him.

This submission and yieldance to a measured correction, is a thing most reasonable: they that know anything aright of themselves and God, will not refuse it.

First, reflecting on their own sinfulness, which when truly discovered, even where there is least, yet is there enough of it to justify even utter destruction. Therefore have we good reason unrepiningly to receive such moderate correction from the hand of God as he thinks fit, and to wonder that it is no more. It is one true character of repentance under the rod, to accept the punishment of our iniquity, to have our untamed spirits brought low, to stoop to God, to acknowledge our punishment to be far less than our iniquity, and that it is of his goodness that we are not consumed, as the church confesses,

Lam. iii. 22. Though we feel it heavy, and the measure hard, yet self-knowledge and conscience of sin will lay the soul low, and make it quiet, so that it will say nothing, or if anything, it will be confession of its own guiltiness and the righteousness of God; still clearing him in all, as it is, Psalm li. 4, and using that other, Psalm cxix. 137; whatsoever is so inflicted, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and just are thy judgments. Which words a good king used, being put in prison, and hardly dealt with. So the psalmist, Psalm xxxviii. 3: There is no soundness in my flesh, because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my bones, because of my sin. He justifies God's anger by his own sin. Thus Daniel makes confession for this people, under the very captivity here threatened, when it had lasted out the full term. See Dan. ix.

And knowing our sin, ought we not to allow God the clearing of his own justice, his purity and hatred of sin, in punishing it? And, possibly, he will punish sin most exemplarily here, in those who are nearest him, his own people and children; he can least endure it there. This, especially, when we consider his sovereignty and greatness, that he is tied to no account of his actings; and though we did not see so clear reason for our sufferings in our deservings, there is reason enough in his will. And this, well considered, would bring us to much humble submission in all. I was dumb, says David, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it. Psalm xxxix. 9. The bishop of Troyes meeting Atila marching toward the city, asked who he was. I am, said he, the scourge of God. Upon this, he set open the gates to him; but God marvellously restrained the soldiers in that city.

But yet further, as our own guiltiness, and God's righteousness and greatness, plead for this compliance with his chastisements, so even his goodness, and our own profit in them. There is in his chastising of his own people very much mercy, that they may not be condemned with the world. 1 Cor. xi. 32. Their afflictions have a secret stamp of love on them: By this is the iniquity of Jacob purged, &c. He purifies a people in his furnace, that they may be holy unto him; gives his own many sweet experiences of secret support and comfort in affliction, and seasonable delivery out of it, and brings them forth with advantage. The peaceable fruits of righteousness. Heb. xii. 11. He humbles and purges a people, or a person, by his rods, and prepares them for greater mercies, to enjoy them both more sweetly and usefully: renews his covenant and the mutual endearments of love between himself and his people, according to the gracious promises made to his people, in relation to this very judgment here threatened, and after inflicted on them. See Isaiah liv.; Ezek. xxxvi.

We, possibly, think it strange that our pressures and troubles still continue, and rather grow upon us than abate; but we judge not wisely concerning this, the most part cursing and repining, others falling into a dead, hopeless stupidity, not caring what becomes of things. But our best course were, to turn to him who smites us, to acknowledge our rebellions and his justice, to eye men less, and God more, in our sufferings, and to confess that our provocations exceed all that is come upon us; to fall down humbly before God, and take submissively his chastisement, saying, Correct me, O Lord, but with judgment; and with the church, I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him. Mic. vii. 9.

Thus, likewise, in private personal correctings, let us learn to behave ourselves meekly and humbly, as the children of so great and good a Father; whatsoever he inflicts, not to murmur, nor entertain a fretful thought of it. Besides the undutifulness and unseemliness of it, how vain is it! What gain we by struggling and casting up our hand to cast off the rod, but the more lashes? Our only way is, to kneel and fold under his hands, and kiss his rod, and, even while he is smiting us, to be blessing him, sending up confessions of his righteousness, and goodness, and faithfulness, only entreating for the turning away of his wrath, though it should be with the continuing of our affliction. That is here the style of the prophet's prayer, Correct me, O Lord, but not in anger. And, according to this suit, even where troubles are chastisements for sin, yet a child of God may find much sweetness, reading much of God's love in so dealing with him, in not suffering him to grow wanton and forget him, as, in much ease, even his own children sometimes do. And as they may find much of God's love to them in sharp corrections, they may raise and act much of their love to him in often-repeated resignments and submissions of themselves, and ready consenting to, yea, rejoicing in his good pleasure, even in those things which to their flesh and sense are most unpleasant.

Now, to the petition, the averting of his anger. That is the great request of them who know and fear him; and there is high reason for it. The heaviest sufferings are light without it, but the least ingredient of that adds inexpressible weight to the smallest affliction. This was the thing, it is likely, which made the visage of death so sad to holy men in Scripture, David, Hezekiah, &c., that in those times it had some character of God's anger against them upon it; came to them as a messenger of displeasure. So a thing, small in itself, may be a great curse. To be cast out unburied is no great matter. Natural men slight it: Caelo tegitur, qui non habet urnam. There is little difference, to lie eaten of beasts above ground, or of worms beneath. Yet, when foretold to a man as a judgment denounced from God, as against that king, Jeremiah xxii. 19, it hath its own weight, carrying some stamp of God's despising him. And though a man feels it not when it is done, yet he feels it, looking on it beforehand, especially as threatened of God; sees himself, as it were, dragged about and torn.

Now, if any little particular cross, marked with God's present anger, becomes so heavy, how much more is his abiding, prolonged wrath, the thing here spoken of—anger, to which no bound is set! That, says he, in the name of his people, would bring me to naught. There is no standing before it; it will make the stoutest and proudest to shake, yea, shakes them to pieces. If the wrath of a king be to meaner men as the roaring of a lion (Prov. xix. 12), how much more terrible, even to kings themselves, is the wrath of God! This great King whose voice shakes the mountains, and makes the earth to tremble, armies of terrors and deaths are nothing to a look of his angry countenance. If he withdraw not his anger, the proud helpers stoop under him. Job ix. 13. The helpers of pride, the great Atlases of the world, who are thought to bear up all, those who, for their wit and power, are thought the supporters of the kingdoms, how soon are they crushed to pieces by a touch of this anger of God, and perish at the rebuke of his countenance! O Lord, says that holy man, Psalm xc. 11, considering the frailty of poor man, and the power of God, who knows the power of thine anger? Even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath; full as much, yea, far more terrible than we can apprehend it.

They who dare go on in ways wherein it may be but suspected that he is against them, oh! they know him not. Let us consider, and fear before him; and, for the land, still entreat the turning away of his wrath, rather than deliverances from any pressures: Lord, while thou thinkest good further to afflict us, so as to draw us nearer to thee, we are content, yea, we will bless thee; but whatsoever thou do with us, suffer not thy hot displeasure to arise against us, for then we are undone. So this is all a soul under his hand, in affliction, ought to say, Correct me, but not in wrath, lest thou bring me to nothing: thou knowest I can not stand before that. He is pleased to look to this, and to express it as that which moderates his anger, even when justly incensed; Isa. lvii. 16; I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made. Lord, if thou wilt, now quickly and how easily couldst thou break into pieces, or sink into nothing, not only me, a little atom of it, but the entire frame of this whole world; and, therefore, strive not with me. This Job often represents, and God is pleased to move himself to restrain his wrath and draw forth his mercy by it. His great compassion lays hold on such considerations. See Psalm lxxviii. 38, 39, and Psalm ciii. 14. And this may furnish great confidence to souls under a sense of wrath, that do but fall down and entreat for mercy. He who so often prevents us, when we seek it not, will he cast any one away who seeks and sues for it?

The diversion of this anger briefly relates to the heathen, the professed and obdurate enemies of God and his church; g. d. Thy wrath, O Lord, may have its course, and yet spare thy people. There is matter enough for it round about, that is good for nothing else; and good reason for it, besides all other wickedness, their spite and cruelty against thy people: For they have eaten up Jacob.

Note the character of the ungodly, who are fit fuel for this fire, That know not, and call not on thy name; that profess not, pretend not to be thine. Tremble, you who are too like these, though reputed among the people of God. Seek the knowledge of God, and worship him, families and persons, lest this curse come upon you.

Now, this is a prophetic foretelling of the utter destruction of the church's enemies whereas the church is corrected in measure, and not destroyed. She is first punished; but they that come last, the enemies, the heaviest wrath falls down there, and smothers them, ends on them, and makes a full end of them. Jer. xxx. 11. The belief of this may uphold the faithful in the church's greatest distresses. When at the lowest, then the wrath is nearest changing place and removing to her enemies.

And this is to be so desired and prayed for, in reference to the implacable enemies of God, that we should beware we mix nothing of our own interest or passion with it. As wrath in God is without any disturbance astuas et tranquillus es, so somewhat like is the desire of it in the godly, a calm, undistempred love of the name of God. And so shall the saints rejoice in the final victory and triumph of Christ over all his enemies, and their final ruin in that day when they shall be made his footstool. Then they shall have a pure complacency and delight in his justice; that shall make all even. And why are we disquieted, if we hope for that day?

SERMON XXV.

MERCY DESPISED, AND THE CONTEMPT PUNISHED.

ISAIAH XXX. 15—18.

For thus saith the Lord God, the holy One of Israel, In returning and rest shall ye be saved, in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength; and ye would not.

But ye said, No, for we will flee upon horses, therefore shall ye flee: And we will ride upon the swift, therefore shall they that pursue you be swift.

One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one: at the rebuke of five shall ye flee, till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain, and as an ensign on a hill.

And therefore will the Lord wait, that he may be gracious unto you, and therefore will he be exalted, that he may have mercy upon you: for the Lord is a God of judgment; blessed are all they that wait for him.

In the sentence of that greatest and biggest judgment that ever yet came on the world, the universal deluge, as we have it Gen. vi., that word doth most lively express the reason of it, My Spirit shall not always strive with man. For thus it is, while he spares even his own people, he is at a continual strife with them by gracious entreaties and mercies, by advices, and warnings, and threatenings, still contesting; that is the way, he uses in the contest, on his part, against refusals, and revolts, and rebellions on their part. Thus here.

The question between him and his people here, is about the help of Egypt: this God often declares to be wholly against his mind and their own good: yet they on all occasions had so strong a mind to it that they could not be diverted. The prophet here hath his message concerning this point, to preach it, and to write it, to remain ad perpetuam rei memoriam, as they speak, that it may be for the time to come, for ever and ever; ver. 8; shows them plainly, that this course was wholly without the counsel and consent of God, yea, directly against it, and that it should succeed accordingly: The strength of Pharaoh shall be your shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion; it shall prove to you according to its name, a land of distress and trouble, instead of help. And if you would know what would suit that other name of Egypt better, that were humble yieldance to God, and confidence in him: your Rahab, your best Egypt, your truest strength, were to sit still. Ver. 7. This is here again represented to them, so gladly would he reclaim them.

For thus saith the Lord.] The words have, 1st, God's express advice to his people. 2dly, Their peremptory refusal of it. 3dly, His just sentence passed upon their obstinacy. The advice is prefaced with the usual words of the prophets, Thus saith the Lord; for in that lies the dignity and authority of the message. His advices, doubtless, are the choicest and the safest; yea, his counsels are all commands, requiring duly the most absolute obedience.

The Lord Jehovah.] Were but his word known to be his, and taken so, how would our souls melt, and yield to the impressions of it, when we read or hear! Oh! learn to hear him, to take every word of his as from his own mouth, every time the law is read, as if thou heard it from Mount Sinai. So think, now God commands me to fear him, as if you heard him speaking from heaven. That would level more our opinion of men, and make less difference of his messengers.

Another word of his style is here added, The holy One of Israel. This is much to be considered by his people, the holiness of his nature, and withal, the nearness of his relation to them, and so, the reverence and obedience we owe him, our deep engagement to holiness, as his people, his children. This is his image in us, if we are truly such. All his sons and daughters are like him, holy as he is holy. The blind, base world thinks it a word of disgrace, but the great God owns it as a chief point of his glory, a diamond of his crown, and frequently expresses it as one of the titles he most delights to be known by, Holy, Holy, Holy. And as this is beheld, the heart can not but be filled with reverence, and holy fear, and self-abasement; as this prophet here, in seeing the vision, and hearing that voice, Then said I, Wo is me, for I am undone. Isa. vi. 5.

This is here used fitly to scare his people from rebellion, the unholy way on which they were so bent; and the rather because they were grown weary of it, and desired not to hear this word. Ver. 9. Therefore it is the more repeated; Because ye despise this word, ye shall hear it the more. Ver. 12. The prophet will neither be mocked nor threatened out of it; he will both deliver his message, and give the King who sent him his own title. And oh, that we knew him according to it, and understood what this means, The holy One of Israel! He was a holy man, and knew something, who yet confesses his own ignorance in that point (there must be some knowledge of it, to discover ignorance of it): I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy. Prov. xxx. 3.

In returning and rest.] In leaving off the pains ye take in messages and journeys to Egypt, in humbly and quietly composing yourselves to wait on me, and trust in me; submitting to my hand, in what I bring upon you, and from the same hand, mine alone, expecting deliverance in due time. This does not bar the use of all lawful means, but as it shuts out perplexing cares and turmoil even in those good means, so it expressly forbids all intermeddling with all unwarranted ways, such as God doth not direct us to, but rather dissuades us from.

And if this be the safest way, surely it is the sweetest, easiest way. There can not be anything easier than to be quiet and sit still, to rest and trust, and so be safe and strong. And as it is in this particular, so generally, it is in all the ways of God; they are the only easy, peaceable, sweet ways, with the least pains, and the surest advantage. And the ways of disobedience, besides what comes after, are, even for the present, more turbulent, laborious, perplexed ways. What a hurry and pother are men put in, to serve their lusts, or their ambition, when, if they attain their object, it does not quit the cost and the pains; besides that if their hopes mock them, and after long pursuit, they embrace a shadow. Thus men woo their own vexation, and take a great deal more pains to be miserable, than they would be put to, to make them nappy.

What a pity to pay so dear for nothing, to give their riches and treasures, and to be at pains too to carry them to a people that shall not profit them (et oleum et operam), both their expense and travel laid out to no purpose! The voluptuous, or covetous, or ambitious, how do they project, and drudge, and serve their wretched lusts, who, when they have done one piece of service, are still to begin another! And what is the profit of all, but shame and sorrow at last? The humble, sober-minded Christian saves all that pains, and hath his heart's desire in quietness and confidence.* His great desire and delight is, God; and, by desiring and delighting, he hath him. Psalm xxxvii. 4: Delight thou in the Lord, and he shall give thee thy heart's desire—HIMSELF; and then, surely, thou shalt have all. Any other thing commit to him, and he shall bring it to pass.

Strange! men might have God at an easier rate than the poorest vanities they are hunting after, and yet they will not; a full fountain of living waters is ready provided, yet they will be at pains to hew out little cisterns, which, after all their pains, are but broken cisterns, and can hold no water.

I know not what men are doing, still at work, when they might better sit still, troubling themselves and all about them, and can not well tell for what. Oh, the sweet peace of believing and obeying God! They truly conquer, sitting still: Sedendo vincebant. In all times, they are safe under the shadow of the Almighty; are strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

And ye would not, but said, No.] Thus men sometimes flatly reject his counsels, and when they are not so gross as plainly to speak it out, yet say so in doing so, and for good manners' sake will blanch it with reproaching the messengers; will have it to be not God's mind, but men's own fancy, a false vision; will own nothing for truth but what suits their humor and design. First, they resolve on their course without acquainting God, ask not his advice; then, when he is pleased to give it by his messengers, they reject it, not under that name, as God's advice, but will not have it pass for this, because it crosses their already-determined course. If it favored that, then, no question, it were welcome enough as his word. That is meant by those words, ver. 10: Which say to the prophets, prophesy not unto us right things; speak unto us smooth things, prophesy deceits. And so they used Jeremiah long after, in this very point. Jer. xlii. 2. And so they go on to take their own course; No, but we will flee upon horses.

And this is the nature of carnal hearts; they are generally inclined to rebel, and take a way of their own, casting away the counsels of God, as not suiting with the state, or with wit, or points of honor. They find more feeling and real substance in sensual things than in the promises of God: these seem airy, unsure things to them; therefore, they would still see apparent means, and where these fail, think it but a fancy to rest on God. They dare not trust him so but as withal to do for themselves, although nothing can be done but what he forbids, which therefore can not be done without giving up with him, and departing from their trust on him. All this cleaves to us, and much cause have we to suspect ourselves, when it is but doubtful that there appears little or no evidence of God's counsel or good-will to a business, but rather clear characters of his dislike, and much of our own will, a soul, uncontrollable bent to it; when we are conscious to ourselves of this, that either we have not asked advice of God at all, or very slightly, not being much upon our knees with it; or, possibly, in asking his advice, have brought our answer with us, in our own breasts, the lying oracle that making answer, and we consenting to delude ourselves, nor hearkening to anything that does not clink and sound to our purpose.

Our hearts are exceedingly deceitful, and particularly in this point of withdrawing our trust from God, and leaving off to follow him in his ways, to trust on the arm of flesh, on policy and strength, and self-resolved undertakings, rather than on him without these. Evil men think that those who advise them to trust on God are silly fellows, who know not what belongs to policy and reasons of state. A fancied wisdom it is, that men are enamored with, and look not to a higher wisdom, consider not God, that he also is wise. Isa. xxxi. 2. There is, I think, in that word a tart scorn of the folly of their seeming wisdom. Be it that you are wits, yet you will not deny some wisdom to God: Yet he also is wise. So they think not on his power neither; therefore he puts them in mind (ver. 3), that the Egyptians are men.

Well, if you be resolved on that course, says God, then know mine too, that I am resolved upon: Therefore ye shall flee, shall have fleeing enough; and if you be swift, they that pursue you shall be swifter, and one shall serve to chase a thousand, the rebuke the very terror of one. This is the condition of the mightiest people and the best-appointed armies, when forsaken of God. There is no strength nor courage, nor anything of worth in any of the creatures, but as it is derived from God: it is dependant on him in the continuance and use of it. Why are thy valiant men swept away? They stood not, because the Lord did drive them. Jer. xlii. 15. We have seen this, and the turn of it on both sides, how men become a prey to any party, when the terror from God is upon them.

Therefore, learn we to fear him, to beware of all ways wherein we may justly apprehend him to be against us. Cleave to him and to his truth, when it is lowest, and when no human means of help appear, then think you hear him saying to you, Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord.

* Vacat temperantia. Sed non habebunt requiem, qui bestiam adorant.—SENECA.

Ver. 18. Therefore will the Lord wait.] There is no language of men nor of angels fit to express the graciousness of God's punishments and the threatenings of them; as if they were violently drawn and forced from him, but mercy, and the sweet promises thereof, naturally flowing from him. Thus here, he is forced to give up his people to their own counsels, because they will not follow his advices. He entreats them to be quiet, and let him do for them; but seeing they will not sit still, and be safe at his direction, they must run their own course, and fall in it. But it can not pass so, they must not be quite given over; the Lord hath an interest in them which he will not lose. They must indeed for a time eat the fruit of their own ways, and that is not a season to show them favor; but the Lord will wait a better hope. He is resolved to show them mercy, and will find his own time for it: Therefore will HE wait, that he may be gracious.

And this is he moved to, according to his gracious nature, by the greatness of their distress and desolation. Though procured by themselves, by their great, their inflexible stubbornness, yet he pities to see them so left as a beacon on the top of a mountain, and as an ensign on a hill. And therefore will the Lord wait. Thus we have the proper arguments of free mercy, which otherwise, to our narrow thoughts, may seem strange and somewhat inconsequent. Such a therefore as this, so unexpectedly changing the strain, doth genuinely and sweetly follow upon the premises, when free love is the medium: that intervening in the midst, makes the sweet turn. Your iniquities prevail to bring you low, and lengthen out your calamities; therefore, I will let that have its course, and will stay till my fit time come to do you good. Meanwhile I will lie hid, and be as sitting still; but when that time comes, I will get up and show myself. He will be exalted, that he may have mercy on you; for the Lord is a God of judgment. He is wise, and just, and good, and knows his measures of afflicting his people, his times and ways of delivering them, and of bringing destruction on his enemies, and will not slip this season; and it being so, this certainly follows, that they are blessed that wait on him.

Observe, 1. The strong inclination of God to show mercy. He would willingly have his people to find nothing but ease; he delights in the prosperity of his servants, would have them constantly have a sweet, peaceful, yea, cheerful life, by constant walking in his ways; but they are often the enemies of their own peace, grieve his Spirit, and turn him to be their own enemy. But he can not persist in that to his own; he longs to be at his way of mercy and loving kindness again. He retains not his anger for ever, because mercy pleases him. He inflicts judgment for sin, but what he delights in is mercy. Therefore, says the prophet, Lam. iii. 32, 33, Though he cause grief, yet he will have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies: For he doth not willingly afflict the children of men. Though he doth grieve them, yet, not willingly; they themselves procure and draw on that, by grieving his Spirit. But he willingly shows mercy, for that abounds: there is such multitude and plenty of it, that, as to full breasts, it is a pleasure to him to let it forth. The two words, gracious and merciful, which stand first in the name of God, Exodus xxxiv. 6, the one signifies free grace, the other, tender bowels of mercy. This is no emboldment to continue in sin, yea, it is of all things the most fit encouragement and inducement to a sinner to return from sin; and so it is used and urged throughout the Scriptures. See Isaiah xxxi. 5, 6, and lv. 7; Jer. iii. 12. In public calamities, where a people are charging the cause thereof upon themselves, searching their hearts and their ways, and turning unto God, humbly acknowledging their iniquity, and entreating pardon, oh! this is the thing he would not despise. Yea, it is what he looks and longs for, and upon that would readily forget all past disloyalties. See Jer. iii. 1. Yea, at the sound of their repentings, his bowels would resound with compassion by a secret sympathy and harmony, as one string, well tuned to another, strins when it is touched. Thus, Jer. xxxi. 18-20.

This a sinner shall find in his returning unto God, more than we can express or promise in his name. Oh, he waits to be gracious, meets thee graciously. Yea, he hath first touched thy heart secretly, hath first drawn it toward himself, before it stirred, or had a thought that way. Now no more upbraidings or remembrance of all thy wanderings: an act of perfect oblivion is past. For I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more. Jer. xxxi. 34. Is thy heart any little softened, and relents it toward him? Then, the controversy is ended, and his thoughts are now, how to comfort thee. Art thou busy inditing accusations against thyself? Then makes he it his part to wipe away and blot out. Comest thou home with a heart full of holy shame and grief, and thy mouth full of humble confessions of thy disobedience? Then know, it is thy tender-hearted Father meets thee, most ready to forgive thee, yea, to interrupt thy confessions in the middle with embraces and kisses of love.

But, alas! we preclude ourselves from the sweet experiences of these tender mercies, by the hardness of our hearts, and by the lightness and vanity of them. Oh that indignity, our God still waiting to be gracious, to heap up more of his love to us, but we are busied in other things, and not at leisure to wait on him! Oh! what are they, these things that take us up? Great matters? Alas! sorry trifles, all day long. And when we are at leisure, yet we are not at leisure; for then we must take our ease, must go to sleep, and so still he is put off and forced to retire, after he has stayed till his head be filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night. Cant. v. 2.

Observation 2. The Lord doth most exactly and wisely measure both the degree and the time of his people's afflictions. Though they have brought them upon themselves, and justly he might leave them so, this he will not do: he is a God of judgment. This is largely and sweetly expressed, in a resemblance of husbandry, Isa. xxviii. 24—29. He knows how much and how long outward or inward trouble is fit for every one, and where the less will serve, will not use the more. He knows what need some spirits have to be bruised and broken beyond others, either under disgrace or poverty, or the proper pressures of the spirit within, apprehensions of wrath, or withdrawals, at least, of comforts; and hath set his days for deliverance of his church, and of every believer under affliction. So, the style of the prophet, In that day, speaking as of a certain prefixed day, and that, no power or wit of man can disappoint. And it is so chosen, as it shall be evident to be the fittest, that it could not so well either have been sooner or later; all things concurring to make it most seasonable to his people, and honorable to his own name. Hab. ii. 3: The vision is for the appointed time: though it tarry, wait for it; it shall come, and shall not tarry. That is strange, Though it tarry, it shall not tarry. But in the original, there are two words, the one importing an undue slowness or constrained retardment: that can not be so, it shall not tarry, though it tarry; that is, though it stay itself, and come not till the appointed time: so the other word signifies. Thus, Psalm cii. 13: Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion; for the set time is come. Now, for this the Lord waits. It is not through want of love, but from abundance of wisdom, that he delivers not sooner. He hath chosen the fittest time, in his all-discerning wisdom; yet, there is in this love, an earnest kind of longing that the time were come. Thus here, he waits to be gracious, and he will be exalted, will cheerfully and gladly raise up himself, and appear to show mercy to his people, and bring his enemies low; coming forth, as it were, to judgment, and sitting down on his throne. In which posture he was not seen while they prevailed and triumphed, and his church were under their oppression; but when the time of their restoring and consolation comes, he then is to sit on his throne, and so is exalted to show them mercy. Hence the psalmist so often desires that the Lord would arise, and utters predictions, assuring that he will arise, and exciting his people to rejoice in that. Psalm ix. 7, 8, and Psalms xcvi., xcvii., and xcviii.

Thus, the church, in her saddest condition, ought hopefully to remember and rest on it, that the day is determined, and can not fail. Our salvation is in God. He laughs at his enemies, when they are at the top of prosperity and pride; sees that their day is coming. Now, certainly the firm persuasion of this would much stay our minds; but either we do not believe, or we do not improve and use these truths, and draw that comfort from them which abounds in them. Our God loses no time: he is waiting till his appointed time. And if he wait, it becomes us so to do. That is our duty here, to wait on him. This faith does, and so, makes not haste; neither goes out to any undue means, nor frets impatiently within at the deferring of deliverance, but quietly rests on God, and waits for him. This, as it is our duty, is also our happiness; and thus it is here expressed. Upon consideration that the Lord waits to be gracious, and will be exalted to show mercy, the prophet is carried to this acclamation, in respect to the happiness of believers, O! blessed are they that wait for him! Their thoughts fall in and meet with his; for he is waiting for the same day they wait for, and if he be not disappointed, they shall not. We are naturally irregular in our affections and notions, and the only right ordering of them is, by reducing them to conformity with the ways and thoughts of God, which keep an unalterable, fixed course, as the heavens; the way, I say, to rectify our thoughts is, to set them by his, as clocks and watches, which so readily go wrong, too slow or to fast, are ordered by the sun, which keeps its course. Oh! that we were more careful to set and keep our hearts in attendance on God, winding them up in meditation upon him, and conforming them in their motions, and desires to his disposal in all; for all that concerns us, and for the times of all, being quiet, yea, glad in this, which the psalmist makes his joy: My times are in thy hand, O Lord. Psalm xxxi. 15. And surely that is the best. Were I to choose, they should be in no other hands, neither mine own, nor any others. Alas! what silly, poor creatures are we! How little do we know what is fit for us in any kind, and still less what time is fit for any mercy to be bestowed upon us! When he withholds mercies or comforts for a season, it is but till the due season; it is but to ripen them for us, which we in childish haste would pluck green, when they would be neither so sweet nor so wholesome. Therefore it is our wisdom and our peace, to resign all things into his hands, to have no will nor desires, but only this, that we may still wait for him. All shall be well enough, if we but get rid of the vain hopes and expectations of this world. None who indulge them are so well but they are still waiting for somewhat further. Now, amid all that, our soul may say with David, and speak it to God as known to him, that it is so indeed: And now, Lord, what wait I for? My hope is in thee. My expectation of waiting (the same word that is here) is all placed upon thee. Is it so, brethren? Are our hearts gathered in from other things, to this attendance, while the most about us are gaping for the wind? Have we laid all up in God, to desire and wait for him, and pretend to nothing beside him?

I would do so, may a soul think, but can I hope that he will look on me, and bestow himself on such a one as I am? To that I say nothing but, look on his word. If thou thinkest that warrant good enough, here it is for thee, that they are certainly blessed that wait for him. This is assurance enough. Never was any one who waited for him, miserable with disappointment. Whosoever thou art that dost indeed desire him, and desirest to wait for him, surely thou resolvest to do it in his ways, wherein he is to be found, and wilt not willingly depart from these; that were foolishly to disappoint thyself, and not to be true to thine own end. Therefore look to that; do not keep company with any sin. It may surprise thee sometimes as an enemy, but let it not lodge with thee as a friend.

And mind this other thing, prescribe nothing to God. If thou hast begun to wait, faint not, give not up, wait on still. It were good reason, were it but upon little hope at length to find him: but since it is upon the unfailling assurance, that in the end thou shalt obtain, what folly were it, to lose all for want of waiting a little longer! See Psalm xl. 1. In waiting I waited—waited, and better waited—but all was overpaid: He did hear me. So Psalm cxxx., I wait and wait until the morning. These two joined are all, and may well go together, earnest desire and patient attendance.

These words, as others of the prophet, which we call consolations, I conceive, look beyond the deliverances from outward troubles, to the great promise of the Messiah. Sure I am the strain of something following is too high for that, and can not but have an aspect to the days of the gospel, as that ver. 26. Now the Lord had set his time, that fulness of time for the coming of the blessed Son in the flesh; and till that time came, the the Lord was waiting to be gracious, to open up his treasures more fully than ever before; which when he did, then was he exalted to show mercy, and exalted in showing mercy. Christ himself was lifted up on the cross, there to show that rich mercy that is for ever to be admired: lifted up to show his bowels as the word is here. Did he not let us see into his heart, there to read that love that can no otherwise be uttered? And in that, the Lord was most eminently manifested a God of judgment, wisdom, and justice, and mercy, all shining brightest in that contrivance. There he was lifted up, and then, after that, lifted up into glory, who is the Desire of the nations, the salvation and joy of all ages, both before and after. Before he came, they were from one age to another waiting; and more particularly at the time of his coming, God stirred up the expectation of believers to welcome him, being so near. See Luke ii. 25, 38. And in all times, before and after that, he is the happiness of souls, and they only are blessed that wait for him. Whether you do, or do not, believe it now, the day is coming when all the world shall know it to be so.

SERMON XXVI.

CONFESSION AND PRAYER OF FAITH.

JEREMIAH xiv. 7—9.

O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, do thou it for thy name's sake: for our backslidings are many, we have sinned against thee.

O the hope of Israel, the Savior thereof in time of trouble, why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land and as a way-faring man, that turneth aside to tarry for a night?

Why shouldst thou be as a man astonished, as a mighty man that can not save? yet thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us, and we are called by thy name; leave us not.

If we look backward and forward in this chapter, we find the three great executioners of God's anger on the world foretold, as having received commission against this people.

In all troubles, felt or feared, this is still the great resource of them who are acquainted with it, and can use it, Prayer. And their labor in it is not altogether lost, even where judgment is determined and unalterable, as here it was; for some mitigations of time and measure are desirable, and by prayer attainable; and whatsoever there is of that kind, the prayers that have been made long before, have had a concurrence and influence in it. And always, at the least, prayer carries the personal good of them that present it: if it return unto their bosom, as David speaks, without effect for others, it returns not thither empty, it brings peace and safety thither with it; they save their own souls. The mourners, if they turn not away the destroyers' weapons from the city, yet, they procure one sent along with them, with an ink horn for their own marking and sparing, Ezek. ix. 3. And were there nothing in this, nor any following effect, prayer hath within itself its own reward. Did we know it, we should think so. The very dignity and delight of so near access to God, to speak with him so freely, this in itself is the most blessed and honorable privilege that the creature is capable of; it is a pledge of heaven, something of it beforehand, a standing in pre-tension to the life of angels: Angelorum candidati, as Tertullian speaks; it is to be but a little lover, as the word is, Psalm viii. 5. Many practise a form; few know the vital sweetness of it.

Oh, my brethren, be aspiring to more heav-enliness, and a higher bent of the soul in it than as yet you know, and use it more that way; use it for yourselves and others, this whole land, these kingdoms, the church of God through the whole earth. No times that we have seen, wherein it hath been more needful, and none wherein less plentiful. There is no one that stirs up himself to lay hold on God. Some, no doubt, there are in these times; yet, so few, so general a decay and negligence in the zeal and frequency of prayer, that, to speak of, there is none. And is it not so now with us? Many discourse one to another, and yet, most to little or no purpose: but little is spoken where nothing would be lost, in humble supplication to God. And this is the saddest sign of that long lasting trouble. Oh! pity the kingdom and yourselves, and learn to pray.

This prayer of the prophet is made up of the two usual ingredients, confession and petition.

O Lord, Jehovah.] A chief point of prayer is, the presenting of the soul before God, remembering to whom we speak, that is to the great king, the holy God; which this expresses, where it is indeed, when we say, O Lord, or should remind us of, when we forget it, to have such apprehensions as we can reach of his glorious majesty. Consider, if we find our hearts filled with him when we are before him. Oh! how seldom think we that he is God, even while we speak to him, and how quickly do we forget it, and let slip that thought! When we have anything of it, how soon are we out of it, and multiplying vain words! For such are all those we utter to him without this. Oh! pray to be taught this point of prayer, and watch over your hearts in prayer, to set them thus when you enter to Him, and to call them in when they wander, and pluck them up when they slumber, to think where they are, and what they are doing.

Our iniquities testify against us.] Confession fitly begins. All the difference between God and us lies in this, our iniquities. Now humble confession is one great article of pacification; it is a thing judgment certainly aims at, a thing mercy is mainly moved with. See Hos. v. 15. Psalm xxxii. 5. Jeremiah xxxi. 18.

When we are to encounter any enemy or difficulty, it is sin weakens us. Now, confession weakens it, takes away the power of accusations, anticipates the great accuser, leaves him nothing to say, takes off the stroke of sins testifying against us, says, you need not, I confess all, and more than you can say.

For this, a right knowledge of God's law is requisite, and then a diligent use of it; laying it to our way, as a straight rule to show our unevenness, which, without it, we discern not. Set that glass before you, but without beg light from Heaven to see by; otherwise our applications to this work of searching our hearts, and comparing them with the law, is but poring in the dark, where nothing is to be seen of our spots though we set the glass before us, and open the leaves of it. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord; Prov. xx. 27; but it is so when he lights it, and directs a man by it into himself, to see the secret corners and pollutions that lie hid within him. Sin discovered by this light, appears in its native vileness, and that makes lively resentments and confessions.

Their confession of sin is varied here in three several expressions, and no one of them is empty; the adding one to another, testifying a deep sense, and each of them having much under it, when issuing from an awakened, sensible mind.

Our iniquities testify against us.] This expresses a deep and clear conviction. Our iniquities are undeniable; they stand up and give in witness against us, and we can not except against them, nor deny the charge they lay.

And thus it shall be with all transgressors in their day, and with each of us. It is not far off, our particular day, it is coming, when the most ignorant and impudent shall be forced to know and the most obstinate and impudent shall be forced to acknowledge their iniquities. Such as now will not be warned and convinced, who hide their sin as men, like Adam, who show themselves in that his children, they (as he was) shall be called for, and forced to come out of the thickets, and convicted of their disobedience. This men find sometimes in a day of distress, when some outward or inward pressure seizes on them, lays on the arrest, and brings them to stand and hear what these witnesses have to say against them. However, there is a day coming for this at the long run, a day of particular judgment for each one, and that great solemn day for altogether: the light of that fiery day shall let them see to read the bill they would not look on sooner. If men would consider this, when sin is speaking them fair and enticing them, in how different a style it will afterward speak, it would spoil the charm of it. As Solomon speaks of the strange woman, that her end is bitter as wormwood (Prov. v. 4), so are all the ways of sin. Those same sins which look so pleasing and friendly, and entreat thee, shall appear again in another tune, and with other language, to witness against thee, and cry for vengeance. Men think sin vanishes as it is acted, and forget it as if they were to hear no more of it, and know not that it shall be forthcoming again, even thoughts, words, and actions. All is kept for a court-day, iniquities sealed up in a bag, as Job speaks, as writs to be produced in the process against thee. Oh, how little know you what the amazement is of a man's sins surrounding him and testifying against him, that he is a rebel against God, and to be condemned! And no scarcity, such multitudes of them, one company succeeding another, as that word, Job x. 17: Thou renewest thy witnesses against me; not by twos or threes, but by thousands, armies of them. This is more affrightful than to be encompassed with drawn swords, or to see a whole army march up upon a man, it were nothing to these bands mustered up. So Psalm l. 21: I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes.

There is no way to escape but by prevention, taking a day beforehand to judge thyself, and call these witnesses, and hear them, and pass sentence. This would save the labor. God is desirous to have the matter thus anticipated, and turns it over to thee, to judge thyself, that he may not judge. Why defer we? It is not worth the while and the pains? And then for that day, when it would seem so terrible to have these witnesses stand up, thy safety is, having judged and condemned thyself, to take sanctuary in Christ, and make him thy advocate to answer all for thee. He can and will do it to the full; yea, he hath already answered all that thy sins, were they many more, can say. Oh, happy the man that takes this course! Sin not upon this account: none surely will do that. These things I write unto you, saith the apostle, that ye sin not; but then, if any man not so minded, do sin, here is that comfort, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. 1 John ii. 1.

Our backslidings are many. This is the double die of his people's sins; they are not simple transgressions, but treacheries, revolts, breaches of promises, of covenant and vow, turnings back, goings out from God, adultery, prostituting their hearts to idols, to base lusts; a heart professed to be married to its Maker, running a gadding after strange vanities. And who of us hath not this sadly to say against himself?—How often have I vowed myself thine, and with some kind of hopes and purpose to have been true to it; but how soon hath all vanished! Oh! the unspeakable unfaithfulness, not only of common formal professors, but of real believers! And these provoke God highly, go most to his heart, to be slighted by his own, to whom he hath so particularly shown himself and imparted of his love.

And we have sinned against thee.] This that comes last seems to sound least; but I take it as meaning most: as if they would have offered at particular confession, and then seeing such a huge multitude, and no end, were forced to retire, and shut up all in this general word. We might and would speak of many things, but they are too many, we are overwhelmed. What shall we say? We have sinned against thee. Thus Job, I have sinned against thee; what shall I do unto thee? As in David's confession, Psalm li. 4: Against thee, thee only have I sinned; THEE, the great, the holy God, our God. This were our business, instead of much discourse and debate of things, to fall down and confess unto God; to begin at ourselves, our own breaches and backslidings, and then to add the public national guiltiness. Oh! we are a sinful people, and few lay it to heart. All ranks are highly guilty; and where are they who retire and mourn for their abominations? Those continued and multiplied, are the continuers and multipliers of our plagues, sword, and pestilence, and threatenings of famine. If you have a mind to do anything for the land, and for yourselves, your families and your little ones, oh! apply to this work, to confess and bewail our iniquities. It may be, yea, I dare say, it shall be, the Lord will return and have mercy on us.

O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us.] In all our approaches unto God, it is a prime thing to take him up according to his name. This is the very ground of access and confidence of sinners, and there is no coming near him without it. We have heard it, that he is the Lord, merciful and gracious, &c. Not so much as confessions can be made without this, much less petitions presented. Instead of coming to fall down before him, to acknowledge sin, the soul will run quite away, and, though that were in vain, would seek to hide itself, that it might not at all appear. But apprehending his goodness and readiness to forgive, this draws the heart to him, and being drawn in, this makes it melt before him. In this some Christians mistake much, when they hold off from the apprehensions of God's graciousness, to the end that they may be the more humble and deeply affected with their sins. No, no: this is that which warms, and softens, and makes the soul pliable, fit to receive any form from his hand. Therefore the people of God, and the prophets in their name, still lay hold on that, and interweave it both with their confessions and their petitions, as the main ground of their confidence, in presenting both.

The petition is in these two words, which begin and close—Do for us—Leave us not. The rest is argument, backing and pressing the petition with familiar and pathetic expostulations; and in them, the whole strength of the argument lies in a mutual interest, that they are his people, and he is their God. But take the words as they lie.

Do thou for thy name's sake.] It is not expressed what or how, and it is best so: that is referred to Him who knows what is best, which we do not. It is an act of grace in general that is sued for, but for the way and time, all is put in his hand. True it is, that sometimes prayer is, and must be, somewhat more particular upon particular warrant, or upon account of the common liberty that God gives his children, to present freely the particular thoughts and desires of their hearts to him. But it is good always to close thus, or that it be understood so when not expressed, that we resign that matter to him, to make his own choice of things, and use his own way. Only, we entreat his favor, and his owing of us and our condition, that he be for us, and do for us. And this is safe and sweet, to let him choose. We often perplex ourselves about that which lies not in our way, and is not our part to be busied in, what things shall be done. This he undertakes for, and will be careful of. Be not afraid. Psalm xxxvii. 5. Commit thy way, roll thy way upon the Lord, trust on the Lord, and he will do it; there is no more. In the Hebrew it is, Turn it over to him and be quiet, and let him alone, he will do well enough. Besides that there is all reason for it, if men knew what peace of spirit there is in this resignation, they would choose it before any way that can be thought on, and it never yet repented any one who chose it.

For thy name's sake.] This is the unfailling argument, which abides always the same, and hath always the same force. When nothing is to be said for ourselves but guiltiness, yet, this name we may plead by. Though our iniquities testify against us, though they return us harsh answers as from thee, speaking nothing but just refusals of our suits and rejecting of ourselves; yet, Lord, remember thy own name, and thence we look for a better answer. Do according to that, and for thy name's sake, in regard of strangers and enemies, who will reproach thy name in the ruin of thy people; and for thy name's sake, in regard of thy people's knowledge of it, and confidence in it, who, in all their straits do expect their help from thee. Thy promises made to them, and thy covenant made with them, in these is thy name, and they do cast themselves, and rely on it. Now see whether it may be for thy glory to cast them off. Whatsoever we are, look to thine own interest, and do for that; Do, for thy name's sake.

In the next clause, and more particularly, a part of his name is expressed, The hope of Israel. That is a piece of his royal style, by which he is known in the world. And in this appeareth the wonderful condescension and bounty of God to his creatures, to choose a number of persons, that he will pass his word to engage himself to be theirs; not only to forgive us who are his debtors by our sins, but to become himself a debtor to us by his promises. And he loves to be challenged on them, and pressed with them. It is a maxim of court-flattery, that mean persons ought not to urge the king upon his word; but this greatest King takes nothing better from the meanest of his subjects. Lord, thou hast undertaken the protection of us thy people, and now it lies upon thee, in point of honor and truth, to save us.

The hope of Israel.] All people, and every man, have something they rely on and make their hope; and they often choose the most broken, rotten hopes, which fail while they lean upon them, and not only fail, but hurt them, as Egypt proved to Israel. Therefore it proved as a broken reed, which not only flew in pieces in their hand, but the splinter ran up into their hand and hurt them. How often have we found it thus, been disappointed, yea, wounded by our vain hopes, pierced through with many sorrows, as the apostle speaks of those who love and trust in riches! Therefore Job disclaims this, that he never made gold his god: If I made gold my hope. Ch. xxxi. 24. There is a word of one of his friends speaking, ch. xxii. 25, rendered in our translation, The Almighty shall be thy defence: the word is in the original, The Almighty shall be thy gold. To those who account and make him so, he is both; for they are rich enough in him in the greatest scarcity, and safe enough in him in the greatest danger.

But you who would look to it, inquire each of you well, what is thy hope, what thy heart readiest turns to, and cleaves to, to comfort itself in any distress. Yea, in the times of the greatest ease, what are thy thoughts most biased and turned to, with oftenest and deepest delight? Canst thou say, It is to God?—that thy heart hath got that retreat, and is injured to that, is frequently there throughout the day, turns by, or passes over husband or wife, or children, or riches, or delights, or anything that would stand in thy way, and stays not till it be at him, and there rejoices in his love, sits down under his shadow content and happy, willing that others should rule and share the world as they please? that thou dost not envy them, yea, canst even pity them with all their gay hopes and great projects? yea, though thou do not find at all times, yea, possibly, scarcely at any time, that sensible presence of God, and shining of his clear-discovered love upon thee, yet that still he is thy hope, that thou art at a point with all the world, hast given up all to wait on him, and hope for him, and dost account thyself richer in thy simple hope, than the richest man on earth is in his possessions? Then art thou truly so, for the hope of God is heaven begun, and heaven complete is the possessing of him.

The Savior thereof.] Not exempting them from trouble, but saving in time of trouble. The reason for Israel's trouble lay in their own sin and security, and their abuse of ease and peace: but yet, they were not left to perish in trouble, but had a Savior in time of trouble, who was then most eyed and considered, and found to be so. In the furnace, both the faith of his people, and the truth of his promises, are tried.

The children of God are much beholden to their troubles for clear experiences of themselves and of God. And in this, indeed, is the virtue of faith, to apprehend God as a Savior in time of trouble, before he come forth and manifest himself to be so.

Wicked men have their times of trouble too, even here, but have no title to this Savior. Sua fortuna fabri—if themselves or friends, or means can help them, it is well;

but they can go no further. But the church, the Israel of God, when all help fails on all hands, has one great resource that can not fail, the strong God, her hope and Savior in time of trouble, or straitness. When there is no way out, he can cut out a way through the sea, can divide their enemies, or whatsoever is their greatest difficulty, and make a way through the middle of it. Well might Moses say, Happy art thou, O Israel! Who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help? Deut. xxxiii. 29. Men are under-saviors in outward deliverances; so it is said, Neh. ix. 27: Thou gavest them saviors; but he is THE SAVIOR. All others have their commissions from him. All their strength and all their success, is from him. Without him, no strength, nor wit, nor courage, avail: all falls to pieces when he withdraws his hand. Give us help from trouble, for, says the church, vain is the help of man. We have found this, if any people ever did, and have had real lectures to teach us to cease from man; for wherein is he to be accounted of? Yet, still we are ready to look to multitudes, or to the quality of men who undertake for us. But if we do so, yet shall that prove our shame and disappointment: and it shall never go well with us, till our dependance and confidence come clear off from all creatures, and we fix it entirely upon him who is our shield and our strength.

This should a soul in particular distress, especially in inward trouble, wherein the help lies most incommunicably and immediately in God's own hand, learn to trust him. And though thou art not clear in thy interest as a believer, yet, plead thy interest as a sinner, which thou art sure of. God in our flesh hath enlarged the nation of Israel; all that will but look to him, he is their Savior: Look unto me, and be saved, all the ends of the earth. Now, he hath styled himself the Savior of sinners; press him by that: Lord, I do look to thee, do for me, O Savior! Help, I am in trouble. So, in any particular temptation, either to sin, or to distrust because of sin, say, Now, Lord, here is an opportunity for thy power and thy grace to glorify itself. And though thou find thyself sinking, yet believe, and thou shalt not drown.

Why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land?] The main thing desired was, his constant abode with them. Some passing deliverances he had wrought; but that was not enough. He came as a stranger, to stay a night, refreshed them with a transient visit, and away again. Thus we may say, He hath still done for us. When we were in desperate straits, he came and helped; but then we were left to such counsels as bred us new troubles. He hath not so evidently yet taken up his residence, though he hath built him a house among us, we trust, with that intention, to dwell with us. This we are to sue and entreat for.

Why art thou as one astonished?] Why art thou looking on our miseries as an amazed stranger, as not concerned in our affairs or condition, and not caring what becomes of us; as a traveller, but passing through, and having no further interest or regard; or, as a mighty man that can not save, as Samson after his hair was cut, either as wearied or bound, or somewhat hindered, though strong enough.

Now, Lord, look not on. Own our sufferings, and bestir thyself. Make it appear that thou faintest not, neither art weary, nor that anything can stand before thee and be thy hinderance. Break through our sins, the greatest hinderance of all; let not these stop thy way, nor bind thy hands. For thou art in the midst of us: though we see thee not so in thy work as we desire, yet here we know thou art in thy special good-will and power, as thou art in our profession and homage done to thee as our king among us. That testifies thy presence. Thou canst not so hide thyself, but there are still some characters of thy presence. And we are called by thy name, thy people. If we perish, thy name being upon us, what becomes then of it? Therefore leave us not. Though thou strike us, yet stay with us, and we shall live in hope of favor and deliverance: if thou go not away, our cries and prayers, at least our miseries, will move thee.

These things make up our plea. We are a most unworthy people, yet, we are called by his name, are in covenant with him; so, his glory is interested. We must not let go this. And what advantage so great as to have our interest wrapped up in his? His glory and our safety are in one bottom, to sink and swim together; then, there is no hazard. Therefore keep close to his interest and his covenant, and beg his staying with us, and arising for us, and lay hold on him for this end. It is a pleasant violence; and were there many to use it toward him, our deliverance were not far off.

SERMON XXVII.

CALAMITIES CAUTIOUSLY INTERPRETED.

LUKE xiii. 1—9.

There were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices.

And Jesus answering, said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things?

I tell you, nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

Or, those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwell in Jerusalem?

I tell you, nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

He spake also this parable: A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard, and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none.

Then said he unto the dresser of the vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none; cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?
 And he answering, said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; And if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.

It is no easy or common thing, to give God's ways a right construction. For the most part we either let them pass unobserved, or unframe our observations, looking those principles and passions of our own, which give things another shape or color than what is truly theirs. This was here the case. This sad accident should have been observed by them who heard it, and might have been spoken of by them to very good purpose; but our Savior knew well what they meant by reporting the story, and what thoughts they had of it and of themselves, and by his answer, it would seem, all was not right with them.

The fact here related, we have not any further account of in sacred history, nor anything that we can clearly and certainly call it in any human writer. It is commonly conceived to have been done at Jerusalem, where Pilate abode, and that his power was exercised and done upon the followers of that Judas of Galilee spoken of, Acts v. 37, being such as denied it to be lawful to give obedience to the Roman empire, or to offer sacrifice for the interest and good of it. When they, it is likely, were coming together to offer at Jerusalem, and to maintain and to spread their opinion, Pilate comes upon them, and, while they were at the solemnity, makes a sacrifice of them to that authority they refused to sacrifice for: whether justly or nor, we can not determine; our Savior does not; but if it was just, surely it was very tragical and severe, suitable to that character Philo gives of his disposition who acted it. [Ἀπειλκτον.] The straining of justice, commonly breaks it: a little of the other side, is, of the two, doubtless, the safer extreme.

However, this stroke and all others, as they come from the Supreme Hand, are righteous. Whatsoever be the temper or intent of the lower actor, and whatsoever be the nature of the action, as from him, the sovereign hand of God is in them, and chief in them. Amos iii. 6: Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it? And yet all evils, as he doth them, are both good and well done. Actions, whether voluntary or casual, as these two here, yet do powerfully issue from the First Being and Worker, and as from him, are both unalterably certain and unquestionably just. Thus they who here report it seem to have judged of this passage, that it was a just punishment of sin. And our Savior contests not about that, but rather seems to agree to them so far, and draws that warning out of it: he only corrects the misconceit it seems they were in, in thrusting it too far off from themselves, and throwing it too heavy upon those who sacrificed.

Think ye that they were sinners? Though it were an error to think that all temporal evils are intended of God as punishments of some particular guiltiness, and so to be taken as infallibly concluding against either persons or causes as evil, yet certainly the hand of God, either upon ourselves or others, is wisely to be considered, and it will very often be found a punishment pointing to the sin. And it is certainly an argument of very great stiffness and pride of heart, not to observe and acknowledge it, and a sure presage either of utter ruin, or, at least, of a heavier stroke. Any one who is set against the Lord, and will not be humbled, whether by what he sees on others, or what he feels on himself, shall find he hath an overmatch to deal with, that will either bow him or break him. Isa. xxvi. 11: Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see; but they shall see and be ashamed for their envy at the people; yea, the fire of thine enemies shall devour them.

Think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt at Jerusalem? Our Savior goes not to search into the quarrel, and to condemn or justify either the one party or the other; that was not for his purpose. His aim was to rectify the mistake of those he spoke to, and to draw forth from their own relation what was most proper for their use. Much of our hearing and telling of news, hath little of this in it; and with most persons it doth not relish, to wind things that way. Some, even good persons, do accustom themselves, and take too much liberty, to an empty, fruitless way of entertainment in this kind. And if we make any remark, it commonly keeps abroad, comes not home to ourselves. Be it a judgment, be the persons great sinners in a sinful course, yet, they are not always the greatest of all because they suffer and others escape, as we readily think, and the Jews here concluded concerning these Galileans.

God is to be adored and revered, who useth his own freedom in this; he does injustice to none, yet chooses them on whom he will do exemplary justice, and whom he will let pass, and gives no account of this to any. Some less wicked have been ensamples to them who were much more wicked than they.

Do not flatter yourselves in the conceit of exception from some stroke which others in the same way with you have fallen under, or even from some course which others have run and smarted in, and bear yourselves big upon the name of God's people. But tremble before the Lord, and search your own hearts. And let us think, though we may not be guilty of such public scandalous evils as others fall into and are punished for, yet how full are we of secret malice, pride, and lusts, &c., and let us wonder at the patience of God to ourselves, while multitudes have been swept away round about us. Think you that they who have died by sword or pestilence of late, were greater sinners than we who are left behind? Oh, no! but except we repent, we shall all likewise perish. Enough of these arrows are still in God's arsenal, and though he use not these to us, yet remember, death, and judgment, and eternity, are before us, and they call for wise and speedy consideration and repentance.

Oh! you that go on in your transgressions after all that is come upon us, who were drunkards and swearers, and are so yet, what think you? Because the heat of public judgment is abated, is there no more fear? Have you made a covenant with hell and death, and gained quarter of them that they will not seize on you? Oh! that will never hold: they will not, they can not keep to you. And if you hold on your course when the day of visitation shall come, how much heavier shall it be by all this forbearance! You shall wish you had been cut off with the first. The day is at hand, when it shall be easier for them than for you. Only, the advantage is, that there is an exception yet sounding in your ears; Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

I beseech you, my brethren, enter into your own hearts, and be not always out of yourselves, and so out of your wits. Consider the Lord's ways and your own, and wonder at his goodness. Why am not I made an example to others, as well as so many have been made examples to me? Now let me fall down at his feet, and beg of him, that as he hath not made me an example of justice all this while, he may now make me an example of mercy and free grace to all that shall look on him.

Our Savior, to their reported instance adds another himself, which was, no doubt, late and recent with them, to the same purpose, and in the same strain: Think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwell in Jerusalem? I tell you, nay; but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Not just after the same particular manner, but the likeness is in perishing.—You shall as certainly perish as they are perished. And this, to many impenitent sinners, is verified in their being cut off, even by some temporal judgment, after long-abused forbearance, and often, very like those they have seen instances of, and would not be warned by. Thus, it was fulfilled to many of the Jews, in the death of many thousands of them, and the destruction of their city by the Romans, in which there was much likeness with the two explanatory judgments here mentioned. But the universal and far more dismal perishing of unrepenting sinners, is that death which lies unseen on the other side of that death we see and are so afraid to look on. Oh! saw we the other, this would appear nothing: it would be the only terrible of all terrors indeed. And how terrible soever, it is the unfailling attendant of impenitence. These God hath linked together, and no creature can sever them, continuance in sin and perishing, repentance and life. It is faith, indeed, that lays hold on our pardon and life in Christ, and by that we are justified and saved; yet, so as this is still true, so that the other nowise crosses it, that there is no life without repentance. And this wrongs not the gospel at all, to preach and profess repentance; yea, it is a prime point of preaching the gospel. And here we find the great preacher of the gospel, who is himself the great substance and subject of the gospel, this is his doctrine, Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. There is no right preaching of the gospel, but the doctrine of repentance must be in it: the drawing and turning of the soul to God, from whom it is gone out by sin, this the gospel aims at. And there is no right preaching of repentance, without the gospel. The law indeed discovers sin, but that is not enough to work repentance: for that, there must be a door of hope opened to a sinner, at which he may come in, hoping to be pardoned and accepted upon returning and submitting. This the gospel alone does. And whensoever the prophets preached repentance, there was somewhat that always expressed or imported the notion of the gospel, God declaring himself reconciled, ready to forgive and receive him.

Now, not to speak of the nature of repentance, which here were pertinent, I shall only desire you to seek to know the nature of it, by feeling the power of it within you.* Oh! happy they that do! Were the sweetness of it known, we might persuade most by that; but that cannot be known, till we be persuaded and brought to repentance,—the delight there is in those tears, the pleasure in crucifying sin, even the most pleasant sins. The soul, then in its right motion when turning toward God, finds itself moved sweetly; but it is thrown, and distorted, and disappointed in turning from him and following sinful lusts. But here, necessity is the argument, the highest necessity. If it may be necessary for you not to perish, then it is necessary for you to repent. Had any of you an ulcer, though painful to be lanced, yet, if told it must be, else you would die, that would make a man call for it and entreat it. Lord what is the madness of the minds of men! Do we believe that there is such a thing after all that is here, as perishing and being saved, eternal death and eternal life, and can we think on anything else, so as to forget these, or to be negligent and unresolved concerning them, and yet, eat and please the flesh, and seek to make other things sure, and leave these to their hazard? The God who made your hearts, persuade them! For who else can?

The parable that follows, teaches the same doctrine of repentance, and that upon the motive of patience and forbearance. He spake also this parable: A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard. Particulars should not be overstrained and squeezed for morality. The main is, God's dispensation, and his expectation in his orchard, the church.

* Malo sentire compunctionem quàm scire ejus definitionem. I would rather feel compunction, than know its definition. [Thomas à Kempis.]

Our Savior is much in this way of teaching. He calls in natural things to serve spiritual ends; and so all are fit to do, had we the faculty to exact it. A spiritual mind draws that which is symbolical with it, out of all. Such may fruitfully walk in gardens and orchards, and feed on the best, though they stir nothing. The great Lord is himself the planter of his vineyard; his own hand sets each tree. And the soil is fruitful, there is sap and moisture. This is to be understood of his visible church and ordinances; for the planting here signifies that. Christians are often compared to things living, growing and fruitful; as to the vine and fig-tree, Isa. v., &c. There is high engagement to be so, and real Christians are truly so.

And he sought fruit thereon.] Good reason had he so to do, having so planted it. Those trees which are left wild in the barren wilderness, no fruit is to be expected on them; at least, no garden-fruit, such as grows in the garden of God. Some natures have some kind of fruit, and some sweeter than others, but they are but wild figs. God's delight is to come into his garden, and there eat his pleasant fruits. Cant. iv. 16. Natural men may, after their fashion, be temperate, and patient, and charitable; but to believe on God, and love him above themselves, and from such principles to do all they do, this is not to be expected.

Now, all that are planted in the church of God, are, in name, such trees as should have their sap in them, that is, faith and love, and bear answerable fruits: they are called trees of righteousness, and planting of the Lord, that he may be glorified. Isa. lxi. 3. He himself knows who are indeed such, and knows that the rest can bear no such fruit; yet, in regard of outward dispensations and their own profession, he speaks after the manner of men; he comes and seeks fruit. Men who think they may live in the face of the church, and make use of her ordinances, and yet be as excusably barren of all the fruits of holiness, as if they grew upon a common heath, it is strange they should not conceive their own folly, and know that God reckons otherwise, and according to the ground that he hath set them in, and the manuring he bestows on them, looks for some suitable fruit.

But the most are thus. They consider not what they are; think it a kind of impertinent importunity, to press them to holiness, to meekness, to bearing wrongs, to heavenly-mindedness, to spiritual activity, and usefulness to others. Why, it is strange. What think ye, my brethren, are we Christians, or are we not? We have a name that we are active, and are dead. Congregations are filled with such; and when the Lord comes and seeks fruit, in the greatest part he finds none. If lies, oaths, and cursings, were the fruits, there are enough of these; But zeal for God, love to our brethren, self-denial, humility, if these be they, alas! where are they? So much preaching, sabbaths, fasts, and covenants; and where is fruit, the fruits of the Spirit? Oh! there are empty leaves, and some promising greenness, but the most belie the hope they give. And we of this land, who are engaged so high, what could have been done more for us? Though lying far north, yet have we much of the gospel sunshine, and are bound by our own promise, and covenant, and solemn oath to God, to be more fruitful. Yet this is still broke. Who that had seen our first meltings into tears, or fair buds of stirring zeal, could have imagined we should have been so barren?

Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard.] Now the conference with the vine-dresser about it, though that is much for the fulness of the parable, yet may imply God's imparting of his thoughts concerning his church to his faithful ministers. Such are included under that name here. For he blames not the vine-dresser as negligent, but complains of the barrenness of the tree. In the cutting down, there may be some pointing at church censure, but I conceive, it is rather to express God's purpose concerning the barren tree, than to give order or command about it. Doubtless, the Lord would have his vine-dressers sensible of the fruitlessness of his trees, though it be not by any notable neglect on their part.

These three years.] This expresses the great patience of God, that spares so long, and speaks not of cutting down at the very first. Thus, of long time hath he waited on many of us, many more years than to the strict number here named; on how many of us a great part of our lifetime! Whence is it that we are not afraid of this word here sounding, as it were, in our ears? Cut it down: why troubles it the ground? As if he should say, It takes up room, and does no good, yea, hinders and prejudices others, as all ungodly, fruitless persons in the church of God do.

The vine-dresser entreats and obtains one year more. This, the faithful laborers of God will not fail to do: to preaching to his people, they will join much prayer for them, that they may be made fruitful, and meantime, be spared and not perish in their unfruitfulness. They will double their endeavors in the sense of that danger; to all other pains will add this, the watering of them with tears. God is gracious, and easy to be entreated, and forbears yet, and waits. Oh! it is not too late. Any of you that at length are stirred up to any real desires of fruitfulness to him, I dare give you warrant to be confident, not only of his forbearing upon such a desire, but of his favorable acceptance of it as a good sign, yea, as already a beginning of fruit. Indeed, in case of people's remaining barren after all, the end will be to be cut down; and to every fruitless and godless person among you, it is not long to that day; it will be upon you before you are aware. As John preached, The axe is laid unto the root of the trees; therefore, every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire. Matt. iii. 10. God is taking his axe, as it were, and fetching his stroke at you, and you know not how soon it may light, and you be cut down, and cut off from all hopes for ever, never to see a day of grace more, nor hear a sermon more—cut down and cast into the fire to burn, and that never to end. Oh, for some soul to be rescued, were it even now! Oh! To-day, to-day, if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

Real Christians, though not altogether barren—that is impossible, yet, are not so plentifully fruitful; there is little of the increase of God, such as he may be invited to his garden for, such as the vine-dressers may rejoice in, yea, the Master himself. The Lord maketh a kind of boast of us, as men will do of trees in their gardens, that they have much fruit, though possibly a meaner appearance and show than most of the rest. Oh, what a joy and glory were it to our God, to have unobserved, obscure Christians abounding in sweet spiritual fruits, laden with fruit, and hanging down the head, stooping the lower, still the more humble for it; referring all to himself, living to him, doing all for him! But alas! we are empty vines, bringing forth fruit to ourselves, serving our own wills and humors, and barren to him. But for this end are we planted in the house of God, and ingrafted into the Son of God, that blessed, living Root, to be fruitful to his praise. It is his credit; Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples, John xv. 8.

Now, for this are requisite, 1st, Much prayer. For though here he speaks as an ordinary master, yet it is his secret influence which does all. Hos. xiv. 8: From me is thy fruit found, and prayer draws down that. 2dly, Much faith in Christ, living to him, and drawing sap from him. Such as do all in his strength, and are much in application and attraction, shall be found the most abundant in all choice and sweet fruits; they who abide in him, that is, who, in the very actings of faith, any more in him than many others who yet are in him. But, alas! this is a thing of which men speak much, and know little.

SERMON XXVIII.

(Preached before the Lord Commissioner and the Parliament, 14th November, 1669.)

PRESENT DUTY.

JOHN XXI. 22.

—What is that to thee? Follow thou me.

OF all that ever lived on earth, the most blessed was this handful and small company our Lord chose for his constant attendants, to see his divine miracles, enjoy his sweetest company, and to hear his divine doctrine. What a holy flame of love must have burned in their hearts, who were always so near the Sun of Righteousness! It was indeed a sad hour, wherein that was eclipsed, and the Lord of life lay dead in the grave. And what a deluge of joy was in their hearts when he rose again! And what a transport was it when they saw him ascend, and a shining cloud kissing his feet, and parting him from them! In the interval, as he had risen himself, so, he is raising them from their unbelief. St. Peter, not content with a bare forsaking of his Lord, had also denied him. But he falls not a quarrelling, but speaks of love to him, and blows up these sparks of love with this threefold question, Lovest thou me? St. Peter answers fervently, but most modestly, whereupon his Lord gives him a service suitable to his love, Feed my sheep; for which none are qualified but they that love him. But when he grows bold to ask a question, he gets a grave check, and a holy command, What is that to thee? Follow thou me. This was a transient stumbling in one who, but lately recovered of a great disease, did not walk firmly. But it is the common track of most, to wear out their days with impertinent inquiries. There is a natural desire in men to know the things of others, and to neglect their own, and to be more concerned about things to come, than about things present. And this is the great subject of conversation. Even the weakest minds must descant upon all things; as if the weakest capacities could judge of the greatest matters, by a strange levelling of understandings, more absurd and irrational than that of fortunes! Most men are beside themselves, never at home, but always roving. It is true, a man may live in solitude to little purpose, as Domitian catching flies in his closet. Many noisome thoughts break in upon one when alone; so that when one converseth with himself, it had need be said, Vide ut sit cum bono viro. A man alone shall be in worse company than are in all the world, if he bring not into him better company than himself or all the world, which is, the fellowship of God and the Holy Spirit. Yet, the matters of the church seem to concern all, and so indeed they do: but every sober man must say, all truths are not alike clear, alike necessary, nor of alike concernment to every one. Christians should keep within their line. Whether it be the will of our great Master, that the order that hath been so long in the church continue in it, or not, What is that to thee? It is certainly a great error, to let our zeal run out from the excellent things of religion, to matters which have little or no connexion with them. A man, though he err, if he do it calmly and meekly, may be a better man than he who is stormy and furiously orthodox. Our business is to follow Jesus, and trace his life upon earth, and to wait his return in the clouds. Had I a strong voice, as it is the weakest alive, yea, could I lift it up as a trumpet, I would sound a retreat from our unnatural contentions and irreligious strivings for religion. Oh! what are the things we fight for, compared to the great things of God? There must be a great abatement of the inwards of religion, when it runs wholly to a scurf. God forbid any should think, that except all be according to our mind, we must break the bond of peace. If we have no kindness to our brethren, yet, let us have pity on our mother, and not tear her bowels. And, indeed, next to the grave and the silent shades of death, a cottage in some wilderness is to be wished for, to mourn for the pride and passion of mankind. How do the profane wretches take advantage from our breaches! But if there be such here, because of the weakness, folly, and passions of some men, is it folly to follow Jesus? Are some ridiculous, and for that, will you turn religion into ridicule? If you do, it will at least turn to a Sardonic laughter. Because we contend for a little, is the whole an invention? Will the pillars be brangled, because of the swarms of flies that are about them?

There is an Eternal Mind that made all things, that stretched out the heavens, and formed the spirit of man within him. Let us tremble before him, and love the Lord Jesus. Our souls have indelible characters of their own excellency in them, and deep apprehensions of another state, wherein we shall receive according to what we have done upon earth. Was not Jesus, the Son of God, declared to be such by his resurrection from the dead? Hath there not been received and transmitted to us, through all ages, many martyrs following him through racks and fires, and their own blood, to his glory? And shall we throw off all these? Better be the poorest, weakest, and most distempered person upon earth, with the true fear of God, than the greatest wit and highest mind in the world, if profane, or, though not such, if void of any just or deep sense of the fear of God. For a living dog is better than a dead lion. Some religious persons are perhaps weak persons, yet, in all ages, there have been greater nobles and more generous souls truly religious, than ever were in the whole tribe of atheists and libertines.

Let us, therefore, follow the holy Jesus. Our own concerns concern us not, compared to this. What is that to thee? may be said of all things beside this. All the world is one great impertinency to him who contemplates God and his Son Jesus. Great things, coaches, furniture, or houses, concern the outward pomp or state of the world, but not the necessities of life; neither can they give ease to him that is pinched with any one trouble. He that hath twenty houses, lies but in one at once; he that hath twenty dishes on his table, hath but one belly to fill. So it is, ad supervacua sudatur. All are uncertain; sudden storms fall on, and riches fly away as a bird to heaven, and leave those who look after them, sinking to hell in sorrow.

A Christian is solicitous about nothing. If he be raised higher, it is that he desires not: if he fall down again, he is where he was. A well-fixed mind, though the world should crack about him, shall be in quiet. But when we come to be stretched on our deathbed, things will have another visage. It will pull the rich from his treasure, strip the great of his robes and glory, and snatch the amorous gallant from his fair, beloved mistress, and from all we either have or grasp at. Only sin will stick fast and follow us. Those black troops will clap fatal arrests on us, and deliver us over to the jailer. Are these contrivances, or the dark dreams of melancholy? All the sublimities of holiness may be arrived at, by the deep and profound belief of these things. Let us, therefore, ask, "Have we walked thus, and dressed our souls by this pattern?"

But this hath a nearer aspect to pastors, who should be copies of the fair original, and second patterns who follow nearer Christ; they should be imitating him in humility, meekness, and contempt of the world, and particularly in affection to souls, feeding the flock of God. Should we spare labor, when he spared not his own blood? How precious must the sheep be, who were bought at so high a rate as the blood of God! Oh, for more of this Divine and evangelic heat, instead of our distempered heat. This is the substance of religion, to imitate him whom we worship. Can there be a higher or nobler design in the world, than to be Godlike, and like Jesus Christ? He became like us, that we might be more like him. He took our nature upon him, that he might transfuse his into us. His life was a track of doing good, and suffering ill. He spent the days in preaching and healing, and often the nights in prayers. He was holy, harmless, and undefiled, and separate from sinners. How, then, can heirs of wrath follow the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world? Humility, meekness, and charity, were the darling virtues of Christ. He came to expiate and to extirpate our pride; and when that Majesty did so humble himself, shall a worm swell? No grace can be where the mind is so swelled with this airy humor. He was meek, and reviled not again; nor did he vent his anger, though he met with the greatest injuries. The rack of his cross could make him confess no anger against those who were draining him of his life and blood: all he did was to pray for them. Charity was so dear to him, that he recommended it as the characteristic by which all might know his disciples, if they loved one another. But alas! by this may all know we are not his disciples, because we hate one another. But that we may imitate him in his life, we must run the back-trade, and begin with his death, and must die without him. Love is a death. He that loves, is gone and lost in God, and can esteem or take pleasure in nothing beside him. When the bitter cup of the Father's wrath was presented to our Lord, one drop of this elixir of love and union to the Father's will, sweetened it so, that he drank it over without more complaining. This death of Jesus mystically acted in us, must strike down all things else, and he must become our all. Oh, that we would resolve to live to him that died, and to be only his, and humbly to follow the crucified Jesus! All else will be quickly gone. How soon will the shadows that now amuse us, and please us, fly away!

SERMON XXIX.

LOVE THE FULFILLING OF THE LAW.

MATTHEW xxii. 37, 39.

Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself.

The wisdom and meekness of our Savior is the more remarkable, and shines the brighter, by the malice of his adversaries; and their cavils and tempting questions occasion our benefit and instruction. Thus was it here.

We see, the words are the sum of the whole law, and they are taken out of the book of the law. They are called two commandments: the former is the sum of the first; the latter, of the second table. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. That is, says our Savior, the first and great commandment. Our first obligation is to God, and then, through him and for his sake, to men.

The second is like unto it.] Seems it not rather contrary than like to the former?—Whereas in the former, the whole stream of love is directed in one undivided current toward God, this other commandment seems to cut out a new channel for it, and to turn a great part of it to men: Thy neighbor as thyself. No, they are not contrary, if we take them right; yea, they do not only agree, but are inseparable. They do not divide our love, but they set it in its right course; first, wholly to God, as the sovereign good, and only for himself worthy to be loved; and then, back from him, it is, according to his own will, derived downward to our neighbor. For then only we love both ourselves and others aright, when we make our love to him the reason and the rule of both.* So, then, our love is not to be immediately divided between him and our neighbor, or any creature, but is first, all to be bestowed on him, and then he diffuses, by way of reflection, so much of it upon others as he thinks fit. Being all in his hands. It is at his disposal; and that which he disposes elsewhere (as here, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself), it is not taken off from him, but abiding still in him, as in its natural place (as light doth in the sun), flows forth from him by such an emanation as divides it not; as beams flow forth from the sun and enlighten the air, and yet, are not cut off from it.

So, then, the second is like unto the first, because it springs from it, and depends on it. It commands the same affection; love, in the former, placed on God, and in this, extended from him to our neighbor. And it is like unto it in this too; that, as the former is the sum of the first table, and so, the first and great commandment, so this is the sum of the second table, and therefore next unto it in greatness and importance.

All the precepts that can be found in the law and the prophets, are reducible to these, and all obedience depends upon this love. 1. Consider this, how these are the sum of this law. 2. Consider them particularly in themselves.

Not only because it is love that facilitates all obedience, and is the true principle of it, that makes it both easy to us, and acceptable to God; but beside this, that love disposes the soul for all kinds of obedience, this very act of love is in effect all that is commanded in the law. For the first, laid to the first table, it is so much one with the first commandment, that it expresses most fitly the positive of it, opposite to that which is there forbidden: Thou shalt have no other gods before me—but shalt have me alone for thy God, or bestow all Divine affection, and all worship that is the sign and expression of it, upon me only. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and, if thou lovest me alone, thou wilt not decline to any kind of false worship. That were to vitiate thy affection, and to break that conjugal love and fidelity to which thou art bound by covenant, being my people as by a spiritual marriage. Therefore is idolatry so frequently called, in the phrase of the prophets, adultery and uncleanness.

And, in the letter of that second commandment, the Lord uses that word which in its usual sense is conjugal, and relates to marriage, I am a jealous God; and, in the close of that precept, expresseth particularly this affection of love, as particularly interested in it, though extended to all the rest, I show mercy to thousands of them that love me.

Is it not a genuine property of love, to honor and respect the name of those whom we love? And therefore it is altogether inconsistent with the love of God, to vilify and abuse his name.

They that understand the true use of that holy rest of the sabbath day, do know that it frees the soul, and makes it vacant from earthly things for this purpose, that it may fully apply itself to the worship and contemplation of God, and converse with him at greater length. Then, certainly, where there is this entire love to God, this will not weigh heavy, will be no grievous task for it: it will embrace and gladly obey this fourth commandment, not only as its duty, but as its great delight. For there is nothing that love rejoices in more, than in the converse and society of those on whom it is placed: it would willingly bestow most of its time that way, and thinks all hours too short that are spent in that society. Therefore not only they who profanely break, but they who keep it heavily and wearily, who find it rather a burden than a delight, may justly suspect that the love of God is not in them; but he that keeps his day cheerfully, and loves it, because on it he may more liberally solace and refresh himself in God, may safely take it as an evidence of his love to God.

* Minus enim te amat, qui aliquid præter te amat, et non propter te. Incipiat homo amare Deum, et non amabit in homine nisi Deum.—AUGUSTINE.

Now, that, after the same manner, the love of our neighbor is the sum of the second table, the Apostle St. Paul proves it for us clearly and briefly, Rom. xiii. 9, 10. All the commandments touching our neighbor, are for the guarding of him from evil and injury. Now, Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law. He that truly loves his neighbor as himself, will be as loath to wrong him, as to wrong himself, either in that honor and respect that is due to him, or in his life, or chastity, or goods, or good name, or to lodge so much as an unjust desire or thought, because that is the beginning and conception of real injury. In a word, the great disorder and crookedness of the corrupt heart of man, consists in self-love: it is the very root of all sin both against God and man, for no man commits any offence, but it is in some way to profit or please himself. It was a high enormity of self-love that brought forth the very first sin of mankind. That was the bait which took more than either the color or the taste of the apple, that it was desirable for knowledge; it was in that, that the main strength of the temptation lay, Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. And was it not deep self-love to affect that? And it is still thus: though we feel the miserable fruits of that tree, the same self-love possesses us still; so that, to please our own humors and lusts, our pride, or covetousness, or voluptuousness, we break the law of God, the law of piety, and of equity and charity to men. Therefore the apostle, foretelling the iniquities and impieties of the last times, that men should be covetous, boasters, &c., and lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God—sets that on the front, as the chief, leading evil, and the source of all the rest—lovers of their own selves: Men shall be lovers of themselves, therefore, covetous; and lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, because lovers of their own selves. 2 Tim. 'iii. 2. Therefore, this is the sum of that which God requires in his holy law, the reforming of our⁴ love, which is the commanding passion of the soul, and wheels all the rest about with it in good or evil.

And its reformation consists in this, in recalling it from ourselves unto God, and reflecting it from God to our brethren. Loving ourselves sovereignly by corrupt nature, we are enemies to God, and haters of him, and can not love our neighbors but only in reference to ourselves, and so far as it profits or pleaseth us to do so, and not in order and respect unto God. The highest and the true redress of this disorder, is that which we have here in these two precepts as the substance of all: first, that all our love ascend to God, and then, that what is due to men descend thence, and so, passing that way, it is purified and refined, and is subordinated and conformed to our love of him above all, which is the first and great commandment.

Here we have the supreme object of love to whom it is due—The Lord thy God, and the measure of it, which is indeed to know no measure*—With all thy heart, all thy soul, and all thy mind. For which, in Deut. vi. 5, we have all thy strength. Luke hath both. The difference is none, for all mean that the soul, and all the powers of it, should unite and combine themselves in their most intense and highest strength, to the love of God, and that all the workings of the soul and actions of the whole man, be no other than the acting and exercise of this love.

He accounts not nor accepts of anything we can offer him, if we give not the heart with it; and he will have none of that neither, unless he have it all. And it is a poor all, when we have given it, for the great God to accept of. If one of us had the affection of a hundred, yea, of all the men in the world, yet could he not love God in a measure answerable to his full worth and goodness. All the glorified spirits, angels, and men, that are or shall be, in their perfections, loving him with the utmost extent of their souls, do not altogether make up so much love as he deserves. Yet he is pleased to require our heart, and the love we have to bestow on him; and though it is infinitely due of debt, yet he will take it as a gift: My son, give me thy heart. Prov. xxiii. 26.

Therefore, the soul that begins to offer itself to him, although overwhelmed with the sense of its own unworthiness and the meanness of its love, yet may say, Lord, I am ashamed of this gift I bring thee, yet, because thou callest for it, such as it is, here it is; the heart and all the love I have, I offer unto thee, and had I ten thousand times more, it should all be thine. As much as I can, I love thee, and I desire to be able to love thee more. Although I am unworthy to be admitted to love, yet, thou art most worthy to be loved by me, and besides, thou dost allow, yea, commandest me to love thee. My loving of thee adds nothing to thee, but it makes me happy ; and though it be true, the love and the heart I offer thee, is infinitely too little for thee, yet there is nothing, besides thee, enough for it.

* Modus est nescire modum, subtilius ista distinguere facile est magis quam solidum.

The Lord, or Jehovah, thy God.] There lie the two great reasons of love, τὸ ἀγαπᾶν and τὸ ἰδοῦν—Jehovah, the Spring of being and goodness, infinitely lovely ; all the beauty and excellencies of the creatures, are but a drop of that ocean :—and, Thy God, to all of us the Author of our life, and of all that we enjoy ; who spread forth those heavens that roll about us and comfort us with their light, and motions, and influences, and established this earth that sustains us ; who furnisheth us with food and raiment, and in a word (and it is the apostle's, Acts xvii. 25), who gives us, ζωὴν καὶ πνοὴν καὶ τὰ πάντα, life, and breath, and all things ; and, to the believer, his God in a nearer propriety, by redemption and peculiar covenant. But our misery is, the most of us do not study and consider him, what he is in himself and what to us ; and therefore we do not love him, because we know him not.

And thy neighbor as thyself.] If we will not confess and suspect ourselves, how much we are wanting in the former, yet our manifest defect in this latter will discover it. Therefore, the apostle, Rom. xiii. 10, speaks of this as all, because, though inferior to the other, yet connected with it, and the surest sign of it. For these live and die together. The apostle St. John is express in it, and gives those hypocrites the lie plainly : If any man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar. 1 John iv. 20. We have no real way of expressing our love to God, but in our converse with men and in the works of love toward them.

Certainly, that sweet affection of love to God, can not consist with malice and bitterness of spirit against our brethren. No, it sweetens and calms the soul, and makes it all love every way.

As thyself.] As truly both wishing and, to thy power, procuring his good, as thy own. Consider how much unwilling thou art to be injured or defamed, and have the same thoughts for thy brother ; be as tender for him. But how few of us aspire to this degree of charity !

Thy very enemies are not here excluded. If self-love be still predominant in thee, instead of the love of God, then thou wilt make thine own interest the rule of thy love ; so when thou art, or conceivest thou art, wronged by any one, the reason of thy love ceaseth. But if thou love for God, that reason abides still.* God hath commanded me to love my enemies, and he gives me his example ; he does good to the wicked who offend him.

And this is indeed a trial of our love to God.

* Amicus diligendus in Deo, et inimicus propter Deum. [AUGUSTINE.]

One hath marred thee ; that gives thee to think that thou hast no cause to love him for thyself ; be it so, self-love forbids thee, but the love of God commands thee to love him. God says, If thou lovest me, love him for my sake. And if thy love to God be sincere, thou wilt be glad of the occasion to give so good a testimony of it, and find a pleasure in that which others account so difficult and painful.

SERMON XXX.

THE LAW WRITTEN UPON THE HEART.

HEBREWS viii. 10.

For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord ; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts ; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people.

THE two great evils that perplex sensible minds, are, the guiltiness of sin, and the power of it. Therefore, this new covenant hath in it two promises opposite to these two evils ; free pardon to remove the guilt of sin, and the subduing of its power by the law of God written in the heart. Of this latter only for the present. Having spoken somewhat of the sense of the law in the ten commandments, and of the sum of it in two, this remains to be considered as altogether necessary for obedience, and without which, all hearing and speaking, and all the knowledge of it, will be fruitless. Though it be made very clear and legible without, we shall only read it, and not at all keep it, unless it be likewise written within.

Observe, in the first place, the agreement of the law with the gospel. The gospel bears the complete fulfilling of the law, and the satisfying of its highest exactness, in our surety Jesus Christ, so that, in that way, nothing is abated ; but besides, in reference to ourselves, though it take off the rigor of it from us, because answered by another for us, yet it doth not abolish the rule of the law, but establisheth it, Rom. iii. 31. It is so far from tearing or blotting out the outward copies of it, that it writes it anew, where it was not before, even within, sets it upon the heart in sure and deep characters. We see this kind of writing of the law, is a promise for the days of the gospel cited out of the prophet Jeremiah, ch. xxxi. 33.

There is indeed no such writing of the law in us, or keeping of it by us, as will hold good for our justification in the sight of God ; therefore, that other promise runs combined with it, the free forgiveness of iniquity. But again, there is no such forgiveness as sets a man free to licentiousness and contempt of God's law, but, on the contrary, binds him more strongly to obedience ; therefore, to that sweet promise of the pardon of sin, is inseparably joined this other of the inward writing of the law. The heart is not washed from the guiltiness of sin in the blood of Christ, that it may wallow and defile itself again in the same puddle, but it is therefore washed, that the tables or leaves of it may be clean, for receiving the pure characters of that law of God which is to be written on it.

Concerning this writing, there are three things you may mark : 1. What it is. 2. What is its necessity. 3. Who is its writer.

1. What it is. The writing of the law in the heart, is briefly no other than the renewing and sanctifying of the heart by the infusion of grace, which is a heavenly light that gives the soul to know God aright. And that is added here, as the same with the writing of the law in the heart, and an illustration of it, They shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest. And this light bringeth heat with it.* That right knowledge of God being in the soul, begets in it love to him, and love is the same with the fulfilling of the whole law. It takes up the whole soul : I will put it in their mind, and write it in their hearts. If we will distinguish these, then it is, that they shall both know it and love it. It shall not be written anew in their heads, and go no deeper, but be written in their hearts. But we may well take both expressions for the whole soul ; for this kind of knowledge and love are inseparable, and where the one is, the other can not be wanting.

So, then, a supernatural, sanctified knowledge of God, is the law of God, written in the heart. When it comes and entertains him as holy within it, then it hath not a dead letter of the law written in it, but νόμον ἐμψυχον, the Lawgiver himself : his name and will are engraven on it throughout, on every part of it. All that they know of God shall not be by mere report, and by the voice of others, but they shall inwardly read and know him within themselves. Which (by-the-by) makes not the public teaching and work of the ministry superfluous to any, even to those who know most of God, but signifies only this : that all they that do indeed receive and believe the gospel, are inwardly enlightened by the Spirit of God to understand the things of God, and have not their knowledge on bare trust of others who instruct them, without any particular persuasion and light within, but what they hear of spiritual things, they shall understand and know after a spiritual manner. And the universality of the promise signifies, that this kind of knowledge should be more frequently and more largely bestowed in the days of the gospel, than it was before.

2. The necessity of writing the law on the heart. Although there be in the natural conscience of man, some dim characters of the law, convincing him of grosser wickednesses, and leaving him inexcusable, of which the apostle speaks, Rom. ii. 15 ; yet, he is so far, naturally, from the right knowledge of God and the love of his whole law, that, instead of that knowledge, his mind is full of darkness, and, contrary to that love, his heart is possessed with a natural enmity and antipathy against the law of God. Eph. iv. 18 ; Rom. viii. 7. There is a law within him directly opposite, which the apostle calls the law of sin, Rom. vii. 23 ; sin ruling and commanding the heart and whole man, making laws at its pleasure,* and obtaining full obedience. Therefore, of necessity, before a man can be brought to obey the holy law of God, the inward frame of his heart must be changed, the corrupt law of sin must be abrogated, and the soul must renounce obedience to it, and give itself up wholly [εἰς ῥύπον], to receive the stamp and impression of the law of God ; and then, having it written within upon his heart, his actions will bear the resemblance, and be conformable unto it.

* Lux est vehiculum caloris.

In this promise which God makes to his people, he hath regard to the nature of that obedience which he requires. Because he will have it sincere and cordial, therefore he puts a living principle of it within, writes his law in the heart, and then it is, in the words and actions, derived thence, and is more in the heart than in them. The first copy is in the heart, and all the other powers and parts of a man follow that, and so, by that means, as it is sincere, so it is universal. The heart is that which commands all the rest ; and, as the vital spirits flow from it to the whole body, thus, the law of God, being written in it, is diffused through the whole man. It might be in the memory, or in the tongue, and not in the rest ; but put it in the heart, and then it is undoubtedly in all.

Its being written in the heart, makes the obedience likewise universal in the object, as they speak, in respect to the whole law of God. When it is written only without a man, he may read one part and pass over another, may possibly choose to conform to some part of the law, and leave the rest ; but when the full copy of it is written in his heart, then it is all one law. And as in itself it is inseparable, as St. James teacheth us, James ii. 10, so it is likewise in his esteem and affection and endeavor of obedience : he hath regard unto all the commandments as one. Because of his love to the law of God, he hates, not only some, but every false way, as David speaks, Psalm cxix. 104. He that looks on the law without him, will possibly forbear to break it while others look upon him ; his obedience lies much in the beholder's eye ; but he that hath the law written within, can not choose but regard it as much in secret as in public. Although his sin might be hid from the knowledge and censure of men, yet still it were violence done to that pure law that is within his breast, and therefore he hates it alike as if it were public. This is the constant enemy of all sin, this is within him. Psalm cxix. 11: I have hid thy law in my heart, says David, that I might not sin against thee. It makes a man abate nothing of his course of obedience and holiness because unseen, but like the sun that keeps on its motion when it is clouded from our eyes, as well as when we see it.

* Tolerabis iniquas interius leges.

In a word, this writing of the law in the heart, makes obedience a natural motion, I mean, by a new nature: it springs not from outward constraints and respects, but from an inward principle, and therefore, not only is it universal and constant, but cheerful and easy. The law, only written in tables of stone, is hard and grievous; but make once the heart the table of it, and then there is nothing more pleasing. This law of God makes service delightful, even the painfullest of it. Psalm xl. 8: I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart. The sun which moves with such wonderful swiftness, that to the ignorant it would seem incredible to hear how many thousands of miles it goes each hour, yet because it is naturally fitted for that course, it comes, as the psalmist speaks, like a bridegroom forth of his chamber, and rejoices, as a strong man, to run a race. Psalm xix. 5. If the natural man be convinced of the goodness and equity of the law of God, yet, because it is not written within, but only commands without, it is a violent motion to him to obey it, and therefore he finds it a painful yoke. But here David, in whose heart it was, speaks of it: how often doth he call it his delight and his joy!

If any profane persons object to a godly man his exact life, that it is too precise, as if he wrote each action before he did it, he may answer, as Demosthenes did to him that objected he wrote his orations before he spake them, that he was not at all ashamed of that, although they were not only written, but engraved beforehand. Certainly, the godly man lives by this law which is written and engraved on his heart, and he needs not be ashamed of it.

It is true, the renewed man, even he that hath this law deepest written in his heart, yet, while he lives here, is still molested with that inbred Antinomian, that law of sin that yet dwells in his flesh: though the force and power of it is broken, and its law repealed in his conversion, and this new pure law placed in its stead, yet because that part which is flesh in him, still entertains and harbors it there, it creates and breeds a Christian daily vexation. Because sin hath lost dominion, it is still practising rebellion against that spiritual kingdom and law that is established in the regenerate mind: as a man that hath once been in possession of rule, though usurped, yet, being subdued, he is still working in that kingdom to turbulent practices. But though by this (as the apostle was, Rom. vii. 4) every godly man is often driven to sad perplexities and complaints, yet in this in his comfort; that law of his God written here, hath his heart and affection. Sin is dethroned and thrust out of his heart, and hath only a usurped abode within him against his will. He sides with the law of God, and fights with all his power for it against the other. That holy law is his delight, and this law of sin his greatest grief.

3. The writer: I will write. The Lord promises himself to do this, and it is indeed his prerogative. He wrote it at first on tables of stone, and this spiritual engraving of it on the heart, is much more peculiarly his. Other men might afterward engrave it on stone, but no man can at all write it on the heart, not upon his own, much less upon another's. Upon his own he can not, for it is naturally taken up and possessed with that contrary law of sin (as we said before), and is willingly subject to it, loves that law, and therefore, in that posture, it neither can nor will work this change upon itself to dispossess that law which it loves, and bring in that which it hates. No man can write this law on the heart of another, for it is inaccessible: his hand can not reach it, he can not come at it: how then shall he write anything on it? Men, in the ministry of the word, can but stand and call without: they can not speak to within, far less, write anything within. Though they speak never so excellently and spiritually, and express nothing but what is written on their own hearts (and certainly, that is the most powerful way of speaking, and the likeliest for making an impression on the heart of another), yet, unless the hand of God's own Spirit carry it into the hearer's heart, and set on the stamp of it there, it will perish as a sound in the air, and effect nothing.* Let this ever be acknowledged to his glory. The voice of men may beat the ear, but only he who made the heart, can work upon it, and change and mould it as it pleaseth him. This is his own promise, and he alone makes it good. He writes his law on the hearts of his children, and by this work of his grace prepares them for glory. They who have this law written in their hearts, their names are certainly written in the book of life.

SERMON XXXI.

GOD'S END AND DESIGN IN AFFLICTION.

HOSEA v. 15.

I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early.

THERE is nothing we more hardly learn, and whereof we have more need to be taught, than to judge aright concerning our own dealing with God, and God's dealing with us ; to know and acknowledge the perverseness and folly of our own ways, and the wisdom and goodness of his ways. Therefore, the sermons of the prophets insist much on this, to convince the people of God, to whom they were sent, of both these ; and by this to persuade them to repentance. This is evidently here the prophet's aim. The whole chapter, with the following, contains a pathetic remonstrance of God's just quarrel with his people, aggravated by much long-suffering and lenity, and many warnings, verbal and real, on his part, and much stubbornness, impenitence, and multiplied provocation on theirs ; he using all means to reclaim and save them, and they using all means to despise him and ruin themselves. The plea is against both the kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

* Sonus verborum nostrorum aures percutit, magister intus. Nolite putare quenquam hominem aliquid discere ab alio homine: admonere possumus per strepitum vocis nostræ, si non est intus qui doceat inanis strepitus est noster. [AUGUSTINE.]

In these words we have the Lord, after much reasoning and trial of milder ways, which prevailed not with them, concluding upon a severe course, as being found necessary, and such as would be more effectual for their conversion. The words contain these three things : I. The procuring cause of God's afflicting his people. II. His way of afflicting them. III. The end of it.

I. The procuring cause is made up of these two, sin and impenitence. I will go till they acknowledge their offences. So that, if they had not committed those provoking sins, or, having committed them, had humbly acknowledged or repented of them, this labor of afflicting them had been saved ; but these sins once committed and often repeated, and their being not so much as once acknowledged, and all this by God's own peculiar people, can not but draw on heavy afflictions.

1st. We may see how unwilling God is to afflict his people. Judgments are termed his strange work, but mercy is his darling attribute. When God exercises punitive acts against his people, the Scripture represents, as it were, a kind of reluctance and struggling in his bowels. Hos. xi. 8. How shall I smite thee, O Ephraim ? and how shall I give thee up, O Manasseh ? My repentings are begun already. He delights in their prosperity, and hath given them a rule, by which, if they walk, peace shall be upon them. He hath made them laws, the observance of which will bring heaps of blessings upon them ; as we find what a multitude of favors attended it, Levit. xxvi. 4-12. I will give you rain in due season ; and a little after, I will give you peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid. I will walk among you, I will be your God, and ye shall be my people. So, also, Deut. xxvii. 1-12. But those laws not being observed, then it is said, ver. 24, &c., The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust ; the Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies, &c. But what is all that when opposed to the affliction here threatened, of God's withdrawing himself ? I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence. He will not leave them, unless they drive him away ; yea, and he is even then loath to leave them, and grieved that they are such enemies to themselves, and will not be persuaded to be better advised.

2dly. We see where the true blame of the many sufferings and miseries of the church is to be found. The abounding of sin, and the want of repentance, these make her troubles to abound. If God's own people would take his counsel, it would be well for them ; either his first counsel of obedience, or his after counsel of repentance. When they are running from him, he calls after them, Return, return, O backsliding Israel, why will ye die ? Thou hast destroyed thyself, says the Lord by the same prophet, but in me is thy help to be found. Hos. xiii. 9. His counsel and ways would be peace, but their afflictions and sharp punishments are the fruit of their own ways ; bitter fruit and wormwood, a root of bitterness. Prov. v. 4 ; Jer. ii. 19. Doth not the preaching of the word, and particularly the doctrine of repentance, sufficiently witness for God, and against his people, when their rebellion brings calamities upon them ? The often-repeated warnings and entreaties, even to those who have often slighted and despised them, show how unwillingly he afflicts us. He does not surprise them, without warnings multiplied one upon another. Before he would proceed to treat them as enemies, to hew and slay them with the sword, he uses his messengers of peace to deal first with the word, sharply indeed, but graciously ;—that sword of the Spirit which kills to make alive, to spare, if it might be, the destroying sword of the enemy. I have hewn them by my prophets (Hos. vi. 5), and if that would have served their turn, the other hewing and slaying should not have followed. A wise enemy who is resolved to be avenged, conceals his rage till it be accomplished, and does not threaten before he strikes, but makes the execution of his purpose the first revealing of it. Therefore, we may know that God, who doth all things most wisely, intends favor in threatening ; denounces indignation that he may be interrupted. Not to inflict it, that is his desire. He would gladly have us stay his hand. A humble penitent acknowledgment will do it. "Miniatu r ne cadat, cadit ne occidat," says Chrysostom. He threatens that he may not strike, and strikes that he may not destroy. If speaking either mildly or sharply, will prevail with his children, he will not stir the rod to them : and when the rod is in his hand, if showing or shaking it will serve the turn, he will not strike with it. But this is our folly that usually we abuse all this goodness, and will not part with our sins, till we smart for them, and be beaten from them. We pull punishment out of God's hand ; as Solomon says, The fool's mouth calleth for strokes. Prov. xviii. 6. When these indulgent ways that the Lord uses, avail nothing, then as a physician wearied in striving with lenitives and gentle medicines in a fixed, stubborn disease that yields not to them, it is no wonder that he betake himself to sharper remedies, and cut and burn, if need be, that he may cure. The Lord's complaint, in the beginning of the viith chapter of this prophecy, sounds this way, When I would have healed Ephraim. If it be thus, then, with the church of God, that it is often found guilty of great sins, and withal, great insensibleness and impenitence, it is no wonder that it is often found under great and many afflictions. There being in the church, in such societies as profess God's name, peculiar sins, such as are found nowhere else, by reason of God's peculiar covenant with them, and ordinances among them; viz., contempt of the ordinances, and breach of the covenant; and by the same reason too, peculiar aggravations of the common sins, and ingredients of such things as make the same sins that other people commit, to be of a deeper die among God's people; their special relation to him, and the special means and mercies they receive from him, by which they are both more instructed and more obliged to obedience; these things make the disobedience more heinous in itself, and more offensive to God. He can not but take it very ill to be disregarded by his own Και ου τεκνον.—Thus the Lord makes a great and loud complaint that all may hear, Isa. i. 2; calls heaven and earth to hear it, that he had nourished and brought up children, and they had rebelled against him. What do we deserve for our sins? Do not our oaths and cursing, our pride and deceit, our wonderful ignorance and profaneness, our formality, hypocrisy, and, above all, our deep security, threaten us with some heavy judgment? Which can not be avoided but by godly sorrow and earnest prayer, by the most humble way of acknowledgment and real amendment. This is our work this day; and unless we set about it for ourselves, and pray for it to the whole kingdom, we know not what we are doing. We can not do anything to purpose on behalf of the church of God, nor be fit supplicants for its deliverance, while we return ungodly ourselves.

II. God's way of afflicting his people: I will go and return to my place. The way that he will afflict them, is indeed the heaviest, as conveyed in this expression; as if he should say, I will withdraw myself from them, and will not appear to them at all for a time, yea, a long time. Well may it be rendered by affliction in the other clause, for they shall be truly so when the Lord is gone from them. Upon the withdrawing of his gracious presence, as necessarily follows affliction, as mist upon the setting of the sun. This was heavier than all his corrections. So long as they could but hear and see him among them, although it were chiding, yea, scourging them, yet, still there was this comfort, that they might speak to him as being near them, and so, considering his merciful nature, might have hope, by their complaints and cries in his presence, to move him to compassionate and spare them, and be reconciled. But when he was out of sight and quite gone from them, and so could neither hear nor see them in their misery, this was indeed the chief misery, worse than all that they could suffer in other punishments. In the preceding verses, he threatens to be as a moth to them, consuming them, though more slowly and insensibly; which was by lesser judgments that befell these kingdoms, as the history of them shows: then, as a lion, devouring more suddenly; but the gradation rises to the highest in this last, though to an ignorant creature it sounds least: I will return to my place. I will retire my favorable presence from them, and shut up all the influences and evidences of my grace. Which, in a public national sense (as here it is to be taken), imports not only longer and more grievous troubles than any which before had befallen them (as indeed they were), but God's leaving of them in those troubles, and not giving as before, any sign of his merciful presence. As if God should say, I will give them up to those miseries that are to come upon them, and leave them to themselves and to their cruel enemies, and will take no notice of them, until they know what a grievous thing the want of my presence is, and how hateful their sins are, that have deprived them of it, and so be stirred up to seek my face;—they would not regard me, either in my word or in my works, whether of mercy or of judgment, so long as I stayed with them, was present among them;—that so I may teach them to know what is the good of my presence, by the evil of my absence, which is a heavier judgment than all I have yet inflicted on them.

And as it is thus in relation to the public condition of the church, so is it, in a personal and more spiritual sense, to a child of God. No evil he fears so much, or feels so heavy, as God's absenting and withdrawing himself in displeasure; nor is there any good that he will admit to be compared with the light of God's countenance. Let others seek any good, let them have any good they can, but, says David, for himself and all the godly, the good we seek is this and no other, Lord, lift upon us the light of thy countenance. Psalm iv. 6. He can hear of any distress with courage and resolution, but this he can not endure to hear of, but deprecates it, Hide not thy face from thy servant. A godly man may, in the most prosperous condition, have much concern if the face of God be hid from him. That is his great affliction, as it is here called. There needs nothing else to damp all his prosperity. Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. Psalm xxx. 7. Even in prosperity, riches and power, and other such poor things, do not answer the desires of a soul acquainted with God: all these are nothing without his favor shining on them: no, nor the graces which are within them, which are far more precious than all outward things. The displeased withdrawing of God's countenance, makes a sad night amid all these; as when the sun is absent, it is night still, notwithstanding all the stars. Although God lay outward affliction on them, yet, if he enlighten them, though in a dungeon, they can rejoice. Yea, when they are inwardly troubled for sin, and God is rebuking them that way, yet, that is not so bad as when he leaves them and returns to his place. This is more grievous than when he chides and rebukes them, which he may do, and yet, not in hot displeasure, as David teaches us to distinguish it, Psalm vi. 1. It is a more comfortable condition, that he stay with them, and that he reprove them when they sin (yea, that is a mercy), than that he leave them, and speak not to them, nor suffer them to speak to him. They would then desire rather to find him present though correcting; for then, by speaking to him, they may express their repentance and requests to him for pardon. They would say to God, Strike me, but hear me, rather than be struck out from all intercourse with him, and he hold them as his enemies. And thus God may sometimes deal with his own, and particularly for some notable offence, until they be duly humbled and brought to a lowly acknowledgment, and so, to seek his face again; to see if they will be loath to grieve him again.

Though we all profess to know God, yet, the greatest part of us are so far from duly esteeming him, that we do not at all know what the spiritual, gracious presence of God is; how sweet the enjoyment, and how bitter and sad the deprivation. Oh, be desirous to understand and know this highest good, and, above all things, seek to enjoy it! And without doubt, the experience of it will persuade you to prize it and entertain it carefully; never willingly to grieve and drive away so great and so good a guest, who brings true happiness along with him to those with whom he dwells. There is solid peace, and there only, where he is. And for the church of God, what other thing can we, yea, what need we desire but this, as the assured help of all her distresses and sorrows, that God would return his gracious presence to her again? Then shall her enemies be turned backward, and she shall sing and rejoice in the God of her salvation. You see, this is the church's own prayer, Psalm lxxx. 3; she desires no more than this, Cause thy face to shine; and we shall be safe. That is the only sun which chases away the mist of her griefs and troubles. So then, the ending of these confusions we are lying and laboring under, is wrapped up in this; that the presence of our God be both entreated and obtained. This would make a sweet union of hearts, and make all attempts prosperous, and strike a terror into the church's enemies. But if their Rock forsake them, they were never so surely supported with other advantages, yet shall they sink and fall. If he go to his place, and shut up his power and wisdom from their help, and leave them with themselves, this shall suffice to undo them, without any enemy. It was sad news, not only to Moses, but to the whole people, Exod. xxxiii. 3; notwithstanding they were bent to provoke him to do so, it was very grievous for them to hear, that he had refused them his own guidance, and would withdraw himself from them, although it was with the promise of an angel to lead them; for little can any possible supply be made by any creature to make up that loss. It was indeed high time for them to put off their ornaments, and be humbled, when their great Ornament and their great Strength, was gone from them in displeasure. Then they put off their garbs of war, and appeared in the penitential dress of sackcloth and ashes.

III. The end of God's thus afflicting his people. And we have these two things to consider in it, both here clearly expressed: 1st, God intention in the means; secondly, The power of these means for effecting it. I will go till they acknowledge their offences, and seek my face, and, in the time of my absence, which will certainly be the time of their heaviest affliction, they will seek me early.

1. This is God's end in scourging his people; it is only to bring them to a sorrow for their offences, and an ingenuous confession of it. And if he withdraw himself, it is not to leave them for ever and look at them no more. On the contrary, it is, that they may learn whether it is better to enjoy him, or their sins; and that, finding themselves miserable without him, they may leave those sins with which he will not dwell, and may come and entreat his return to them; and which he is willing, being entreated, to grant them. And this he removes from them, that, on their return to him, and their earnest and humble seeking of his return to them, they may find him, and enjoy more of his presence than before, and learn to keep it better. He throws his people into the furnace, and goes away, and leaves them there; yet, it is not to let them lie still there, but he is skilful in this work, and knows the time needful for their refining, and then returns and takes them out. His purpose is, to purge away the dross, but he will not lose the gold. Isa. xxvii. 9. By this shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged, and this will serve to take away his sin. As that sin was the meriting cause of the affliction, it clears God's justice; the end he aims at, when he declares his graciousness and mercy to his people, being no other than this, to destroy the meriting cause of the affliction, by their trouble; to take away that sin which procured it, and then to give them peace. That is his design. He takes no pleasure in their affliction for itself, more than they themselves do. Indeed, in punishing his enemies, there is pure justice: their punishments are not for a better end, so far as concerns them, but are appointed to torment them. But to his own people, his purpose is, by afflicting them, only to draw from them their sins, which drive him away from them. And as we see in this the bounty of God, so it instructs us, for our own practice, in the just way both of preventing trouble to ourselves that it come not, and of removing it if it be come upon us. Is this the thing God seeks in punishing us, a sense and acknowledgment of sin committed? Then, if we give him his end, he will not at all needlessly make use of the means. If, therefore, we either carefully shun sinful provocations, or, being guilty, speedily return and humble ourselves before him, he will not enter into displeasure against us; he will be appeased toward us. And on our seeing that which is his intent in punishing, before he begins to punish, he is very well pleased to be thus prevented. So then, if either we follow the advice of the Psalmist, Psalm iv. 4, Stand in awe, and sin not, or that other which follows, that we examine our hearts concerning sin, before the decree of punishment go forth, or be put in execution on our guiltiness, pronouncing ourselves guilty (as the word is here in the text), which is indeed acknowledging our offences, this is the way to prevent it; and if it be begun upon us, this is the ready way to remove it, for this is the end of it. When the Lord sees his children grieved for their offences and entreating pardon, he is a tender-hearted father, the very Father of mercies. Those confessions and prayers that his children utter, enter his paternal ears, the rod falls out of his hand, and he turns his stripes into embraces, and his frowns into smiling. There may be, indeed, a confused cry from the sense of the smart, without repentance, that moves him not. As he directs parents in correcting a peevish child, Thou shalt not spare for his crying (Prov. xix. 18), so he himself doth not spare nor leave off for that kind of crying. It is confession and submission that he seeks, not the howling and complaining which nature draws from any under sharp affliction. This the Lord complains of in his people, by the same prophet. Hos. vii. 14: They did not cry unto me with their hearts: they only howled upon their beds. A man that is upon the rack for extorting confession, he will cry and roar when he confesses nothing; but it is not that which is sought of him, pain forces him to that; it is confession, and when he begins the least word of that, they presently stay and release him. Thus it was with David, and he tells it us, and distinguishes these two expressly, Psalm xxxii. 3-5. He tells us of his roaring under the hand of God, but that did no good: he found no ease but that, so long as he kept silence from this confession. But as soon as he began, or did but offer at acknowledgment, one word of confession, yea, the promise of it, brought him the release that a whole day's roaring could not obtain. I roared all day long, but thou helpdest me not; still Thine hand continued heavy upon me. But I acknowledged my sin; I said I would confess my transgression, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.

Now, to the end we might confess aright, there must be a searching of our hearts for our sins, and for some particular one or more which God's afflictions aim at. And, First, if we can not easily find it out, consider the nature of the affliction. Secondly, seek the knowledge of it from God, who will readily, when he corrects his children, tell them what fault it is. Thirdly, however, finding so many, be sure to spare none of them, and then ye can not but fall on the main one which breedeth you trouble.

2. The other thing here concerning the end of affliction, is the efficacy of the means for reaching it. In their affliction they will seek me early. It had been early, in a wiser sense, to have sought to him for a reconciliation before the affliction; but here it expresses a most diligent seeking, according to the original word: for things that men are earnest upon, they will be early stirring to set about. For besides that it is a certain prophecy of what was to come to pass in this people, it hath in it this general truth, with which it agrees; to wit, the moral fitness of great affliction to work this diligent seeking of God, before neglected, and acknowledgment of sin, before unfelt; which is expressed in the former clause. Together with seeking his face, there must be the sense and acknowledgment of sin. There is no returning to him, but from it. In following sin, we depart from God, and by forsaking it, we return to him. These are inseparable; they are but one motion. It was their sin made him leave them, and go to his place; and therefore it were in vain to seek him, retaining it, for that would drive him further from them.

Now affliction is apt to bring men to this; such, I mean, as have any knowledge of God. Although they be not converted, yet it works them to a temporary fit of returning and seeking God, such as they are capable of. And those make up the greatest part in the public humblings of a nation, or any multitude of people, having most of them no more heat of devotion and desire of God, than the fit of present affliction works; and therefore, when that ceases, they have done likewise with their repentance and regard of God. Being stirred only by that outward principle, they act no longer that way, than while they are acted by it. Water will be very hot, yea, boil and make a noise, when it is upon the fire; but set it off, and it returns, within a while, to its natural coldness. Thus it was often with the same people. See Ps. lxxviii. And there are still daily too many instances of it. Yet the Lord, to show how much regard he hath to repentance, lets not the very semblance of it go to loss. He is pleased, for the repressing of sin, and the purging of his church of gross and scandalous profaneness, to make use of public afflictions to work in many even this kind of repentance, and to answer this repentance with the removal of the affliction that wrought it. With God's own children, this method holds in a way peculiar to them. They may, indeed, as well as others, sometimes stand in need of the rod for their bettering, and it may work it, but there is this difference: their grief for sin and seeking after God, do not wholly depend on the lash; they are constant in these things, as having a living principle within them; whence they show in all estates, that sin is to them the greatest grief, and the favor of God the greatest good. Again, when they are surprised with sin, and possibly fall into a fit of security, and must be awaked by some affliction, and it is sent for that purpose, that renewing which it works in them, is not, as in others, a mere present violent motion only, from the impulse of the affliction, but it is real and inward from the grace which is in them, awakened and only set on work by the correction; and therefore it is more abiding than the other. There is in them a special love to God, working their repentings and returning under the sense of his hand. And it is from God's special love to them, which others share not in, that he stirs them up to renew repentance, and upon their repentance takes off affliction, and shows himself graciously reconciled to them. To some, likewise, it may be, that God may use some particular cross, as a partial and concurring means to the work of their repentance and conversion to God. But however, there is in that some peculiar love of God, and that effectual working of his word and Spirit to beget grace in them, by which afflictions are sanctioned and made useful to excite and awaken grace where it is.

Now, in all these different ways, affliction is apt for this effect; 1st. Because it sets men in upon themselves, calls in their thoughts, which, in a fair season, more readily dissipate and scatter themselves abroad. As they observe, that much light disqualifies the sight of the mind, as well as that of the body, and that, in the dark, men's thoughts are more united and deep; thus in the darkness of affliction, we feel readily more inward, and that acquaints us better with ourselves and our sins, and so, tends to the first of these two, the acknowledging of our offences. Besides, the particular respect we speak of, is often between the kind of affliction and our own sins.

2dly. When a man is driven by force from the comforts of the world, which he used to hinge upon, especially by some great affliction which breaks him off from them all, then, if he have any thoughts concerning God, those begin to work with him. He bethinks himself for no other way of help, but thinks, Could I obtain the Lord to befriend me, and show me his favor, that were enough. He could deliver me out of this distress, and in the meantime support me under it. True, I have provoked him, and, which is heavier than all my other troubles, I have made him mine enemy; yet, I know he is very compassionate and gracious, therefore I will go to him, and confess my offence, and I trust he will pardon me. This is the other thing, the seeking of his face. So affliction hath something in it suitable to the work of both. As we see the lost son by his distress came to himself, and then resolved to return to his father. Indeed, when a man is straitened on all hands by a crowd of troubles, and finds no way out, then he finds his only way is upward. We know not what to do, but our eyes are toward thee. The Israelites went before to other helpers; they are reproved for it, ver. 13; but when once convinced of that folly, no more of any such way, but, as follows in the next words containing a description of their purposes, Come, let us return to the Lord our God, they acknowledge him as the just inflietor of these calamities: He hath torn, and he hath smitten. Not a word of Salmanazer or Nebuchadnezzar, but their offended God is their smiter, and so no recourse to other powers for this deliverance, but, Let us return to him; he will heal us. Oh then, let us all be persuaded to repentance. And certainly all they who do truly mind the honor of God, and the good of his church, will not be negligent at such a time as this. I trust that God who heareth prayer, will have regard to their prayers and his own glory. Amen.

SERMON XXXII.

SUITABLE EXERCISE IN AFFLICTION.

ISAIAH viii. 17.

And I will wait upon the Lord, that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him.

BESIDES the personal trials and sorrows that are the lot of the godly in this life, every one of them hath a share in the calamities and troubles of the church; not only when some part of these troubles reaches them, for so they are personal and private, but, in the remotest and most exempted condition, there is a living sympathy which this can not divest. And for both their own and Zion's griefs, they have but one support to stay their own souls from fainting under the burden of them, but it is a great one, and strong enough to bear all the weight that can be laid upon it. And it is this the prophet here resolves on. I will wait upon the Lord, and I will look for him.

Among the many sins that the prophets had to contend with in the people, one, and a main one, was, their unbelief, which indeed is the root of all disobedience and perverseness. The very natural motion of the heart possessed with it, being, as the apostle speaks, to depart from the living God, and to turn it aside to dead, helpless helpers, makes it run to and confide in anything rather than in him, besides whom there is nothing at all to be confided in. To this folly, the prophet here opposes God's command and his own resolution contrary to it: ver. 11. For the Lord spake thus to me, and this was the echo of his voice, resounding from my heart, I will wait. And this he speaks not only for himself, but in the name of all that will adhere to it, and subscribe to his purpose; and he intends it as a leading resolution to the godly both in his own and after times. And it is here upon record for us, as the truest character of faith, and the only establishment of the mind in the days of trouble.

And this is the most powerful way of teaching, when the messengers of God teach, by their own example, those duties they recommend to others. The Lord spake thus to me, with a strong hand: not only with the words of his mouth, but with the strength of his hand, he makes the impression of it deep upon their hearts, that the expression of it may come from that inward impression and persuasion of the truth. And that will indeed bind a man strongly (as the word signifies) to the discharge of that high calling, notwithstanding all his discouragements from within and from without, which are so many, that they who have most sense of the nature of it, would possibly undo themselves, were it not the strong hand of God upon their consciences, that binds them to it.

In the words we have to consider, 1st, The trial of faith. 2dly, The strength of it. The trial of it is in the hiding of God's face from the house of Jacob. The strength of it is in that fixed purpose of waiting for him, even in that time of hiding his face.

Who hideth his face.] To a natural ear, this soundeth not so much as fire, and sword, and pestilence, and captivity; but, being rightly understood, it is the heaviest word, and very far weighs down all other expressions of distress whatsoever. It is a very large, comprehensive word. All the good that we enjoy in any kind, is but a beam of the face of God; and therefore, the hiding of his face, is a high expression of a dark, afflicted state. The countenance of God shining on them in his universal providence and goodness, is that which upholds the world and all the creatures in their being: the least of them subsists by him, and the greatest can not subsist without him. So that the schools say truly, "There is in the lowest, aliquid Dei, and in the highest, aliquid nihil." He shines upon all in that sense, preserving them in being, which otherwise would not continue for a moment; as it is excellently expressed, Psalm civ. 29, and particularly concerning man, Psalm xc. 3; Job xxxiv. 13-15.

But the church of God, which we have here under the name of the house of Jacob, doth after an especial manner depend upon a special aspect of his countenance for her being and well-being. Her outward peace and prosperity, with all the blessings that she enjoys, are fruits of a more than ordinary providence. And there are blessings in their nature not ordinary, but peculiar to the church, which have more of the face of God in them than all outward splendor of prosperity hath, and therefore are the special love-tokens he bestows upon his spouse, the church, and by which he testifies his marriage with her. And that is the being of a church, the oracles and ordinances wherein God manifests himself to his church, makes himself known there as by his face, which is hid from the rest of the world. And though, in comparison of the vision of glory, the clearest, even extraordinary manifestations of God, are but as a glance of his back parts (as that of Moses, which was singular), yet, in such a sense as suits our present condition, we are said to appear before the Lord, and to stand in his presence, and to see his face, and the beauty of it, in his house and ordinances. Psalm xlii. 2; xxvii. 4, &c.

It is true, that the outward distresses of the church and people of God are sometimes expressed by the hiding of his face from them, and so it is a part of what he means here; but it is not all the sense of it anywhere, but it is a word of their affliction, carrying a reflection upon their sin that provoked the Lord to afflict them, and so, implies his just anger kindled by these provocations. And it hath usually the ingredients of spiritual judgments under it, either the depriving them of God's ordinances in their use, or of the power and efficacy of them (as was at this time, we see, the prophet's complaint), and possibly a great measure of that heavy judgment upon the people, of blindness of mind and hardness of heart, a stupid senseless under their calamities, which is one of the most certain and the saddest signs of their continuance. And this is the prophet's meaning in this place. For without these, or something like them, a church may be in real affliction, and yet, not under the eclipse of God's face for all that. Yea, possibly it may shine clearer on the church in a time of outward trouble, than in the midst of peaceable and prosperous days: as the moon, when it is dark toward the earth, then the half that is toward heaven is all luminous, and, on the contrary, when it is the full to our view, it is dark heavenward. We see it in the common instance of the primitive times, how the gold shined in the furnace, how holiness and purity of religion flourished and spread in the midst of persecutions, and zeal for God burnt brighter than the fires that were kindled against it, and triumphed over them; and soon after they were put out, how it began to cool and abate, and the purity of religion insensibly died into numbers of superstitious and gaudy devices; and the church grew downward, outwardly more pompous, but lost as much for that of integrity of doctrine and worship. And therefore, in the twelfth chapter of Revelation, there is a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, as full of heavenly ornaments as she is destitute of, and withal despises, those of the earth. And look, again, to the eighteenth chapter, and see a woman clothed in purple, and decked with gold and precious stones, and a golden cup in her hand, but herself, under all these dressings, a harlot, and her golden cup full of abominable filthiness. So, then, doubtless, the hiding of God's face from his church, is something beyond her outward lowness and affliction, and greater and heavier than that; the withdrawing of his presence, and his not appearing for their deliverance out of trouble, and their spiritual comfort and benefit under it.

1st. Now, as that is put for the top of all distresses, we should esteem it so. But in reference to ourselves, and to the church of God, I am afraid a great part of us do not know what it is to have this light. If we did, there needed no more urging it; itself would persuade us enough to prize it, and to fear the loss of it. The soul that knows the sweetness of his presence and his face shining on it, will account no place nor condition hard, provided it may be refreshed with that: as the saints have been in caves and dungeons enjoying more of that light in those times, when other comforts have been abridged. Then they have had a beam from heaven into their souls in their darkest dungeon, far more worth than the light of the sun and all the advantages the world can afford. The rabbin who lived twelve years in a dungeon in Francis's time, called a book he wrote, "The Polar Splendor;" implying that he had then seen most intellectual light when he had seen least sensible light. And thus it is with many Christians, in the darkness of distress; if they seek after this light, they may blame themselves and their own neglect if they find not somewhat of this truth. On the other hand, to a spiritual mind, this hiding of God's face will damp and distress the pleasantest outward condition which can be allotted him. It was in the midst of David's prosperity, enough to unseason all: Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. Psalm xxx. 7.

Now, if we would have the Lord, to whom believing souls are married in truth and righteousness, to look pleasantly on us, our great ambition should be, to walk in all well pleasing unto him, and to seek of himself those ornaments and that spiritual beauty which may make us lovely in his eyes; as a faithful wife decketh herself only for her husband. For all these inferior things are but figures of that mysterious life of grace which the soul hath from God, and by which it lives in him. There are some singular largesses and outlets of spiritual joy which God gives not to every Christian, nor to any at all times. These we speak not of. But if we would enjoy more abiding influences of his love, and find him accepting of our services at our hands, and measuring his graces to us, coming to us, and giving us access to come to him, putting a life and blessing into his ordinances, though with different degrees at divers times; then our care should be, to entertain this friendship and correspondence diligently, to watch over our hearts and ways, that we admit of nothing that may disturb or interrupt it, and to be jealous of the least abatement; to search and find out the cause of it without delay. And if we do thus, we shall undoubtedly find the Lord willing to converse and dwell with us; and though he give us lower measures of comfort and graces than others get, they shall be so much as will enable us to go on in our journey. Above all, study humility. The high Lord loves to give himself and his society most to the lowly heart. Trust not at all to thyself, nor to anything below him. Lay all thy confidence upon his power and goodness. Ye see here, that it was the multitude of sins that eclipsed his face from his own people, the house of Jacob; as he tells them by this prophet, chap. lix. 1. It was particularly their distrust of God, and running to other helps beside him. Ever, the more he is in thy esteem, the more thou shalt have of him; and the more thou believest his all-sufficiency, the more thou shalt find it and know it in thine own experience. Yea, it may be that when his face is hid from the church, in respect of public distress and desertion, yet, it may even then shine bright upon a soul that secretly cleaveth to him and delights in him. So here, the prophet says not that he hides his face from me, but, from the house of Jacob.

2dly. As for the church, learn by the prophet and other penmen of the Holy Scriptures, to eye and consider the estate of God's church; to take notice how he deals with it when he shines on it and when he hides his face, and be deeply affected with it. Let thine eye be looking out, and let thine eye affect thy heart, as it is, Lam. iii. 51. Far be it from thee, to judge it any impertinence, and think it concerns thee not. Truly most of us have both eyes, and if we had twenty more, we should have them all poring upon our private condition. Providing we might have ease and good days, we should feel little for the afflictions of Joseph. It were not excusable, if even our secret devotions took us up so as to forget the church; how much less excusable, to have our hearts engrossed wholly by our earthly concerns! And we see here what it is we have to do on the church's behalf: to bewail her sins, begging pardon for those evils for which God hath hid his face from her; and what to desire, only to commence her suit anew, as troubles arise, Cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved; as the returning of the spring makes all things to flourish, and again puts a new visage upon nature. Mark the harmony and resound of the Lord's returning to Israel; the returning of their hopes and the sweet effects of it, Hos. xiv. 1, 5. All those heavy indignations that are on, or might trouble, the church and themselves, arise from security, impenitence, and the fruitlessness of the word among them, which makes the Lord hide his face from them. Our part is, therefore, to return to him. Oh, had we hearts to put the Lord to it, he could and would do yet greater things for us. And this we ought earnestly to desire, and with all patience to wait for it; which is the prophet's way, I will wait.

The two wheels of the soul are desire and hope. Difficulty sets an edge upon desire; and the appearance of obtaining, upholds hope. And both these are in the words the prophet here uses for his waiting and expecting; for they import an earnest desire, and yet a patient attending upon the issue. Look to that of David, Psalm cxxx. 6: I wait for thee more than they that wait for the morning—that watch until the morning, as some render it; in the cold night that watch. The thing the pilot waits for is not a private good to himself, for that could not stand a counter-balance to the evil he is sensible of. The Lord's hiding his face from the house of Jacob was that which troubled him, and his waiting was answerable for the return of that light to the house of Jacob. Grieved that the Lord should absent himself from his people, he looks back upon God's frequent appearances and showing of his face to Jacob, by such visions as gave lustre and glory to the place. See Hosea xii. 9: We found him in Bethel, there he spake with us—even us, who have interest in these gracious appearances. And there it is urged for a ground of hope and waiting and calling on God. Now, for the face of God to be hid from those who were the posterity of Jacob and God's own peculiar people, was a sad thought to the prophet, who stays himself with this, that the Lord God had made known to him his purpose of returning and restoring the house of Jacob, and upon this he resolves to believe, and to rely upon God's word for it: I will wait.

Hoping, waiting, and believing, are taken indifferently in the Scriptures, and all the difference is only in relation to time. Faith believes the present word, and hope looks out for the after-accomplishment; and the patient waiting for it results from both. So they are but the actings of the same faith in a different notion, and they are indeed the test of faith. Our hearts are naturally of another temper than to take the Lord's word and repose upon it, and, when it is deferred, yea, and cross appearances come in between, yet, still firmly to believe and patiently to wait for the accomplishment. We are of a childish humor. That which we laugh at in children, in little things, such as their minds are set on, we may be sorry for in ourselves as a greater folly, being in greater affairs. We are all in haste, and would have things come as fast as our fancying; and upon the delay of these mercies we look for, are almost ready to give over. That which brake forth from that wicked king's mouth, the seed of it is in all our hearts, when things appear worse and worse: This evil is from the Lord; why should I wait for him any longer? 2 Kings vi. 23. It is strange, in court suits and other business of a like nature, how long a man will wait upon another, and think all is well if he speed at last; and yet how briskly we deal with God if he answers not at the first!

But faith teaches us (so to speak) spiritual civility, good manners toward God; it lets the soul see his greatness, and goodness, and truth, and persuades us to wait on him, and not to weary in waiting; to wait patiently, as it is Psalm xl. 1. Faith composes the mind, cures that light, fickle hastiness which is naturally in us. He that believeth shall not make haste, says the same prophet, Isa. xxviii. 16. And is it not good reason that we wait for him? Is he not wise enough to choose the fittest times for his own purposes? Well may we wait till he be gracious to us, for he waits to be gracious to us. Isa. xxx. 18. He is not slack, but is staying only for the due season; his love is waiting for the time that his wisdom hath appointed. And, to express his affection in our terms, he is longing for that time, as well as we are. For the same word is there used for his waiting, that both here and in that verse is used for ours, and it signifies an earnest waiting or breathing for that thing we wait for; and therefore, since he waits and longs, our waiting is in a happy conformity to him. And thus, with good reason it is concluded, They are blessed that wait for him. Thus there is a word very answerable, Hab. ii. 3: The vision is for an appointed time—we read; At the end it shall speak; but it may be rendered, It breatheth toward the end; runs, as it were, so fast that it panteth. The same word is used, Cant. ii., for the rising of the morning.

By fretting impatience there is nothing gained but needless desire. It advances not our business, but perplexes us to no purpose. And, on the other hand, patient waiting loses not a moment, but attains its end in the very due time determined; and hath this advantage in the meantime, that it puts the mind into a temper of peace and contentedness, which a man may act and profess to others, but can not truly have within himself without faith. Isa. xxvi. 3: Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee. This waiting is always answered; never marked with disappointment, as is the ordinary custom of other hopes. Therefore, that which the prophet hath, He that believeth shall not make haste, the apostle Peter renders shall not be ashamed, 1 Pet. ii. 6. Though he hasten not, but wait, and wait long, yet his waiting shall not shame him; none shall have matter to laugh at him for it, for his waiting shall be repaid with success, his hope shall be accomplished; whereas, any other expectations make men ridiculous, and expose them to scorn, in that they look often for most contentment in those things that deceive them. The brooks that grow dry in summer, are an emblem of worldly hopes. Thus, Job vi. 19: The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them. They were confounded because they had hoped; they came thither and were ashamed. But this waiting on the Lord never yet deluded any. I waited patiently for the Lord, says the psalmist, and he inclined to me, and heard my cry. Psalm xl. 1. Then he makes his experience a common good; draws it to a general conclusion, ver. 4: Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his trust. Thus he confirms that general truth by his particular experience, and, as the apostle says of them who believe, sets to his seal that God is true. Thus ought every one, upon his experience of the Lord's goodness in his deliverance, speak to the advantage of the Lord's faithfulness, and say, "As he is called abundant in goodness and truth, so I have found him, and I would have others to rely upon him: if my testimony could do any good to that, or persuade them, they shall be sure to have it wheresoever I come." Thus Psalm xxxiv., the prophet will not smother the Lord's goodness which he hath found: This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him. And ver. 8, he invites all to taste and see that the Lord is good; blessed are they who trust in him. He will advise others to this upon his own experience. Surely he will know where to seek, when he is again put to it. As he loves the Lord for what he hath found, so he will make use of him always in all his straits. Psalm cxvi. 1: I love the Lord; and seeing he hath inclined his ear to me, I am resolved upon this course, I will call upon him as long as I live.

The difficulties which the prophet's faith here encounters, and which commended the strength of it, are these two: 1st, The multitude of unbelievers round about, as a mighty torrent which he was to come against; that so few would rely on the Lord. But he resolves against it, as Joshua did for obedience, Choose you whom you will serve, so here, for faith; let others take their course, each one run his own way, my choice is this, I will wait on the Lord. And this is no small matter, to maintain the preciousness of faith against the profaneness and atheism of the world. And considering the disregard of God that there is in the society and converse of the greatest part, it is much if a godly mind do not sometimes suffer something by it; and we have need to beware of it.

2dly, The other difficulty is in the thing itself, which looks so dark and unlikely, that many of his people are giving over trusting on him, and he seems to give over helping them. He hides his face, yet I will wait on him alone, says the prophet. Though all other hearts fail, yet I will wait on thee. Though thou withdraw thyself, and hide thy face, yet I will look to no other, I will stay by thee, and wait on thee. And although not only my days may pass, but ages, before the things be accomplished I look for, yet I will believe they shall come to pass. I will look on them in this notion, though I can not live to see them. And, indeed, besides that the great temporal deliverances which the prophet foresaw and here looks into, came long after his days, it is likely that he looks beyond these too, to the coming of the Messiah, of whom he speaks so clearly both in this chapter and the former, and also in the following. Notwithstanding all the sins of this people, and all the heavy judgments their sins call for and have brought, or shall bring on them, yet he believed the Lord would send them that great deliverer and Savior, his only Son, whom he had promised. Thus the eye of faith looks over the head of many difficulties and of many ages between it, to the thing it expects, and sees it beyond them all (so the word here, I will look for him, is to stand upright as a line and look out, answering to that word, Ἀποκαρὰβντα, Rom. viii.); desiring and confidently expecting good from him to his church. In these kingdoms, though the outward face of affairs look quite contrary, and the Lord for a time suffer our troubles to increase, and hide his face as not regarding us, suffering things, by the perverseness of men on all hands, to turn to a universal confusion and disorder, yet still, you that know the Lord and his dealing, pray, and believe, and wait, and be assured your prayer shall be answered in due time.

Thus for your personal condition. You that desire the light of God's countenance above all things, though he seem to deny and hide his face from you for a time, yet wait on him, leave him not, for if ye do, you are sure to perish; but if ye wait on him, ye may say, it may be he will be gracious, but if he will not, I know no other to go to; I will still wait and try him. What think ye of Job's purpose? Though he slay me, yet I will trust in him: though I saw him ready to throw me into hell, yet I will look for mercy. Faith can not be nonplused. There is in it a pious obstinacy that will not yield to the greatest opposition, nor give over so long as there is any possibility of prevailing. I said, says Jonah, I am cast out from thy presence, yet for all that, I can not give the matter up for desperate; I must have leave to look toward thee; Yet I will look toward thy holy temple. Jon. ii. 4. Invincible faith, as here,

I will wait—I will look. His doubling the word is meant to express his resolvedness, in the beginning of the verse, and in the end of it. And so, faith conquers the difficulty that makes against it. And this is the purest acting of faith, where there is nothing of sense to support it, and yet it holds out, and, as Abraham did, against hope believes in hope. When the soul is at the hardest pinch, faith will say, I will lie at the footstool of the throne of grace until I be thrown from it. I will not away from it. I will wait on till the last moment.

SERMON

PREACHED TO THE CLERGY.

2 COR. v. 20.

Now then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled unto God.

It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that to come to judgment, saith the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Two sad necessities to sinful man. This last, nature's light discovers not; but the other, though it be seldom deep in our thoughts, is almost always before our eyes; and though few seriously remember it, yet none can be ignorant of it. Against this known and universal evil, the chief of heathen moralists, the stoics, have much endeavored to arm themselves. And others have bent the strength of their wits to master the fear of death, and have made themselves, and some of their hearers, conquerors in imagination; but when the king of terrors really appeared, he dashed their stout resolutions, and turned all their big words and looks into appalment.

And the truth is, there are no reasonings in the world able to argue a man into a willingness to part with a present being, without some hopes, at least, of one more happy; nor will any contentedly dislodge, though they dwell never so meanly, except upon terms of changing for the better.

The Christian, then (not the nominal Christian, but he who is truly such), is the only man that can look death immediately in the face; for he knows assuredly that he shall remove to a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

The discourse beginning this chapter, occasioned by the end of the former, continues to the 12th verse, where the apostle subjoins an apology, for his high and confident manner of speaking; which apology serves likewise for a very pertinent re-entry to the main discourse of the former chapter, concerning the worth and work of the ministry. But because of the apostle's frequent, yet seasonable digressions, proleptic and exegetic, divers may model the analysis after divers manners.

To take, then, the discourse as it lies here together, abstract from precedent and consequent, I think it may be divided into these two heads: First, the apostle's resolution for death. Secondly, his course and manner of life. Each is supported with its proper grounds or reasons: the former to verse 9, the other to the end of the chapter.

The resolution is so strong, that he expresses it by the words of earnest desiring and groaning. And this resolution for death, springs from his assurance of life after death: We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. He speaks in his own and his colleague's names. And the whole matter of both is set forth by an elegant continued metaphor. Both the desire and the assurance causing it, are illustrated, First, by their chief cause, verse 5. Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing is God: who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit. Both in his gracious purpose for this, hath he made us, and in a pledge of performance he hath given us earnest, even his Spirit. Then they are illustrated by their subordinate cause, faith, verse 7. For we walk by faith, not by sight.

His course and purpose—for he both signifieth what he doth, and how he intends to continue to do—his course and purpose of life is, in general, to walk acceptably in this absence from the Lord (ver. 9). And in particular, walking diligently and faithfully in the ministry. Ver. 11, 18.

One reason of this course and purpose, is implied in that illative [$\Delta\omega$], which knits this part with the former. And indeed, a good frame of life hath a most necessary connexion with a strong resolution for death, and assurance of life eternal; and they mutually cause one another. That a pious life gives strength against death, and hope of eternal life, none will deny; nor is it less true, that the assurance animates and stirs up to obedience: so far is it from causing sloth, that it is the only spur to acceptable walking. We are confident, saith he (ver. 8), WHEREFORE, we labor to be accepted (ver. 9).

This purpose is further backed with a double reason, viz., of two pious affections; the one of fear, ver. 11, the other of love, ver. 14; that of fear, arising from the consideration of the judgment-seat of Christ; that of love, from the thoughts of his death. Ver. 14. For that love of God constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead. And he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them, and rose again. These are the reasons that stir up this eminent apostle to a study of acceptable walking in all things, particularly in his especial calling, the ministry of his rec-conciliation:—approving himself therein to his God, and as much as may be to the consciences of the people; saying and doing all things with intention of his glory and their good; free from vain glory; not speaking for himself, nor living to himself, but to Him who died for him, and rose again; not possessed with carnal respects touching himself or others; no, nor entertaining carnal considerations of Christ himself, as being ascended, and therefore to be considered and conversed with after a new manner (spiritually) by all those that are new creatures in him, and reconciled to God by him, through the ministry of the word of reconciliation. Which reconciliation God himself hath thus effected (ver. 21). He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Who knew no sin, practically knew none; was altogether free from sin, not only from commission and consent, but from the very first and least motions of sin. And indeed no one was thus fit to be made sin, but one who knew none, an immaculate Lamb. Made him to be sin, not by constraint, not beside his knowledge and consent. The heathens observed, that their sacrifices were successful and unhappy, when the beasts came unwillingly to the altar. We need not fear this point: our blessed sacrifice, who was also priest and altar, offered himself up cheerfully: Then saith he, Lo, I come to do thy will. Heb. x. 7. And I lay down my life for the sheep, saith the good shepherd, John x. 15. To be sin; not only to take the similitude of sinful flesh, but becoming man for man's sake, and to be numbered with transgressors, as the prophet speaks, Isa. liii. 12, and to bear the sin of many, but the imputed guilt and inflicted punishment of sin. And these sins of many made him imputatively an exceedingly great sinner, and therefore he is said to have been made sin, by reason of this imputation; whereupon followed his suffering as a sacrifice. And I conceive, that the reason why the word which in the first language signifies sin, is sometimes taken for the sacrifice, is because the confessed sins were, in a manner, transferred and laid upon the heads of the legal sacrifices. And so saith the prophet, He hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. Isa. liii. 6.

He was then made sin primarily, by imputation of, and consequently, by suffering for, our sins, as our expiatory sacrifice. He made him sin for us, in our stead, and for our good; to wit, our redemption; as follows. That we might be made, or become [γινώσκοντες] the righteousness of God in him; but be it made [διωκόμεθα], it is no otherwise than Christ was made sin imputatively; and if this inference need help, each word that follows will confirm it. Righteousness, not righteous; to show the perfection of it, not to urge its unity. Righteousness, not righteousnesses; as intimating that it is but one righteousness, whereby we are all justified of God. Not our own, but in him, not in ourselves. All which makes it clear, as it were written with the sunbeams, that, by the most gracious exchange, as he took our sins, so he hath given us his righteousness. It is true, this is always accompanied with holiness inherent, but imperfect. By that imputed righteousness, the spouse of Christ is clear as the sun, all luminous; but in regard of infused righteousness, she is only fair as the moon, but the one half light, and that appearing unequally too, waxing and waning, and having spots at its fulness here below. She is holy in this regard, but righteousness in the other righteousness of God; his by appointing, his by gift and application, and his by acceptance. Of God in him; that is, its being in him who is called the Lord our righteousness; in him in whom the Father acquiesceth, and is well pleased. Blessed are they that trust in him.

But to the former, ver. 20. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled unto God.

Here we have all the parties requisite in the treaty of reconciliation. God, though offended, seeking peace with men, his creatures, and by sin become rebels: As though God beseeched you. Christ the only procurer, and likewise the chief ambassador, of this peace. And then, lastly, have we the sub-delegated messengers of this peace: We, as ambassadors for Christ. We, the apostles, and all the ministers of the gospel. For as in their peculiarities, they had no successors, for that is repugnant, so, in those things wherein they have successors, all true ministers of the word are such. The apostle himself calls this embassy, the ministry of reconciliation, ver. 18.

Ambassadors for Christ, that is, in his stead. In this verse, we have the office of the ministry, under the name of ambassadors; and their message, the delivery whereof is the execution of their office, the entreaty of men, to be reconciled to God. Both the office and the message are backed with due authority or warrant. The office's warrant is, that we are ambassadors for Christ, or in his stead; that is, subordinate to him by his own ordination: the warrant of the message is God's own will who sent them, for it is his mind to beseech you by us.

But to resume the first division, whereof each of its two parts will afford its proposition; and upon these two propositions I shall insist, in what remains to be said.

The first proposition is this: from their office, ministers of the gospel are true ambassadors, under Christ, from God to man. As soon as man had divested himself of God's image, his shameful nakedness made him run into the thickets; nor could he ever since then look his Maker directly in the face, nor endure to hear his immediate voice. Therefore, when God himself would come and dwell among men, he veiled his deity with human flesh: there he stood behind the wall, and showed himself through the lattices. Let us not hear again the voice, nor let us see this great fire any more, that we die not, said the people at Horeb; and the Lord who knew their mould, saith, They have said well. Deut. v. 28. I will raise them up a prophet, said God, from among their brethren; like unto thee! and he did so. As he came for man's good, so, for the same end, went he away again: It is expedient for you, saith he, that I go away. John xvi. 7. And since that time he hath continued to send men, men yet liker themselves than he was, men subject to like infirmities, sin not excepted. Even as my Father sent me, so send I you, saith he. John xx. 21. But the loss in this change were intolerable, did he not allay it somewhat by sending his Spirit upon those men whom he sends to men: If I depart I will send him unto you, saith he, John xvi. 7. He is gone indeed, as was necessary, but, being ascended, he caused gifts to descend upon men; Some he gave to be apostles, some prophets, and some evangelists, and pastors, and some teachers; all for the work of the ministry, and that for the perfecting of the saints, and the edifying of his body, Eph. iv. 11, 12.

Thus, then, God treats with man in a human way. He draws not his own to him by immediate revelations, nor rejects he the rest by express words from heaven; but, while he sends his ambassadors indifferently to both, he works differently in them. And the admirable variety of effects of the same message, after the same manner, and at the same time delivered, do not a little set forth and commend that same [πολυρικιδος σοφια του Θεου], manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10); that his word should sweetly melt the hearts of some, and, as it were, more violently break the hearts of others; that it should harden and blind some, mollify and enlighten others; that it should convince those whom yet it converts not, and that by its majesty, though in the mouths of simple men, it should bridle and restrain many of all ranks, whom it renews not: moulding and framing them to an external conformity and square carriage, whereby the world, and the church of God in it especially, are much advantaged. And the lustre of all these effects, is exceedingly set off by the quality of the messengers, being to the world's eye but contemptible men. But had it not been more congruous to the grandeur of this great King, to have sent angels, his ministering spirits, to be the ministers of the word? Had he not better have used those precious vessels for his chief treasure, than to have concredited it to vessels of earth, not to say, to discredit it by so doing? No, his thoughts are not as ours; yea, they are farthest above ours when they seem to be farthest below them. And if we look again, we shall find it more glorious to have conquered so many kingdoms, and brought them to our king, the Lord Jesus, by the preaching of a few fishermen, and such like, than if he had done it by those active spirits. The meanness of the means, raises exceedingly the glory of the sovereign's cause.

Thus we see how the sending of men in this embassy, was requisite for the frailty of man, and how well it suits with the glory of God.

Hence may be deduced some necessary things for all in general, something in particular for these ambassadors, and something for those to whom they are sent.

First, it may persuade all to entertain more respectful thoughts of this function than most men do. Some speak out their disrespect; others, though not expressing it in words, have it lurking in their breasts, and appearing in their practices. To instance in one error or two, which many labor under, springing evidently from a low esteem of this calling.

1. Are there not divers pretenders to it, who being, and possibly finding themselves, insufficient for all other employments, have their recourse to this, making no doubt of their sufficiency for it? Yea, such there are, too many; their worldly friends being guilty either of begetting in them, or of fomenting this presumption. On the other side, be there not others, who, having some advantage of outward rank, or inward endowments, would think themselves, and be thought by those who have interest in them, to be exceedingly disparaged if this calling were mentioned to them, and who would count it a great abasing, yea, a losing of themselves to embrace it? Against these two gross mistakes, may very appositely be opposed this, We are ambassadors for Christ. From which expression it is most evident, that the ministry both requires the best and ablest, and deserves them; that the refuse and objects of men can not be worthy of it, nor it unworthy of the choicest. It requires able men, because they are to be ambassadors; and this will follow of itself. Again, consider, whose ambassadors, and in what business: the ambassadors of the King of kings, in the weighty matter of treating peace between him and mankind. Shall it be said of his ambassadors, as Cato said to those who were sent by the Romans to Bithynia counting that three wants were among them, viz., that they had neither feet, nor head, nor heart?

It is true God may, and sometimes, especially in extraordinary times, does, make use of unlettered and low-qualified men; but then he inlays their defects by a singular supply: therefore, that is no rule for us in the ordinary vocation. It is a piece of God's prerogative, to use unlikely means without disadvantage. Anything is a fit instrument in his hands; but we are to choose the fittest and best means, both in our own affairs, and in his service; and if in any, this eminent service of embassy requires a special choice. If bodily integrity was requisite in the servers at the altar under the law, shall we think that the mentally blind and lame are good enough for the ministration under the gospel, which exceeds in worth and glory? Who is sufficient for these things? saith the great doctor of the Gentiles. Our practices seem to answer, anybody: And it is observable, that carelessness in this kind, is usually the companion of false worship, and too much care of decking, trimming, and making gay the externals of it. It is said of Jeroboam, that he made high places, but priests of the lowest of the people, 1 Kings xii. 31. As it was said, that the church had. As he said of "golden cups and wooden priests," so we may say of that church which values them so much, they are well looked to, neatly adorned, but their priests grossly ignorant.

This function requires able men, being a weighty charge, and is worthy of them, being highly honorable. And doubtless, there is egregious profaneness in the contrary thoughts. The heathen can style those stones more happy than common ones, which are chosen for the building of temples, and among these, the altar-stones the happiest. And shall we not account truly happy, those living stones, which are hewn out for God's building, and chiefly (so to speak), the altar-stones, the messengers of peace? What can be more honorable than to serve the highest Lord in the chiefest functions of his house? How ought we to account of an ambassador's place, when King David esteemed so highly a door-keeper's office in this king's court!

2. We are ambassadors. This may correct another error in the world, though accounted by those that entertain it, a choice piece of policy for God. It is this: the ministry being so mean a thing in the world's eye, and so obnoxious to contempt, it is expedient that it be raised and brought into credit by annexed excessive dignities, high titles of honor, and suitable revenues. It is true, that penury and want of competency in temporals, in those who bring an eternal treasure, argues base ingratitude, and is most unworthy of well-constituted churches. But where the remedy exceeds too far, it becomes worse than the disease, being compounded of carnal prudence and ambition, both of which are enmity to God. And this I take to have been one of Germany's provoking sins, and Rome's predominant sin. For these incongruous honors, to speak it in a word, raising some from contempt, teach them to condemn and insult over their brethren; to say nothing of their affronting of higher quality, yea, of princes and kings themselves, while they pretend to be the only supporters of their crowns. And if this their insolency in advancement, devolve them back again in contempt, and their honor become their shame, they may thank themselves. Their Master taught them another method of attaining due esteem. He hath given honor enough to those whom he hath made his ambassadors; and if men condemn this, he takes the indignity as done to himself, and he is able enough to vindicate his own honor. Let men esteem of us, as the ministers of Christ, 1 Cor. iv. 1. Here is all the esteem St. Paul requires; and they are unworthy of this who are not content with it. Their best way, whom God employs, is to study his glory, and he will not fail to honor those that honor him.

And this leads me fitly on from the conviction of these common errors, to a word of particular exhortation to those ambassadors, from the nature of their calling so expressed. And it binds upon them chiefly these four duties: 1. Piety. 2. Prudence. 3. Fidelity. 4. Magnanimity.

Piety, in two steps or degrees: first, to look they be friends with God; secondly, to labor to be inward with him.

[1.] They are to look that they be friends with God. For it no way suits that they be ambassadors for reconciliation, who are not themselves reconciled: it is certain such will move both coldly and successfully in the work. What he can do extraordinarily who doth always what he wills in heaven and earth, we question not. He can convey grace by those to whom he gives none. He can cause them to carry this treasure, and have no share in it; carry the letter and not know what is in it; and make them, so to speak, equivocal causes of conversion.

But, usually, he converts those whom he makes the happy strengtheners of their brethren, Luke xxii. 32. We think, that they who savingly know not Christ, should not be fit to make other men acquainted with him. He who can tell men what God hath done for his soul, is the likeliest to bring their souls to God. Hardly can he speak to the heart, who speaks not from it. Si vis me flere, &c. Before the cock crows to others, he claps his wings, and rouses up himself. How can a frozen-hearted creature warm his hearers' hearts, and enkindle them with the love of God? But he whom the love of Christ constrains, his lively recommendations of Christ, and speeches of love, shall sweetly constrain others to love him. Above all loves, it is most true of this, that none can speak sensibly of it, but they that have felt it. Our most requisite pulpit-orators, yea, speak they with the tongues of men and angels, without the experience of this love, are no fit ambassadors for Christ, for his embassy is a love-treaty. Such men are but sounding brass, and tinkling cymbals. The sublimest and best contrived of their discourses, glow-worm like, are as those foolish fires, may have some light with them, heat they have none. When a man speaks of reconciliation and happiness, as if he had some interest therein himself—when his words are animated with affection, as he is like to beget some affection where there is none—so, a pious hearer that is already gained to Christ, finds the embassy drawing him effectually nearer heaven, blowing that Divine fire that is within him, and causing it to mount upward. As in water, face answereth to face, so doth the heart of man to man, saith the wise man, Prov. xxvii.

19. There is a certain peculiar sympathy and sweet correspondence between souls that lodge the same spirit. Those that are united to the same Head, Christ, by reconciliation, find their hearts agreed, and they relish the discourses one of another. Thus important is it every way, both for the begetting and for the strengthening of grace, that the ambassador thereof be a reconciled person.

[2.] As he must look that he be friends with God, so, secondly, he must labor also to be inward with God. For though the embassy be the same, in great part, in the mouths of all God's ambassadors, yet there is a world of mysterious particulars contained in it, and they meet with many intricate pieces in their particular treaties with men's consciences. And in these, know they the will of the King, their master, more or less clearly, according as they are more or less intimate with him. How knew divine Moses so much of the Lord's will, but by much converse with him?

These ambassadors, to the end that they may do so, must labor for integrity. His secret is with the righteous. For humility. He is familiar indeed with the lowly; he takes up house with them: With such a one will I dwell, saith the Lord. God's choice acquaintance are humble men. For the spirit of meekness. He whom we named was eminent in this, and so, in familiarity with God. Christ singularly loves the meek and lowly, they are so like himself. One thing they must mainly take heed of, if they aspire to a holy familiarity with God: earthly-mindedness. If no servant of the god of mammon can serve this God in point of common service, how much less can he be fit for an eminent employment, as an embassy, and enjoy the intimacy requisite for that employment! These messengers should come near the life of angels, always beholding the face of the Father of lights. But if their affections be engaged to the world, their faces will still be that way. Fly high they may, sometimes, in some speculations of their own; but, like the eagle, for all their soaring, their eye will still be upon some prey, some carrion here below. Upright, meek, humble, and heavenly minds, then, must the ambassadors of this great King have, and so obtain his intimacy, mounting upon those wings of prayer and meditation, and having the eye of faith upward. Thus shall they learn more of his choice mysteries in one hour, than by many days' poring upon casuists and schoolmen, and such like. This ought to be done, I confess; but above all, the other must not be omitted. Their chief study should be, that of their commission, the Holy Scriptures. The way to speak skilfully from God, is, often to hear him speak. The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned, saith the evangelic prophet (chiefly intending Christ), to speak a word in season to the weary. Ay, that is the learnedest tongue, when all is done. But how?—He wakeneth me morning by morning; he wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned. Isa. l. 4.

Thus we see how these ambassadors have need to be friends, and intimate friends with their Lord. For if they be much with God in the mount, their returns to men will be with brightness in their faces, and the law in their hand; their lives and their doctrines shall be heavenly.

2. The second requisite of these ambassadors is prudence, or dexterity to manage their Master's business. Wise princes and states, in choosing their ambassadors, above all other kinds of learning, have respect to practical abilities; and they that can best read the several geniuses and dispositions of several nations and particular men, and accordingly know how to treat with every one according to their temper, to speak to them in their own language, are judged the fittest men for that employment. Great is the diversity of humors among men: some are timorous, some rash, some avaricious, some ambitious, some slow and leaden, others precipitant and mercurial, and many other varieties. Now, to know how to deal with each of these in their own kind, for the advancement of his Master's business, is a special discretion in an ambassador. And those ambassadors we speak of, had as much need of it as any: they have men of all, both outward and inward differences, to deal with, and the same men so different from themselves at divers times, that they are hardly the same; some ignorant, others learned, some weak, others strong, some secure with false presumptions, others tormented with false fears. And much prudent consideration of those differences, and accommodating themselves thereunto in the matter and manner of their discourses, is very expedient in their treaties. Of some have compassion, plucking them out of the fire, making a difference. Jude 22. What other is St. Paul's becoming all things to all men, that he might win some? 1 Cor. ix. 22. And this policy is far different from temporizing, and compliance with evil, which in no case can be tolerated in these ambassadors, for that is disadvantageous to their business: it may be the way of their own promotion, but it is not the way to advance their Master's kingdom, which end should be the square of all their contrivances, and with it nothing will suit but what is upright. A kind of guile they may use, but it must carry their King's impress; it must be a holy guile; and such the ministers of the gospel not only may, but ought to study. Fishers of men they are, and why may they not use certain baits, and diversity of them? But as their catching is not destructive, but saving, so must all their baits be. They must quarter dovelike simplicity and serpentine wisdom together, as he commanded them, who sent them on this embassy.

3. Their third duty is fidelity; and that both in the matter of their embassy, and in the manner of delivering it. In the matter they must look to their commission, and declare the whole counsel of God, not adding nor abating anything. We know how heinously kings take the presumption of their ambassadors in this kind; though reason be pretended, and perhaps justly, yet even they account obedience better than sacrifice; yea, some of them have been so precise and tender of their prerogative, that they have preferred a damageable affront to their commands, before a profitable breach of them. And above all kings, this King, who is above them all, hath good reason to be punctual in this; for princes' instructions may be imperfect, and as things may fall out, prejudicial to their purpose, but his are most complete, and always so suitable to his end, that they can not be bettered. The matter, then, of this embassy is unalterable; in that, these ambassadors must be faithful. Faithful, also, in the manner of delivering it; with singleness and diligence. [1.] With singleness, free from by-respects, not seeking their own honor or advantage, but their Master's; abasing themselves where need is, that he may be magnified; never hazarding the least part of his rights for the greatest benefit that could accrue to themselves. The treachery of an ambassador is of all the most intolerable; to deceive under trust. If any who bear the name of God's legates, think to deceive him, they deceive themselves. He can not be mocked. They must all appear before his judgment-seat, and be unveiled before men and angels. Knowing, therefore, the terrors of the Lord, let them go about his work with candor and singleness of heart. And [2.] with diligence. He that is diligent in his work, shall stand before princes, saith the wise prince, Prov. xxii. 29. The great Prince of Peace shall admit those to stand eminently before him who are diligent in his embassy of peace. Such are they who make it their meat and their drink, as Christ himself did, who accept all occasions, yea, seek and make occasions, to treat with men for God. That oracle-like preaching of one sermon or two in a year is far from this sedulity and instancy in treating, which are requisite in God's ambassadors. The prince of darkness hath more industrious agents than so: they compass sea and land to make a proselyte; they hold to it, and are content to lose many a labor, that some one may prosper.

And this may meet with the discontent that some ministers take at their great pains and little success. We see, Satan's ministers can comport with this. Since it is no just exception against God's work, still be in thy business, and refer the issue to thy Master. Wait on God, and do good, saith the royal psalmist, Psalm xxxvii. 3. Sow thy seed in the morning, and in the evening withhold not thy hand; for thou knowest not which will prosper, saith the wise son, Eccl. xi. 6. As the moralist speaks of benefits, a man may lose many words among the people, that some one may not be lost. I am all things to all, saith the apostle, that I may gain some. 1 Cor. ix. 20. And though in continuing diligent, thy diligence should still continue fruitless to others, to thee it shall not be so. Thy God is a discreet Lord: as he hath not put events into thy hand, he will not exact them at thy hands. Thou art to be accountable for planting and watering, but not for the increase. Be not wanting in thy task, and thou shalt not want thy recompense. Shouldst thou be forced to say with the prophet, I have labored in vain, and spent my strength for naught, in regard of success, yet, if thou hast labored, so labored as to spend thy strength in that service, thou must add with him, Yet surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work with my God. Isa. xlix. 4.

4. The last duty recommendable to these ambassadors is magnanimity, which is no less needful than the preceding. Many a difficulty and discouragement is to be encountered in this service; and, which is worse, some temptations of prosperity and advancement. If you persist to plead freely for your Master, you shall be the very mark of the world's enmity. What mischief is there that Christ hath not foretold his disciples to expect at their hands? For Christ circumvents no man to his service; he tells them what they shall meet with: They shall prosecute you through their courts, ecclesiastical and civil; deliver you up to councils, and scourge you in their synagogues, and accuse before governors and kings (Matt. x. 17); yea, they shall think they do God good service when they kill you, his own ambassadors. Many mountains are to be climbed in going this embassy, and the rage of many a tempest to be endured. His animis opus est, et pectore firmo. Courage, then, ambassadors of the Most High! See if you can rise above the world, and tread upon her frownings with the one foot, and her deceitful smilings with the other. Slight her proffers, and contemn likewise her contempts. There is honor enough in the employment, to cause you to answer all oppositions with disdain. Let it be as impossible to turn you aside from your integrity, as the sun from its course. For that message which you carry shall be glorious in the end: it shall conquer all opposite powers. When you seem exposed in your voyage to the fury of winds and waves, remember what you carry. Cæsarem vehis, et fortunam ejus, as he said; it can not suffer shipwreck. Let no sufferings dismay you. For a generous ambassador will always account it far more honorable to suffer the worst things for doing the best service he can to his master, than to enjoy the world's best rewards for the least point of disloyalty. And if ever Master was worthy the suffering for, yours is. Happy are you when they persecute you for his sake, as himself hath told, Matthew v. 10. There are honorable examples to look back to—So persecuted they the prophets; and a precious recompense to look forward to—Great is your reward in heaven.

Our blessed Redeemer refused no hardships for the working out of this peace, which is your embassy. He knew what entertainment did abide him in the world, what contempts would be put upon him by mankind whom he came to redeem; he knew of the full cup of his Father's wrath, that he was to drink for them; yet resolution arising from love, climbed over all these mountains, and happily conquering all those difficulties, attained the desired end. Worthy ambassadors, follow this generous Leader in promulgating the peace he hath purchased. Tread his steps who endured the cross and despised the shame, and your journey's end shall be suitable to his who is set down at the right hand of the Father. Heb. xii. 2. Well did St. Paul study this copy when he said, I know that bonds abide me everywhere; but I care for none of these things, so that I may finish my course with joy. Acts xx. 24. The looking over to that great end, is the great means of surmounting the hardest things that intervene. The eying of that much, will make an undaunted ambassador. And that this lesson of courage is very pertinent for them, will appear by Christ's own urging it upon the first legates he sent out, when he dwelt here below: Fear not, saith he, them that can kill the body, &c., Matt. x. 28; where, methinks, he propounds, as the chief incentive of courage to these ambassadors, the joint consideration of those to whom they are sent, and of Him who sends them. For, seriously considered, it must needs be found most incongruous, that ambassadors of God should be afraid to speak to men. Fear not them; the utmost they can do, reacheth no farther than the tabernacles of clay. Nor can they touch that without permission: not a hair of their head falls without notice of their Master. But suppose the highest, let them kill the body; thither goes their rage and no farther. But fear Him who can kill both the body and soul. Fear not, but fear. As this fear hath better cause, so it is the only expelling cause of the other fear. Nothing begets so generous and undaunted spirits as the fear of God: no other fear, none of those base ones that torment worldly men, dare claim room where that fear lodgeth. The only cause of these legates' fears is the inconsideration of their Master. Would they remember him much, it would ennoble their spirits to encounter the hardest evils of life, and death itself, courageously in his service. Their reward is preserved for them, and they for it; yea, it alone puts them into full possession. For their Master, beyond all kings, hath this privilege: he can not only restore life lost in his service, but, for a life subject to death, yea, a dying life, can give immortality, and, for their sufferings, light and momentary, an eternal weight of glory. Let them be impoverished in his service, it is the best bargain in the world to lose all for him. Let them be scourged and stigmatized, for the ignominy of these sufferings, the spirit of glory shall rest upon them. If that Persian prince could so prize his Zopyrus, who was mangled for his service, how much more will this Lord esteem those who suffer so for him! He is the tenderest King over his servants in the world. Those who touch them, touch the apple of his eye. Let his messengers, then, despise the worst the world can do against them; yea, let them say of death, as he said of it to his adversaries, Anytus and Melitus, Kill me they may, but they can not hurt me.

The lessons to those to whom these ambassadors are sent, are: 1st. Do not dishonor them. Remember David and the king of Ammon. No king resents this so much as God: He that despiseth you, despiseth me.

2dly. Slight not their message: know whence it comes. This not discerning of holy things, is the pest of Christians. The apostle specifieth it in the Lord's body, 1 Cor. xi. 29; it is so in the Lord's word. He condescends, in using earthen creatures, to explain the choicest of heavenly mysteries, and earthen vessels to convey these treasures. And if that which he intended for their advantage, the wretched sons of men make it a stumbling-block, and if they contemn the grace, for the meanness of the persons that are made conveyors and instruments of it, what may they expect?

3dly. Respect even the ambassadors for his sake whom they represent, counting them worthy of double honor. For this is the will of your Lord and their Lord, your King and their King. And to this King immortal, be all honor, and glory, and praise, by all the churches, world without end. Amen.

EXPOSITIONS.

EXPOSITION OF THE CREED.

1 TIM. iii. 9.

Holding the mystery of faith in a pure conscience.

THAT which was the apostle's practice, as he expresses it, 1 Cor. ix. 22, is the standing duty of all the ministers of the same gospel: To the weak to become as weak, to gain the weak, and all things to all men, that if by any means they may save some. And truly, one main part of the observance of that rule, is, in descending to the instruction of the most ignorant in the principles of the Christian religion. What I aim at, at this time, is, a very brief and plain exposition of the articles of our faith as we have them in that summary confession; not staying you at all on the antiquity and authority of it, both of which are confessed. Whether it was penned by the apostles, or by others in their time, or soon after it, it doth very clearly and briefly contain the main of their divine doctrine.

But though it be altogether consonant with the Scriptures, yet, not being a part of the canon of them, I choose these words as pertinent to our intended explication of it. They are, indeed, here, as they stand in the context, a rule for deacons; but without question, taken in general, they express the great duty of all who are Christians, to keep the mystery of faith, in a pure conscience.

You see clearly in them a rich jewel, and a precious cabinet fit for it; the mystery of faith laid up and kept in a pure conscience. And these two are not only suitable but inseparable, as we see in the first chapter of this epistle, ver. 10: they are preserved and lost together, they suffer the same shipwreck; the casting away of the one, is the shipwreck of the other: if the one perish, the other can not escape. Every believer is the temple of God; and as the tables of the law were kept in the ark, this pure conscience is the ark that holds the mystery of faith. You think you are believers, you do not question that, and would take it ill that others should. It is very hard to convince men of unbelief, directly and in itself. But if you do believe this truth, that the only receptacle of saving faith, is, a purified conscience, then, I beseech you, question yourselves concerning that: being truly answered in it, it will resolve you touching your faith, which you are so loath to question in itself. Are your consciences pure? Have you a living hatred and antipathy against all impurity? Then, surely, faith is there; for it is the peculiar virtue of faith to purify the heart (Acts xv. 9), and the heart so purified, is the proper residence of faith, where it dwells and rests as in its natural place. But have you consciences that can lodge pride, and lust, and malice, and covetousness, and such like pollutions? Then, be no more so impudent as to say, you believe, nor deceive yourselves so far as to think you do. The blood of Christ never speaks peace to any conscience but the same that it purifies from dead works to serve the living God. Heb. ix, 13, 14. As that blood is a sacrifice to appease God's wrath, so, it is a laver to wash our souls; and, to serve both ends, it is as was the blood of legal sacrifices, both offered up to God and sprinkled upon us, as both are expressed in the apostle's words there. Do not think that God will throw this jewel of faith into a sty or kennel, a conscience full of defilement and uncleanness. Therefore, if you have any mind to these comforts and the peace that faith brings along with it, be careful to lodge it where it delights to dwell, in a pure conscience. Notwithstanding the unbelieving world mocks the name of purity, yet, study you, above all, that purity and holiness which may make your souls a fit abode for faith, and for that peace which it worketh, and for that Holy Spirit who works both in you.

Faith is either the doctrine which we believe, or that grace by which we believe that doctrine. Here, I conceive, it is both, met and united in the soul. As they say of the understanding in the schools, Intelligendo fit illud quod intelligit, so, faith, apprehending its proper object, is made one with it. Faith is kept in a pure conscience; that is, both that pure doctrine of the gospel which faith receives, and that faith which receives it, are together fitly placed and preserved, when they are laid up in a pure conscience. The doctrine of faith can not be received into, nor laid up in the soul, but by that faith which believes it, and that faith hath no being, without believing that doctrine. And both are fitly called the mystery of faith. The doctrine is mysterious, and it is a mysterious work, to beget faith in the heart to receive it. For the things we must believe, are very high and heavenly, and our hearts are earthly and base till the spirit renew them. In our confession of faith we have both expressed. The first word, is a profession of faith, which receives the doctrine as true, I believe; and the articles themselves contain the sum of the doctrine believed. And if we who profess this faith, have within us pure consciences, wherein the mystery of faith—the doctrine of faith believed, and the grace of faith believing it, both together as one—may reside, dwell, and be preserved, then is the text completely answered in the present subject.

Remember, then, since we profess this faith, which is the proper seat of faith. Not our books, our tongues only, or memories, or judgment, but our conscience; and not our natural conscience defiled and stuffed with sin, but renewed and sanctified by grace. Holding the mystery of faith in a pure conscience.

I believe in God the Father :

Not to insist here on the nature of faith, taking it as comprehensively as we can, it is no other than a supernatural belief of God, and confidence in him. Whether we call God, or the word of God, the object of faith, there is no material difference; for it is God in the word, as revealed by the word, that is that object. God is that veritas incomplexa (as they speak) which faith embraces; and the word, the veritas complexa which contains what we are to conceive of God, and to believe concerning him. As in the gospel, the peculiar object of that faith which saves fallen man, it is all one whether we say it is Christ or the promises; for it is Christ revealed and held forth in the promises, that faith lays hold on. In him are all the promises of God, yea, and in him, Amen. 2 Cor. i. 20. So that it is all one act of faith that lays hold on Christ, and on the promises, for they are all one: he is in them, and therefore faith rests on them, because they include Christ who is our rest and our peace; as a man at once receives a ring and the precious stone that is set in it. This once rightly understood, any further dispute about placing faith in the understanding or in the will, is, possibly, in itself not at all needful: sure I am, it is no way useful for you. Take heed of carnal, profane presumption, for that will undo you; and labor to be sure of such a faith as dwells in a pure conscience, and it will be sure not to deceive you.

That confidence which this expression bears, believing in God, supposes certainly (as all agree), a right belief concerning God, both that he is, and what he is, according as the word reveals him: especially what he is relating to us. These three we have together, Heb. xi. 6. He that cometh to God must believe that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. 1. That he is. 2. To trust his word, believing that he is true to his promises, a rewarder of them that seek him. 3. Upon these follows coming to him, which is this believing in that God which the apostle speaks of, that reliance and resting of the soul upon him, which results from that right belief concerning him, and trusting the testimony of his word, as it reveals him.

We have discoursed of the attributes of God elsewhere, as also of the Trinity, which is here expressed in these words: I believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. That sublime mystery is to be cautiously treated of, and rather humbly to be admired, than curiously dived into. The day will come (truly, a day, for here we are beset with the gloomy nightly shades of ignorance), wherein we shall see him as he is. 1 John iii. 2. In the meantime, let us devoutly worship him, as he has revealed himself to us; for this is the true way to that heavenly country where we shall see him face to face. And it is our interest here to believe the Trinity of persons in the Unity of the Godhead, and to trust in them as such: for this is the spring of all our hope, that the Middle of the THREE became our Mediator, and the Holy Spirit our guide and teacher, and the Father reconciles us to himself by the Son, and renews us by the Spirit.

The Father.] First, the Father of his only begotten Son, Christ, and through him, our Father by the grace of adoption. And so Christ does clearly insinuate the order of our filiation: I ascend to my Father and your Father, my God and your God. He says not, to our Father, but, to my Father and your Father; first mine, and then yours through me.

Almighty.] This also belongs to the attributes of God; so we shall be but short on it here. Almighty, able in himself to do all things, and the source of all power in others, all the power in the creature being derived from him; so that it can not altogether equal his, nor resist him, no, nor at all be without him. Whosoever they be who boast in their own strength in any kind, and swell highest in conceit of it, they are yet but as brittle glass in the hand of God: he can not only break it to pieces by the strength of his hand, but if he do but withdraw his hand from supporting it, it will fall and break of itself.

Maker of heaven and earth.] The Son and the Spirit were, with the Father, authors of the creation: but it is ascribed to the Father, particularly in regard of the order and manner of their working. Whether natural reason may evince the creation of the world, we will not dispute; we know that he who had very much of that, and who is the great master of it in the schools, could not see it by that light. Yet there is enough in reason to answer all the false cavils of profane men, and very much to justify the truth of this we believe. However, we must endeavor to believe it by Divine faith, according to that of the apostle, Heb. xi. 3. By faith we believe that the worlds were framed by the word of God. And this is the first article we meet withal in the Scriptures, and our faith is put to it in a very high point in the very entrance, Gen. i. 1. In the beginning God made the heaven and the earth—speaking like himself; it is not proved by demonstrations, or any kind of arguments, but is asserted by the authority of God. And with that which begins the books of the law, John begins his gospel; that upon his word who, by his word, made the world, we may believe that he did so. This is fitly added to the title of Almighty, as a work of almighty power, and therefore a clear testimony of it; and both together well suit with our profession of believing in him. For this is a main support of our faith, to be persuaded of his power on whom we trust. Our God is able to deliver us, said they, Dan. iii. 17. And Abraham, the apostle says, offered up his son, accounting (or reasoning with himself, or laying his reckoning) that God was able to raise him from the dead, Heb. xi. 19.

We make more bold to speak out our own questioning of the love and good-will of God, because we think we have some reason in that from our own unworthiness; but if we would sound our own hearts, we should often find in our distrust some secret doubts of God's power, Psalm lxxviii. 19. Can God prepare a table in the wilderness? said they; though accustomed to miracles, yet still unbelieving. We think we are strongly enough persuaded of this, but our hearts deceive us. Quæ scimus cum necesse non est, ea in necessitate nescimus, says Bernard: The things which we seem to know when it is not necessary for us to know them, we find, when necessary, that we know not. The heart is deceitful, Jer. xvii. 9—where he is speaking of trusting. It is not for nothing, that God by his prophets so often inculcates this doctrine of his power, and this great instance of it, the creation, when he promises great deliverances to his church, and the destruction of their enemies. See Isa. xlv. 12, and li. 12. What can be too hard for him, who found it not too hard to make a world of nothing? If thou look on the public, the enemies of the church are strong: if on thyself, thou hast indeed strong corruptions within, and strong temptations without: yet, none of these are almighty, as thy God is. What is it thou wouldst have done, that he can not do if he think fit? And if he think it not fit, if thou art one of his children, thou wilt think with him; thou wilt reverence his wisdom, and rest satisfied with his will. This is believing indeed; the rolling all our desires and burdens over upon an almighty God, and where this is, it can not choose but establish the heart in the midst of troubles, and give it a calm within in the midst of the greatest storms.

And try what other confidences you will, they shall prove vain and lying in the day of trouble. He that thinks to quiet his mind and find rest by worldly comfort, is, as Solomon compares his drunkard, like one that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or, that sleepeth on the top of a mast, Prov. xxiii. 34: he can have but unsettled rest and repose that lies there. But he that trusteth in the Lord, is as Mount Sion that can not be removed. Psalm cxxv. 1. When we lean upon other props beside God, they prove broken reeds, that not only fail, but pierce the hand that leans on them. Jer. xvii. 7.

There is yet another thing in this article, which serves further to uphold our faith, that of necessity. He who made the world by his power, doth likewise rule it by his providence. It is so great a fabric as can not be upheld and governed by any less power than that which made it. He did not frame this world as the carpenter his ship, to put it into other hands and look no more after it; but as he made it, so he is the continual pilot of it, sits still at the helm, and guides it; yea, he commands the winds and seas, and they obey him. And this serves much for the comfort of the godly, but I can not here insist on it.

And in Jesus Christ.]

The two great works of God, by which he is known to us, are creation and redemption, which is a new or second creation. The Son of God, as God, was with the Father, as the worker of the former; but as God-man, he is the author of the latter. St. John begins his gospel with the first, and from that passes on to the second. In the beginning was the Word—by him were all things made. But at verse 14, the other is expressed: The Word was made flesh, and he dwelt among us, had a tent like ours, and made of the same materials. He adds, He was full of grace and truth; and for this end (as there follows), that we might all receive of his fulness, grace for grace. And this is that great work of new creation. Therefore the prophet Isaiah, foretelling this great work from the Lord's own mouth, speaks of it in these terms, ch. li. 16: That I may plant the heavens and lay the foundation of the earth, and say unto Sion, Thou art my people. That making of a new people to himself in Christ, is as the framing of heaven and earth. Now this restoration by Jesus Christ, supposes the ruin and misery of man by his fall, that sin and death under which he is born. This we all seem to know, and acknowledge, and well we may, for we daily feel the woful fruits of that bitter root; but the truth is, the greatest part of us are not fully convinced, and therefore do not consider this gulf of wretchedness into which we are fallen. If we were, there would be more cries among us for help to be drawn out and delivered from it: this great Deliverer, this Savior would be of more use, and of more esteem with us. But I can not now insist on that point.

Only consider, that this makes the necessity of a Mediator. The disunion and distance which sin hath made between God and man, can not be made up but by a Mediator, one to come between; so that there is now no believing in God the Father, but by this believing in Jesus his Son; no appearing without horror, yea, without perdition, before so just a Judge highly offended, but by the intervention of so powerful a Reconciler, able to satisfy and appease him. And he tells it us plainly and graciously, that we mistake not our way, No man cometh unto the Father but by me, John xiv. 6.

Few are our thoughts concerning God and returning to him; but if we have any, this is our unhappiness, that naturally we are subject to leave out Christ in them. We think there is something to be done: we talk of repentance, of prayer, and of amendment, though we have not these neither. But if we had these, there is yet one thing necessary above all these, which we forget; there is absolute need of a Mediator to make our peace, and restore us into favor with God, one who must for that end do and suffer for us what we can neither do nor suffer. Though we could shed rivers of tears, they can not wash out the stain of any one sin; yea, there is some pollution in our very tears, so that they themselves have need to be washed in the blood of Jesus Christ.

Jesus Christ.] Our anointed Savior, anointed to be our King, our great High Priest, and our Prophet, and in all these, our Savior: our prophet to teach us the way of salvation, our priest to purchase it for us, and our king to lead and protect us in the way, and to bring us safe to the end of it. Thus is his name full of sweetness and comfort, Mel in ore, in aure melos, in corde medicina, as Bernard speaks: Honey in the mouth, music to the ear, a cordial to the heart. It is a rich ointment, and, in the preaching of the gospel, an ointment poured forth (Cant. i. 3), diffusing its fragrant smell, for which the virgins, the chaste, purified souls of believers, love him; such as have their senses exercised, as the apostle speaks (Hebrews v. 14), their spiritual smelling not obstructed with the pollutions of the world, but quick and open to receive and be refreshed with the smell of this precious name of Jesus.

His only Son.] Other sons he hath, angels and men, by creation, and adoption, but this his only begotten Son, as God, by eternal and ineffable generation, and as man, peculiarly the Son of God, both in regard of his singular unexampled conception by the Holy Ghost, and by that personal union with the Deity which accompanied that conception, and by that fulness of all grace which flowed from that union. The unfolding of these would require a long time, and, after all, more would remain unsaid and unconceived by us; for, his generation who can declare? Isaiah liii. 8.

Let us remember this, that our sonship is the product of his. He is the only begotten Son of God, and yet, To as many as receive him, he gave this privilege, to be the sons of God. John i. 12 and 14.

Our Lord.] Both by our loyal subjection to him, and our peculiar interest in him: these go together. Willing subjection and obedience to his laws, is an inseparable companion, and therefore a certain evidence of our interest in his grace.

Conceived by the Holy Ghost.]

This is that great mystery of godliness, God manifested in the flesh; the King of Glory after a manner divesting himself of his royal robes, and truly putting on the form of a servant, the Holy Ghost framing him a body in the Virgin's womb. Not that it was impossible to have made his human nature sinless in the ordinary way (though the schools usually give that reason), but that by that miraculous and peculiar manner of birth, he might be declared to be more than man, as being a way more congruous both to the greatness of his person and the purity of his human nature.

Born of the Virgin Mary.]

He was not only of the same nature with man, which he might have been by a new-created humanity, but of the same stock, and so, a fit Savior, a near kinsman, as the word which in Hebrew is a Redeemer, doth signify; bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. We see, then, the person of our Mediator is very fit for that his office, having both the natures of the parties at variance which he was to reconcile. And this happy meeting of God and man in the person of Christ, to look no further, was a very great step to the agreement, and a strong pledge of its accomplishment. To see the nature of man who was an enemy, received into so close embraces with the Deity, as within the compass of one person, promised infallibly a reconciliation of the persons of men unto God. There the treaty of peace began, and was exceedingly promoted by that very beginning, so that, in it, there was a sure presage of the success: it was indeed, as they say of a good beginning, dimidium facti, half done. Had God and man treated anywhere but in the person of Christ, a peace had never been concluded, yea, it had broken up first; but being in him, it could not fail, for in him they were already one, one person, so there they could not but agree. God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself. 2 Cor. v. 19.

Considering the work to be done in this agreement, as well as the persons to be agreed, it was altogether needful that the Undertaker should be God and man, Humana Divinitas et Divina humanitas. The mediation was not a bare matter of word, but there was such a wrong done as required a satisfaction should be made. We speak not of what God might absolutely have done, but what was to be done suitable to God's end, which was for the joint glory of justice and mercy, that mercy and truth might meet, and righteousness and peace kiss each other. And because the party offending was not able for it, he that would effectually sue for him, must likewise satisfy for him. And this Jesus Christ did, as here follows. Now, that he might do this, it was necessary that he should be God able to save, and man fit to save man; man that he might suffer, and God that his sufferings might be satisfying: man that he might die, and God that his death might have value to purchase life to us.

The Son was fit to be incarnate for this work, the Middle Person in the Godhead to be man's mediator with God. That which we had lost, was, the dignity of the sons of God, and therefore his only Son alone was fit to restore us to it. The beauty defaced in us was, the image of God; therefore the repairing and reimpartment of it was a fit work for his purest and most perfect image, his Son, the character of his person, Heb. i. 3.

Now, this incarnation of the Word, the Son of God, is the foundation of all our hopes; the sense of that great promise, The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, and of many others of the same substance in the prophets; the great salvation so often foretold, and so long expected by the Jews. When this was fulfilled, that a virgin did conceive by the Holy Ghost, then did the heavens drop down righteousness from above, and the earth bring forth salvation. Isa. xlv. 8. This seems to be that which the church did so earnestly wish, Oh, that thou wert as my brother! Cant. viii. 1.

Suffered under Pontius Pilate.]

Though all his life was one continual act of suffering, from his living in the cratch to his hanging on the cross, yet, because of the shortness of this confession, as likewise because this last act was the greatest, and most remarkable of his sufferings, and the Scripture itself doth, as such, mention it most frequently, therefore it is here immediately subjoined to the article of his birth.

It is not for nothing that we have the name of the Roman judge here expressed, under whom he suffered: though it is nothing to his credit, yet it is to the credit of Divine wisdom, even this; considering the nature and end of Christ's death, it being to satisfy a pronounced sentence of justice, though for others, it was a very agreeable circumstance, that he should not be suddenly or tumultuously murdered, but be judicially, though unjustly, conderaned.

Crucified.] Besides, it made his sufferings more public and solemn: and the Divine providence ordered this, that he should suffer under a Roman judge, and so fall under this Roman kind of punishment, being in itself a very shameful and painful kind of death, and, by the sentence of the law, accused, that we might have the more evidence of our deliverance from that shame, and pain, and curse, that were due to us. The chastisement of our peace was upon him, says the prophet, and by his stripes we are healed. Isaiah liii. 5.

Suffered.] That he died, and what kind of death, you see, is expressed. But as many particular sufferings of his body are not here mentioned, so none of those of his soul, but all are comprehended in this general word, He suffered. Those were too great to be duly expressed in so short a form, and therefore are better expressed by supposing them, and including them only, in this, He suffered. As he that drew the father, among others, beholding the sacrificing of his own daughter, signified the grief of the rest in their gestures, and visages, and tears, but drew the father veiled; so here, the crucifying and death of our Savior are expressed, but the unspeakable conflicts of his soul are veiled under the general term of suffering. But surely, that invisible cup which came from his Father's hand, was far more bitter than the gall and vinegar from the hand of his enemies; the piercing of his soul, far sharper than the nails and thorns. He could answer these sweetly with, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. But those other pangs drew from him another kind of word, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

Died.] No less would serve, and therefore he was obedient even unto the death, as the sentence against us did bear, and the sacrifice of the law did prefigure. When the sacrifices drew back and went unwillingly to the place, the heathens accounted it an ill presage. Never was sacrifice more willing than Christ. I lay down my life for my sheep, says he, and no man taketh it from me, John x. 15, 18. As a sheep before the shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth. He gave his back to the smiters. Isa. liii. 7. For this hour came I into the world, John xviii. 37. And this death is our life; though by it we are not freed from this temporal death, yet, which is infinitely more, we are delivered from eternal death, and which is yet more, entitled to eternal life; and therefore do no more suffer this temporal death as a curse, but enjoy it as a blessing, and may look upon it now (such as are in Christ, none other) not only as a day of deliverance, but of coronation, the exchange of our present rags for long white robes, and a crown that fadeth not away.

Buried.] For the further assurance of his death and glory of his resurrection; as likewise to commend the grave to us, as now a very sweet resting-place; he hath warmed the cold bed of the grave to a Christian, that he needs not fear to lie down in it, nor doubt that he shall rise again, as we know, and after to hear that he did.

Descended into hell.] The more noise there hath been about this clause, I shall make the less. The conceit of the descent of Christ's soul into the place of the damned, to say no more nor harder of it, can never be made the necessary sense of these words: nor is there any other ground in scripture, or any due end of such a descent, either agreed on, or at all alleageable, to persuade the choosing of it as the best sense of them. Not to contest other interpretations, I conceive, with submission, that it differs not much, possibly nothing, from the plain word of his burial. Not that the author or authors of this so brief a confession, would express one thing by divers words, but that, it may be, in the more ancient copies, only the one of them hath been in the text, and in after copies, in transcribers' hands, the other hath crept into it out of the margin. But retaining it by all means as it is, it may signify the abode and continuance of Christ's body in the grave; in which time he seems to have been swallowed up of death, and that the pit had shut her mouth on him; but it appeared quickly otherwise, for, The third day he arose from the dead.

Ref. 1. These are great things indeed which are spoken concerning Jesus Christ, his birth and sufferings; but the greater our unhappiness if we have no portion in them. To hear of them only, and to enjoy nothing of them, is most miserable; and thus it is through our unbelief. Were it as common to believe in him, as to repeat these words, or to come to church and hear this gospel preached, then you would all make pretty good plea on it. But believe it, it is another kind of thing to believe than all that, or than any thing that, the most of us yet know. My brethren, do not deceive yourselves. That common highway faith will not serve; you are, for all that, still unbelievers in Christ's account; and if so, for all the riches of comfort that are in him, you can receive none from him. It is a sad word that he says, Because ye believe not in me, ye shall die in your sins. John viii. 21. As if he should say, Though I died for sins, not mine own, but others, yet, you remaining in ungodliness and unbelief, that shall do you no good; ye shall die in your sins for all that. It is such a faith as endears Christ to the soul, unites it to him, makes Christ and it one, that makes all that is his to become ours. Then, we shall conclude aright, Christ hath suffered, therefore I shall not. As he said to them who came to take him, Is it I you seek? then let these go free; so, to the law and the justice of God, he says, seeing you have sought and laid hold on me, and made me suffer, let these go free who lay hold on me by faith: if you have anything to say to them, I am to answer for them, yea, I have done it already.

2. You that believe and live by this death, be often in reviewing it and meditating on it, that your souls may be ravished with the admiration of such love, and warmed with a reflex love to him. Mira Dei dignitas, mira indignitas nostra. Other wonders, as you say, last for a while, but this is a lasting wonder; not to the ignorant—the cause of wonder at other things is ignorance indeed, but this is an everlasting wonder to those who know it best, viz., to the very angels. Let that loved Jesus be fixed in your hearts, who was for you nailed to the cross: Donec totus fixus in corde, qui totus fixus in cruce. St. Bernard wonders that men should think on anything else: Quanta, insana post tanti Regis adventum aliis negotiis! Surely it is great folly, to think and esteem much of anything here, after his appearing: the sun arising drowns all the stars. And withal, be daily crucifying sin in yourselves, be avenged on it for his sake, and kill it because it killed him.

3. Will you think anything hard to do or suffer for him, who undertook and performed to the full so much for you? If you had rather be your own than Christ's, much good do it you with yourselves; but know that if you are not Christ's, but your own, you must look for as little of him to be yours. If ye be your own, you must bear all your own sins, and all the wrath that is due to them. But if you like not that, and resolve to be no more your own, but Christ's, then what have you to do but cheerfully to embrace, yea, earnestly to seek all opportunities to do him service?

4. These are the steps of Christ's humiliation; look on them, then, so as to study to be like him particularly in that. Surely, the soul that hath most of Christ, hath most humility. It is the lesson he peculiarly recommends to us from his own example, which is the shortest and most effectual way of teaching: Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart. Matt. xi. 29. He says well, Eru-bescat homo superbus esse, propter quem humilis factus est Deus: Let man be ashamed to be any longer proud, for whom God himself humbled himself so low. Intolerabilis est impudentia, ut ubi se exinanivit majestas, vermiculus inflatur et intumescat. He became humble to expiate our pride, and yet we will not banish that pride which undid us, and follow that way of salvation which is humility. Jesus Christ is indeed the lily of the valleys; he grows nowhere but in the humble heart.

Rose again the third day.] When humbled to the lowest, then nearest to his exaltation, as Joseph in the prison. He could die, for he was a man, and a man for that purpose, that he might die; but he could not be overcome by death, for he was God: yea, by dying, he overcame death, and so showed himself truly the Lord of life. He strangled that lion in his own den. The whale swallowed Jonah, but it could not digest him; it was forced to cast him up again at the appointed time, the same with the time here specified, wherein the prophet was a figure of this great prophet, Jesus Christ. The grave hath a terrible appetite; it devours all, and still cries, give, give, and never hath enough, as Agur says; yet, for all its appetite, Christ was too great a morsel for it to digest, too strong a prisoner for all its bars and iron gates to keep him in. It was impossible he should be holden of it, says St. Peter. Acts ii. 24.

He hath made a breach through death, opened up a passage on the other side of it into life, though otherwise, indeed vestigia nulla retrorsum. They who believe, who lay hold on him by faith, they come through with him, follow him out at the same breach, pass through death into heaven. But the rest find not the passage out; it is as the Red sea, passable only to the Israelites; therefore, they must of necessity sink quite downward through the grave into hell, through the first death into the second, and that is the most terrible of all. That death is indeed what one called the other the most terrible of all terrors—the king of terrors, as it is in Job.

Now, the only assurance of that happy second resurrection to the life of glory hereafter is, the first resurrection here to the life of grace. Blessed are they that are partakers of the first resurrection, for on such the second death hath no power. Rev. xx. 6. For the resurrection of Jesus Christ is, to the believer, the evidence of his redemption completed, that all was paid by Christ, as our surety, and so, he set at liberty: which the apostle teaches us, when he says, He arose for our righteousness; and again, It is God that justifies: who shall condemn? It is Christ that died, or rather that is risen again. Rom. viii. 33. Nor is it only the pattern and pledge of a believer's resurrection, but it is the efficient cause both of that last resurrection of his body to glory, and of the first of his soul to grace.

The life of a believer is derived and flows forth from Christ as his head, and is mystically one life with his, and therefore, as himself expresseth it, because I live, ye shall live also. John xiv. 19. Therefore is he called the first begotten from the dead and the beginning, Ἐν πρώτῳ ἀποστόλῳ. Col. i. 18. He is first in all, and from him spring all those streams that make glad the city of God. Therefore the apostle, in his thanksgiving for our new life and lively hopes, 1 Pet. i. 3, leaves not out that, Blessed be God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is the conduit of all. And he expresses it in the same place, that we are begotten again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. But, alas! we prejudice ourselves of all that rich comfort that is wrapped up in this, by living to ourselves and our lusts, and to the world, having not our consciences purified from dead works. How few of us are there who set that ambition of Paul before us, desiring above all things to know him and the power of his resurrection, to be made conformable unto his death! Phil. iii. 10. That is the knowledge, as he there expresses it, a lively experienced knowledge of that power.

This rightly considered, will answer all our doubts and fears in the church's hardest times. When in its deliverance there appears nothing but impossibilities, when so low that its enemies are persuaded to conclude that it shall never rise again, and its friends are oppressed with fearing so much, yet, he who brought up his own Son Jesus from the dead, can and will restore his church, for which he gave his only begotten Son to the death. Son of man, says he, can these dry bones live? Ezek. xxxii. 3. Thus often looks the church's deliverance, which is there the proper sense. The prophet answered most wisely, Lord, thou knowest; q. d. It is a work only for thee to know and to do; and by his Spirit they were revived. And so here, it looked hopeless as the disciples thought; they were at the point of giving it over, and blaming almost their former credulity: We thought this should have been he that should have delivered Israel; and besides all this, to-day is the third day. True, the third day was come, but it was not yet ended; yea, he rose in the beginning of it, though they as yet knew it not, nor him to be present to whom they spake; but toward the end of it, they likewise knew that he was risen, when he was pleased to discover himself to them. Thus, though the enemies of the church prevail so far against it, that it seems buried, and a stone laid to the grave's mouth, yet, it shall rise again, and at the very fittest, the appointed time, as Christ the third day. Thus the church expresses her confidence, Hos. vi. 2: In the third day he will raise us up. Whatever it suffers it shall gain by it, and be more beautiful and glorious in its restoration. Mergas profundo, pulchrior exilit.

He ascended into heaven.] He rose again, not to remain on earth as before, but to return to his throne of majesty, whence his love drew him, according to his prayer, John xvii., which was a certain prediction of it. He had now accomplished the great work he came for, and was therefore, by the covenant and transaction between his Father and him, to be exalted to his former glory; the same person as before, but with the accession of another nature, which he had not before, and of a new relative dignity, being to sit as king of his church, which he had purchased with his blood. And to express this, it is added,

And sitteth at the right hand of God, the Father.] See Psalm cx. 1; Ephes. i. 20, 21. By which, according to his allusive sense, is expressed, not only his matchless glory, but his dominion and rule as Prince of Peace, the alone king of his church, her supreme law-giver and mighty protector, and conqueror of all his enemies; ruling his holy hill of Zion, with the golden sceptre of his word, and breaking his enemies, the strongest of them, in pieces with the iron rod of his justice, as we have it in the second Psalm. They attempt in vain to unsettle his throne; it is very far out of their reach, as high as the right hand of God. For ever, O God, thy throne is established in heaven! What way is there for the worms of this earth to do any thing against it?

As in these is the glory of Christ, so, they contain much comfort to a Christian. In that very elevation of our nature to such dignity, is, indeed, as the ancients speak, mira dignatio; that our flesh is exalted above all the glorious spirits, the angels. And they adore the nature of man, in the person of man's glorified Savior, the Son of God. This exaltation of Jesus Christ doth so reflect a dignity on the nature of mankind. But the right and possession of it, is not universal, but is contracted and appropriate to them that believe on him. He took not on him the nature of angels, says the apostle, but the nature of the seed of Abraham. Heb. ii. 16. He says not, the nature of man, though it is so, but, of the seed of Abraham; not so much because of his descent from that particular stock after the flesh, as in the spiritual sense of Abraham's seed, as it is at large cleared, Rom. ix. The rest of mankind forfeit all that dignity and benefit that arise to their nature in Christ, by their distance and disunion from him through unbelief. But the believer hath not only naturally one kind of being with the humanity of Christ, but is mystically one with the person of Christ, with whole Christ, God-man. And by virtue of that mysterious union, they who partake of it, partake of the very present happiness and glory of Christ: they have a real interest in whatsoever he is and hath, in all his dignities and power; and in that sense, they who are justified are glorified. Rom. viii. 30. In that Christ is exalted, they are so too in him. Where a part, and the chief part of themselves, is, and is in honor, there may they account themselves to be. Ubi portio mea, regnat, ibi me regnare credo. A man is said to be crowned, when the crown is set upon his head; now, our Head, Christ, is already crowned.

In sum, believers have, in this ascending and enthroning of Christ, unspeakable comfort through their interest in Christ, both in consideration of his present affection to them, and his effectual intercession for them, and in the assured hope which this gives them of their own after happiness and glory with him.

First, In all his glory he forgets them not. He puts not off his bowels with his low condition here, but hath carried it along to his throne. Bene conveniunt, et in una sede morantur, majestas et amor. His majesty and love suit very well, and both in their highest degree. As all the waters of his sufferings did not quench his love, nor left he it behind him buried in the grave, but it arose with him, being stronger than death; so, he let it not fall to the earth when he ascended on high, but it ascended with him, and he still retains it in his glory. And that our flesh which he assumed on earth, he took up into heaven, as a token of indissoluble love between him and those whom he redeemed, and sends down thence, as the rich token of his love, his Spirit into their hearts; so that these are mutual remembrances. Can he forget his own on earth, having their flesh so closely united to him? You see he does not; he feels what they suffer. Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And can they forget him whose Spirit dwells in them, and records lively to their hearts the passages of his love, and brings all those things to their remembrance (as himself tells us, that Spirit would do), and so proves indeed the COMFORTER, by representing unto us that his love, the spring of our comforts? And when we send up our requests, we know of a friend before us there, a most true and a most faithful friend, who fails not to speak for us what we say, and much more. He liveth, says the apostle, to make intercession for us. Heb. vii. 25. This is the ground of a Christian's boldness at the throne of grace: yea, therefore is the Father's throne the throne of grace to us, because the throne of our Mediator, Jesus Christ, is beside it: he sits at his right hand, otherwise it could be nothing to us but a throne of justice, and so, in regard of our guiltiness, a throne of terror and affrightment, which we would rather flee from, than draw near unto.

Lastly, as we have the comfort of such a friend, to prepare access to our prayers there, which are the messengers of our souls, so, of this, that our souls themselves, when they remove from these houses of clay, shall find admission there through him. And this he tells his disciples again and again, and in them all his own, that their interest was so much in his ascending to his glory: I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also. John xiv. 3.

It will not be hard to persuade them who believe these things, and are portioners in them, to set their hearts on them, and, for that end, to take them off from all other things as unworthy of them: yea, it will be impossible for them to live without the frequent and sweet thoughts of that place where the Lord Jesus is. Yet, it is often needful to remind them that this can not be enough done, and, by representing these things to them, to draw them more upward. And it is best done in the apostle's words: If ye be risen with Christ, mind those things that are above, where he sits, &c. Col. iii. 1. If ye be risen with him follow him on, let your hearts be where he is. They that are one with him, the blessed Seed of the woman, do find that unity drawing them heavenward. But, alas! the most of us are like the accursed seed of the serpent, basely grovelling on this earth, and licking the dust. The conversation of the believer is in heaven, where he hath a Savior, and whence he looks for him. Truly, there is little of a true Christian here (and that argues that there is little of the truth of Christianity among us, who are altogether here); his head in heaven, and his heart there, and these are the two principles of life. Let us then suit the apostle's advice, and so enjoy the comfort he subjoins, that by our affections being above, we may know, that our life is hid with Christ in God, and therefore, that when he, who is our life, shall appear, we likewise shall appear with him in glory.

[From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.] We have in this to consider, 1. That there is a universal judgment. 2. That Christ is the Judge. 3. Something to be added of the quality of the judgment. All the three we have together, Acts xvii. 31: Because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.

1. That there is a universal judgment, we know to be the frequent doctrine of the Scriptures, and it hath been ever the belief of the godly from the beginning, as we may perceive by that ancient prophecy of Enoch, recorded by St. Jude; and we are so to believe it as a Divine truth. And yet, there is so much just reason for it, that natural men, by the few sparkles of light in their consciences, have had some dark notions and conjectures of it, as is evident in Plato and the Platonics, and not only the philosophers, but the poets: it may be, too, that they had been helped by some scattered glimmerings of light concerning this, borrowed from the Jews, and traditionally passed from hand to hand among the heathen, and therefore disguised and altered after their fashion.

If we be persuaded that there is a Supreme Ruler of the world, who is most wise and just, and good, this will persuade us, not only that there is some other estate and being than that we see here, appointed for man, the most excellent, the reasonable part of this visible world; but that there shall be a solemn judicial proceeding, in entering and instating him in that after-being. The many miseries of this present life, and that the best of men are usually deepest sharers in them, though it hath a little staggered, not only wise heathens, but sometimes some of the prime saints of God, yet, it hath never prevailed with any but brutal and debauched spirits, to conclude against Divine providence, but rather to resolve upon this, that of necessity there must be another kind of issue, a final catastrophe, reducing all the present confusions into order, and making odds even, as you say. Cum res hominum tanta caligine volvi. [CLAUDIAN.] It is true, that sometimes here, the Lord's right hand finds out his enemies, and is known by the judgment which he executes on them; and, on the other side, he gives some instances of his gracious providence to his church, and to particular godly men, even before the sons of men; but these are but some few preludes and pledges of that great Judgment. Some he gives, that we forget not his justice and goodness; but much is reserved, that we expect not all, nor the most here, but hereafter. And it is certainly most congruous, that this be done, not only in each particular apart, but most conspicuously in all together, that the justice and mercy of God may not only be accomplished, but acknowledged and magnified, and that, not only severally in the several persons of men and angels, but universally, jointly, and manifestly in the view of all, as upon one theatre, angels and men being at once, some of them the objects of that justice, others of mercy, but all of them spectators of both. Each ungodly man shall not only read, whether he will or no, the justice of God in himself and his own condemnation, which most of them shall do before that time in their soul's particular judgment; but they shall then see the same justice in all the rest of the condemned world, and the rest, in them; and, to the great increase of their anguish, they shall see likewise the glory of that mercy which shall then shine so bright in all the elect of God, from which they themselves are justly shut out, and delivered up to eternal misery. And, on the other side, the godly shall with unspeakable joy behold, not only a part, as before, but the whole sphere both of the justice and mercy of their God, and shall with one voice admire and applaud him in both.

Besides, the process of many men's actions can not be full at the end of their life, as it shall be at that day; many have very large after-reckonings to come upon them for those sins of others to which they are accessory, though committed after their death; as the sins of ill-educated children to be laid to the charge of their parents, the sins of such as any have corrupted, either by their counsels or opinions, or evil examples, &c.

2. HE, the Lord Jesus, shall be Judge in that great day. The Father, and Spirit, and his authority, are all one, for they are all one God and one Judge; but it shall be particularly exercised and pronounced by our Savior, God-man, Jesus Christ. That eternal WORD by whom all things were made, by him all shall be judged; and so, he shall be THE WORD in that last act of time, as in the first. He shall judicially pronounce that great and final sentence which shall stand unalterable in eternity; and not only as the eternal Son of God, but withal as the Son of man, and so shall he sit as king, and invested with all power in heaven and earth. By that man whom he hath appointed to judge the quick and the dead. The same Jesus shall so come, in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. Acts xvii. 31; i. 11. The powers of the world and of hell are combined against his throne; therefore, they shall be his footstool sitting on that throne. And the crown which he hath purchased for believers, he shall set it on their heads with his own hand. This shall be exceeding joy and comfort to all that have believed on him, that that their Redeemer shall be their Judge. He who was judged for them, shall judge them, and pass sentence according to that covenant of grace which holds in him, pronouncing them free from the wrath which he himself endured for them, and heirs of that life which he bought with his dearest blood.

And that gives no less accession to the misery of the wicked, that the same Jesus whom they opposed and despised, so many of them as heard anything of him, he shall sit upon their final judgment, and pronounce sentence against them, not partially avenging his own quarrel on them—no word of that—but most justly returning them the reward of their ungodliness and unbelief. That great Shepherd shall thus make that great separation of his sheep from the goats.

3. Of the manner, we have thus much here, that he shall come from heaven as the Scriptures teach us, he shall visibly appear in the air: he shall come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, Matt. xxiv. 30, attended with innumerable companies of glorious angels who shall serve him, both in the congregating of his elect, and in separating of them from the reprobate; but himself, in the brightness of his own majesty, infinitely surpassing them all. 2 Thess. i. 7: In flaming fire. His first coming was mean and obscure, suiting his errand, for then he came to be judged; but that last coming shall be glorious, for he comes to judge, and his judgment shall be in righteousness, Acts xvii. 31. Iuste judicabit qui injuste judicatus est. [AUGUSTINE.] There shall be no mis-alleging, or mis-proving, or mis-judging there. All the judgments of men, whether private or judicial, shall be re-judged there according to truth, by such a judge before whom all things are naked. And not only shall he know and judge all aright, but all they who are judged, shall themselves be convinced that it is so. Then all will see that none are condemned but most deservedly, and that the Lord's justice is pure and spotless in them who perish, as his grace is without prejudice to his justice, it being satisfied in Christ for them who are saved. The books shall be opened, those which men so willingly, the most of them, keep shut and clasped up, and are so unwilling to look into, their own accusing consciences; the Lord will proceed formally against the wicked according to the books: no wrong shall be done them, they shall have fair justice, and they shall see what they would not look upon before, when by seeing, that might have been blotted out, and a free acquittance written in its stead. And that the believer shall read in his conscience at that day, which through the dimness of faith, and the dark, troubled estate of his soul, he many times could not read here below.

We are gaping still after new notions, but a few things wisely and practically known, drawn down from the head into the heart, are better than all that variety of knowing that men are so taken up with. Paucis literis opus est ad mentem bonam. This and such like common truths, we think we both know and believe well enough; but truly, if this great point, touching the great and last judgment, were indeed known and believed by us, it would draw our minds to more frequent and more deep thoughts of it; and were we often and serious in those thoughts, they would have such influence into all our other thoughts, and the whole course of our lives, as would much alter the frame of them from what they are. Did we think of this gospel which we preach and hear, that we must then be judged by it, we should be now more ruled by it. But the truth is, we are willingly forgetful of these things; they are melancholy, pensive thoughts, and we are content that the noise of affairs or any vanities fill the ears of our minds, that we hear them not. If we be forced at some times to hear of this last judgment to come, it possibly casts our conscience into some little trembling fit for the time, as it did Felix; but he was not, nor are we, so happy as to be shaken out of the custom and love of sin by it. We promise it fair, as he did, some other time; but if that time never come, this day will come, and they who shun to hear or think of it, shall then see it, and the sight of it will be as terrible and amazing, as the timely thoughts of it would have been profitable. It is, no doubt, an unpleasing subject to all ungodly, earthly minds; but surely, it were our wisdom to be of that mind now, that then we shall be forced to be of: we shall then read, by the light of that fire which shall burn the world, the vanity of all those things whereon we now dote so foolishly. Let us therefore be persuaded to think so now, and disengage our hearts, and fix them on him who shall then judge us. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. They only are happy who trust in him. That which is the affrightment of others, is their great joy and desire: they love and long for that day, both for their Savior's glory in it, and their own full happiness; and that their love to his appearing, is to them a certain pledge of the crown they are to receive at his appearing. 2 Tim. iv. 8:—at that day, says the apostle. This day he esteems more of than all his days; therefore, he names it no otherwise than that day. How may we know what day it was he meant? His coronation-day. But of all men, surely, the hypocrite likes least the mention and remembrance of that day: there is no room for disguises there, all masks must off, and all things appear just as they are, and that is the worst news to him that can be.

[I believe in the Holy Ghost.] God is both a Spirit and Holy; but this name, personally taken, is peculiarly that of the third person, proceeding from the Father and the Son, by a way that can neither be expressed nor conceived. Holy in himself, and the author and cause of all holiness in us.

It is neither useful nor safe for us to entangle our thoughts in disputes concerning this mystery, but it is necessary that we know, and acknowledge and believe in this Holy Spirit. It is he in whom, and by whom we believe. We can not know God, nor the things of God, but by the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. ii. 1; nor say that Jesus is God, but by the same Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 3. We know that this holy trinity co-operates in the work of our salvation: the Father hath given us his Son, and the Son hath sent us his Spirit, and the Spirit gives us faith, which unites us to the Son, and through him to the Father. The Father ordained our redemption, the Son wrought it, the holy Spirit reveals and applies it.

[In the holy Catholic church.] The remaining articles have the fruit of that great work, the sending of the Son of God in the flesh, his suffering, and dying, &c.—what it is, and to whom it belongs; the result of Christ's incarnation and death, cui et cujus gratia. Yea, the great design of God in the other great work, that of the first creation, was this second: he made the world that out of it he might make this elect world, which is called his church. The Son fell on sleep, on a dead sleep, indeed the sleep of death on the cross, that out of his side might be framed his spouse, which is his church. The holy Spirit moving upon the souls of men in their conversion, aims at this same end, the gathering and completing of his church: he is the breath of life that breathed on these new creatures who make up this society. So then, this is as much as to say, I verily believe that God had such a purpose in making the world, and in sending his Son into it, and they both in sending the Spirit, and the Spirit in his working to make a holy church, a number that should serve God here, and enjoy him in eternity; and I believe, that God can not fall short of his end, that blessed trinity doth not project and work in vain; I believe, therefore, there is such a company, there is a holy universal church. Universal—diffused through the several ages, and places, and nations of the world. Holy—washed in the blood of Christ, and sanctified by his Spirit. That it is, which it hath in all ages continued from the beginning, and shall continue to the end of the world, increasing still and growing to its appointed perfection, amidst all the enemies and oppositions that it encounters in the world. I send you forth, says Christ, as sheep among wolves. Matt. x. 16. The preservation of the church is a continuing miracle: it resembles Daniel's safety among the hungry lions, but prolonged from one age to another. The ship wherein Christ is, may be weather-beaten, but it shall not perish.

So then, you see that this confession is altogether no other than your acknowledgment of God in himself, three in one, and one in three; and his works of the creation of the world, and redemption of man by his Son, made man for that purpose, and appropriate to them for whom it was designed by his holy Spirit; and with this acknowledgment, our reliance on this God as the author of our being and well-being.

[The communion of saints.] This springs immediately from the former: if they make one church, then they have a very near communion together. They are one body united to that glorious head that is above; they have all one spiritual life flowing from him. And this communion holds not only on earth and in heaven apart, but even between heaven and earth: the saints on earth make up the same body with those already in glory; they are born to the same inheritance by new birth, though the others are entered in possession before them. This their common title to spiritual blessings, and eternal blessings pre-judges none of them: their inheritance is such as is not lessened by the multitude of heirs: it is entire to each one. And that grace and salvation that flows from Christ, the Son of Righteousness, is as the light of the sun where it shines; none hath the less because of others partaking of it. The happiness of the saints is called an inheritance in light, which all may enjoy without abatement to any. They have each one their crown: they need not, they do not envy one another, nor, Ottoman-like, one brother to kill another to reign alone. Yea, they rejoice in their happiness and salvation of one another; they are glad at the graces which God bestows on their brethren; for they know that they all belong to the same first owner, and return to his glory, and that whatsoever diversity is in them, they all agree and concentre in that service and good of the church; and so, what each one hath of gifts and graces, belongs to all by virtue of this communion. Thus ought each of them to think, and every one of them humbly and charitably so to use what he hath himself, and ingenuously to rejoice in that which others have, as the apostle reasons at large, 1 Cor. xii.

[A holy catholic church—the communion of saints.] We may see the worth and the necessity of holiness, how much it is regarded in the whole work. For this very thing did Christ give himself for his church, that he might sanctify it, and cleanse it—that he might present it to himself a glorious church—holy. Eph. v. 26. So it is the end of our redemption. And if we look as far forward as salvation, there it will be perfect holiness: nothing unclean shall enter that holy city, and without holiness no man shall see God. And look again as far back as our election: Eph. i. 4. According as he hath chosen us in him—that we should be holy. And those who are not partakers of this, do but delude themselves, in dreaming of an interest in the rest. There is no washing in the blood of Christ to remission, but withal by the Spirit to sanctification; no comfort to the unholiness in their resurrection, because no hope of that to follow on it, which follows here, eternal life. No, without shall be dogs, Rev. xxii. 15. In the base and foolish opinion of the world, holiness is a reproach, or at the best, but a mean poor commendation, as you speak of it disdainfully, a good, silly, holy body; and men are more pleased with any other title: they had a great deal rather be called learned, or wise, or stout, or comely, than holy. Malum est audire, O virum doctum, quam O virum bonum. [SENECA.] But God esteems otherwise of it, whose esteem is the true rule of worth. That fore-cited place, A glorious church: how? Holy and without blemish. That is indeed the true beauty of the soul, makes it like God, and that is its comeliness. We see the Lord himself delights to be known much by this style, and to be glorified by it, holy, holy, holy. So Exod. xv. 11; glorious in holiness. And the Spirit of God is still called the holy Spirit. How much, then, are they mistaken concerning heaven, who think to find the way to it out of the path of holiness, which is indeed via regni, the only way that leads unto it! Reprove you of holiness, you say; you are not saints. No? So much the worse, for they who mean to share in the pardon of sin and eternal life, must be such. If you be content still not to be saints, go on: but know, that they who are not in some measure saints in grace here, shall never be saints in glory hereafter.

Forgiveness of sins.] Notwithstanding forgiveness of sins, there is a necessity of holiness, though not as meriting it, yet, as leading unto happiness. But on the other side, notwithstanding the highest point of holiness we can attain, there is a necessity of this forgiveness of sins. Though believers make up a holy church and company of saints, yet, there is a debt upon them that their holiness prays not; yea, they are so far from having a surplus for a standing treasure after all is paid, that all the holiness of the saints together will not pay the least farthing of that debt they owe. As for me, I will walk in mine integrity, says David, Psalm xxvi. 11. How then? adds he, this shall justify me sufficiently? No, but Redeem thou me, and be merciful to me. So, 1 John i. 6: If we say, that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie. And yet, in the next verse, though we do walk in the light, yet is there need of the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin; and so throughout the Scriptures. All the integrity of the godly under the law, did not exempt them from offering sacrifice, which was the expiation of sin in the figure, looking forward to that great and spotless sacrifice that was to be slain for the sins of the world. And those who believe the gospel, the application of that justifying blood that streams forth in the doctrine of the gospel, is not only needful to wash in for their cleansing in their first conversion, but is to be reapplied to the soul, for taking off the daily-contracted guiltiness of new sins. It is a fountain opened and standing open for sin and for uncleanness, as that sea of brass before the sanctuary. They that are clean have still need of washing, at least, their feet, as Christ speaks to Peter, John xiii. 10.

The consideration of that precious blood shed for our sins, is the strongest persuasive to holiness, and to the avoiding and hating of sin. So far is the doctrine of justification, rightly understood, from animating men to sin. But because of the woful continuance of sin in the godly, while they continue in this region of sin and death, therefore is there a continual necessity of new recourse to this great expiation. Thus St. John joins these two, 1 Epis. ii. 1, 2: These things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins.

You think it an easy matter, and a thing that for your own ease you willingly believe, the forgiveness of sins. It is easy indeed, after our fashion; easy to imagine that we believe such a thing when we hear it, because we let it pass and question it not; we think it may be true, and think no further on it, while we neither know truly what sin is, nor feel the weight of our own sins. But where a soul is convinced of the nature of sin, and its own guiltiness, there to believe forgiveness is not so easy a task.

In believing this forgiveness of sins, and so, the other privileges that attend it, there be these three things gradually leading one to the other. 1. To believe that there is such a thing, and that it is purchased by the death of Christ, and so attainable by coming unto him for it. 2. By this, the soul finding itself ready to sink under the burden of its own sins, is persuaded to go to him, and lay over that load on him; and itself withal resolves to rest on him for this forgiveness. This is to believe in him who is the Lord our righteousness. 3. Upon this believing on him for forgiveness, follows a reflex believing of that forgiveness; not continually and inseparably, especially if we take the degree of assurance somewhat high, but yet, in itself, it is apt to follow, and often, in God's gracious dispensation, doth follow upon that former act of believing, through the clearness and strength of faith in the soul, and sometimes withal is backed with an express, peculiar testimony of God's own Spirit. To believe, and to grow stronger in believing, and to aspire to the assurance of faith, is our constant duty; but that immediate testimony of the Spirit is an arbitrary beam that God reserves in his own hand, yet such a gift as we may not only lawfully seek, but do foolishly prejudice ourselves and slight it, if we neglect to seek it, and want so rich a blessing for want of asking, and withal, laboring to keep our hearts in a due disposition and frame for entertaining it. The keeping of our consciences pure, as much as may be, doth not only keep the comfortable evidence of pardon clearest and least interrupted within us, but is the likeliest to receive those pure joys which flow immediately into the soul from the Spirit of God. The testimony of our conscience is, if we damp it not ourselves, our continual feast; but that testimony of the Spirit is a superadded taste of higher comfort out of God's own hand, as it were a piece of heaven in the soul, which he sometimes cheers it withal, where he hath first given much love and ardent desires after himself: they are short of that light, in the fulness whereof we hope to dwell hereafter. But besides that God is most free in that particular, and knows what is fittest for us, the greatest part even of true Christians yet do not so walk, nor attend to that spiritualness that is capable of such visits.

The resurrection of the body.] The comfort of these privileges is opposed to those grand evils that we feel or fear: sanctification, to the power of sin; justification or forgiveness, to the guilt of sin; the resurrection, to temporal death; and life eternal, to the second or eternal death.

This is the raising of the self-same body that is laid in the dust; otherwise, the giving of a body to the soul again must have some other name, for resurrection it can not be called.

That God can do this, notwithstanding all imaginable difficulties in it, have we not proof enough in what he hath done? Surely, that which he did in the beginning of time, the framing of the whole world of nothing, is more than a sufficient pledge of this which is to be done in the end of time.

That he will do it, we have his own word for it, and the pledge of it in raising his Son Jesus; therefore called, The first begotten from the dead, Col. i. 18, this as relating to believers, who are one with him. The resurrection of the dead in general is an act of power: but to the godly, it is an act of grace, to the wicked of justice. Both shall rise by the power of Christ, but, to the one, as a Judge, and a Judge who shall condemn them; to the other, as their head, and their Savior. Joseph's two fellow-prisoners were both taken out of the prison, and at the same time; but the one to the court, the other to the gallows. So shall it be in the resurrection. John v. 29.

The confession of faith being of such things as belong to believers and are their happiness, therefore their resurrection is particularly here intended, as we see eternal life and glory is subjoined to it. Our bodies are raised, which were companions and partakers of our good and evil in our abode upon earth, that they may in eternity be companions and partakers of our reward. Those of the ungodly, to suit their condemned souls, shall be filled with shame, and vileness, and misery; and those that were, in their lower estate here, temples of the Holy Ghost, shall be filled with that fulness of joy that shall run over from the soul unto them: they shall be conformable to the happy and glorious souls to which they shall be united, yea, to the glorious body of our Lord Jesus Christ. There shall then be nothing but beauty, and glory, and immortality, in them which are now frail and mortal, and being dead, do putrify and turn to dust. He shall change our vile bodies, and make them like unto his most glorious body. Phil. iii. 21. But, as St. Bernard says well, If he would be sure of this, that our bodies shall be conformed to his in the glory to come, let us see that our souls be here conformed to his, in that humility which he so much manifested while he dwelt among men: if we would that then our vile body be made like his glorious body, let our proud heart now be made like his humble heart.

Life eternal.] Our confession of faith ends in that which is the end of our faith, our everlasting salvation, or eternal life. Of which, all that we can say is but stammering, and all our knowledge and conceiting of it but ignorance, in regard of what it is: yet, so much we know or may know of it, as, if we knew aright, would certainly draw us more into the desires and pursuit of it. The very name of life is sweet, but then especially as it is here meant, in the purest and sweetest sense, for a truly happy life. Non est vivere, sed valere, vita. For a life full of misery is scarcely worth the name of life, and the longer it were, the worse; therefore, the miserable estate of damned souls, though immortal in it, is called death. So then, by this life, true and full blessedness being meant, and then, that added, that it is eternal life, what can be imagined more to make it desirable? So happy, that there shall not be the smallest drop of any evil or bitterness in it, pure unmixed bliss; nothing present in it that is displeasing, nor anything wanting that is delightful; and everlasting, that when millions of years (if there were any such reckoning there) are rolled about, it shall be as far from ending as at the first.

A very little knowledge of this blessed life would make us clean out of love with the life that now we make such account of. What can it be that ties us here? The known shortness of this life, were it more happy than it is to any, might make it of less esteem with us. But then withal, being so full of miseries and sins, so stuffed with sorrows round about us, and within ourselves, that if the longest of it can be called long, it is only the multitude of miseries in it, that can challenge that name for it. Such a world of bodily diseases, here one's head paining him, another his stomach—Quam male nobis convenit, nunc de ventre, nunc de capite, &c., hoc contingere solet in alieno habitantibus. [SENECA]: some complaining of this part, some of that, and the same party sometimes of one malady, sometimes of another; what disappointments, and disgraces, and cross encounters of affairs; what personal and what public calamities; and then, sin, the worst of all! And yet, all can not wean us! We can not endure to hear nor to think of removing; and the true reason is, unbelief of this eternal life, and the neglect of those ways that lead to it. Be persuaded at length to call in your heart from the foolish chase of vanity, and consider this glorious life that is set before you. Do you think the provision you make for this wretched present life worth so many hours' daily pains, and give eternal life scarcely half a thought in many hours, possibly not a fixed, serious thought in many days? Surely, if you believe there is such a thing, you can not but be convinced that it is a most preposterous, unwise course you take, in the expense of your time and pains upon anything else more than on life eternal. Think what a sad thing it will be, when your soul must remove out of that little cottage wherein it now dwells, not to be bettered by the removal, but thrust out into utter darkness. Whereas, if ye would give up with sin, and embrace Jesus Christ as your joy and your life, in him you would presently be put into a sure, unfailing right to this eternal life. It is a pure life, and purity of life here is the only way to it. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

EXPOSITION OF THE LORD'S PRAYER.

MATT. vi. 9.

After this manner, therefore, pray ye.

THE malice and craft of Satan in reference to good actions, works first in attempting wholly to divert us from them; but, if that take not, the next is, to pervert their use, and corrupt them so in doing, that they lose their acceptance with God, and we consequently lose the fruit and comfort of them. And as there is no religious exercise that he hath more quarrel at, and owes greater enmity to, than prayer, being the most constant crosser of his designs, there is none from which he more endeavors to estrange men, either wholly to lay it down, or to frequent cessations; or, if that can not be, but the light of conscience still calls for somewhat at least that may pass with a man for prayer, yet, if Satan can get it turned to hypocrisy and formality, he knows he needs not fear it, for so it wants the life of prayer, and remains nothing but a dead carcass, and therefore can neither please the living God, nor hurt him who is its enemy.

Therefore, our Savior here warns his disciples to avoid, in praying, these two evils, the vain ostentation of hypocrites, and the vain repetition of the heathen; not to think it prayer, to tumble out a multitude of empty words; and upon that, takes occasion to set this matchless copy of prayer, the way of example being the shortest and liveliest way of teaching. These words, which are but the entry, are not to be passed over: there is in them, I. The duty of prayer supposed. II. The prescribing of this form. First, pray. Secondly, after this manner.

I. The use and necessity of prayer is taken for confessed, as before, verse 7: When ye pray, and when thou prayest. And the consideration of this exercise, and of this pattern of it, is with good reason accounted among the most necessary principles of religion.

Without it, indeed, all religion withers and languishes. The law of God is so pure and exact a rule, that we can not come near the perfection of it, and therefore fall under its curse. When we understand it so, that drives us to the gospel, to seek salvation there. And the articles of the gospel, of our Christian faith, are so high and mysterious, that nature can not aright understand or believe them; and therefore, both law and gospel drive us to prayer, to seek of God renewing grace to conform our hearts in some measure to the holy law of God, and faith to lay hold on Jesus Christ and salvation, in him held forth to us in the gospel. Prayer is not taken in its strict grammatical sense, in which the words used for it signify only petition or request; but as comprehending, together with petition, confession and thanksgiving. It may be called briefly and plainly, a pious invocation of God; and, as we are not speaking abstractly of prayer, but according to the estate of fallen men, it is very fit to add the express mention of the Mediator, that it is an invocation of God in the name of Christ; for it never ascends to God as pleasing incense, but when it passeth through that golden censor, and is perfumed with the sweet odors of his merits and intercession. His entrance into heaven hath opened up the way for our prayers to come in, and there is no access to the throne of grace, but by that new and living way, as the apostle speaks, Heb. x. 20. But how much better is the frequent practice, than much discourse and business in defining it! Whatsoever is said aright in this, is for the other as its end, as one hath it out of an ancient philosopher, Inquirimus quid sit virtus, non ut sciamus, sed ut boni efficiamur: We inquire what virtues are, not to know them, but to have them. And indeed, to do otherwise, is but answerable employment to studying the nature of riches, and talking of them, and remaining poor, possessing none.

It is not needful to stay upon distinguishing prayer by the different matter of petitions, or things to be requested, which, possibly, some of the different names of prayer in Scripture do signify. This may suffice, that it ought to be of such things as are conformable to the will and promises of God, and desired with a suitable disposition of mind; and therefore I call it a pious invocation. It is the highest impudence to present God with unjust or frivolous desires. Qua scire homines nolunt, Deo narrant, as Seneca speaks: They tell God what they would not have men to know. We ought to reverence the majesty of God, and regard that in our requests. There is a difference between solemn prayer and sudden ejaculations, but it is not a difference in their nature, but only in continuance. The former is here meant. Only this of the other, it is to be wished that it were more known, and more in use with Christians; for it is, no doubt, a very happy means of preserving the heart in a holy temper and constant regard of God in all a man's actions, and is a main point of answering the apostle's word, Pray continually. When in company, and apart, a man useth secret, short motions of the soul to God, that may be very frequent in the day, and at night; whereas men's callings and natural necessities and employments, allow them but some certain parcel of both for solemn prayer. And these frequent looks of the heart to Heaven, exceedingly sweeten and sanctify our other employments, and diffuse somewhat of heaven through all our actions. Solemn prayer, at fit times, is a visiting of God; but this were a constant walking with him all the day long, a lodging with him in the night. When I awake, says David, I am still with thee, Psalm cxxxix. 18. And these sudden dartings of the soul heavenward, may sometimes have more swiftness and force than larger supplications, having much spirit, as it were, contracted into them; and they would, no doubt, if used, be answered with frequent beams of God's countenance returned to the soul, as it were in exchange. For though whole lifetimes of prayer are not worthy the least of those, yet it pleases God thus to keep intercourse with those souls that love him, and for the ejaculations of their desires to him, looks back on them, and so they interchange as it were sudden glances of love that answer one another. The Lord is pleased to speak thus himself, and the souls that know this love understand it: Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse, with one of thine eyes. Cant. iv. 9. But though such looks and ejaculations will refresh a soul inflamed with the love of God, yet it suffices not: they must have times of larger and more secret converse with their beloved, and particularly in the exercise of solemn, continued prayer; and, if cut short of it at any time, they will miss it as much as a healthful body its accustomed repast.

But it would seem, that though there may be some reason for confession and thanksgiving, yet, that which hath most peculiarly the name of prayer—petition—is superfluous: he who knows our wants better than ourselves, and what is fittest to bestow upon us, and forgets not all, what need we put him in mind, and follow him with so many suits?

This, indeed, is a strong reason against vain babblings in prayer, and imagining to be heard merely for long continuance and multitude of words; and our Savior himself doth here use it so, ver. 8; but withal he shows us clearly, that it makes nothing against the exercise of prayer, in that he adds immediately upon these words, After this manner, therefore, pray ye.

Although the Lord knows well our wants, and doth according to his own good pleasure, yet there is for prayer, 1. Duty. 2. Dignity. 3. Utility.

1. Duty. We owe this homage to God, not only to worship him, but particularly to offer up our supplications, and to acknowledge him our king and ruler of the whole world, and to testify our dependance upon him, as the giver of every good gift. It is not because he is unwilling and loath to give, for He gives liberally and upbraids none; yet, says the apostle there, If any man lack wisdom, let him ask it. James i. 5. So, of all wants, that which thanksgiving doth acknowledge after receipt, supplication doth beforehand; his power, and truth, and goodness, &c. This is his name still, the God who heareth prayer, and therefore this homage is due to him, To him shall all flesh come. Ps. lxxv. 2.

2. Dignity. This is the honor of the saints, that they are admitted to so near and frequent converse with the great God, that they do not only expect from him, but may so frequently speak to him of their desires and wants, and may pour out their complaints into his bosom. Abraham is sensible of the greatness of this privilege, by reflecting upon the greatness of his distance. Gen. xviii. 27. Behold, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, who am but dust and ashes. It is an unspeakable honor for dust and ashes to be received into such familiarity with the Lord of heaven and earth.

3. Utility. [1.] It quiets and eases the heart when it is troubled, to vent itself to God. As there is some natural ease in sighs and tears (for otherwise nature should not have been furnished with them, nor teach us to use them), they discharge some part of grief, though addressed no whither, but only let out; but more when it is in the presence of some entire friend; so they must be most of all easing, when they are directed to God in prayer. Cor serenat et purgat oratio, capacisque efficit ad excipienda divina munera: "Prayer," says Augustine, "calms and purifies the heart, and renders it more capable of the Divine benefits." Mine eye poureth forth tears unto God, says Job, Job xvi. 20; and David, My sighing is not hid from thee. Ps. xxxviii. 9. Cast thy burden on the Lord, says the psalmist. Psalm lv. 22. The Lord calls for our burdens, would not have us wrestle with them ourselves, but roll them over on him. Now, the desires that are breathed forth in prayer, are, as it were, the very unloading of the heart: each request that goes forth, carries out somewhat of the burden with it, and lays it on God. Phil. iv. 6. Be careful in nothing, says the apostle: that were a pleasant life indeed, if it might be; but how shall that be attained? Why, this is the only way, says he, In all things make your requests known unto God. Tell him what are your desires, and leave them there with him, and so you are sure to be rid of all further disquieting care of them. Try as many ways as you will, there is no other will free you, in difficulties, of all perplexing thoughts, but this, and this will do it.

[2.] In it the graces of the Spirit are exercised, and they gain by that, as all habits do; they are strengthened and increased by acting. Faith, in believing the promises; and that is the very basis of prayer: it can not subsist without the support of faith. And hope is raised up and set on tiptoe, ἀποκαταδοκτείν, to look out for accomplishment. And love, it is that which delights in, to impart its mind to him on whom it is set, and thus to entertain converse and conference with him, and all hours seem short to it that are thus spent; and by this it still rises to a higher flame, it is blown and stirred by prayer. The more the soul converses with God, doubtless the more it loves him.

And this speaking your desires to God in prayer, makes the heart still more holy, invites it to entertain new desires, but such as it may confidently acquaint God withal.

[3.] In relation to the particular things desired, it not only fits and disposes the heart for receiving them as blessings, but withal it is a real means of obtainment, by reason of God's own appointment, and of his promise. He hath bound himself by his promises not to disregard the prayers of his people. His ear is open to their cry, says the psalmist, Psalm xxxiv. 15. And the many instances in Scripture, and the experience of the church in all ages, bear witness to the truth of these promises. Imminent judgments have been averted, great armies conquered,* and the very course of nature countermanded, the sun arrested, by the power of prayer. Moses's hands only held up to heaven, routed the Amalekites more than all the swords that were drawn against them.

The goodness of God is expressed in his promises; and these promises encourage prayer; and prayer is answered with performance; and thanksgiving returns the performance in praise to God. Psalm l. 15. So, all ends where it began, in him who is the Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the End of all things.

* In Aurelius's time, the legion of the Christians was called ἡ ἐπαννοβόλος, the thundering legion.

If you would be rich in all grace, be much in prayer. Conversing with God assimilates the soul to him, beautifies it with the beams of his holiness, as Moses's face shined when he returned from the mount. It is prayer, that brings all our supplies from heaven; as the virtuous woman is said, Prov. xxxi. 14, to be like the merchant's ships, she bringeth her food from afar. Prayer draws more grace out of God's hand, and subdues sin and the powers of darkness: it entertains and augments our friendship with God, raiseth the soul from earth, and purifies it wonderfully. Their experience, who have any of this kind, teacheth them, that, as they abate in prayer, all their graces do sensibly weaken. Therefore, when the apostle hath suited a Christian with his whole armor, he adds this to all, Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit. Eph. vi. 18. For this arms man and his armor both, with the strength and protection of God: Armatura armatura oratio.

II. The form prescribed: After this manner.

They who know anything of their own wants and poverty, and of the bounty and fullness of God, can not doubt of the continual usefulness of prayer; and they who are sensible of their own unskilfulness, will acknowledge, that, as prayer is necessary, so there is necessity of a direction how to perform it. The disciples found this in themselves, when they said, Lord, teach us to pray, as St. Luke hath it, where he records this prayer. And our Savior here marks the errors of hypocrisy and babbling in prayer, which are so incident to men, and teacheth his disciples, After this manner, therefore, pray ye.

As for prescribing forms of prayer in general, to be bound to their continual use in private or in public, is nowhere practised. Nor is there, I conceive, on the other side, anything in the word of God, or any solid reason drawn from the word, to condemn their use.

There is, indeed, that inconvenience observable in their much use, and leaning on them, that they easily turn to coldness and formality; and yet, to speak the truth of this, it is rather imputable to our dulness and want of affection in spiritual things, than to the forms of prayer that are used. For whereas some may account it much spiritualness to despise what they have heard before, and to desire continual variety in prayer, it seems rather to be want of spiritualness that makes that needful, for that we find not our affections lively in that holy exercise, unless they be awaked and stirred by new expressions; whereas, the soul that is earnest on the thing itself for itself, panting after the grace of God and the pardon of sin, regards not in what terms it be uttered, whether new or old; yea, though it be in those words it hath heard and uttered a hundred times, yet, still it is new to a spiritual mind. And surely the desires that do move in that constant way, have more evidence of sincerity and true vigor in them, than those that depend upon new notions and words to move them, and can not stir without them. It may be, that it is no other than a false flash of temporary devotion that arises in a man's heart, which comes by the power of some moving strain of prayer that is new. But when confessions of sin, and requests of pardon, though in never so low and accustomed terms, carry his heart along with them heavenward, it is then more sure that the Spirit of God dwelling in him, and the sense of the things themselves, the esteem of the blood of Christ and the favor of God, do move the heart, and there is no novelty of words to help it. So, then, though the Lord bestows rich gifts upon some of his servants, for his own glory and the good of his church, yet we should beware that in fancy continual variety in prayer, there be not more of the flesh than of the spirit, and the head working more than the heart. It is remarkable, that, as they that search those things observe, the words of this prayer are (divers of them) such as come near the words of such petitions as were usual among the Jews, though He in whom was all fulness and wisdom, was not scarce of matter and words; so little was novelty and variety considerable in prayer, in his esteem. Mistake it not; the Spirit of prayer hath not his seat in the invention, but in the affection. In this many deceive themselves, in that they think the work of this Spirit of prayer to be mainly in furnishing new supplies of thoughts and words: no, it is mainly in exciting the heart anew at times of prayer, to break forth itself in ardent desires to God, whatsoever the words be, whether new or old, yea, possibly without words; and then most powerful when it words it least, but vents in sighs and groans that can not be expressed. Our Lord understands the language of these perfectly, and likes it best: he knows and approves the meaning of his own Spirit, and looks not to the outward appearance, the shell of words, as men do. Rom. viii. 26, 27.

But, to speak particularly of this form that is above all exception, it is given us as the pattern and model of all our prayers, and the closer they keep to it, the nearer they resemble it, they are the more approvable. It is a wonder, then, how any can scruple the use of this prayer itself. For, if other prayers are to be squared by it, what forbids to use that which is the square, and therefore perfectest? If they be good by conformity to it, itself must be better. The mumbling of it over without understanding and affection, is indeed no other than a gross abuse of it, and taking of the name of God in vain, as all other lifeless prayer is. And this is not only the popish abuse of it, but too much our own; for when we do not both understand and attentively mind what we say, it is all one to us, though in our own tongue, as if, with them, we said it in an unknown language. It is a foolish, superstitious conceit, to imagine that the rattling over these words is sufficient for prayer; but it is, on the other side, a weak, groundless scruple, to doubt that the use of it, with spiritual affection, is both lawful and commendable.

[ὄρος.] It is a particle both for the matter and the manner of prayer.

1. The matter. This may be our rule, that whatsoever we can not reduce to some part of this prayer, as contained under it, should be no part of ours. If we take not heed to this, we may abuse the throne of God with undue and unworthy suits, and ask those things that it were a punishment to give us. Therefore, Plato chose well that word, Give us what is good for us, whether we ask it or not; and what is evil give us not, though we should desire it. Not to speak now particularly, we see in the matter of this prayer in general, that spiritual things are to be the main of all our prayers; and, in things temporal, not to lodge superfluous, inordinate desires, but in a moderate use to seek things necessary.

2. For the manner. Observe [1.] The order of this prayer, that the soul put itself in the sight of God, and him in its own sight, beginning, as here, with due thoughts of the majesty of God, to whom we pray. And this is of very great consequence: but more of this hereafter.

[2.] That the glory of God is wholly preferred to all our own contentment of what kind soever: that is to be the first-born and strength of all our desires; and all that we seek for ourselves, must be in relation to that his glory, directed to it as our highest scope. And because we are naturally full of self-love, and our hearts are carried by it toward our own interest, and will be ready to start aside like deceitful bows, and slip us in our aiming at that mark; therefore, there be three several petitions, all of that strain, to make them steady and fixed toward it, to desire in all things, and above all things, that our God may be glorified.

[3.] Brevity; opposed to that babbling which our Savior reproves and particularly corrects by this form. The fault he lays on the heathen, not upon the Jews, for they blamed it too, and their doctors spake against it, alleging that place that is very pertinent, Eccl. v. 2, where he argues from our exceeding distance and the greatness of God, because men use not to entertain great persons with long, empty discourses. Know then, before whom thou art in prayer, and have so much respect to the majesty of God, as not to multiply idle repetitions, such as wise men can not well endure; how much less the all-wise God! Βαρρολογία and πολυλογία are here put as one, because the one is the consequent of the other: where there is much speaking, there will be vain speaking and empty repetitions.* In multitude of words there wanteth not sin, says Solomon, Prov. x. 19. And we see it, that they who lay a necessity upon themselves of a long continuance and many words in prayer, as if it were otherwise no prayer at all, they fall into this inconvenience of idle repeating; and this is most unbeseeching our access to the majesty of God, as if there were some defect either in his knowledge, or in his attention or affection to those that seek him. Therefore, though this was the common fault of the heathen, yet some even of them had so much discerning as to condemn this folly, and inveigh against it, acknowledging both the wisdom of God and his love to mankind, and that he understands far better what is fit for us, than we ourselves, and therefore was not to be dishonored with idle tediousness in prayer.†

But is, then, all length and much continuance in prayer, and all redoubling of the same request, reprovable? Surely not. Were there nothing else to persuade us of this, our Savior's own practice were sufficient, who prescribed this rule, and yet is found to have spent whole nights in prayer, and to have iterated the same request; and doubtless (which can be said of no other), his example is as perfect a rule as his doctrine.

This, then, briefly, is the fault here: when the long continuance and much repetition in prayer, is affected as a thing of itself available; when heaping on words, and beating often over the same words, though the heart bear them not company, is judged to be prayer; and generally, whensoever the tongue outruns the affection, then is prayer turned into babbling. Yea, though a man use this very short form here prescribed, yet he may commit this very fault against which it was provided, he may babble in saying it; and it is to be feared, the greatest part do so. Men judge, and that rightly, a speech to be long or short, not so much by the quantity of words, as by the sense; so that a very short speech that is empty of sense, may be called long, and a long one that is full, and hath nothing impertinent, is truly short.‡ Thus, as men judge by the sense of speech, God judgeth by the affection of prayer, which is the true sense of it; so, the quality is the rule of the quantity with him. There is no prayer too long to him, provided it be all enlivened with affection: no idle repetition, where the heart says every word over again as often, and more often than the tongue. Therefore, those repetitions in the Psalms, Lord, hear, Lord, incline thine ear, Lord, attend, &c., were not idle on this account: God's own Spirit did dictate them, there was not one of them empty, but came from the heart of the holy penmen, full fraught with the vehemency of their affections. And it is reported of St. Augustine, that he prayed over for a whole night, Noverim te, Domine, noverim me: because his heart still followed the suit, all of it was prayer. So that in truth, where the matter is new, and the words still diverse and very rich in sense, yet, with God, it may be idle multiplying of words, because the heart stays behind; and where the same words are repeated, so that a man seems poor and mean in the gift of prayer to others, yet, if it be not defect of affection, but the abundance of it, as it may be, that moves often the same request, it is not empty, but full of that sense that the Searcher of hearts alone can read. I had rather share with that publican in his own words, and say it often over, as if I had nothing else to say, God be merciful to me a sinner, saying it with such a heart, than the most excellent prayer where the outside is the better half.

So, then, this is the mistake of men, to think to make words pass for prayer with God, and to make up what is wanting inwardly with multitude of words and long continuance: a foolish compensation, that will no way satisfy him who says, Above all, my son, give me thy heart; and no length nor words can supply the want of that with him. Yet, many do thus; they give large measure of that which is altogether worth nothing. As the orator said of those that make a poor speech pass for something, by crying it out with a loud voice, that they were like to those cripples who got a horseback to hide their halting; it is thus here. And the church of Rome hath it for their common shift; they have shut the heart out of this employment, where it hath most interest, by praying in an unknown tongue; and this defect they make up with long continuance, and repetition of paternosters, with a devotion as cold and dead as the beads they drop. And so they with their breviaries, notwithstanding their name, fall directly into this foolish, heathenish vanity of idle length and repetitions.

Thus do we too, though we speak our own known language, when either in secret or in public we suffer our hearts to rove in prayer, and hear not ourselves what we are praying: how then can we expect that God should hear us?

If the affection can be brought to continue in it, prayer in secret can not be too long. But let us not think it virtue enough that it is long; let it rather be brief with strong bent of mind, than long without it;* as a small body strong and full of spirits, is much better than the greatest bulk that is dull and spiritless. And when we pray in company, because men can not know the temper of other men's hearts,

* Χωρίς τὸ τ' εἶπεν πολλά και τὰ καιρία.—SOPHOCLES.

† Paucis verbis rem divinam facito.

‡ Absit ut multiloquium deputem, quando necessaria dicuntur, quantalibet sermonum multitudine ac prolixitate dicuntur. Brevitas est etiam in longissima oratione, cui nihil inest alieni.

* Non est (ut quidam putant) orare in multiloquio, si diutius oretur, aliud est sermo multus aliud diuturnus affectus. Absit multo loquutio, sed non desit multa precatio.—AUGUSTINE.

usually a convenient medium between the extremes of briefness and length, seems most suitable.

But, alas! how few be there who keep constant watch over their affections in prayer, and endeavor to keep the heart bent to it throughout! Oh, how much sin is committed by us this way that we observe not!

This is a great lesson, and requires still our diligence, even all our lifetime, to learn it better and better, how to pray.

We have here indeed a complete copy, but we can not follow it. He who set it us, must put his Spirit within us, to lead our hand and heart that we may follow it, as he here shows how we should pray. We are not born with this heart finis oratores. And I may add other the word, true of us, in regard of our vanity of mind, and the devices that arise in it. nascimur poetæ. Omnis fictio cordis, Every fiction of the heart, &c., Gen. vi. 5. We must have that Spirit of his, the Spirit of prayer, to teach us effectually, and make us learn this divine art of prayer, according to his rules. Although we are thus externally taught by our Savior's doctrines, yet unless we be taught within by the Spirit, we are never the nearer; we know neither what to ask, nor how to ask. But that is a happy supply, and they may rejoice in it who have it, the Spirit of God helping their infirmities, and making intercession for them. Rom. viii. 26. How should they but speed in their suits with God, who have both his own Spirit interceding, by framing and inditing their petitions, and his own Son interceding at his right hand by his merits!

He that follows me, says our Savior, shall not walk in darkness. John viii. 12. It is safest, in all our ways, to be led by him, particularly in our access to the Father by prayer. He leads us in by his intercession. Through him we have [ἐπισημαίνων] access, or rather adduction. Eph. ii. 18. He takes us by the hand to bring us to the throne of grace, gives us his Spirit to frame our minds, and teach us with what disposition to pray. Here he leads us, by putting words in our mouths, and furnishing us what to say. Consider,

I. The preface or compellation. II. The petitions. III. The conclusion.

By the preface, we are in general taught this, ere we consider particularly the words of it: 1. To endeavor to have right thoughts and apprehensions of God, on whom we call. 2. At our entry or beginning to pray, to set ourselves before him, and him before our own sight; to have the eye of our mind set on that Deity we worship. This would do much to the curing of that common disease of our prayers, the wandering and roving of our minds: an evil that they can not but be sensible of, and often bewail, who take any notice of their own inward carriage with God, who trace their own hearts, and ask account of their behavior in prayer.* Oh, light, inconstant hearts! may they say: as the Latin reads that, Psalm xl. 12, Cor meum dereliquit me. How many regard them not at all! But they who do, find it their ordinary trick to give them the slip. And this is one great cause of our wanderings, that we do not, at our entrance to prayer, compose ourselves to due thoughts of God, and set ourselves in his presence: this would do much to awe us, and ballast our minds, that they tumble not to and fro, as is their custom. There be not many that do, but it would prove no doubt much help, would we task ourselves to this, never to open our mouths to God, till the eye of our soul were fixed upon him, and taken up with the considering of his presence. But of this more when we come to those words, Who art in heaven.

* Nihil est in nobis corde fugacius. GREGORY.

Our Father which art in heaven.] Our Father—the mercy of God is in this, to beget in us the confidence of faith; in the other, Which art in heaven, the majesty of God to work us to reverence: though there is somewhat in the word Father, likewise, to persuade reverence, and something in the other that confirms faith (but more of this hereafter); yet, if we take that which appears most, and is predominant, the former mainly supports faith, and the latter begets humility.

The frame of it is extensive; not My Father, but our Father, and so throughout. Besides that it was a pattern both for public and private prayer, and so it was fittest to run in the larger and public style, it doth, no doubt, as all have taken it, teach the charitable extension of our prayers, where they are most private, to take in with our own the good of others, and when we are busiest and most particularly dealing for ourselves, yet, not to shut out our brethren. Let the place and performance of secret prayer be as private as may be, but the strain and supplications public, as well as personal. The most private prayer of the godly is a public good, and he loses nothing by that; for, besides that his particular interest is not hindered by taking in others, he hath this gain, that by the same reason he likewise hath a share in all the prayers of others. And this (though little considered by the most) is one point, and not a small one, but a very profitable and comfortable point of that article of our faith. The communion of saints, that every believer hath a share in all the prayers of all the rest: he is partner in every ship of that kind that sets to sea, and hath a portion of all their gainful voyages.

But he that in prayer minds none but himself, doubtless he is not right in minding himself. Howsoever, this he may be sure of, that in keeping out others from his prayers, he bars himself from the benefit of all others' prayers likewise. Si pro te solo oras, pro te solus oras: If thou prayest for thyself alone, thou alone prayest for thyself, says St. Ambrose. So that self-love itself may here plead for love to our brethren. Forget not the church of God, and to seek the good of Zion, it is not only your duty, but your benefit. Are you not all concerned in it, if indeed you be parts of that mystical body? And it hinders not at all, but rather advances your personal suits at God's hands, when he sees your love to your brethren, and desires for the church's good. Let not, therefore, any estate, no private perplexity or distress, nor very sorrow for sin, take you so up, as to be all for yourselves: let others, but especially the public condition of the church of God, find room with you. We find it thus with David; when he was lamenting his own case, Psalm li. 18, and Psalm xxv. ult., and elsewhere he forgets not the church: In thy good pleasure do good to Zion, and build up the walls of Jerusalem. So then, let this be the constant tenor of your prayers, even in secret. When thou prayest alone, shut thy door, says our Savior here, shut out as much as thou canst the sight and notice of others, but shut not out the interest and good of others; say, Our Father: as the heathen call their God, Ζεῦ Πατέρ.

Father.] He is indeed our Father (Τὸν γὰρ καὶ γένος ἔσμεν, Acts xvii. 28), as the author of our being, beyond all the visible creatures. He breathed upon man the breath of life. But the privilege of this our natural relation, the sin of our nature hath made fruitless and comfortless to us, till we be restored by grace, and made partakers of a new sonship: we are indeed the workmanship of God, but, being defaced by sin, and considered in that estate, our true name is, children of wrath.

But the sonship that emboldens us to draw near unto God as our Father, is derived from his only begotten Son. He became the son of man, to make us anew the sons of God. Being thus restored, we may indeed look back upon our creation, and draw out of it, to use in prayer with God, that we are his creatures, the workmanship of his hands, and he in that sense our Father. But, by reason of our rebellion, this argument is not strong enough alone, but must be supported with this other, as the main ground of our comfort, that wherein the strength of our confidence lies, that he is our Father in his Son Christ; that by faith we are invested into a new sonship, and by virtue of that may call him Father, and move him by that name to help and answer us. John i. 12. To as many as received him, he gave power to become the sons of God. Our adoption holds in Jesus Christ as the head of this fraternity; therefore he says, I go to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God. John xx. 17. He says not, To our Father and our God, but severally, mine and yours; teaching us the order of the new covenant, that the sonship of Jesus Christ is not only more eminent in nature, but in order, is the spring and cause of ours, as St. Cyril well observes. So then, he that here puts this word in our mouths, to call God Father, he it is by whom we have this dignity and comfort that we call him so.

But this adoption is accompanied (that we think it not a naked, external name) with a real change, and so great a change that it bears the name of that which is the real ground of sonship; it is called regeneration. And these are inseparable. There be no sons of God by adoption, but such as are withal his sons by regeneration and new birth. There is a new life breathed into them from God. He is not only the Father of Spirits, by their first infusion into the body, and enlivening it by them, but by this new infusion of grace into the souls of men (as it seems to signify there, Heb. xii. 9, where he is speaking of spiritual sons), and enlivening them by it, which were dead without it, as the body is without them. And the Spirit of God renewing them, is the Spirit of adoption, by which they cry, Abba Father. Rom. viii. 15. He gives them a supernatural life by this Spirit sent into their hearts; and the Spirit, by that regeneration which he works, ascertains them of that adoption which is in Christ Jesus; and in the persuasion of both, they call upon God as their Father.

So then, you who would have this confidence in approaching to God, to call him Father, lay hold on Jesus Christ, as the fountain of sonship. Offer not to come unto God but through him, and rest not satisfied with yourselves, nor your prayers, till you find some evidence that you are in him. And know, that there is no evidence of your portion in the Son, but by the Spirit; therefore called the Spirit of the Son, by which we call God Father. Gal. iv. 6. See whether the Spirit of God dwells and rules in your hearts. For they that have not the Spirit of God, are none of his, says the apostle; but, in the same chapter, he assures you, that As many as are led by the Spirit of God they are undoubtedly the sons of God, Rom. viii. 9, 14. If you then call on the name of God, and particularly by this name, Our Father, depart from iniquity. Be ashamed to pretend to be his sons, and yet be so unlike him, wallowing in sin: it can not be so, that the sons of so holy a God can be altogether unholy, and delight to be so: no, though they can not be perfectly free from impurity, yet, they who are indeed his children, do certainly hate impurity, because he hates it.

Do you draw near unto God in his Son Christ? Do you give yourselves up to be led by his Spirit? Then you may account and call him your Father. And if you may use this word, there is abundance of sweetness in it: it is a spring of comfort that can not run dry. And it hath influence into all the petitions; as likewise the other word, which art in heaven; Thou who art so great and so good. Whose name and whose kingdom should we desire to be advanced so much as our own Father's, our heavenly Father? And whose will to be obeyed on earth as it is in heaven? Of whom should we seek our daily bread, but of our Father? And especially, so rich a Father, possessor of heaven and earth! And forgiveness we may ask of our gracious Father, and conduct, and protection. In the hardest condition that can befall you, ye may come to your Father: all the world can not bar your access. And there is no child may go to his father with any suit, with more confidence than you may to your Father; and if there be mercy and power enough in God, thou canst not miss of help. He hath the bowels of a Father. Psalm ciii. 13. Yea, says our Savior, Can you that are evil give your children good things? How much more will your heavenly Father give good things to them who ask him! Matt. vii. 11. The love of parents to their children, they have from him: He hath given it to nature, so, it is but a drop to the ocean of fatherly love that is in himself. Ante petitionem magnum accepimus, ut possimus dicere, pater: quid enim jam non det filiis petentibus pater, qui jam hoc ipsum dedit ut essent filii? [AUGUSTINE.] Let not, then, unworthiness scare his children. Parents love their children, and do them good, not because they see they are more worthy than others, for it may be far otherwise, but because they are their own.

Yea, though we have run astray from him, and forgotten very far the duty of children, yet he can not forget the love of a Father; and our best is, to return to him. It can not be well with us, so long as we go any whither else. The prodigal found it so, and therefore, though he was convinced of that, that he was unworthy to be called his son, yet he resolves to return, I will go to my father. Yea, though to thy sense he should seem to reject thee, yet, let not go this hold. If thou hast but a desire to believe in him and love him, though thou canst find no more, and even while thou doubtest whether he is thy Father or no, yet, press him with the name, call him Father, speak to him as thy Father; Jesus, his Son, in whom he is well pleased, doth warrant thee. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, says Job: so resolve thou, though thou sawest his hand, as it were, ready to throw thee into hell, yet, cry to him still, and use this very name, Father, reject me not. Never any perished with such a purpose.

Who art in heaven.]

Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling, Psalm ii. 11. This compellation taken together, and rightly understood, works that due temper of prayer, the mixture of these two, joy, and fear, confidence and reverence. There was some such thing spoken of Augustus, but it is most true of the Divine Majesty, that they who dare speak rashly to him, know not his greatness, and they who dare not speak to him, provided it be with due reverence and respect, know not his goodness.

That we all invoke one Father, teaches that new law of love to one another, which our Savior, the author of this prayer, so often recommends, and makes the very badge of his disciples. It serves to comfort the meanest, and to abate the loftiness of the greatest who pray thus, as St. Augustine well observes, that they all meet and agree in this: the greatest kings, and their meanest subjects, all must speak to God as their Father, not only all alike having their being from him as the Father of the spirits of all flesh, but the same adoption belonging unto all, high and low, that are believers. All the pomp and command and pleasures of princes can not make them happy without this grace of adoption; and no outward baseness prejudices any, but they may be happy by partaking of it. In this, likewise, is very clear our lesson of love to God, because our Father. For though (as they say) love doth descend much more than it ascends, and it is here most of all verified, yet it doth ascend from the children to their parents by way of reflection, especially from the sons of God to him as a Father, who is love itself. And as this name draws the soul to the throne of grace with assured expectation of mercy, so it commands withal (as we said), honor and reverence; especially, being accompanied with this word that mainly enforces that [ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς,] In the heavens, answering the Hebrew word, which is plural, and signifying that the glorious God is above all the visible heavens. And thus the profane authors speak of God likewise, ὀψιτάτα δώματα ναίων.

We know, although we are guilty of much forgetting it, that the Lord is everywhere present, neither excluded nor included anywhere; that he fills all places, not as contained in them, but as containing them, and upholding them, and all things in them. But he is in heaven after a special manner, in the brightest manifestation of himself, and as the purest service is performed to him there. They can not contain him, as Solomon expresses it, 1 Kings viii. 27; yet, his throne is there, there he dwells, as in his principal palace, in greatest majesty, as David teacheth us, Psalm xi. 4, and often elsewhere. But that he is not shut up there, and regardless of things below, we learn in that same place; for he adds, His eyes behold, and his eyelids try the children of men.

This is added first, for distinction. As the apostle differencing him, from the fathers of our flesh, Heb. xii. 9, calls him, The Father of Spirits, so here to distinguish him from earthly fathers, he is styled, Our heavenly Father.

Observe. We can not here know God according to what he is in himself, and therefore he is described to our capacity, and to our profit, so as we are able, and as it most concerns us to know him here; by his gracious relation to us as our Father, and by the excellency of his dwelling, as a sign of his greatness, that he is in heaven; both which are extrinsic to his essence. But thus we may learn thus much, to worship and love him, as the best and the greatest, infinitely exceeding all that we can conceive of him.

As it is for distinction, so, it is such a word of difference as is of excellent use.

1. To make the soul humble and reverend in approaching to God in prayer. If we consider it, shall we not be wary how we behave ourselves in the presence of so great a king? It is very strange, that our souls should not be possessed with the deepest lowliness and self-abasement in the sight of God; worms in the dust before the majesty that dwells in heaven. This Solomon expresses: He is in heaven, and thou on earth, therefore let thy words be few. What is this we find in ourselves, that makes us so drunk with self-conceit, not only in converse one with another, but with God? Surely, we know him not; at least, we consider not who he is, and where he dwells, and who we are, and where we dwell. Surely, it would lay us low, if when we come before God, we would consider him as the most glorious king, sitting on his throne, and compassed with glorious spirits, who offer him spotless praises, and we ourselves coming before him, as base frogs creeping out of our pond, where we dwell amidst the mire of sinful pollutions.

Thus, indeed, his highness should humble us in coming, but it should not affright us from coming before him; for though he is in heaven and we on earth, yet, he is our Father. Thus ought we to join these two, and to behold them jointly, that we may have that right posture of mind by them which suits with prayer—humble boldness.

There may be undue distrust, but there can not be too much humility of spirit, in prayer. The more humble, the fitter to come to God; and he the more willing to come into the soul, and dwell in it. For that is the other house that he hath chosen. They seem very ill suited together: if the highest heavens be the Lord's own dwelling, it would seem fit that the other should be the richest palaces on earth, or stately-built temples. No, the other is such a one as we most despise, but God prefers before all other, even the most sumptuous building. Isa. lvii. 15. Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy; I dwell in the high and holy place; with him also (a strange also!) that is of a broken and humble spirit. The highest heavens are the habitation of his glory, and the humble heart hath the next honor, to be the habitation of his grace.

2. As the word humbles the soul in God's sight, so it elevates it to heaven where God dwells, and fixes it there in prayer. And this elevation is not contrary to humility: the soul that is laid lowest in itself, is most sublime in converse with God, Sublimiter humilis et humiliter sublimis. [CYPRIAN.] And thus ought our hearts to ascend in prayer, which, alas, we usually suffer to lag and draw the wing heavily on the earth. Unto thee, O Lord, says the psalmist, do I lift up my soul. Psalm xxv. 1. That is the right and natural motion of prayer. But there is another lifting up that our souls are better acquainted with, which is spoken of in the psalm immediately foregoing, the lifting up of the soul unto vanity; and the more so lift up, the farther off from God. O the vainness of our hearts? And how hard is it to establish them on him who dwells on high! Even while we are speaking to him, we suffer them to break loose and rove, and to entertain foolish thoughts. We would not use a king or great person so, nor any man whom we respect, when we are speaking to him seriously, to intermix impertinences, and forget what we are saying. But we dare offer gross nonsense to the all-wise God: though the words go on in good sense, yet the prayer is so to him, when the heart intermixes vain thoughts—Polum terræ miscet, confuses and spoils all. And this is the great task as we have said, to bring the heart before God, to set it on his holy mountain in heaven, while we pray (it should be so certainly), and leave servile, earthly thoughts at the foot of the mount.

3. It gives confidence. [1.] Of the power of God, his rich ability to grant all our requests. He, that Lord of all, and as greatest possessor, hath his throne in the highest heavens, and doth what pleaseth him in heaven and in earth; this, with the other completes our comfort: good-will and power—our Father in heaven. And this we may apply to all our wants, for assurance of supply, and to all our enemies, and the church's enemies, that our prayer shall be heard for their foil and disappointment. He sits in heaven and laughs. Psalm ii. 4. They rage, and tumult, and consult; a great bustle and noise they keep; and he sits and laughs at them. He scorns all their proud attempts, for that with ease he can scatter them in a moment: one word of his mouth overturns them and all their contrivances.

[2.] It is a confirmation of our portion in heaven. If he who is in heaven be our Father, then, our inheritance lies there, in that land of peace where it can not be lost or impaired, and he will bring his children to the possession of it. To be the sons of God, is not a style without an estate, an empty title. No, he who makes us sons, makes us heirs likewise: sons, we are, in Christ, and co-heirs with Christ. Rom. viii. 17. He came down to earth for this purpose, to make a new purchase of heaven for us; and he is returned thither to prepare it for us. I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, ye may be also. John xiv. 2.

Hallowed be thy name.] The sense of many wants and necessities, drives a Christian daily to God in prayer; yet, certainly, that which draws him most strongly to it, is of a higher nature, the sense of his duty to God, and the delight he hath to do that homage and honor to him. And therefore, in prayer, the main current of his heart runs that way, and so agrees with this pattern given us by our Savior; wherein we see clearly, that our prime desires are to be bestowed on the glory of God. And that is placed first, not only as it is to be preferred before all other suits, but as it is to be regarded still in all the rest, and they all referred to it. And to make the impression of this desire the deeper on our hearts, and to give the fuller vent of it in expression to them who have it, there are, you see, three of these six petitions spent on it. This is the first of them, Hallowed be thy name. This suits well with the style here given to God Our Father. If I be a Father, where is my honor? says the Lord by his prophet, Mal i. 6. And here, his children are taught to join these two together: Thou art our Father, and so glorious a Father, dwelling in heaven; therefore our desire is that thou mayest have honor, that thy name may be hallowed, and Thy kingdom come. We will inquire,

1. What is meant by his name. 2. What is the hallowing or sanctifying of it. 3. What the petition itself is.

1. Briefly his name is, Himself, as he is made known to us, and conceivable by us, and differed from all other beings, as men are by their names one from another. For to this purpose are all these several names and attributes given him, which we find in scripture, that we may so conceive of himself as here we are capable.

2. To sanctify his name, we know, can not be to infuse holiness into it, or effectually to make it holy; for neither can we so make anything holy, nor can the name of God be so made holy, for it is most holy of itself, yea, he is holiness itself, and the fountain of all holiness. But according to the double sense of the word blessing as mutual between God and man, so is this of sanctifying. Blessed, says the apostle, be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings. Eph. i. 3. His benedicere, is benefacere. He blesseth us really, as the giver of all blessings and of blessedness itself; and our blessing him is no other than the acknowledging of this, that it is he who blesseth us, and praising him for it. Thus he sanctifies us, makes us holy, purifies us by his Spirit from our natural unholiness and filthiness according to his promise (Ezek. xxxvi. 25), and according to our Savior's prayer (John xvii. 17); and we sanctify the Lord and his name (as here, and Isaiah viii. 13), when we know and acknowledge that he is holy, and use his name holily. And thus, they only sanctify, who affectionately pray thus, that his name may be sanctified, whose hearts he hath first sanctified and made them holy.

More particularly and distinctly, the sanctifying of God's name hath in it these things. [1.] To have right thoughts of the holiness and majesty of God. [2.] That, upon so conceiving of him, our hearts be reverently affected toward him. [3.] Not only to have that due apprehension and reverence of his holiness in the habit, and so let it lie dead within us, but often to stir up ourselves to the remembrance and consideration of it, to call in our thoughts to act about it: so, this will increase our knowledge and reverence (as all habits grow by acting), and will excite the soul to praise him, as the psalmist speaks, Give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. [4.] The declaring and extolling of his holiness, speaking upon all seasonable occasions, honorably of his name. [5.] The humble sense and acknowledgment of our own unholiness in his presence: and therefore, all those lowly confessions of sins and of their own unworthiness, that we find in the prayers of the prophets, are so many hallowings of the name of God, giving the glory of holiness to him alone, and taking the shame of their own pollutions. Thus, Dan. ix., Isa. lxiv., &c. As some of the Americans have a custom, when they appear before their king, to put on their worst apparel, that all the magnificence may rest on him alone, and appear the better; thus, though the majesty of God, in itself being infinite, needs nothing else to commend it, yet, to our apprehension of it, it may be thus, and the saints in desire of his glory may intend this, to set off the lustre of his purity and excellency in the humble confessions of their own vileness: To thee, O Lord, belongeth righteousness, but to us confusion of face. Dan. ix. 7. [6.] The hallowing of God's name, is an earnest endeavor of conformity with him in holiness; first, in heart, that must be the principal seat of it, and then, holiness in all our words and actions, and the whole course of our lives. This is that which the Lord continually presses upon his people, Be ye holy, for I am holy. Lev. xix. 2, xx. 7, xxi. 8, &c. And this is the most effectual sanctifying of his name by way of declaring it holy, when his people walk in holiness. Though you tell the world that he is holy, they know him not: they can neither see him nor his holiness: but when they see that there are men, taken out of the same lump of polluted nature with themselves, and yet so renewed and changed, that they hate the defilements of the world, and do indeed live holily in the midst of a perverse generation; this may convince them that there is a brighter spring of holiness, where it is in fulness, whence these drops are, that they perceive in men; for seeing it is not in nature, there must be another principle of it, and that can be no other than this holy God. Thus is his name hallowed, and he known to be holy, by the holiness of his people.

So then, the petition takes in all, and in it we desire the sanctifying and magnifying of God's name in every possible way. 1st, by ourselves, that we may mind his glory, and by his grace sanctify his name. 2dly, By others, that our Lord may be more known and honored in the world. They would gladly have many hearts and many tongues brought in to confess the Lord, and his holiness and greatness. Thus the psalmist stirs up the angels to bless the Lord, Psalm ciii. 20; not that they need exciting, but to show his own affection to God's praises. 3dly, And because there is still some alloy and mixture of unholiness in all the hallowing of his name here below, all our services being stained, therefore, as the godly do, in this request, wish all the exalting and sanctifying of God's name among men that is attainable here, so, I conceive, they do, as it were applaud those purer services and praises that are given him above; and sensible how far they fall short themselves, they are glad to think that there be such multitudes of angels and glorified spirits hallowing and praising his name better and more constantly, not ceasing day nor night to cry Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty. And here they follow as they can, and give their acclamation, though in a lower key, yet as loud as they are able, Even so, Lord, hallowed be thy name. Now, the cause and source of their great desire of exalting and hallowing the name of God, is their love to him, which the sight that he hath given them of his excellency, hath kindled in their hearts.

After that, their chief delight is to think of him, and speak of his name. Gladly would they have him highly esteemed by all; and this is their grief, that they can find so few to bear them company and help them in this, in hallowing and extolling his name, which is so deeply engraven on their hearts. See how pathetically the psalmist repeats that again and again, Psalm cvii: O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and his wonderful works to the children of men! And when they hear or see anything tending to the dishonor of his name, this wounds them, and pierces them through as a sword, as the psalmist speaks, Psalm xlii. 10. They are far from envy, or an evil eye: yea, they rejoice in the gifts and graces which God bestows upon others, although it be beyond what they have themselves; for still it serves their desires, and answers what they are most earnest in: it tends to the hallowing and glorifying of the name of God. And what they have themselves, they are not in danger to grow vain upon it: rather, they wonder at the free grace of God, and extol that, and think with themselves, What am I, that he should have had compassion on me, and plucked me out of the crowd of the lost world, and given me any desire to hallow his name, while others are blaspheming it, and delighting to dishonor it! But ever the more they receive from God, they are the more humble, the more desirous of his praise, and regardless of their own. Any holiness that is in them, they know well, is from him, and therefore, all the glory of holiness must return thither, whence holiness originally comes; and the very end for which they desire increase of holiness in themselves, is to the end that they may the more hallow his name from whom they have it, and that, by the increase of their stock, there may be an increase of the tribute of praise to God.

But alas! how far are we from this mind! What hypocrisy is it, for the same mouth to utter this request, that dares profane the name of God by vain swearing! That which is holy, as the Hebrew word imports, is separated from common use (although it was not holy before), and ought not to be profaned; least of all, this name, which is not made holy by such a separation, but is primitively holy in itself; and they who use it rashly and unholy, are deeply guilty of despising the majesty of God. It is not possible that any one who is truly sensible of his greatness and holiness, can customarily abuse his name, that blessed name which he hopes to bless for ever. You say, It is your custom. It is a wonder to hear men speak thus as an excuse; it is the deepest accusation. Are not men known by their customs? Do not these discover what they are? It is your custom—what gain you by that? You must confess that it is such a one as is the custom of the children of Satan, the professed enemy of God's name; as the delight and custom of hallowing his name, is the badge of his children. It is your custom! Then know, it is his custom not to acquit them, but to make them feel the weight of his punishing hand, who dare make it a custom to dishonor his name.

Again, they who profane his holy day, they who sanctify not his name by calling on it daily in private, and generally, all who by an unsanctified life do blot the profession of Christians, what do they mean to lie so grossly, not unto men, but unto God, to his face, in praying thus, as if they desired the hallowing of his name by all, and yet, do nothing but unhallow it themselves? Think it not sufficient to the hallowing of his name, that his house and worship is purged of abuses: though they be holy, yet, unless we ourselves be holy too, we pollute all in our use of them: the worships, and sabbaths, and the name of God, our filthy hands defile all. Let us not thus provoke God, lest, in just wrath and punishment, he sanctify his own name upon us, which we profane, as he threatens against the Jews by his prophets. Ezek. xxxvi. 23.

First, then, be not satisfied to think slightly and superficially of God. Take time to consider him, and know who he is; and then you will reverence him in your thoughts. It deserves and requires all the whole heart to keep up with it; and alas! what is a heart, a narrow thing, though the largest of hearts, as Solomon's, as large as the sand of the sea, to an infinite God! We can find time for our earthly thoughts, and for vain foolish thoughts, which are good for nothing; and shall we shut out God, or think any sudden passing look enough for him!

Secondly, Behave yourselves with regard of him in his worship: ἁγιάγιος, let holy things be done holily.

Thirdly, Honor it in your lives: especially, such as do know his name, grow daily more respective and tender of it, and be more circumspect in your actions, and, as He who hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation. 1 Pet. i. 15.

Thy kingdom come.] He who is the beginning of all things, must likewise of necessity be the end of them all; and then are our intentions rightest and purest, when we are most possessed with the desire of that highest end, the glory of God, and look straightest unto it. And if this purpose ought to diffuse itself through all our actions, certainly, in prayer, it should be most lively and active, because prayer is so direct and express a turning of the face of the soul unto God, and setting of its eye upon him. Therefore, this petition follows forth the same desire with the former, wishing honor to God. He is a most holy God, and the former request was for his glory in that, in the sanctifying of his name. He is a king, a great king, the greatest of all, and this wishes his glory in that sense, that his kingdom may be advanced: Thy kingdom come. 1. We shall inquire what his kingdom is. 2. What is the coming of it. And, 3. Shall speak of the petition itself.

1. This kingdom is not his universal supremacy over all the world and all the creatures in it, as being their Maker and their Preserver, and so having the highest and justest title, and the most absolute kind of dominion over all things; but his peculiar royalty over his church. By the former, he is called King of nations, Jer. x. 7; and by the latter, his style is King of saints, Rev. xv. 3. Of the former the psalmist speaks, Psalm xxiv. 1, but that which he adds, ver. 3, concerns the latter, and so on, in the Psalm, and ver. 7: Lift up your heads, O ye gates, that the King of glory may come in.

This kingdom is gathered and selected out of the other, and though the less in quantity, yet, in God's account, far more precious than all the rest. The church is the jewel in the ring of the world: in it he hath his peculiar residence and chief delight; as kings choose one of their palaces, and, if they have more, one of their kingdoms, to dwell in more than another. Those things that are hidden from the rest of the world concerning this King, are made known to his subjects of this his select kingdom; and it is in it that he opens up, displays after a special manner more than in all the world beside, both the glory of his majesty, and the riches of his bounty, here, in part, and fully hereafter. And according to that difference, it is distinguished into the kingdom of grace, and that of glory.

The kingdom of grace is to be considered, first, in the external means and administration of it; secondly, in its inward being and power. In the former sense, it is of a larger extent; but in the latter, of a more uniform nature in itself, and more conformed to its Head. The former, the kingdom of grace in its outward administration, is plainly the whole visible church; but the inward power of the kingdom of grace is only in the hearts of those who are truly sanctified, and members of the invisible church.

Jesus Christ is ordained and anointed the king and head of both, political; but of the one, natural, and therefore altogether indissoluble, not only in regard of the whole, but of each part and member of it.

The visible church is but a little parcel, a kingdom chosen out of the world; but the truly godly, who are alone the subjects of the inward kingdom of grace, are but a small part of that part, a choice part of the visible church, as it is a choice part of the visible world.

Now these three, the kingdom of glory, and those two kinds of the kingdom of grace, stand in this subordination: the inward kingdom of grace is the way and preparation for that of glory, and the outward kingdom of grace in the visible church, is the means and way of introducing, and establishing, and increasing the inward: so that both of them look forward to the kingdom of glory, as their utmost end, and shall terminate and end in it.

The first of these, the external or political kingdom of Christ in the visible church, consists in his absolute and supreme authority to appoint the laws of his church, and rulers by these laws. And the use of the word, and sacraments, and discipline, according to his own appointment, is the acknowledgment of him as King of his church.

The other, the inward kingdom of grace, is then received into the heart, when the Spirit of God moves it to a willing subjection to Jesus Christ, and the whole soul submits itself to be governed by him. He enters indeed by conquest, and yet is most gladly received. It is both a lawful and a favorable conquest, because he frees the soul, which is his by so many rights, from the tyranny of a most cruel usurper, the prince of darkness, and brings in a kingdom full of sweetness and happiness: there is no worse in it than these, righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Rom. xiv. 17.

This is the folly of an unbelieving mind, that it entertains most false prejudices against the kingdom of Christ; thinks that, if it let him in, it shall be controlled and curbed, and therefore resolves against it, and studies how to hold him out; consults (as it is in the second Psalm) against the Lord and his anointed. But this is a lamentable madness, to dream of liberty in the midst of chains, and to be afraid of a deliverer. There is no soul that opens to this King of glory, but can testify that it never knew what true liberty was, till it admitted this kingdom of God, till there was a throne for Christ erected within it.

The third, the kingdom of glory—would you hear wherein that consists? It is such as we can not hear nor speak of as it is. And this indeed says more of it than all we can say, that the excellency of it is unspeakable, yea, unconceivable. This we are sure of, to speak comparatively of it (which is our help in things we understand not in themselves), that all the kingdoms of the world, unite all their glory together, are base and poor in respect of it, but splendida in serico; and that all the delights we have here, not only of nature, but even of grace, are less to it than the smallest sparkle is to the sun in its brightness. All that is done here by our king, Christ, in the ruling of his church, and the power of his ordinances, and the bestowing of graces on his own, are but preludes and preparations for that; and when that cometh, this way of ruling his church and people shall cease, as having attained its end. Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to the Father; word and sacraments, and discipline, shall be at an end; and then God shall be all in all. 1 Corinthians xv. 24-28.

2. The coming of the kingdom of God, in the former two, is, the extending and spreading of them to those places and persons that have not yet received them, and the increase of their power where they are entertained; for they come gradually. And that kingdom of glory, as it is concerned in the other, comes forward in them so far, and hastens toward its perfection; but in itself, as their consummation, it shall come at once altogether in the end of time.

3. So, then, in the petition, all these are included, and in their largest extent; for it is to take it too narrow and too low, to restrain it only to our own interest in this kingdom, either of grace or glory, or both. Thus David, Psalm ciii., excites all to praise the Lord, but most his own soul; begins with that, and ends with it. Although they who desire it aright, do desire that they may partake of it (for, if they desire that God may be glorified, they can not but, even out of love to that glory, beside their own happiness, desire that they themselves may be among those who may honor God as the subjects of his kingdom), yet they stay not there, but dilate their hearts to wish the advancement and accomplishment of his kingdom in all the elect, and in all those ways that tend to it; and their love may rise to that high strain, as without considering their own interest at all; yea, supposing that they were to be shut out of his kingdom themselves, yet still to wish, Thy kingdom come: let others enjoy and bless thee, Lord, for ever, even though I should be excluded: let thine elect be gathered, though I were none of them. Be thou great, O Lord, whatsoever become of me.

[1.] Considering what a height of glory will arise to God out of the final subduing of his enemies, and the full deliverance of his church, and the bringing home of all his children after all their sufferings and sorrows, to sit down together to that great marriage-supper of the Lamb; they can not but thus breathe forth their longings and wishes, that that time may be hastened, and the fulness of their Lord's kingdom accomplished, where it shall abide for all eternity.

[2.] Both in relation to that end, and likewise in respect of the present glory that redounds to God in it, they earnestly desire the advancement and enlargement of Christ's kingdom here on earth. For, beside that thus it is rising to its perfection, it is no small present glory to our king, Christ, as a testimony of his invincible power, that he rules in the very midst of his enemies, and in despite of them all, Psalm cx. 2; not only sits sure and keeps his own, thrust at him who will, but, when he pleases, gains upon them, and enlarges his territories, and grows greater by their resistances and oppositions. He is here, as David was, often assaulted, and put to defend his kingdom often in war, but always a conqueror; but after this militant kingdom, he shall be as Solomon, who likewise typified him, reigning in perfect peace.

Now, because the enemies of his kingdom are not yet, as they shall be, all under his feet, but round about him, and incessantly plotting and working against him, and Satan hath his kingdom and his throne in the world opposite to Christ, therefore this is one chief point of this request: that all adverse power may be brought low, that all his enemies may lick the dust, and melt before him as wax before the fire. And for us, especially in these times, that the kingdom of Antichrist, the son of perdition, may, answerably to that his name, be brought to perdition; that God would remember his promise (for the faithful are called his remembrancers; though he forgets not, and hath his set time for judgment, yet he loves to be stirred up by the cries of his children); that he would make good at length those words he hath spoken of Babel's ruin and the flourishing estate of his church in these latter times: that the power of the word, and purity of religion, maugre all the policy and power of men opposing it, may spread and extend itself, and make irresistible progress, as the sun in his course; that Jesus Christ may be daily taking further possession of the nations, even to the ends of the earth, according to the patent of his Father's donation. And the certainty of its endurance and growth till it be complete, should not abate, but increase the vigor of our prayers for it. And the nearer things are to their accomplishment, the more, usually, the Lord excites the hopes and prayers of his people about them, and they pray the more earnestly (see Dan. ix), moving naturally in it, and therefore, fastest when nearest their place.

Again, we pray in this, that where Christ doth reign in his outward ordinances, there he would bring in his spiritual kingdom into the souls of men, that sinners may be converted unto him. The love of the glory of Jesus Christ will desire this earnestly, that many hearts may be brought in to submit to him, for the glory of a king is in the multitude of his subjects. Further, that they who are his people, may grow more conformable to his laws; that his dominion may be more powerful in their hearts and lives, and particularly that we ourselves may find it so.

You who will not receive the kingdom of God within yourselves, to what purpose do you speak this, as if you desired it to be enlarged and flourish abroad? 1. You can have no comfort in it, remaining slaves to sin, and so enemies indeed to it. Neither the kingdom of Christ in the government of the church on the one side, nor, on the other, the coming of his kingdom of glory, can do you any benefit, while the third is wanting, the inward kingdom of his grace, which is the true end of the former, and the means to partake of the happiness of the latter. Why wish you the day of the Lord? Amos v. 18. As the prophet says of that day he there speaks of, mistake it not: though that day of his kingdom shall be all glory in itself, it shall be to you, remaining still impenitent, darkness and not light, full of horror and amazement. 2. As you can have no comfort in his kingdom, so you can not really wish its advancement. You wish it well elsewhere, as if you were content it should be anywhere, rather than within yourselves. But would you indeed have his kingdom to be embraced and advanced, then do, for one, let him be thy king: first, give him thine own heart, and then wish him many more; for then thou wilt wish it heartily and truly.

You who have received this kingdom, yet have need still, even in that sense, to wish the coming of it in further degrees, and fuller efficacy. Find you not many rebels yet unsubdued? No doubt, they who search and know their own hearts, will, and often do, complain of them to their king: oh, such swarms of lusts, and unruly, irregular desires! When shall they all be brought into subjection? And so they lift up their wish, from this to the other, the full and glorious kingdom, and say again and again, Thy kingdom come. This is the noble desire that takes up the hearts of the godly. While others are desiring and pursuing low, base things, their minds, and their endeavor, to their power, are chiefly set upon this, the advancement of the kingdom of God. They seek not themselves and their own things, with the world, to the prejudice of this kingdom; no, they desire to lose anything, to suffer contempts and abasements themselves, so that this kingdom may flourish. St. Paul cares not what he be accounted, modo magnificetur Christus, so that now also Christ may be magnified, Phil. i. 20. As faithful ministers of state (and wise princes choose such), who are not making up themselves to their master's disadvantage, but always preferring his honor to their private benefit, feeling his losses and gains more than their own (as was said of St. Augustine, Dominicus semper lucris gaudens, et damnis mœrens); this is the right temper of the servants and ministers of Jesus Christ, to be all for their Master, willing that their name, and estates, and lives, and all, may make a part of his footstool to step up to his throne; not forced as his enemies to be so, but willingly laying themselves low for his glory. And this comfort they have, that when his kingdom shall come in its fulness, and all his enemies shall be trodden down for ever, then they shall be glorified with him, and shall see his glory with exceeding joy. Therefore do they so often desire his coming, and are so weary of all they see here: and when he says himself, for their assurance and comfort, Surely, I come quickly, their earnest desire makes them echo, Even so come, Lord Jesus, Rev. xxii. 20.

There is some loss to the flesh, if we will hear it, in this desire, in each kind. The erecting of Christ's kingdom in purity in his church, thrusts out the outward pomp and magnificence that naturally we like so well. His kingdom of grace can not be in the soul, without the forsaking of all our accustomed and pleasing ways of sin. But they who know the excellency of his kingdom, are well content to forego all that suits not with it. Thus, that his kingdom of glory may come, the world must be burnt up; and, that we may particularly come to it, we must pass through death. But it is worth all.

Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.]

I will direct my prayer to thee, says David, Psalm v. 3. The word is, I will set in order, or orderly address it. Which implies not the curious contriving either of the words or method (for there may be most of that, where there is least of this right directing it to God), but the due ordering of the frame and desires of the heart. And certainly, one main point of that is taught us, as we have said, in the order of this prayer, in this particular; that it not only prefers the honor of God to all our own interest, setting the heart first upon that, but keeps it to it, causes it to dwell upon that in three several petitions, varying the expression of that one desire, as often as there be several requests following, of our own concernment; teaching us, that that doth, in its own worth, and therefore should likewise in our affection, itself alone being but one, weigh down all the different things besides that we can desire. And thus withal, it is accommodate to our dulness, for that our hearts would not readily, with one word, be either duly stirred up or stretched forth in the heavenly desire: so that, both to excite and to dilate them the more, it is thus iterated without vain tautology. This so short and complete a form, given us by so wise a master, is far from that; yea, it was particularly intended in opposition to that abuse. And not only doth the dignity of the thing itself, and our indisposedness, require this adding of one request to another concerning it, but there is in the petitions themselves, a very profitable difference, though their scope is one: they are as so many several arrows aimed at the same mark. The first, in general, wishes all manner of honor to the name of God; and because his name is especially honored in the advancement, and in the completing of his spiritual kingdom, the second is particular in that. And because until that kingdom be completed and brought all together, it lies in two several countries—there is one part of it already above, which is the appointed place for the perfection and perpetuity of this kingdom; another part here below, but tending thither; this third petition particularly concerns these of this lower region and condition, desiring this, that in obedience to their king, they may be as conformed as is possible, to those above. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

Thy will.] God is most perfectly one, and his will one; yea, his will is himself, he is purus actus; yet, in respect of its several objects or circumstances that concern them, it is diversely distinguished in the schools, sometimes needlessly, yea, erroneously, but some of the distinctions are sound and useful. But here we shall not need them much. His will is here taken, according to a very usual figure, for that which he wills; and we desire here, that we ourselves, and others, may be obedient to his will in everything, even here on earth: that he may be acknowledged and served, not only in heaven, but here likewise.

For this, no question, means not the equality of our obedience to theirs, but the quality of it; that, though it fall very far short of so perfect a pattern, yet it may bear some resemblance to it; as a scholar's writing, though it be nothing so good as his copy, yet may have so much likeness as to show he follows it. It doth no wrong, but helps a man much in anything, the more perfect example he hath before him; although he be not able to match it, yet, the looking on it, makes him do the better: though an archer shoot not so high as he aims, yet the higher he takes his aim, the higher he shoots. And, that we may not think it strange, that we have here the citizens of heaven set before us as a model for obedience, we have our heavenly Father himself propounded by our Savior in the former chapter, as our example for perfection: Be ye perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect. The obedience in heaven, is, 1. Universal, without choosing and excepting; and this is, because the will and command of God is the very reason of it. The angels are said to do his commandments, hearkening to the voice of his word; Psalm ciii. 20: they wait but for a word from him, and that is enough. And in this should we desire to be like them. Though we can not fully keep any one commandment, yet should we exclude none of them from our endeavor: yea, the rather, because we want that perfection in the degree, should we study this other, which is a kind of perfection in the design and purpose, to have respect to all the commandments, as David says: to have our eye upon them all, as the word there is, Psalm cxix. 6. So Psalm xvi. 8: I have set the Lord always before me [æqualiter posui], in an even, constant regard of his will. And the want of this discovers, that much of our obedience hath not the right stamp on it, is no way heavenly.

A man may think he approves and does the will of God in some things, where it is but by accident, because the letter of the commandment is coincident with his own will; and so, it is not the will of God, but his own, that moves him; therefore, in doing that which God commands, he does not God's will, but his own; and therefore, when they meet not, but are contrary, there it appears, for he leaves God's will then, and follows his own. A covetous father condemns the prodigality of his lavish son, and the son again cries out against the avarice of his niggardly father, and thus both seem to condemn sin; but the truth is, neither do it: it is but two extreme sins fighting together, neither of them regarding the rule that God hath set: it is but their two idols choking each other, as the heathen set their gods together by the ears. But they who therefore hate sin, because of God's countermand, and love his will for itself, their obedience is more even, and regards the whole will of God, and at all times: for there is that universality too in their obedience, conformable to that of heaven. So shall I keep thy law, says David, continually, for ever and ever. Psalm cxix. 44.

See a man's carriage when tempted or provoked to some sin. For when the occasion is out of reach, and out of sight, what wonder if there he forbears? But when it offers itself, as, by company, intemperance, or cursing or swearing by passion, it appears, if a man yield then, that sin was not out before, but only lay close and quiet within, till it was stirred, as mud in the bottom of water. Natura vexata prodit seipsam. So, a man may, for his own gain, or his own glory, do God's will. Jehu could say to Jonadab, Come and see my zeal for the Lord.

2. The obedience of heaven is cheerful. It is the very natural motion of glorified spirits, to be acted and moved by the will of God. They excel in strength, says the psalmist, in that ciii Psalm, and do his commandments: they have no other use for all their strength; that is the proper employment of it. Thus, the godly man, in so far as he is renewed (for in so far he suits with heaven), delights himself in the way of God's commandments, takes more pleasure in keeping them, than profane men do in all their pleasures of sin, by which they break them. He is never well but when he is in the way of obedience; and the ways of sin are painful and grievous to him. Then hath he most inward gladness and contentment, when he keepeth closest to his rule. And the reason why he finds the law of God thus pleasant, is, because it is not to him, as to the ungodly, one without, driving him violently, but it is within him, and therefore moves him sweetly. I delight to do thy will, O my God, Psalm xl. 8, and he adds, Thy law is within my heart, or, in the midst of my bowels. So, Psalm lxxxiv. 5: In whose heart are thy ways: not only their feet in the ways, but the ways are in their hearts.

3. They do the will of God in heaven, unanimously and harmoniously; there is neither an evil eye of envy among them, nor a lofty eye of pride, whatsoever degrees there be among them in their stations and employments. Not to be curious in that, nor to obtrude ourselves into things we have not seen, yet, we are sure, the lesser do not envy the greater, nor the greater despise the less; and the reason is, because they are all so wholly taken up and so strongly united in this joint desire of doing the will of God. Thus ought his servants here, each one in his place, and according to that which God hath dispensed to him, the greatest, humbly, and the meanest, contentedly, to mind this, and nothing but this, to do his will.

Answerably to the sense of this petition, do godly men, in prayer, [1.] Vent their regret and grief unto God, that there is so little regard and obedience to his among men, that they see the greatest part taking pleasure in unrighteousness, as the apostle speaks, 2 Thess. ii. 12. Thus David, Psalm cxix. 136: Rivers of water run down mine eyes because men keep not thy law. And as they bewail ungodliness without them, so especially, the strength of corruption within themselves: they begin there, and express their grief, in the presence of God, that they are so clogged and hampered with sin cleaving fast to them, and crossing their purposes of obedience; saying with the apostle, I find a law in my members warring against the law of my mind. Rom. vii. 23. [2.] They declare their desire of redress, both in themselves and others; that their great desire is, that more obedience were given unto God, and particularly, that they had more faculty and strength to serve him. Psalm cxix. 4, 5. [3.] They pray in this, for the effecting of this their desire, that God would incline men's hearts, and particularly their own to the obedience of his will (whatsoever vain will-worshippers say, they are indeed in that sense, θεοδόρητοι, make a deity of the will); not doubting that it is in his hand to do so, and that he hath more power of our hearts than we ourselves have. Otherwise, it were in vain to put these supplications into his hand, if he have no power to answer them, to give them the real answer of performance. Incline my heart unto thy law, &c. Turn us, O Lord, &c. [4.] They do, in this request, offer up their own hearts to God, to be fashioned and moulded to his will. And every godly man, if he had the hearts of all the men in the world in his disposal, he would dispose them the same way, lodge them with his own, and make one sacrifice of all. His own he gives wholly, resigns it up to his Lord, to be as a piece of wax, in God's hand, pliable to what form he will, to do with it what he will, to turn out and banish whatsoever displeases him, and to make it to his own mind. In a word, this is the desire of a Christian, that his own will may be annihilated, and the will of God placed in its room; that he may have no will but God's; that he may be altogether subject both to God's commanding and his working will, to do what he commands, and to be heartily content with what he does; for both these are in it.

Where he commands anything, though our own corrupt will grumble at it, and think it hard, we must tread upon it to obey his will, making that the rule of all we do. To this end, we must endeavor to be acquainted with his will, and to know what it is: otherwise we can not do it. But once knowing it, this is the end of knowing, to do; otherwise, you know, that knowledge will make us the worse for it, the more guilty.

It is a safe and comfortable thing, to walk every step by his direction. The constant regard of that, is, we see, what conforms us to heaven. It was observable how this will prevailed with Abraham: he was a loving father, it appears, and upon Sarah's private motion, while there was no more, he could not find in his heart to put Ishmael out of doors, who was but the son of the bond-woman; but upon God's command, he was ready to put Isaac to death, who was the son of the promise. And He who taught us to pray thus, gives us his own example in this: he did the will of his Father indeed, as it is done in heaven, and he came to the earth for that purpose: Then, said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O my God. And, in that great and most painful part of his work, Not my will, but thine be done. For our actions, then, let his word be our guide; and for the events of things, and all that concerns us, let his good pleasure and wise disposing be our will. Let us give up the rudder of our life into his hand, to be steered by him.

For our actions, is it not better to observe his will, than to be subject to our own corrupt wills, and to Satan's, led captive at his will? And, as it is our best, to do what pleaseth him, so, in all his dealings with us, to be pleased with what he does; not to think it were better for us to be richer or greater in the world than we are, or to murmur and struggle under affliction. There is nothing to be gained by this. Who hath resisted his will at any time? In all things he doth what he will, whether it like us or not. Our repining hinders not his working at all, but it hinders our own comfort: our wrestling and fretting doth but pain ourselves. If we be his (as we profess), then we may be assured he loves us; and if we believe that, and withal believe that he is wiser than we, then we must confess, that whatsoever he doth with us, is better than our own choosing for ourselves could be.

This is the only way of constant quietness and contentment of mind. Who is there outwardly so prosperous, but meets with many things that cross his will? Now, he who hath renounced his own will, and is fixed upon a continual complacency with the good pleasure and providence of God, to will what he wills, and nothing else; everything that befalls him, he looks upon that side of it as God's will, and so is satisfied: Doth God think this good, and shall I think it evil?

There is a difference of estates, but all coming from the same hand (which is Job's consideration), to embrace and kiss the worst that can come, is our duty. It is the Lord, said David, let him do what seems good in his eyes. 2 Sam. x. 12. Thus, Wilt thou have me poor or rich, healthful or sick, esteemed or despised? Wilt thou that I live, or that I die? I am thine, they will be done.

Give us this day our daily bread.] Man is made up of two different principles, a soul derived from heaven, and a body at first moulded out of earth; as Nazianzen expresses it, πνεύς καὶ χοῦς, the breath of God, and the dust of the earth, Ex igneo spiritu, et terrene corpore. And according to his composition, so is this prayer comprised; being made for his use, it is wisely fitted to his condition.

The greatest part of it is taken up with such desires as are spiritual, and so most suitable to his worthier part, his soul; such as do immediately concern God, and such as properly concern itself. Yet, the body is not wholly shut out: though the meaner part, yet being a part of man, and the workmanship of God, this one petition is bestowed upon its concernment.

Observe in it briefly, First, The matter or object of the request. Secondly, The qualification of it. The matter under the name of bread; not only bread for all food, as the Hebrews do, but food, so named for all other necessaries. By bread, as the chief support and staff of man's life, is meant, all needful temporal blessings, food and raiment, and health and peace, &c., a blessing on the works of our calling, and the seasons of the year, and all our lawful temporal affairs.

Though a godly man looks upon the necessities of this life as a piece of his present captivity, and is often looking beyond it to that purer life he hopes for, yet, in the meanwhile, he doth, in obedience to God, use these things, and in dependance upon God, he seeks them at God's own hand.

In the request, together with its object, as here we have it, there is, I. Piety. II. Moderation—Godliness and soberness.

I. Piety, in asking our bread of God, in asking it in the true notion, by way of gift.

Our daily bread. There is a natural cry or voice of our necessity, and that not only ungodly men, but unreasonable creatures have, the very beasts and fowls, as the cxlviii Psalm hath it (ver. 9): The ravens ask their meat from God. But this spiritual cry of prayer is the peculiar voice of God's own children. Now, to ask bread, or needful temporal things, at the hands of God, is not only no way incongruous to the piety and spiritual-mindedness of a Christian, and no wrong to the majesty of God, but, on the contrary, it were impiety in man, and an injury to God, not to do so. We have here the warrant of his own command, Pray thus. And is it not most reasonable?

1. Seeing these things are necessary for us to receive, and are in the hand of God to bestow, why ought we not to seek them there? Although, in his wisdom, he knows what we need, and is in bounty most ready to furnish us, yet, this is the homage we owe to God, to present ourselves and our necessities before him, and seek our supplies by prayer. In it, there is a clear acknowledgment of the Divine providence and goodness, and of our faith and reliance on it. And faith is not only signified in prayer, in these things, but is acted and excited, and by that means is increased and strengthened.

2. Godliness hath both kinds of promises, those of the life to come, and those of this life. 1 Tim. iv. 8. And as godliness hath a right to them both, so, it teacheth to use them both; and particularly this way, by turning the promises into prayers, as a means appointed by God, both to fit us for obtainment, and to obtain the performance of them.

3. Though a man hath his provision by him, not only of a day, but of many years, yet hath he need still daily to ask it of God; for it is still in God's hand to give it to him, or not to give, though it is in a man's own hand in present possession. [1.] It is in God's disposal to continue it to him, or suddenly to pluck it from him out of his hand, or even out of his mouth, ut bolus ereptus è faucibus. How many have been thus on a sudden turned out of great estates into extreme poverty, either by the hands of men, which are moved by God, or by some immediate accident from his own hand; and others, by little and little, their estates consuming and melting as snowballs! In the former, the judgment of God is as a lion, and in the latter, as a moth, as the prophet speaks. Hos. v. 12, 14. Again, [2.] If God do continue a man in his possessions, yet, there is further needful for his cheerful use of daily bread, that calmness and content of mind, and healthfulness of body, which are God's peculiar gifts, without which all is unsavory. Is the mind in bitterness or distemper, or the body tied to its sick-bed, this disrelishes a man's daily bread, though it be of the richest kind. [3.] Having bread, and a disposition to use it, yet, there is further an influence of blessing from God needful to make it serve its proper end; and without this, that staff of life is but as a broken staff in a man's hand, that can not support him. [4.] Besides that ordinary blessing, there is yet something further, that a godly man desires, and desires most of all, a secret character and stamp of the peculiar favor of God even upon his bread, his temporal enjoyments. And this is a proper fruit of prayer. As there is (as is already said) a peculiar voice of God's own children in this request, so, God knows it particularly, and distinguishes it from the common voice of natural men, and other creatures that call for supply; and therefore, he gives that peculiar voice of their suit, a peculiar answer: together with the daily bread which he gives to others, and a common blessing on it, they have something that is not given to others. This is that which particularly sweetens their bread, that they receive it after a special manner out of their Father's own hand, having humbly asked it by prayer as his gift.

That is the other thing observable in the word of the request, Give.

We are not by this forbidden, no, nor dispen- sated with from labor and honest industry for it, but, after all our labor, we are still to acknowledge all as a free gift; both the bread we obtain by labor, and the strength by which we labor. Just as we find it of the other bread, the bread of life. John vi. 27. Labor for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: labored for, and yet given. The fruit of our labors may be just reward from men, but it is always free from God; even these lowest benefits to the best and holiest men. I am less, says Jacob, than the least of thy mercies. Gen. xxxii. 10. We have no motive for the least mercy, but his own goodness as our Father; so that it suits with this, as with all the other requests here. Though we deserve nothing, yet He is our Father: it is proper for children to ask bread of their father, as our Savior teaches us in the next chapter; therefore he teaches us here to say, Father, give us bread.

II. The moderation of the desire appears in comparison of the number of the other petitions. All the rest are for things spiritual, and but one for temporals: those that regard the glory of God as the chief are three to one with it; and those that concern our own spiritual good, two for one. Thus for the number. And as for the order or place, which so many have taken quite contrary, it suits very well with this as the least of our requests, and so to be accounted by us. It is strange, that this right place of it should have scared men from its right meaning, and persuaded them to take it for our spiritual food, or the bread of life, because it is the first of the three. But taking it as it is, for this life's necessities, there is no need of such reasons as some give for its standing in this order, which are a little light and unsolid. But, to omit even those that are more pertinent, which justify this order, though this petition be less than the two following, it seems truly the only fit place for it, for that very reason, because it is the least. It is known to be the ordinary course of skilful orators, to place the meanest part of their speech in the middle; and in this, let the ear of any understanding mind be judge, whether it sounds not much better, that this request pass in the middle, than if the prayer should have ended with it. Whereas now, it begins spiritually, and closes so. And this petition, which is de impedimentis militiae nostrae (for the things of this life prove so too often), is cast in the middle.

Now, how few are there who follow Christ's estimate in this, who have the very strength of their desires, and most of their thoughts, on things that are spiritual, and do but in passing lend a word to the things of this life!* This proportion few will admit: it makes not for their purpose. The apostle gives this character of those who perish, that they mind earthly things. Phil. iii. 19.

But to consider the words, each word designing the matter of this request, doth clearly teach us moderation in it. Give us our daily bread. Having food and raiment, says the apostle, let us be content. 1 Tim. vi. 8. How few be there of us, if any, who want these; and yet, how few that have contentment! It is the enormity and boundlessness of our desires that causeth this. There is no necessity for curious food and raiment, but such food as nourishes, and such raiment as covers.

Our daily bread. In the original, ἐπιούσιον. Not at all to dispute the word, its genuine sense is, such as is fit for our daily sustentation; therefore rendered, daily bread. And it answers well to the word in that petition of Agur, Prov. xxx. 8, convenient (or proportionable) food, and so agrees with what we said of bread—proportionable, not to our lust, but our necessity. This was the sin of the Jews, and a most impertinent sin in the wilderness, They asked meat for their lust: (Psalm lxxviii. 18), they were not content with bread for themselves, but must have meat for their lust too, must have that fed likewise. We are not to be carvers of the proportion ourselves, but leave that to God, who knows best what is convenient for us; therefore the word is there, of my set, or ordained, portion—ordained by thee.

Our bread, [Ἡμῶν.] Not seeking any other than that which is our own by our just industry and God's free gift. What is it, but the base, immoderate desire of having, that stretches a man beyond this? When a man lays down that conclusion with himself, that he must have so much, then it follows, that any way tending to that he must use; if he can, by right, but if not, any way, rather than miss; by violence and oppression, or by deceit, through all ways, fair and foul.* When a man is once upon that journey there is no stopping, until either God recall him, or he plunge himself in the pit of destruction. They that will be rich, says the apostle, who are resolved upon that, they fall into temptation and divers snares, which drown men in destruction and perdition. 1 Timothy, vi. 9. That is the issue.

* Quamprimum à corpore ad animam redeundum.—
SENECA.

This day. It is true, that this condemns not a due providence in men for themselves and their families, in a just and moderate way. But men deceive themselves in this; few stay there, but, under that name, harbor gross avarice and earthliness. But in this word, we have the true temper of a Christian mind, that, whatsoever is his own lawful providence, and whatsoever is the success of it, what he lives and relies on, is, the providence of God, not his own: he lives upon that from one day to another, as a child in his father's house; and for provision for afterward, thinks it as good in God's hand as if it were in his own, and therefore asks not so much stock, or so much yearly rent, but bread for to-day. If he have much land or great revenues, yet, he trusts no more in that, than if he had nothing; and if he have bread for to-day, and nothing for to-morrow (as the Israelites had manna), yet he trusts no less in God than if he had thousands. He resolves thus: Whether I have much or little, I am at God's providing, and live upon that from day to day. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.

Εὐσέβεια ἀντάφεια, 1 Tim. vi. 6—these two together, as we have observed them here together, godliness and moderation: godliness in this particular, of casting over our care of temporal things on God by prayer. So Phil. iv. 5—Let your moderation be known. But how shall we have it? Make your requests known unto God, and that in all things. That will ease you, and not trouble him. But when we lodge such desires as are not fit indeed to be imparted to him, this is our shame, and proves our vexation. It is a wonder what men mean, but it is a folly so rooted in men's hearts, that no discourse will pluck it up; they imagine that there is happiness in having much, and will neither believe religion, nor reason, nor experience, though all teach the contrary. They can not be persuaded to make this the rule of their desires—daily bread, and, for to-day; but are still projecting for a long time to come, though they are not sure of a day. Men are still beginning to live, even when their years tell them they should be thinking how to die; are upon new contrivances for the world, when they must shortly leave it. And this is one point of this our decease, that it grows still and is strongest in old age, when there is least reason for it. Quo minus via restat, eo plus viatici comparare.

* Si possis, rectè, si non, quocunque modo, REM.—HORACE.

What is this that riches can do? Our Savior tells us, if we will believe him, that Man's life doth not consist in the abundance of the things he possesseth. Luke xii. 15. There is something necessary, we see, and truly that is not much; and what more than serves, many times proves but mere incumbrance. One staff will help a man in his way, but a bundle of staves would burden and weary him. Would men but stop a little and ask themselves, What is this I do? What do I aim at in all my turmoil? it might possibly recall them. Would they but hear Solomon's question, Eccl. v. 11, and tell him, what good the rich have of possessing more than they use, but only the beholding of them with their eyes. If there be anything more, it is more care and trouble, et curæ circum laqueata tecta volantes. He that hath a hundred rooms, hath but one body; he can lodge but in one at once. He that might have sea and land ransacked for delicates of his table, hath himself but one appetite to serve with them all.

Then, consider, that beyond the bounds of this petition, if a man once pass, there be no bounds after; he knows not where to stay. Depinge ubi sistam. One thousand would have something more, to save it unspent; and when that grows a little, it is best even to make another thousand, and save that too, and fall a scraping for more.

And if this is always a phrensy, most of all in these times. Behold, says God to Baruch, I will break down that which I have built, and that which I have planted will I pluck up, even this whole land, and seekest thou great things for thyself? Jer. xlv. 4, 5.

But is it not wisdom to be provident, and to see far before a man? And to look no farther but to the present, is it not the character of a fool? True, it is indeed; and therefore, the truly wise man despises this providence for a base, uncertain life, and is content if alive but from one day to another. But there is a higher design in his head, a providence of a farther reach, that sees afar off, indeed, to make himself an estate for eternity. That takes up his thoughts and pains: the other is the grossest short-sightedness, to look no farther than a moment; it is indeed, μυωραλέων, as St. Peter speaks. But that life the Christian's eye is upon, is of another nature, where none of these poor things shall have place, no marrying nor giving in marriage, as our Savior says; so, no eating or drinking, no need of bread, nor of this prayer for it; but we shall be as the angels of God.

And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.] Thy loving kindness, says David, is better than life: therefore, this request rises above the former. In it, we sought bread for the present life ; in this we entreat his favor : not corn, nor wine, nor oil, but that which glads the heart more than them all, the light of his countenance ; that the thick cloud of our sins be dispelled by a free pardon, as he promises, Isa. xlv. 2.

In this petition we have, 1. The request. 2. The clause added.

Forgive us our debts. That which is here called debts, St. Luke hath sins ; and here, in the observation our Savior adds, they are called, παραπτώματα, offences. Now sin, as it is called a debt, is taken for the guiltiness of sin, which is no other than pœnas debere, to owe the suffering of punishment, or an obligation to the curse which the Law hath pronounced against sin ; and because this results so immediately from sin, therefore, sin is often put for the engagement to punishment ; so the apostle's phrase, 1 Cor. xv. ult., may be taken. So then, the debt of sin being the tie to punishment which follows upon it, the forgiving of sin can be no other than the acquitting of a man from that curse, setting him free from his debt, his engagement to suffer ; and therefore, to imagine a forgiveness of sin with retaining of the punishment, is direct nonsense, and a contradiction.

To pass the words of this request through our mouths, as the rest, is an easy and common thing, but altogether fruitless ; but to offer it as a spiritual supplication of the heart unto God, is a thing done but by a few ; and to as many as do offer it so, it never returns in vain, but is certainly granted. Now, to offer it so, as a lively spiritual suit unto God, there are necessarily supposed in the soul that presents it, these things :—

1. A clear conviction and deep sense of the guiltiness of sin. Both in general, what this guiltiness is, what is that debt which sin engages us in, that misery to which it binds us over ; as, first, the deprivation of happiness, the loss of God and his favor for ever ; and secondly, the endless endurance of his wrath and hottest indignation, and all the anguish which that is able to fill the soul with to all eternity. Unsufferable, inconceivable torment, described to us by such things as we can understand, but going infinitely beyond them, a gnawing worm that dies not, and a fire that can not be quenched. This is the portion of the sinner from God, and the heritage appointed to him by God, as Zophar speaks, Job xx. 29. Then, in particular, there must be a seeing of our own guiltiness. A man must know himself to be nothing else than a mass of sin, and so, fuel for that fire ; must see himself a transgressor of the whole law of God, and therefore abundantly liable to that sentence of death.

2. Upon this apprehension will follow a very earnest desire to be free, and such a word as that, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me! And seeing no way either to satisfy or escape, without a free pardon, the soul then looks upon that as its only happiness, with David : Blessed is the man—O the blessedness of that man!—whose iniquity is forgiven, and whose sin is covered. Psalm xxxii. 1.

3. In this request, there is a taking of it as a thing attainable ; for it is implied that there is no impossibility in it. And this arises from the promises of God, and the tenor of the covenant of grace, and the Mediator of that covenant revealed in the word, apprehended only in their general tenor.

4. It imports an humble confession of guiltiness before the Lord ; as it follows there, Ps. xxxii. 5 : I acknowledged my sin, and mine iniquity have I not hid. The way to find God hiding and covering it, he perceived, was for himself not to hide it. The way to be acquitted at God's hand, is for the soul with humility and grief to accuse itself before him.

5. Where there is this sensible knowledge and humble acknowledgment of sin and misery, and earnest desire of pardon, then doth a man truly offer this suit unto God with strong affection, Lord, this is my request, that my sin may be forgiven ; and prays it in faith, which is a more particular laying hold on the promises, believing that he will forgive, and therefore waits for an answer, to hear that voice of joy and gladness, as David speaks, Psalm li. 8, to hear the word of his pardon from God, spoken into his soul. And for this cause (beside the need of daily pardon for daily sins), the most godly men have need to renew this suit, that, together with pardon, they may obtain the comfortable persuasion and assurance of it. And though they have some assurance, yet, there be further degrees of it possible, and desirable, clearer evidences of reconciliation and acceptance with God. Forgiveness itself is, indeed, the main, and is often granted where the other, the assurance of it, is withheld for a time : but there is no question that we may, yea, that we ought to desire it, and seek after it. He is blessed who is pardoned, though as yet he know it not ; yet, doubtless, it abates much of his happiness for the time that he does not know it. Non est beatus, esse qui se non putet.

The philosopher says, The poor man thinks him happy who is rich, and the sick man, him who is in health : their own wants make them think so. Now, this forgiveness of sin is happiness indeed ; yet a man must first feel the want of it, before he judge so. But here is the difference : when he hath obtained it, he shall think so still : whereas the other, being tried, are found to fall short, and do not make any man happy.

Seeing this is a request of so great moment, may we not wonder at ourselves, that we are so cold and indifferent in it? But the true reason of this is, because so few are truly sensible of this heavy debt, of the weight of sin unpardoned. A man who feels it not, prays thus, not much troubling his thoughts whether it be granted or no ; but he who is indeed pressed with the burden of sin, cries in earnest, Lord, forgive. David knew what he said, when he called him blessed whose sin is forgiven; the word is, who is unloaded of his sin. He was a king, and a great captain, but he says not, "He is a blessed man who wears a crown, or who is successful in war," but, "Blessed is he whose sin is taken off his shoulders; whatsoever he is otherwise, he is a happy man." It is in vain to offer a conscience groaning under sin, anything else, until it be eased of that. If you should see a man lying grovelling under some weight that is ready to press him to death, and should bring sweet music to him, and cover a table with delicacies before him, but let him lie still under his burden, could he, think you, take any pleasure in those things? Were it not rather to mock him, to use him so?

And though we feel it not as troubled consciences do, yet, we are truly miserable in all enjoyments, until this forgiveness be obtained. To what purpose daily bread, yea, what is the greatest abundance of all outward things, but a glittering misery, if this be wanting? But he who is once forgiven, and received into favor with God, what can befall him amiss? Though he hath no more of the world than daily bread, and of the coarsest sort, he hath a continual feast within: as he that said, "Brown bread and the gospel, is good fare." Now, the gospel is the doctrine of this forgiveness of sin, and is therefore so sweet to an humbled sinner. Yea, though a man have not only a small portion of earthly comforts, but be under divers afflictions and chastisements, yet, this makes him cheerful in all: as Luther said, Feri, Domine, &c. Use me as thou wilt, seeing thou hast forgiven my sin, all is well.

Lastly, as there must be earnest desire in the request, so, withal, firm belief. Ask in faith. If once thou art become an humble suiter for mercy, and that is the great desire of thy heart, that God would take away thy sin, and be reconciled to thee; then know, that he will not cast back thy petition in displeasure. Now, he is gracious, and whatsoever thou hast been, consider what he is. Doth he receive any for anything in themselves? What is the cause he pardons any? Is it not for his own name's sake? Isa. xliii. 25. And will not that reason serve for thee, as much as for others? Will it not avail for many sins, as well as for few? Hast thou multiplied sin often, abused his mercy, but now mournest before him for it? Then he will multiply pardon. Isa. lv. 7; Jer. iii. 1. Thou hast rebelled much, but he is thy Father, and hath the bowels of a father to a repenting child. And this style we give him in this prayer, as fitly urging all our suits, Father, forgive us our sins: therefore forgive, because thou art our Father. And then consider, that he who puts this petition, among the rest, in our mouths, hath satisfied for believers, paid all their scores, and answered justice to the full, and in him we are forgiven: it is a free forgiveness to us, though he hath paid for it; and he himself was freely given to us, to undertake and satisfy for us. Yet, let not any thus embolden themselves to sin; this were the grossest impudence, to come to crave pardon of sin while we delight in it, and to desire it to be forgiven, while we have no mind to part with it and forsake it. For this privilege belongs only to repenting and returning sinners.

[As we forgive our debtors.] This is added both as a fit motive for us to use with God, and as a suitable duty that he requires of us. The former we may perceive in the manner that St. Luke hath it: For we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. Thou, Lord, requirest of us to forgive others, and thou workest it in some of us to do so: how much more then may we hope, thou wilt forgive us? If there be any such goodness in us, it is from thee, and therefore is infinitely more in thyself, as the ocean of goodness.

Again, this is likewise a very profitable argument to move us to this duty; as we see clearly by our Savior's returning to speak of it after the prayer: it is not only bound upon us by this precept, but by our prayer.

This (as), just as before in the third petition, means not equality in the degree, but conformity in the thing.

Now, the request running thus, they who do not forgive their brethren, turn it into a most heavy curse to themselves, and, in effect, pray daily, Lord, never forgive me my sin. And whether they say this or no, he will do thus, if we be such fools as not to accept of such an agreement. He hath infinite debt upon our heads, that we shall never be able to pay: now, though there is no proportion, yet he is graciously pleased, without further reckoning, to forgive us all, and discharge us fully, if we accept (as it were) of this his letter of exchange, and for his sake forgive our brethren the few pence that at the most they can be owing us, in lieu of the thousands of talents that he acquits to us. And by this as our certain evidence, we may be assured of our pardon, and rejoice in it, as our Savior after clearly affirms; and therefore, on the contrary (which he likewise tells us), may well take our debates, and hatreds, and desires of revenge, as a countersign, testifying to us that we are not forgiven at God's hand.

And think not to satisfy him with superficial forgivenesses and reconcilements. Would we be content with such pardon from God, to have only a present forbearance of revenge, or that he should not quarrel with us, but no further friendship with him; that he should either use strangeness with us, and not speak to us, or only for fashion's sake? And yet, such are many of our reconcilements with our brethren. God's way of forgiving is thorough and hearty, both to forgive and to forget (as Jer. xxxi.); and if thine be not so, thou hast no portion in his.

What a base, miserable humor is this same desire of revenge, this spirit of malice that possesses men, and they think themselves brave in it, that they forgive no injuries, can put up with no affronts, as they speak ! Solomon was of another mind, and he was a king, and a wise king, and knew well enough what honor meant : It is the glory of a man to pass by a transgression, said he, Proverbs xix. 11. And we see, inferior magistrates and officers may punish : but it is a part of the prerogative of kings to pardon : it is royal to forgive, yea, it is Divine, it is to be like a God. Matt. v. 44-48 : Be you perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect—and the perfection is, Do good to them that persecute you, &c., as HE causeth the sun to shine on the just and the unjust.

There is more true pleasure in forgiving, than ever any man found in revenge. Father Desales said, that “Whereas men think it so hard a thing to forgive a wrong, he found it so sweet, that, if the contrary were commanded him, he would have much ado to obey it.” Were the law of love written in our hearts, it would be thus with us. It would teach us effectually to forgive others, if we knew and found in our experience the boundless love of God in forgiving us.

And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.] As the doctrine of Divine mercy, mistaken and abused by carnal minds, emboldens them to sin : so, being rightly apprehended and applied, there is nothing more powerful to possess the heart with indignation against sin, and love of holiness. So that this request agree most fitly with the former : where that is presented aright, the heart will be no less sincere and earnest in this other. The guiltiness of sin, and the prevailing power of it, are the two evils which the godly feel more than all other pressures in the world. Deliverance from both, is jointly promised in the new covenant (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34), and is here jointly entreated in these two petitions. We shall explain,

I. What this temptation and evil is.

II. What is meant by not leading into it, and delivering from it.

I. Temptation] In the original, Πειρασμός, a trial ; that which gives proof of a man's strength, and of his disposition, which draws forth what is within him. And thus, in most things we meet withal in the world, there is some tempting faculty, to try us what we are, on the using of them. But especially such things as are more eminent in their nature, that have much power with us : as eminent place and public charge try both the ability and integrity of men : afflictions try the faith and stability of men's minds ; injuries try whether they are truly meek and patient or no ; they stir the water that was possibly clear at top, and so try whether it be not muddy at the bottom.

But by temptation here, are meant, occasions and provocations to sin. So, likewise, the word (evil) in the other clause, is not to be taken for afflictions and crosses, but, for the evil of sin, or for that evil one, as he is called, 1 John ii. 13 ; and that, particularly in relation to the evil of sin, wherein he hath so frequent and so great a hand.

There be outward things which are not in themselves evil, and yet prove temptations to us, because they meet with a depraved, corrupt heart in us ; as riches, and honor, and beauty, and, to intemperance, dainty meats, or the wine when it is red in the cup, as Solomon speaks ; and upon these, men sometimes turn over the blame of their disorders, but most foolishly.

Other temptations and tempters there be without us, which are themselves evil, and, by tempting, partake of our sin ; the profane example and customs of the world ; ungodly men, by their practices, and counsels, and enticements, drawing others to sin, putting others into the same mire wherein they are wallowing.

But the most effectual tempter of all, is that which the Apostle St. James gives as the chief, and without which, indeed, none other could prevail. James i. 14 : Every man is tempted of his own concupiscence. Whosoever it is that begets it, that is the womb wherein all sin is conceived, and that brings it forth, as he there adds : yea, this were able of itself to be fruitful in sin, though there were not a devil to tempt it to it, and doth no doubt often tempt us without his help.

Yet because he is so continually busied in this work, is so constant a stickler in the greatest part of sins in the world, therefore, it is not unlikely that this is particularly meant of him.

Howsoever, he is, out of doubt, the greatest of all inward tempters (and therefore it is pertinent to consider his share in them), the most skilful, the most active and diligent, and he that manages all other kind of temptations against us, both such as are without us in the world and such as are within us : he works upon our own corruption, stirring and blowing it up by his suggestions, and sometimes throwing in balls of his own infernal fire, which are grievous and abominable to the soul into which he casts them. It is his name and profession, ὁ κλέπτης, that great pirate, who robs upon all seas, who is everywhere catching the souls of men. And he is well seen in his trade, a known spirit, who manifested his skill shrewdly in his first essay against man ; that serpent's first poison killed the whole race of mankind ; and now he is perfected by long experience and practice, hath his methods, as arts after a time are drawn into method. He hath his topics, his several sorts of temptations for several tempers, and hath great insight into the subject he is to work upon, and so fits the one to the other.

The profane, who will be easily drawn to the grossest sins, he is not at the pains to find out other ways for them, but hurries them along in that highway to destruction, using his advantage either of their gross ignorance or hardness of heart. Others, who are resolved to live outwardly blameless, he endeavors to take and hold fast to himself by pride, and self-love, and malice, and covetousness, by formality in religion, unbelief; which are things, though smaller wrought than some others, yet, there are as strong, and hold men as fast to be led captive at his will.

And the godly, because they are escaped and set free from his tyranny, and he is desperate of reducing them, yet, because he can do no more, he is sure to be a perpetual vexation and trouble to them, so far as he is let loose: he is most unwearied in his assaults, gives them no respite, neither when he gains upon them, nor when he is foiled and repulsed.

II. Let us next consider what the request is,—not to be led into temptation, and, to be delivered from evil.

Lead us not.] Not that God doth solicit a man to sin, for that is most contrary to his most pure nature: as St. James tells us plainly, He is neither so tempted, nor tempts he any. But his leading into temptation is, briefly, [1.] To permit a man to be tempted. [2.] To withdraw his grace, and so deliver up a man into the hand or power of temptation. Now this is what we pray, that the Lord would be pleased either to bear off assaults from us, and suffer us not to be tempted; or, if he let temptation loose upon us, yet, to give us the better, to order it so that it overcome us not. That which is here meant, by leading or carrying us into temptation, is, the prevailing of it, or leading us into a foil, and this we pray that he would not do; that, if he do bring us into the conflict of a temptation, he would not leave us there, but bring us fair off again. And thus the whole petition runs, Lead us not, but deliver us. And in this it is implied, that he would furnish us, with his own grace, the holy habits of grace to be within us, as a constant garrison; and then, that either he countermand our enemy from assaulting, or that they be such as overmatch not the strength he hath given us, but may be below it; or, that he send us the auxiliary strength of supervenient, assisting grace to that we have, that howsoever, the forces that come against us may be turned backward, and we may have the comfort, and he the glory, of our victories.

So, then, in this we are taught, 1. To know the danger wherein we are; that we live in the midst of enemies, and such as are strong and subtle; that we have the prince of darkness plotting against us, and the treacherous corruption of our own hearts ready to keep correspondence with him, and betray us to him; that he hath gins and snares laid for us in all our ways, laqueos ubique, laqueos in cibo et potu, as Augustine speaks—snares in our solitude and in our converse, and in our eating and drinking, yea, snares in our spiritual exercise, our hearing, preaching, prayer, &c., and therefore, as he here teaches us to pray against them, we must join that, [1.] To watch against them. [2.] To be sensible of our own weakness and insufficiency, either for avoiding or overcoming these dangers. [3.] To know the all-sufficient strength of God, his sovereign power over all adverse powers, that they are all under his command, so that he can keep them off from us, or subdue them under us, as he pleaseth; and so to have our recourse to this, and rest in it. The first of these considerations, if it take with us, will stir us up to watchfulness, and the other two will persuade to prayer: and these are the two great preservatives against temptation which our Savior prescribes; Watch and pray lest you enter into temptation. Watch—How can we sleep secure, and so many enemies that sleep not? If we pray and watch not, we tempt God, and we lead ourselves into temptation. It is our duty (mock the word who will), to walk exactly or precisely ἀκριβῶς, to look to every step, to beware of the least sins. For, [1.] they by multitude make a great weight. [2.] They prove usually introductions to greater sins. Admit but some inordinate desire into your heart, that you account a small matter, and it is a hundred to one but it shall prove a little thief got in, to open the door to a number of greater: as the Rabbins speak, a less evil brings a man into the hands of a greater.*

2. Avoid, not only sins, but the incentives and occasions to sin. As St. Chrysostom observes well that exhortation of our Savior, When they shall say, here is Christ, and there is Christ, he says not, Believe them not, but go not forth to see. And Solomon's instruction for avoiding the allurements of the strange woman, says not only, Go not in, but come not near the door of her house. The way of sin is motus in proclivi, down-hill: a man can not stop where he would; and he that will be tampering with dangerous occasions, in confidence of his resolution, shall find himself often carried beyond his purpose. If you pray, then, watch too. But as that word commands our diligence, so this imports our weakness in ourselves, and our strength to be in another; that as we watch, we must pray; and without this, we shall watch in vain, and be a prey to our enemy. Truly, had we no power beyond our own, we might give over, and be hopeless of coming through to salvation, so many enemies and hazards in the way. Alas! might a Christian say, looking upon the multitude of temptations without, and of corruptions within himself, and the weakness of the grace he hath, how can this be? Shall I ever attain my journey's end? But again, when he looks upward, and lifts his eyes above his difficulties, beholds the strength of God engaged for him, directs his prayers to him for help, and is assured to find it; this upholds him, and answers all. There is a roaring lion that seeks to devour, but there is a strong rescuing lion, The lion of the tribe of Judah, who will deliver. The God of peace, says the apostle, will bruise Satan under your feet shortly. Rom. xvi. 20. He says not, we shall bruise him under our feet, but God shall do it. Yet, he says not, he shall bruise him under his own feet, but under yours: the victory shall be ours, though wrought by him. And he shall do it shortly: wait a while, and it shall be done. And the God of peace, because he is the God of peace, he shall subdue that grand disturber of your peace, and shall give you a perfect victory, and, after it, endless peace: he shall free you of his trouble and molestation. Grace is a stranger here, and therefore hardly used, and hated by many foes; but there is a promise of a new heaven and a new earth where dwells righteousness: there it shall be at home and in quiet; no spoiling nor robbery in all that holy mountain.

* Levius malum inducit in manus gravioris. DRUS

For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

This pattern, we know, is the line under which all our prayers ought to move: all our requests are to be conformed to it, and are certainly out of their way, when they decline and wander from it. And if we observe it, we may clearly perceive it is a circular line (as, indeed, the exercise of prayer is a heavenly motion, circular as that of the heavens); it begins and ends in the same point, the glory of that God to whom we pray, and who is the God that heareth prayer. In that point this prayer begins, and here ends in it: so that our requests which concern ourselves are cast in the middle, that all our desires may move within this circle:—though the things we pray for concern ourselves, yet, they are not to terminate in ourselves, but in him who is Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End of all things. We are to desire, not only the blessings of this life, but the blessedness of the life to come, more for his glory than for our own good.

This is genuine and pure love to God, in the pardon of our sins and salvation, to rejoice more in the glory of Divine mercy, than in our own personal happiness. Thus it shall be with us, when we shall be put in possession of it, and we ought to aspire to that measure of the same mind which can be attained here, while we are in the desire and hope of it.

For thine is the kingdom.] Though this clause is left out in divers translations, and wanting in some Greek copies, yet it is so agreeable to the nature of prayer, and to the perfection of this prayer, that we ought not to let it pass unconsidered.

There is in it an enforcement of our prayer; but especially, it is a return of praise. Good reason we should desire earnestly the sanctifying of thy name, and the coming of thy kingdom, and obedience to thy will, seeing these are so peculiarly due to thee, namely, kingdom, and power, and glory. And seeing thou art so great and rich a king, may we not crave with confidence at thy hands all needful good things to be bestowed on us, and that all evil may be averted from us; that we may find thee gracious to us, both in giving and forgiving; and as in forgiving us the guiltiness of sins, so, in freeing us from the power of sin, and preserving us from the power of our spiritual enemies that would draw us into sin? We are under thy royal protection, we are thy subjects, yea, thy children, thou art our king and Father: so that thy honor is engaged for our defence. Whatsoever sum our debts amount to, they are not too great for such a King to forgive; they can not rise above thy royal goodness, and whatsoever be our enemies, all their force is not above thy sceptre; though they be strong, too strong for us, yet, thou art much too strong for them, for power is thine. And this we know, that all the good thou dost us will bring back glory to thy name, and it is that we most desire, and that which is thy due; the glory is thine.

Thus we see all our grounds of argument for our requests are in God, none of them in ourselves: as we find this in the prayers of the prophets, For thine own glory, and for thine own name's sake. There is nothing in ourselves to move God by, but abundance of misery; and that moves not, but by reason of his bounty: so still, the cause of his hearing, and the argument of our entreating, are in himself alone. Were it not thus, how could we hope to prevail with him? Yea, how durst we offer to come unto him? It is well for us, there is enough in himself doth to encourage us to come, and to furnish us with motives to persuade him by, that we come not in vain. Moses had not a word to say for the people in themselves: such was their carriage, his mouth was stopped that way; yet, he doth not let go this, what wilt thou do with thy mighty name? It is true, they have trespassed, yet, if thou destroy them, thy name will suffer. Lord, consider and regard that. And we know the success of it. Thus, a Christian for himself may plead: "Lord, I am most unworthy of all those things I request of thee, but, whatsoever I am, thou art a liberal and mighty king, and it is thy glory to do good freely; therefore it is that I come unto thee: my necessities drive me to thee, and thy goodness draws me, and the poorer and wretchered, I am, the greater will be thy glory in helping me."

But it is withal, an extolling and praising of the greatness of God, and so we are to consider it.

Thine is the kingdom. Other kings and kingdoms there be, but they are as nothing, they deserve not the naming, in comparison of thine. They are but kings of little molehills, to the bounds of thy dominion. The greatest kingdoms of the world are but small parcels, of this globe of earth, and itself altogether, to the vast circumference of the heavens, is as nothing—loses all sensible greatness. This point which men are so busy dividing among them with fire and sword, what if one man had the sovereignty of it all? He and kingdom both were nothing to thine; for sea and land, earth and heaven, and all the creatures in them all, the whole, all is thine. Thou art Lord of heaven and earth, and therefore, the kingdom is thine. As all other kingdoms are less than thine, so, they hold of thine, thine is supreme; all the crowns and sceptres of the earth hang at thy footstool. All kings owe their homage to this great King, and he disposeth of their crowns absolutely and uncontrolled as he will. He enthrones and dethrones at his pleasure, throws down one and sets up another; as we have a great monarch confessing it at length upon his own experience, being brought down from his throne, on purpose to learn this lesson, and was seven years in learning it. Dan. iv. 34.

The power. The creatures have among them several degrees and several kinds of power, but none of them, nor all of them together, have all power; this is God's. He is all-powerful in himself, primitively powerful. And all the power of the creatures is derived from him: he is the fountain of power. So that, whatsoever power he hath given unto men, or any other creature, he hath not given away from himself: it is still in himself more than in them, and at his pleasure he can call it back, and withdraw the influence of it, and then they remain weak and powerless. And when he gives them power, he useth and disposeth of both them and their power as seems him good. Therefore, his style is The Lord of Hosts. He can command more armies than all the kings and princes of the earth: from the most excellent, to the meanest of the creatures, all are his trained bands; from the host of glorious spirits, to the very armies of grasshoppers and flies. And you know, that as an angel was employed against the Egyptians, so likewise these contemptible creatures were upon service there too, and being armed with commission and with power from God, did perform the service upon which they were sent so effectually, that the wisest of heathens were forced to confess, This is the finger of God.

This is the Lord to whom we address our prayers, who can not fail in anything for want of power, for He doeth what he will in heaven and in earth.

The glory. In these two consists mainly the eminency of kings, in their power and their majesty; but they exceed not the meanest of their subjects, so far as this King surpasseth the greatest of them in both; Psalm xciii. 1; Clothed with both majesty and strength. They are often resisted, and cut short of their designs for want of sufficient power, and are (the best of them) often driven to straits; sometimes men, sometimes money or munition, or some other necessary help is wanting, and so their enterprises fall behind. But this King can challenge and defy all oppositions; I work, says he, and who shall let it? Isa. xliii. 13.

And as their power, so, their majesty and glory is infinitely short of his. He is the King of glory, as the psalmist styles him, Psalm xxiv. 10, alone truly glorious, both in the excellency of his own nature and the extrinsecal glory that arises to him out of his works. Of the former, we can know but little here, for that light wherein he dwells is to us inaccessible (1 Tim. vi. 16); but this we know, that he is infinitely above all the praises even of those that do behold him. Likewise, how unspeakable is that glory which shines in his works, in the framing of the whole world, and in the upholding and ruling of it from the beginning! In which appear the two former that are here ascribed to him, His kingdom and his power; and so, this third, His glory, springs out of both. Then if we consider the glorious attendance that is continually about his throne, as the Scriptures describe it to us, it drowns all the pomp of earthly thrones and courts in their highest degree. See Rev. iv.

For ever. This kingdom, and power, and glory of God, besides their transcendent greatness, have this advantage beyond all other kingdoms, and power, and glory, that his are for ever and ever, all other are perishing, nothing but pageants and shows that appear for awhile, and pass along and vanish. It was a wise word of a king (especially at such a time), when he was riding in a stately triumph, and asked by one of his courtiers, thinking to please him, What is wanting here? he answered Continuance. Where are all the magnificent kings that have reigned in former ages? Where is their power and their pomp? Is it not past like a dream? And not only are the kings gone, but the kingdoms themselves, the greatest in the world, have fallen to nothing; they had their time of rising, and again of declining, and are buried in the dust. That golden-headed image had brittle feet, and that was the ruin and break of it all. But this kingdom of the Most High is an everlasting kingdom, and his glory and power abide for ever.

Not only things on earth decay, but the very heavens wax old as a garment, says the psalmist, but thou, O Lord, art still the same, and thy years have no end.

Refl. 1. It is a thing of very great importance, for us to have our hearts established in the belief of these things, and to be frequent in remembering and considering them: to know that the kingdom is the Lord's, that he sovereignly rules the world and all things in it, and particularly the great affairs of his church: that he is the mighty God, and therefore, that there is no power, or wisdom, or counsel of men, able to prevail against him; and that in those things wherein his glory seems to suffer for the present, it shall gain and be advanced in the close.

2. Let us always, and in all things, return this to him as his peculiar due: Thine is the glory; it belongs to thee, and to none other. Deo quæ Dei sunt: To God the things which are God's.

3. Let us think most reverently of God. Oh, that we could attain to esteeming thoughts of him, to think more of his greatness and excellency beyond all the world! It is our great folly to admire anything but God. This is because we are ignorant of him. Certainly, he knows not God, who thinks anything great beside him.

Amen.] In this word concentrate all the requests, and are put up together: so be it. And there is in it withal, as all observe, a profession of confidence that it shall be so. It is from one root with those words which signify believing and truth. The truth of God's promising, persuades belief; and it persuades to hope for a gracious answer of prayer.

And this is the excellent advantage of the prayer of faith, that it quiets and establishes the heart in God. Whatsoever be its estate and desire, when once the believer hath put his petition into God's hand, he rests content in holy security and assurance concerning the answer; refers it to the wisdom and love of God, how and when he will answer; not doubting that whatsoever it be, and whensoever, it shall both be gracious and seasonable. But the reason why so few of us find that sweetness and comfort that are in prayer, is, because the true nature and use of it is so little known.

EXPOSITION OF THE TEN COMMANDMENTS.

EXODUS xx. 1, 2.

And God spake all these words, saying, I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.

It is the character of the blessed man, and the way of blessedness, to delight in the law of God. Psalm i. 2. And because the eye is often upon that whereon the affection and delight of the heart is set, the sign of that delight in the law, is, to have the eye of the mind much upon it, to meditate on it day and night. And that we may know this is not, as the study of many things are, empty speculation and fruitless, barren delight, we are further taught that the soul that is fixed in this delight and meditation, is a tree well planted, and answerably fruitful. The mind that is set upon this law, is fitly set for bearing fruit. Planted by the rivers of waters; and is really fruitful, Bringing forth its fruit in its season.

If this holds true of the law in the largest sense, taken for the whole will of God revealed in his word, it is, no doubt, particularly verified in that which more particularly bears the name of the law; this same summary of the rule of man's life delivered by the Lord himself, after so singular a manner both by word and writ.

So, then, the explication of it being needful for the ignorant, it will be likewise profitably delightful for those who be most knowing and best acquainted with it. It is a rich mine, that we can never dig to the bottom of. He is called the blessed man, who is still digging and seeking further into the riches of it, meditating on it day and night; his work going forward in the night, when others cease from working.

We have in the creed, the object of faith; in the law, the sacrifice and trial of love: for Love is the fulfilling of the law; and, If ye love me, keep my commandments, saith our Savior. And prayer is the breathing of hope, or, as they call it, Interpretatio spei. Thus, in these three summaries, are the matter of these three prime theological virtues, faith, hope, and charity.

The law rightly understood, addresses us to the articles of our faith: for seeing the disproportion of our best obedience to the exactness of the law, this drives us to seek salvation in the gospel by believing; and our natural inability to believe, drives us to prayer, that we may obtain faith, and perseverance in it, at his hands who is both the first Author and the Finisher of our faith.

The preparation enjoined upon the people, teacheth the holiness of the law. The fire, and thunder, and lightning, and, upon these, the fear of the people, testify the greatness and majesty of the Lawgiver, and withal, his power to punish the transgressors of it, and his justice that will punish; that as he showed his presence by fire seen in delivering this law, so he is (as the apostle teacheth us, alluding to this) a consuming fire to them who neglect and disobey it. The limits set about the mount, that they might not approach it, even after all their endeavor of sanctifying and preparing, read [1] humility to us, teaching us our great distance from the holiness of our God, even when we are most holy and exact in our preparations; and [2] sobriety [σπουδὴ ἐν τῷ σωσθῆναι], not to pry into hidden things; to hear what is revealed to us and commanded us, and to exercise ourselves in that. Scrutator majestatis opprimetur à gloria.—Hidden things belong unto God, but those which are revealed to us and to our children, that we may do all the words of this law. Deut. xxix. 29.

Lastly, we are taught, that the law of itself is the ministration of death, and hath nothing but terror in it, till the Messiah, the Mediator appear, and the soul, by his perfect obedience, be accounted obedient to the law. But we must not insist on this now.

The preface is twofold. I. That of Moses. II. That of God himself.

I. God spake all these words. Ten words. Exod. xxxiv. 28; Deut. v. 22. He added no more. Hence we may learn, (1.) The perfection of this law, that no more was needful to be added. (2.) The excellency of it, being so short, and yet so perfect. For as it is the excellency of all speech, as of coin (as Plutarch hath it), to contain much in little, most value in smallest quantity; so, especially of laws, that they be brief and full.

That we may the better conceive of the perfection of this law, we must not forget those rules which divines give for the understanding of it in its due latitude. (1.) That the prohibitions of sin contain the commands of the contrary good; otherwise, the number of precepts would have been too great. And, on the contrary, (2.) Under the name of any one sin, all homogeneous sins, or sins of that kind, are forbidden. (3.) All the inducements and occasions of sin, things that come near a breach, are to be avoided: that which the rabbins call the hedge of the law, is not to be broken. They who do always all that they lawfully may, will sometimes do more. (4.) It is spiritual, hath that prerogative above all human laws, that it reaches the heart and all the motions of it, as well as words and actions. This Supreme Lawgiver alone can see the behavior of the heart, and alone is able to punish all who offend so much as in thought. It were a vain thing, for men to give laws to any, more than what they can require account of and correct, which is only the surface and outside of human actions. But he who made the heart, doth not only give his law to it, but to it principally, and examines all actions there in their source and beginning; and therefore, oftentimes, that which men applaud and reward, and do well in so doing, he justly hates and punishes.

God spake. All that was spoken by his messengers the prophets, with warrant from him, was his word; they but the trumpets which the breath of his mouth, his Spirit, made to sound as it pleased him; but this his moral law, he privileged with his own immediate delivery. Men may give some few rules for society and civil life, by the dark light that remains in natural consciences; but such a rule as may direct a man to answer his natural end, and lead him to God, must come from God himself. All the purest and wisest laws that men have compiled, can not reach that: they can go no higher in their course, than they are in their spring. That which is from the earth is earthly, saith our Savior.

He added to this speaking, the writing of them likewise, himself, in tables of stone, that they might abide, and be conveyed to after ages. At first they were written in the heart of man, by God's own hand; but, as the first tables of stone fell and were broken, so was it with man's heart: by his fall his heart was broken, and scattered among the earthly perishing things which was before whole and entire to his Maker; and so, the characters of that law written in it, were so shivered and scattered, that they could not be perfectly and distinctly read in it. Therefore it pleased God to renew that law after this manner, by a most solemn delivery with audible voice, and then by writing it on tables of stone. And this is not all, but this same law he doth write anew in the hearts of his children.

Why it pleased him to defer this solemn promulgation of the law to this time, and at this time to give it to a select people only, these are arcana imperii—state secrets, indeed, which we are not to search into, but to magnify his goodness to us, that he hath showed us the path of life, revealing to us both the precepts of the law, and the grace and promises of the gospel.

It was the All-wise God who spake all these words; therefore he knew well his own aim and purpose in them, and doth certainly attain it.

It was not, indeed, that this law might be the adequate and complete means of man's happiness, that by perfect obedience to it he might be saved; for the law is weak for this, not in itself, but through the flesh. Rom. vii. 3. It is altogether impossible for it alone to save us, because impossible for us to fulfil it. But it doth profit us much if we look aright upon it.

1. It discovers us to ourselves, and so humbles us, frees us from the pride that is so natural to us in the midst of our great poverty and wretchedness. For when we see how pure the law is, and we, compared with it, to be all filthiness and defilement, our best righteousness, as Isaiah says, as filthy rags; this causeth us to abhor ourselves. Whereas naturally, we are abused with self-love, and self-flattery arising from it. The point of the law (as they in the Acts were said to be pricked in their hearts) pricks the heart, which is swelled and puffed with pride, and makes it fall low in sense and vileness.

2. As this discovery humbles us in ourselves, so it drives us out of ourselves. This glass showing us our pollution, sends us to the fountain opened. When we perceive that, by the sentence of the law, there is nothing for us but death, this makes us hearken diligently to the news of redemption and pardon proclaimed in the gospel, and hastens us to the Mediator of the new covenant. As the spouse was then singularly rejoiced to find her Beloved, when she had been beaten and hardly used by reproaching (Cant. v. 7), so the soul is then gladdest to meet with Christ, when it is hardest buffeted with the terrors and threatenings of the law. His promise of ease and refreshment sounds sweet after the thunderings and lightnings of Mount Sinai. A man will never go to Christ, so long as he is not convinced of misery without him, of impotency in himself, and in all others to help him.

3. It restrains the wickedness even of ungodly men. The brightness of it makes them sometimes ashamed of those works of darkness which otherwise they would commit without check; and the terrors of it affright them sometimes from that which they would otherwise commit without shame.

4. But chiefly it serves for a rule and square of life to the godly; a light to their feet, as David says, and a lantern to their paths. Either they have no rule of life (which is impious and unreasonable to think), or this is it. Christ came not to dissolve it, but to accomplish and establish it; and he did carefully free it from the injurious glosses of the Pharisees, and taught the right sense and force of it. See Matt. v. He obeyed it both in doing and in suffering; both performing what it requires, and, in our stead, undergoing what it pronounces against those who perform it not. It is a promise chiefly intended for the days of the gospel, as the apostle applies it, I will write my law in their hearts. It is a weak conceit arising upon the mistake of the Scriptures, to make Christ and Moses as opposites. No, Moses was the servant in the house, and Christ, the Son; and being a faithful servant, he is not contrary to the Son, but subordinate to him. Heb. iii. 5. The very abolishment of the ceremonial law, was not as of a thing contrary, but as a thing accomplished in Christ, and so was an honorable abolishment. And the removing of the curse and rigor of the moral law from us, was without wrong to it, being satisfied in a better for us, our surety, Jesus Christ.

They are happy, who look so on the law of God, as to be made sensible of misery by it, and by that made earnest in their desires of Christ; and who judge themselves, the more evidence they have of freedom from the curse of the law, to be not the less, but so much the more obliged to obey the law; who are still making progress and going on in that way of obedience, though it be with continual halting, and often stumbling, and sometimes falling; yet they shall certainly attain their journey's end, that perfection whereof they are so desirous.

This were the way to lowliness, not to compare ourselves with others, in which too many are often partial judges, but with this holy law. We use not to try the evenness of things with our crooked stick, but by the straightest rule that we can find. Thus St. Paul: The law is spiritual, I am carnal. Rom.

vii. 14. He looks not how much he was more spiritual than other men, but how much less spiritual than the law.

[I am the LORD thy God.] That is the truest and most constant obedience, which flows jointly from reverence and love: these two are the very wheels upon which obedience moves. And these first words of the law are most fit and powerful to work these two; Jehovah—sovereign Lord, to be feared and revered—thy God; and then, Who have brought thee out, &c., who hath wrought such a deliverance for thee. Therefore, in both these respects, most worthy of the highest love.

This preface can not stand for a commandment, as some would have it; for expressly it commands nothing, though by inference it enforceth all the commandments, and is indeed so intended. Though it may be conceived to have a particular tie with the first commandment, which follows it immediately, yet certainly it is withal a most fit preface to them all, and hath a persuasive influence into them all; commanding attention and obedience, not in the low way of human rhetoric, but stylo imperatorio, in a kingly phrase, becoming the majesty of the King of kings—I am Jehovah.

Here we have three motives to obedience: 1. His universal sovereignty, Jehovah. 2. His particular relation to his own people, Thy God. 3. The late singular mercy bestowed on them, Who have brought thee out of the land of Egypt. Each of them sufficient, and therefore altogether most strongly concluding for obedience to his commandments.

1. Jehovah. Not to insist on the ample consideration of this name of God, of which divines, both Jewish and Christian, have said so much, some more cabalistically and curiously, others more soberly and solidly; this they agree in, that it is the incommunicable name of the Divine Majesty, and signifies the primitiveness of his being, and his eternity; that his being is not derived, but is in and from himself; and that all other being is from him; that he is from everlasting to everlasting in himself, without any difference of time, but, as eternity is expressed to our conceiving, He who is, and who was, and who is to come, ALPHA and OMEGA.

Now, it is most reasonable, that seeing all things, mankind, and all the creatures that serve for his good, receive their being from him, we should likewise receive laws from him.

His majesty is alone absolute and independent: all the powers of the world, the greatest princes and kings, hold their crowns of him, are his vassals, and owe obedience to his laws, as much as their meanest subjects, that I say not more, in regard to the particular obligation which their honor and eminency given them by him doth lay upon them.

Jehovah. What are the numerous styles wherein princes delight and glory so much, but a vain noise of nothing in comparison of his name, I AM? And in all their grandeur, they are low, petty majesties, when mention is made of this Jehovah, who stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth, and formed the spirit of man within him? Zech. xii. 1. What gives a man, when he gives all the obedience he can, and gives himself in obedience to God? What gives he him, but what he hath first received from him, and therefore owes it all, as soon as he begins to be?

This authority of the Lawgiver, is the very life of the law. It is that we so readily forget, and this is the cause of all disobedience, and therefore the Lord inculcates it often, Lev. xix., I am the Lord, ver. 3; and again repeated, ver. 37.

This is the apostle St. James's argument, by which he strongly proves his conclusion. That he that transgresseth in one, is guilty of all. He urges not the concatenation of virtues in themselves—though there is truth and force in that: he that hath one hath all, and so he that wants any one hath none:—but the sameness of the authority is his medium; For he who said, Thou shalt not commit adultery, said also, Thou shalt not kill. Jam. ii. The authority is the same, and equal in all. The golden thread on which these pearls are stringed, if it be broken in any one part, it scatters them all. This name of God signifying his authority, keeps the whole frame of the law together, and if that be stirred, it falls all asunder.

2. Thy God. Necessity is a strong but a hard argument, if it go alone. The sovereignty of God ties all, either to obey his law, or to undergo the punishment. But love is both strong and sweet. Where there sounds love in the command, and in the relation of the commander, there it is received and cheerfully obeyed by love. Thus then, thy God, in covenant with thee, can not but move thee.

We see, then, the gospel interwoven with the law, in thy God, often repeated, which is by the new covenant, and that by a mediator. God expects obedience from his peculiar people. It is their glory and happiness, that they are his. It adds nothing to him, but much every way to them. He is pleased to take it as glory done to him, to take him to be our God; and doth really exalt and honor those that do so, with the title and privileges of his people. If his own children break his law, he can not but take that worse.

3. Who brought thee out of the land of Egypt.] By the remembrance of their late great deliverance, he mollifies their hearts to receive the impression of this law.

Herein was the peculiar obligation of this people. But ours, typified by this, is not less, but unspeakably greater; deliverance from the cruel servitude of sin, and the prince of darkness. From these we are delivered, not to licentiousness and libertinism, but to true liberty, John viii. 36. If the Son make you free, you shall be free indeed. Luke i. 74. Delivered from the power of our enemies—To what end?—to serve him without fear, that terror which we should be subject to, if we were not delivered; and, to serve him all the days of our lives. And that all, if many hundred times longer than it is, yet were too little for him. It is not such a servitude as that of Egypt, from which we are delivered: that ended to each one with his life; but the misery from which we are redeemed, begins but in the fulness of it when life ends, and endures for ever.

The gospel sets not men free to profaneness: no, it is a doctrine of holiness, We are not called to uncleanness, but to holiness, saith the apostle. 1 Thess. iv. 7. He hath indeed taken off the hardness, the iron yoke, and now his commandments are not grievous. 1 John v. 3. His yoke is easy, and his burden light. And they who are most sensible, and have most assurance of their deliverance, are ever the most active and fruitful in obedience: they feel themselves light and nimble, having the heavy chains and fetters taken off. Psalm cxvi. 16. Lord, I am thy servant; thou hast loosened my bonds. And the comfortable persuasion of their redemption, is that oil of gladness which supple and disposes them to run the way of God's commandments.

PRECEPT I.

Thou shalt have no other Gods but ME.

THE first thing in religion is, to state the object of it right, and to acknowledge and receive it for such. This, I confess, is the intent of this first precept of the law, which is therefore the basis and foundation that bears the weight of all the rest. And therefore, as we said before, though the preface looks to them all, yet it looks first to this which is nearest it, and is knit with it, and through it to all the rest. The preface asserted God's authority as the strength of his law, and this first precept commands the acknowledgment and embracing of that his authority, and his alone, as God. And this is the spring of our obedience to all his commandments.

But before a particular explication of this, a word, first, of the division of this law; secondly, of the style of it. 1. As to its division. That they were divided, first, into two tables, and then into ten words or commandments, none can question. We have the lawgiver's own testimony clear for that. But about the particular way of dividing them into ten, and the matching of these two divisions together, there hath been, and still is, some difference. But this I will not insist on. Though Josephus, and Philo the Jew, would (to make the number equal) have five precepts in each table, yet, the matter of them is more to be regarded, and persuades the contrary; that those which concern piety, our duty to God, be in the first table, and those together in the second, which concern equity, or our duty to man. And the summary which our Savior gives of the two tables, is evidently in favor of this. And that those precepts of piety, those of the first table, are four, and they of the second, six, and so, that the first and the second, as we have them, are different, and make two, and the tenth but one, hath the voice both of antiquity and reason; as many divines on the decalogue do usually evince at large, which, therefore, were as easy as it is needless to do over again. The creed of the Romish church to the contrary, is plainly impudent presumption and partiality, choosing rather to blot out the law, than reform their manifest breach of it.

2. What I would say of the style of the commandments, is but in this one particular, briefly: We see the greatest part of them are prohibitive, or, as we usually call them, though somewhat improperly, negative. Thou shalt not, &c. This, as is observed by Calvin and others, intimates our natural bent and inclination to sin, that it suffices not to show us what ought to be done, but we are to be held and bridled by countermands from the practices of ungodliness and unrighteousness.

[Thou shalt not have, &c.] This order here—and so in the rest: I. The scope. II. The sense of the words. III. What it forbids. IV. What it commands. And these follow each upon the other; for out of the scope, the sense is best gathered, and from that, the breach, and the observation.

I. The scope. As the second commandment concerns the solemn form of Divine worship, that it be not such as we devise, but such as himself appoints; the third, the qualification or manner of it, not vainly and profanely, but with holy reverence; the fourth, the solemn time set apart for it, the sabbath; so, this first precept aims at somewhat which is previous to all these.

Many distinguish this and the second, per cultum internum et externum, by the internal and external worship; and a grave modern divine, espying some defect in that, doth it, per cultum naturalem et institutum, by natural and instituted worship. But I confess, both omit, at least they express not (it may be, they take it as implied), that which is mainly intended, the object of worship; that that Jehovah who gave and himself spake this law, be received and acknowledged for the only true God, and so, the only object of Divine worship. And this is that which he calls Cultus naturalis, natural worship, that primitive worship, the religious habitude of man to God, giving himself entire, outward and inward, to his service and obedience; for this is no other than to own him, and him only, for that Deity to whom all love, and worship, and praise, are due.

It is surely not so convenient to restrain this precept to inward worship only, for each precept binds the whole man to obedience; and therefore I would not give the first motions of concupiscence in general, for the sense of the tenth commandment, as we shall show when we come to speak of that. Certainly, even outward worship given to a false God, breaks this first commandment.

The scope, then, is briefly, that the ONLY TRUE God be alone acknowledged for what he is, and, as we are able, with all our powers and parts, inwardly and outwardly, that he be answerably adored; that we neither change him for any other, nor join any other with him, nor be neglective and slack in honoring and obeying him. So that, as we are particularly, by each several precept, instructed in, and obliged to, the particular duties of it, by this we are generally tied to give obedience to them all. It is no way inconvenient, but most fit in this general notion, that this first commandment import the observance of itself, and of all the rest.

II. The sense of the words, Non habebis, Heb. Non erunt tibi, &c.

1. Erit tibi, Deus, Thou shalt have a God. Know and believe that there is a Deity. 2. Seek to know which is the true God, that thou mayest acknowledge him. 3. Know me as I have revealed myself in my word. Know and believe that I, Jehovah, the Author and Deliverer of this law, that I am God, and there is none else. Isa. xlv. 8. 4. Offer not, therefore, either to forsake me, or to join any other with me. Alienate no part of my due from me, for my glory I will not give unto another. 5. Take me for thy God; and give service and honor, and thyself unto me.

[Before my face.] Set them not up in my sight, for I can not suffer them, nor their worshippers. If they come in my sight, they will provoke me to anger. The word here for face, sometimes signifies anger, in Scripture; and it seems to allude to God's clear manifestation of himself to his people in the delivery of the law, and further to clear the doctrine of pure and true religion shining in the law, which is, as it were, the light of the face of God. In which regard, the nations who knew him not, may be said not to have had their gods before his face; for though he saw them, they saw not him.

Again, Before my face, is as if he should say, If thine idolatry be never so secret, though it were but in heart, remember that it will be in my sight. Thou canst not steal away any of my glory to bestow anywhere else, so cunningly and secretly, but I shall espy thee. If thou canst have any other gods that I can not know of and see not, thou mayest; but if thou canst have none but I shall see them, then beware, for if I see it, I will punish it.

III. Breaches or sins against this commandment. We can not particularly name all, but some main ones.

1. That inbred enmity, that habitual rebellion which is in our natures against God; συνφύτης ἐχθρα, that connatural enemy, that takes life with us as soon as ourselves in the womb, —Τὸ σπέρμα τῆς σαρκός, the mind of the flesh.

Rom. viii. 6. And the evidence of that, is, οὐκ ὑπατάσσεται. It can not be ordered, is ever breaking rank. Some even of those who bestow mourning upon sin, yet, do not often enough consider the bitter fountain, and bewail it. The wisest way to know things, is, following them home to their causes. Thus David, Psalm li. 5. Behold I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin hath my mother conceived me.

2. Atheism. Though there is in the consciences of all men an indelible conviction of a Deity, so that there have been few of those monsters found, professed atheists; yet, there is in us all, naturally, this of atheism, that by nature we would willingly be rid of that light, and quench that sparkle if we could. And all ungodly men do live contrary to it, and fight against it.

3. The gross idolatry of the heathens; their πολιθεοῖς, making gods of beasts, almost of every thing and beasts of themselves. Nullus enim terminus in falso. The writers of the primitive church have mightily and learnedly confuted them: but we will not stir this dunghill. The Scripture calls idols so: Hillulim.

4. Witchcraft, necromancy, and magical arts, which make a god of the devil.

5. Rome's invocation of saints and angels. Though they take never so much pains to clear it, they do but wash the blot more. Thus in the same matter, Jer. ii. 22: Though thou take thee nitre and much sope, yet, thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord. All their apologies take it not away, let them refine it never so much with pamphlets and distinctions; all they attain by spinning it so fine, is but to make it a part of the mystery of iniquity.

6. Erroneous opinions concerning God, and, generally, heresies in religion.

7. Practical or interpretative atheism, or idolatry, whether of the two you will call it; for it is both in the lives of the most, and the world is full of this; being such as declares they have no God, or that this God is but some base idol in his stead. Particularly, among ourselves, [1.] Gross ignorance of God, and no endeavor to attain the knowledge of him, though in the midst of the light and means of knowing. [2.] Universal profaneness flowing from this ignorance. Hos. iv. 1, 2, 3. The hearts of men, which should be the temples of God, are full of idols. Though we hide them in the closest corners, they are before his face: he sees them, lust, and pride, and covetousness. See Ezek. viii. Consider, that which you bestow most thoughts and service on, that which you are most affectionate and earnest in, is not that your God? And is there not something beside the true God, that is thus deep in the hearts of the most of us? Take pains to make the comparison; look upon the temper of your minds. To say nothing of much more time spent upon other things than on him, how ardent you are in other affairs which you think concern you near, and how cold in serving and honoring him! But, though in particular under-gods, in what serves their honor, they differ, all men naturally agree in the great idol, self. Every man is by corrupt nature his own god. Was not this the first wickedness, which corrupted our nature, Ye shall be as gods? And it sticks to it still. Men would please themselves, and have themselves somebody, esteemed and honored; and would have all serve to this end. Is not this God's right and due they give themselves, to be the end of all their own actions, and sacrifice all to their own glory?

IV. What it commands.

Now, by these we may easily gather the the contrary, what is the obedience of this commandment.* It is so to know the true God, this Jehovah, as to be persuaded sovereignly to love, and fear, and trust in him, to serve and adore him.

He is to be feared, for he is great. Who would not fear thee, thou king of nations! Jer. x. 7. To be loved, for he is good. And because both great and good, only fit to be wholly relied on and hoped in.

But love is all; it gives up the heart, and by that all the rest to the party loved; it is no more its own. Oh, that we could love him! Did we see him we should. It is his uncreated beauty which holds glorified spirits still beholding and still delighted. But we, because we know him not, if we have any thoughts of him, how short are they! Presently down again we fall to the earth, and into the mire ere we are aware. Therefore,

Set yourselves to know, and love, and worship this God. Labor that there may be less of the world, and less of yourselves, and more of God in your hearts; more settled and fixed thoughts of him, and delight in him. Think not that this is only for the learned, or only for some retired, contemplative spirits that have nothing else to do. He is the Most High, and service and honor are due to him from all his creatures; and, from his reasonable creatures, reasonable service; and what this is, hear from the apostle, and let his exhortation, or his entreaty, persuade you to it. Rom. xii. 1: I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice (and they are not living without the soul), holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service; and your truest obedience to this commandment.

* Though the graces are duties properly belonging to the commandment, some divines think fit to expatiate into the several commonplaces of them, in explaining this commandment; yet, I think it not so fit to dwell upon each of these herein; their full handling rather belonging to that place of divinity which treats of the head of sanctification and those infused habits of which it consists.

PRECEPT II.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth! Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them. For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.

THE first commandment binds us to acknowledge and worship the true God; this, to the true worship of that God.

As God is not known but by his own teaching and revealing himself, so he can not be rightly worshipped but by his own prescription and appointment. This is the aim of this second commandment, to bind up man's hands, and his working fancy that sets his hands at work, and to teach him to depend upon Divine direction for the rule of divine worship, and to offer him nothing in his service, but what he hath received from him in command. The prohibition is general; Non facias tibi, Thou shalt not devise anything to thyself in the worship of God. And under that gross device of images, and worshipping them, expressly named, are comprehended all other inventions and will-worship.

There is in the words, I. The precept. II. The enforcement of it.

I. The precept. 1. Thou shalt not make. Thou shalt not imagine, nor invent, nor imitate the invention of others. Thou shalt not make, nor cause to make. In a word, thou shalt be no way accessory to the corrupting of Divine worship, with any resemblance (or image), or human device at all: the former is a particular word, signifying the then most usual kind of imagery; but the other of a most large and general sense, is put for all kinds of similitude and representation. So that the dispute the church of Rome drives us into for her interest, in this matter, about εἰδωλον and εἰκων, is not only a mere logomachy, a debate about words, but altogether impertinent and extravagant, having no ground at all in the words of the commandment; the former whereof is more particular than either of these two, and the latter more general and comprehensive than either they or any one word we have to render it by.

Of the things which are in heaven, &c.] Because the vain mind of man had wandered up and down the world, and gone through all these places to find objects of idolatry; in heaven, the sun, and moon, and stars; on the earth, not only men, but beasts and creeping things, and fishes in the water, and made images of them to worship; the Lord is therefore particular in his countermand.

2. The second part of the precept is concerning their worship: Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor serve them.

The former word is more particular, specifying one usual sign or worship, the inclining, or bowing, of the body. The other, general:

Thou shalt not serve them: i. e., Give them no kind nor part of religious worship at all, on whatsoever pretence.

Here again the popish writers make a noise with that distinction under which they think to shift the censure of idolatry. Call it what they will, λατρεῖν or δουλεῖν, surely, it comes under the word in the original, which signifies religious service or worship. Neither can they ever find in all the Scriptures, that anything of that kind should be bestowed lower than upon the majesty of God himself.

This is then the tenor of the commandment. [1.] That no image or representation of God be made at all: as is expressed in many other scriptures, as giving the sense of this precept. [2.] Nor that any resemblance of any creature be made for a religious use. [3.] That neither to any creature, nor to any resemblance or image, be given any part of Divine worship, although it were with a pretence, yea, and intention of worshipping the true God in and by them: which, if it were a sufficient excuse, as the church of Rome dreams it is, certainly, the Israelites' golden calf, and many other the grossest idols that have been in the world, might come and find room to shelter under it.

II. For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God.] This follows the other part, as the binding on, or enforcing of the precept by threatening and promise annexed. Particularly, there be these five things by which God describes himself here, to persuade obedience to this command: 1. His relation to his people—Thy God. 2. His power both to punish and reward—[El.] The strong God. 3. The exact regard he hath to his own glory and zeal, or jealousy for it—A jealous God. 4. The certainty and severity of his justice, punishing the transgressors of this his law on themselves and their posterity—Visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children. 5. The plenty and riches of his goodness to the obedient—Showing mercy to thousands of them that love me.

This commandment, and the fourth are longer than the rest, and more backed with argument, because the light of nature discerns less in these than in the rest; viz., the outward manner of the worship of God, and God's exactness in that, to be served not as we will, but as he himself sees fit, and concerning the time of it.

Of the first argument, from God's relation to his people, we heard before in the preface. Here it is repeated because it suits with the word that follows, Jealous. 1. Thy God—thy husband by particular covenant, and therefore jealous of thy love and fidelity to Me and my worship. 2. El—able to right Myself upon the mightiest and proudest offender. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? says the apostle. Are we stronger than he? 1 Cor. x. 22; there joining these two together, as here they are, his strength and his jealousy. 3. Jealous—he is the Lord and husband of his people, and idolatry is therefore spiritual adultery; as they are often reproached with it under that name, by the prophets, Jer. iii. 1, &c. So that by that sin particularly, his anger is stirred up against them. The very contract of this marriage with his people we have, Exod. xix. 5.

Visiting.—As judges and magistrates use to visit those places that are under their jurisdiction, to make inquiry after abuses committed in time of their absence, and to punish them. 1 Sam. vii. 16. Thus, he who is always everywhere alike present, yet, because he doth not speedily punish every sin at the first, therefore when he doth execute judgment in his appointed time, then is he said to visit, and search, and find out that iniquity which, in his time of forbearance, he seemed to the ungodly, either not to see, or not to regard.

The iniquities of the fathers upon the children.] It is true, the prophet, correcting the perverse speech of the people of his time, affirms (Ezek. xviii. 20), that the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, &c., to wit, he repenting and returning, and being no way culpable of the like iniquity, which the people then falsely presumed of themselves. But neither is it here said, that the godly children shall suffer for the sin of their ungodly parents or ancestors; but, because the sin of idolatry, or false worship in any kind, doth as commonly and readily descend to posterity as any other, and there is scarcely any plea for false religion that takes more than, It was the religion of our forefathers, this kind of threatening may possibly for that cause be here particularly suitable.

But surely that is not all that is here intended, that if the children do continue in the sin of the parents, they shall be punished; but, that for so high a transgression as this, he may justly, and often doth in judgment, give the children over to the sins of their parents. His grace being free, and so, not being bound to his creature to furnish grace but where he will, they go on in the sin of their fathers, and bring upon themselves further punishment, not only temporal, but spiritual and eternal. It is not necessary for its verifying, that it be always so; for God, we know, hath converted many children of ungodly, yea, particularly, of idolatrous parents, and showed them mercy; but in that he justly may do thus, it is a just threatening, and that he often doth thus, it is a true threatening, although in mercy he deal otherwise where it pleaseth him.

That hate me.] What! this is so harsh a word, that nobody will own it: not the most dissolute and wicked, not the grossest idolaters. Yet, generally, the love of sin witnesses against men possessed with it, that they are Θεοστυγεις, haters of God. And particularly the love of idols and false worship, alienates the soul from God, and turns it to enmity against him. Men seem, possibly, to themselves, in false worship, humble and devout (Col. ii. 18); but it is to hate and dishonor the Divine majesty, to bring to him and force upon him, as it were in his own presence, in his immediate service, that which is most hateful to him.

Showing mercy to thousands.] Blessing them and their posterity, being their God, and the God of their seed. Of them that love me and keep my commandments. Who therefore obey me, because they love me, and testify they love me, by obeying me. This is a general truth, in regard of all the commandments, though more particularly to be applied to this to which it is annexed. This commandment forbids, 1. The making of any image or resemblance of God at all. Deut. iv. 15. Ye saw no manner of similitude, says Moses, on the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. So, Isa. xl. 25. To whom will ye liken Me?

2. The giving of any kind of religious honor or worship to any creature or created resemblance. Job xxxi. 27. Psalm cxv. The reason why men are so prone to both these, is, because they are so much addicted to sense, and their minds are so blinded, that they can not conceive of the spiritual nature of God. Therefore, being driven by conscience to some kind of worship and religion, they incline to have some visible object of it: the soul having lost its sight, leans upon the body, would make it up, and supply it by the eye of sense.

3. All superstition and will-worship, all self-pleasing ceremonies and inventions in the service of God. How pompous, and plausible, and devout soever they seem to be, instead of decorating, they do indeed deface the native beauty of Divine worship; and, as popish pictures on glass windows, they may seem rich and gay, but they darken the house; they keep out the light of saving truth, and obscure the spiritual part of the service of God.

4. All gross, material conceits, and apprehensions of God. Other particulars of prohibition may be reduced to this command; for this and the rest name but the main offences and duties.

Then it commands,

1. To learn, and carefully, and punctually to observe the prescription of God in every part of his own worship, and diligently to be exercised in it, as in hearing, prayer, sacrament, &c.

2. In worshipping him to have the purest spiritual notion of his majesty that we are able to attain to.

God deals by representing both his justice and his mercy to persuade his people to obedience: to drive them by fear of the one, and draw them by the sweetness of the other. Thus, pastors are to set both before their people. But as he delights most in the pressing of his mercy, and persuading by that, so, certainly, it is that which prevails most with his own children, and doth most kindly melt, and mould their hearts to his obedience.

Showing mercy to thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments.] Although it be not perfect, yet, it is such a keeping of his commandments as flows from love, and therefore love makes up what is wanting in it; and that is not perfect, neither, in us here, and therefore, mercy makes up what is wanting in both. It is not such love and obedience as can plead for reward upon merit, but such as stands in need of mercy; and it is free grace and mercy that rewards it.

Love me and keep my commandments. These two are inseparable. No keeping the commandments without love; no love without keeping them. Try, then, the one by the other—the sincerity of your obedience by examining the spring of it, whether it arises from love; and try the reality of your love, whether it be active and fruitful in obedience.

You know how studious love is to please, how observant of their will whom it affects, preferring it to their own will, and desirous to have no will but the same: it makes hard things easy, and can not endure to have anything called difficult to it. Much love to God would do this; it would turn all duty into delight. Did we once know what this were, we should say with Augustine, What needs threatening and punishment to those who love thee not? Is it not punishment enough, not to love thee? If you would have all your obedience sweet and easy to yourselves, and acceptable to God, seek, above all things, he: as inflamed with his love.

PRECEPT III.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

THE psalmist stirring up himself to the praises of God, Psalm lvii. 8, calls up his glory to it. Awake my glory. By glory, the Hebrew interpreters understand the soul; the Septuagint, and others, the tongue; so the apostle, following the Septuagint, renders it, from Psalm xv., Acts ii. 26. It suits well with both: the soul being the better part of man, far excelling the body; and among the parts of the body, the tongue having this excellency, to be the organ of speech, and so, the interpreter of the mind: and this difference from the beasts, as the soul is, may well partake of this honorable name, and be called man's glory.

But that which gives them both best title to that name, is that exercise to which he calls them, the praising and glorifying of their Lord and Maker. Then are they indeed our glory, when they are so taken up and employed; when the one conceives, and the other utters his glory.

And as it becomes them always to be one, as they have one name, the soul and the tongue to agree, so, especially, should this one name given them be answered by their harmony and agreement in his own work, for which chiefly they have that name, in giving glory to God. And it is that which this commandment requires; forbidding that which is the ignominy of man, both of his soul and of his tongue, and which degrades them, turns them out of the name of glory, to be called shame and dishonor; that is, irreverence, and the dishonoring of the glorious name of God; and therefore, on the contrary, commanding the reverent and holy use of his name and service, and that we always endeavor so to speak and think of him, and so to walk before him, as those that seek beyond all things, that his name may be glorified in us and by us. For, though false swearing and vain swearing are main breaches of this commandment (as we shall show afterward), being primarily forbidden by it, yet, it extends generally to all our speeches concerning God. Neither is it to be restrained there, and kept within that compass, as if it gave only law to the tongue; although, indeed, the tongue hath a very great share in it, both in the breaking and the keeping of it: yet, certainly the precept, in its full sense, goes deeper into the soul, and gives a rule to the speech of the mind, our thoughts concerning God; and larger, stretches itself forth to our actions and life, which hath as loud a voice, to those with whom we converse, as our tongues, and is the more considerable of the two—giving a truer character of men, what they are indeed, than their words can do.

The first commandment teaches and enjoins whom we shall worship. The second, what worship we shall give him. This third shows us with what disposition and intention, and answerably with what manner of expression, we shall worship him and use his name; that it be not vainly, and after a common, trivial manner, but in holiness and humility, and in desire of his glory.

So, then, this commandment concerns particularly that which is the great end of all the works of God, The glory of his name. He made all things for himself (Prov. xvi. 4), His works of creation for this end (Isa. xliii. 7); those of redemption, and his new creation of the elect world, all to the praise of his glory. Eph. i. 12. And for this end calls he us from darkness to light to show forth his praises or virtues. 1 Pet. ii. 9. This we are to intend with him: and this precept requires of us, that what he aimed at in all his works, the same we may intend in all ours. And this is an excellent thing, the holiest and happiest condition, to make God's purpose ours, and have the same end with him. Here it is particularly true, Summa religionis est imitari quem colis: The main of religion is, to imitate him whom we worship. Thus are we to live, and particularly, so to worship him and make mention of his name, that we be ever sensible of its worth and greatness, and so beware that we indignify it not, but always seek to advance the honor and glory of it. And that is the very scope of this commandment.

There is in it, I. The Precept itself. II. The annexed Commination.

In the Precept consider, 1. What is his Name. 2. What it is to take it. What to take it in vain.

The name.] That is, [1.] the names that are given him in scripture, Jehovah, Elohim, &c. It was a foolish and profane shift of the Jews, who thought themselves free if they abused not the name JEHOVAH; and so they became superstitious in the forbearing of that, and licentious in the abuse of the rest, and in swearing by other things in heaven and earth, &c. Which, therefore, our Savior reproves, giving the true sense of this commandment, Matt. v. 34. And this is the nature of superstition, to make frivolous, undue restraints, by way of compensation for that profane liberty and looseness in the commandments of God, which is its usual companion. [2.] All the attributes of God, by which the Holy Scriptures set him forth to us. [3.] Generally, anything whatsoever by which God is made known unto us, and distinguished from all others, and by which we make mention of him, which are the uses of a name. In a word, that of St. Paul expresseth it fully and fully, Τὸ γνωστὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ.

Thou shalt not take.] That is, thou shalt not take, or lift up, or bear. [1.] Not use it secretly by thyself, or within thyself, in thine own thoughts, without reverence; nor take it in vain. So, [2.] Not make mention of it, or express it to others, vainly; not lift up in vain. [3.] Not bear, not be called by it, or have it called upon thee; not profess it in vain.

In vain.] That is, [1.] Falsely and dissimulately. [2.] Profanely. [3.] Unprofitably, to no person. [4.] Lightly and inconsiderately, without due regard and holy fear.

II. The annexed Commination,

He will not hold him guiltless.] He will not clear him. The sovereign Judge, from whose hand no offender can escape, except he willingly set him free and absolve him. He will not absolve them who abuse his name. And it means further, he will not clear him; that is, he will certainly punish him, and do judgment on him as guilty. And this is the rather particularly here expressed, because men are subject foolishly to promise themselves impunity in this sin, thinking either that there remains no guiltiness behind it, but it passes as the words do; or, if there be any, yet, being but a matter of words, wherein the most usual and known breach of this command consists, that the guiltiness of them is so small, that any little excuse may wipe it off; that it is but inadvertence, or a bad custom, or some such thing. No, says the Lord, the Lawgiver himself, delude not yourselves; think not the honor and dishonor of my name a light matter; or, if you will, yet I will not think it so, nor shall you find it so: though you easily forgive and clear yourselves, I will not clear you, but will vindicate the glory of my name in your just punishment, which your sin of taking it in vain did abuse and dishonor, and you shall feel in that punishment that you are not guiltless, as you imagined. The name of God is great, and weighty, and honorable (as the same Hebrew word signifies both), and therefore, qui assumunt vel attollunt, as the same word here is—they who offer to lift up this weighty name lightly and regardlessly, it shall fall upon them, and they shall be crushed under the weight of it.

There are many questions relating to this commandment, handled and discussed by divines, as, of an oath, a vow, &c., which, for our purposed brevity, we will pass by; and only, according to our usual method, add some chief heads of the violation and the observance of this commandment.

It forbids, 1. All false swearing or perjury, which is to take his name after the grossest manner in vain, or in mendacium, as the word likewise signifies; to call Truth itself, the first Verity, to partake of a lie. But he is not mocked; for as the nature of an oath imports invoking him as the highest both witness and judge of truth, and punisher of falsehood, he always, in his own due time, makes it good on those who dare adventure upon that guiltiness in so high a sin.

2. Papal dispensation of oaths, which is a most heinous sin, and becomes him who is eminently called The man of sin. It is more than perjury; for it is a professed, avowed patrociny of perjury, together with an impudent conceit of a privilege and right to do so.

3. Equivocatory oaths, by which, if it were lawful, the grossest perjury might be defended; for there is nothing so false, but some mental reservation may make it true.

4. Abusing the name and the word of God to charms and spells.

5. Execration and cursing by the name of Satan, which is no other than invoking him.

6. Swearing by any creature.

7. Abusing and vilifying the glorious and holy name of God, by passionate, or by vain and common, customary swearing.

8. Swearing for ends of controversy, and in weighty matters, where an oath is lawful, yea, necessary, yet doing it without due reverence and consideration of the greatness of God and the nature of an oath.

9. The abusing of the word of God, either wresting it to defence of error, or making sport and jesting with it.

10. Scoffing and taunting at holiness and the exercises of religion.

11. Dishonoring the religion which we profess, by unworthy and unsuitable carriage of life.

12. Performing prayer, or any other religious exercise, only out of custom, without affection and delight, and holy regard of the presence and majesty of God in his worship. More might be added, which for brevity we omit.

Is it not the highest shame of Christians, to take pleasure to vilify and abuse that holy name of God, which saints and angels are blessing above, and which we hope (as we pretend) to bless with them for ever? If any dare offer to excuse it by provocation or passion, who otherwise use it not; consider, what a madness this is, because man hath injured thee, thou wilt injure God, and be avenged upon his name for it? And you who plead custom, accuse yourselves more deeply: that tells, you are guilty of long continuance in, and frequent commission of, this horrible sin. Were the fear of God in men's hearts, it would prevail both above their passion and their custom. Did they believe this, that the Lord will not clear them in his great day, it would fright them out of their custom. Were there a law made, that whosoever were heard swear, should be put to death, you would find a way to break your custom. God threatens eternal death, and you fear not, because indeed you believe not.

It commands, 1. Generally the reverend and holy use of the name of God, and, particularly in case of necessity, by advised and religious swearing by his name, and his alone, in judgment, truth, and righteousness. 2. To consider his name often, to take it into our thoughts, to meditate on his glorious attributes, and on his words and works, in both which those attributes shine forth unto us. 3. To delight to make mention of his name upon all fit occasions, and to speak to his glory. 4. To adorn our holy profession of religion with a holy life, with wise and circumspect walking, that it may not be evil spoken of by our means. 5. That our heart and affection be in the service of God which we perform; otherwise how plausible soever the appearance and outside of it is, it is nothing but guiltiness within, a taking of his name in vain, who will not hold him guiltless who does so. 6. Above all exercises, to delight in the praises of God, which is most properly the exalting and magnifying of his name, the lifting it up on high. The psalmist abounds in commending it: It is good, it is comely, it is pleasant. Oh! that we could resolve with him, Psalm xxxiv. 1, 2: I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall be in my mouth continually. My soul shall make her boast in the Lord. This is, as we can, to bear a part here with glorified spirits; and a certain pledge to us, that, after a few days, we shall be admitted into their number.

PRECEPT IV.

Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work. But the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do and work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger within thy gates: For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it.

AMONG all the visible creatures, it is man's peculiar excellency, that he is capable of considering and worshipping his Maker, and was made for that purpose; yet being composed of the dust of the earth and the breath of God, a body and a soul, the necessities of that meaner part, while we are in this life, employ as much, and take up a great part of our little time. And in this regard God hath wisely and graciously set apart a day for us, one of each seven, to be appropriate to that our highest employment, the contemplating and solemn worshipping of his Majesty. This is the scope of this precept. Consider,

I. The precept itself. II. The reason of it, and motive to its obedience. The precept itself is first briefly expressed; and then, further explained and urged.

Remember.] This word used seems, 1. To reflect upon by-past omission and forgetfulness. For, though it was instituted in paradise, and was not now a new unheard-of thing to this people, as appears by Exod. xvi. 23, yet, it is like they were much worn out of the observation and practice of it, especially during the time of their captivity in Egypt. So then, it is renewed thus: keep holy this day which you know was so long ago appointed to be so—be not now any more unmindful and regardless of it. 2. Such a way of enjoining seems more particularly needful in this than in the rest, because it is not so written in nature as the rest, but depends wholly upon particular institution, which may also be the cause why it is so large, and the form of it alone, among all the ten, both negative and positive. Thou shalt do no work, and remember to keep it holy. 3. But the main reason of this remember, is the main thing or aim in this precept, as both the badge, and the preserver and increaser of all piety and religion. And therefore is it, that it is so often pressed in the books of the law, and in the sermons of the prophets to the people of God, and so often called a sign of God's covenant with them, and their mark of distinction from all other people. Exodus xxiii. 12, and xxxi. 13, 14. Levit. xix. 30; xxv. 2, &c. Jer. xvii. Isa. lviii. 13, 14, &c.

The Sabbath day.] It is called a day of rest from the beginning and original of its institution, God's rest; and from the end of its institution, man's rest; both which follow in the words of the command: the one is the example and enforcing reason of the other.

That thou keep holy.] God sanctified it by instituting it, and man sanctifies it by observing it according to that institution.

This sanctifying is [1.] In cessation from earthly labor. [2.] In their stead, to be wholly possessed and taken up with spiritual exercise, both in private and in public. The former is necessary for the being of the latter; that cessation, for this work; and the latter is necessary for the due being of the former; we can not be vacant and entire for spiritual service, unless we cease from bodily labor; and this cessation or resting from bodily labor can not be a sanctifying of this day unto God, unless it be accompanied with spiritual exercise.

In the following words, that part only is expressed, the rest or abstinence from work; but the other is supposed as the end of this—that they shall not do their own works, that they may attend upon God's, his solemn worship. And this is implied in that word, It is the sabbath of the Lord thy God; both of his own appointing, and for this end, this work, that he may be more solemnly worshipped. And likewise, the antithesis that seems to be in that word, In six days thou shalt do all thy work, imports, that on the seventh thou shalt do God's. Not so called, that any benefit arises to him by our service; no, our goodness reaches him not at all. Psalm xvi. 2. In that way, that worship, which is far above ours, that of the angels, can add nothing to him, for he is infinite. Even this work, sabbath-work, and all our prayers and praises offered to him, and all performances of his worship, they are our works, in respect of the gain and advantage of them: it comes all back to us. But his worship is his work objectively, he is the object of it; and directively, by particular prescription from himself; and if you will add, effectively, too, never done aright but by his own grace and assistance.

[Six days shalt thou labor.] The command of due labor and diligence in our particular callings, is not of this place; it belongs properly to the eighth precept, and in some way to the seventh: here it is only mentioned premissively, and for illustration of this duty here enjoined. And further, there is under it a motive from abundant equity: seeing that God hath made the proportion thus, not pinched to us, but dealt very liberally in the time granted for our own work, what gross, not impiety only, but iniquity and ingratitude will it be, to encroach upon that small part he hath nominated and set apart for his service! This was a great aggravation of our first parents' first sin, that having the free use of all the trees in the garden beside, they would not bate that one which was forbidden them, in homage and obedience to him who had given them all the rest, and given them themselves, who a little before were nothing.

Thou shalt labor six days. Not so as in them to forget and take no notice of God, nor at all to call upon him and worship him, and think to acquit all by some kind of attendance on him on the sabbath. They who do so are most unsanctified themselves, and therefore can not sanctify the sabbath to God. Such profane persons do profane and pollute all they touch with their foul hands, for such be all profane hands lifted up to God in prayer. The life of the godly is not a visiting of God only in his house on this day, but a daily and constant walking with God in their own houses, and in all our ways, making both our houses and our hearts his houses, his temples, where he may dwell with us, and we may offer him our daily sacrifices.

Only, the peculiar of this day is, that we may not divide it between heaven and earth, but it shall be wholly for the service of God, and no work at all to have place in it that may hinder that, and suits not with the sanctifying of it: for so we are to understand the word, No manner of work.

[Neither thou nor thy servant, &c.] As each one is obliged personally, so, they who have command of others, are bound to bind them to observance of the precept, and the cattle to rest, because their labor is for man's use, and therefore his resting infers theirs; as, likewise their rest is for a passive conformity, that man may see nothing round about him but what may incite to the observance of this day; which was the reason, in solemn fasts, of the beasts' fasting likewise, for man's further humiliation. The stranger, if converted and professing their religion, the same reason for him as for all others within a man's house: and if a stranger to their religion too, yet they might, and ought, as is here commanded, oblige him to this part of outward conformity, cessation from work, which otherwise would be an offensive and scandalous sight; and withal, if they did any work for those with whom they dwelt, their share would be deeper in the sin, than of such a stranger not professing their religion.

[For in six days.] It is not pertinent here to speak of the reason of this, why God made six days' work of that which he could have done in one instant. Here, it is only urged exemplarily, as the reason why God did sanctify this day, and why we should sanctify it. His rest, you know, is not of weariness, or at all of ceasing from motion, for He faints not, neither is wearied, as he tells us by the prophet, Isa. xl. 28; yea, he moves not at all in working. Omnia movet ipse immotus: All things, himself unmoved, are moved by him. But this rest is this: that this was the day that immediately followed the perfecting of the creation; and therefore God blessed it with this privilege (that is the blessing of it), that it should be to men holy, for the contemplation of God and of his works, and for solemn worship to be performed to him.

All the other precepts of this law remaining in full force in their proper sense, it can not but be an injury done to this command, either flatly to refuse it that privilege, or, which is little better, to evaporate it into allegories. Nor was the day abolished as a typical ceremony, but that seventh only changed to a seventh still, and the very next to it; he who is Lord of the sabbath, either himself immediately, or by his authority in his apostles, appointing that day of his resurrection for our sabbath, adding to the remembrance of the first creation, the memorial of accomplishing the new creation, the work of our redemption, which appeared then manifestly to be perfected, when our Redeemer broke the chains of death, and arose from the grave; he who is the light of the new world, shining forth anew the same day that light was made in the former creation. This day was St. John, in the Spirit, taken up with those extraordinary revelations. Rev. i. 10. They were extraordinary indeed. And certainly, every Christian ought to be in the Spirit, in holy meditations and exercises on this day, more than the rest; winding up his soul, which the body poises downward, to a higher degree of heavenliness; ought to be particularly careful to bring an humble heart to speak to God in prayer, and hear him in his word, a heart breathing after him, longing to meet with himself in his ordinances. And, certainly, it is safer and sweeter to be thus affected toward the Lord's day, than to be much busied about the debate of the change.

The very life of religion doth much depend upon the solemn observation of this day. Consider, if we should intermit the keeping of it but for one year, to what a height profaneness would rise in those who fear not God, who yet are restrained, though not converted, by the preaching of the word, and their outward partaking of public worship. Yea, those who are most spiritual would find themselves losers by the intermission.

What forbidden.—1. Bodily labor on this day, where necessity unavoidable, or piety, commands not. 2. Sporting and pastime.* This is not to make it a sabbath to God, but to our lusts and to Satan; and hath a stronger antipathy with the worship of God, and that temper of mind they intend in it, than the hardest labor. 3. Resting from these, but withal resting from the proper work of this day, neglecting the worship of God in the assemblies of his people. The beasts can keep it thus, as we see in the precept. 4. Resorting to the public worship of God, but in a customary, cold way, without affection and spiritual delight in it. 5. Spending the remainder of the day incongruously, in vain visits and discourses, &c.

How observed.—1. By pious remembrance of it, and preparation, sequestering not only the body from the labor, but our souls from the cares and other vain thoughts of the world. 2. Attending upon the public worship of God willingly and heartily, as the joy and refreshment of our souls. Isa. lviii.; Psalm cxxii. 3. Spending the remainder of it in private, holily; as much as may be, in meditation of the word preached, and conference, in prayer, reading, and meditating on the great works of God, of creation, redemption, &c.

* Sabb. vituli aurei.

This is the loveliest, brightest day in all the week to a spiritual mind. These rests refresh the soul in God, that finds nothing but turmoil in the creature. Should not this day be welcome to the soul, that sets it free to mind its own business, which is on other days to attend the business of its servant, the body? And these are a certain pledge to it of that expected freedom, when it shall enter to an eternal sabbath, and rest in him for ever, who is the only rest of the soul.

PRECEPT V.

Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

THE renewed image of God in man, or the new man, is made up of holiness and righteousness. Ephes. iv. 24. These two are that of which the whole law of God is the rule: the first table, the rule of holiness or piety toward God; the second, of righteousness or equity toward men. And of the commandments which concern the latter, the first aims at the preserving of that order which God hath appointed in the several relations of superiors and inferiors; that is the scope of this fifth commandment.

Daily experience teacheth us how needful this is, that God should give a particular precept concerning this; in that we see how few there are who know aright, either how to command and bear rule as superiors, or as inferiors, to obey and be subject. And there is one evil very natural to men, which misleads them in both, pride and self-opinion, which often makes superiors affect excess in commanding, and inferiors defective in due obedience.

Observe the order: it hath the first place in the second table: 1st. As being the rule of order and society among men, which is needful for the better observing of all the rest. And, 2dly, as in all authority, there is a particular resemblance of God, therefore it is fitly placed next to those precepts that contain our duty to himself. He is pleased to use that interchange of names with superiors which testifies this resemblance; not only to take theirs to himself, to be called a father, a master, a king, &c., but to communicate his own name to them, and call them gods. And where the apostle speaks of God as the Father of Spirits, he draws a reason from that obedience we owe to the fathers of our flesh, as the subordinate causes of our being. Heb. xii. 9.

There is in the words, I. The precept. II. The promise. And it is called by the apostle, The first commandment with promise. Ephes. vi. 2. For the last clause of the second commandment, though it imply a promise, yet, as is usually observed, it is general to the keeping of all the commandments; whereas this is appropriate. But again, that is a promise of mercy in general, this of one particular blessing. Further, that it is not formally a promise, though it implies one indeed, and is intended so: but it is set down by way of description of God, from his mercy and bounty to those who keep his precepts; as the clause foregoing it expresses his justice in punishing the rebellious.

Honor.] Under this is comprehended whatsoever is due to superiors, by virtue of that their station and relation to us: inward respectful thoughts and esteem of them, and the outward expression and signifying of it by the usual signs of honor, and by obedience and gratitude, &c.

Thy father, &c.] This relation is named for all the rest, as being the first and most natural: and also as being the sweetest and most affectionate superiority, and therefore the fittest to regulate the command of superiors, and to persuade inferiors to obedience. Magistrates are fathers for men's civil good in their societies and dwelling together; ministers, fathers for their spiritual good and society as Christians.

That thy days may be long in the land.] That it is said, Which the Lord thy God shall give thee, is peculiar to that people to whom this law was first delivered; but the substance of the promise being common, extends to all together with the precept.

This blessing of length of days is particularly fit for the duty; that they who honor their parents, who are the second causes of their life, should be blessed with long life.

This, as all other promises of temporal things, is ever to be taken with that condition without which they might change their quality, and prove rather punishments; but God always bestows them on his own, and therefore ought to be understood so to promise them, in so far as they are fit for them, and may be truly good in their particular enjoyment, and as they conduce to a greater good.

It forbids—1. All disobedience in inferiors to the just commands of those whom God hath placed in authority above them; stubbornness and rebellion in children against their parents, or despising and disesteem of them for their meanness in body, or mind, or estate. The precept is not, honor thy parents for their riches, or wisdom, or comeliness; but, honor them as thy parents, and because they are so. Against this command is all other disobedience or refractoriness of those who owe obedience; wives to their husbands, servants to their masters, people to their pastors, &c.

2. Superiors break it, when they abuse their authority to serve their pride. Their screwing it too high, is very unpleasant, a particular dishonor to God, and defaces the resemblance they have of him: it spoils their harmony, as a string too high wound up; and besides that, it is very dangerous, being the ready way to break it. As in magistracy and public government, tyranny is most observable, so there is petty tyranny in masters and parents, and husbands, in extreme harshness and bitterness, μη τρυφαιετε, says the apostle, &c. Again, the precept is broken, when superiors walk unworthily, and so divest themselves of that honor which belongs to them.

It commands—First, that children give due respect and obedience to their parents; and that all who are subject to the authority of others, though they have not suitable deserving, give it to their station, in obedience to God who commands. For though they, personally considered, do not, yet certainly God deserves our obedience. And it is so much the purer to him, when, other incitements failing, yet we observe that which fades not at all.

All obedience to men is limited thus, that it be in the Lord, and with regard to his supremacy: and therefore no authority can oblige to the obedience of any command that crosses his. Authority is primitively and originally in God, and he gives not his glory to another. He gives not away any of his peculiar authority to man, but substitutes him; and our first tie is to God, as his creatures, and this is universal. The greatest kings are his vassals, and owe him homage, and no authority derived from him, can free us from that which we owe to himself. There is a straight line of subordination, and if superiors leave this, we are to adhere to it, looking directly to God, keeping our station. Some of the schoolmen think that the inferior angels therefore fell with the chief in their apostasy, because they looked so much upon him, that they considered him not in subordination to God, and so, left their station, as the apostle speaks, Jude 6.

Secondly, The duty of all superiors is, 1. To consider that their higher station is not for themselves, and for their own advantage, but for those who are in subjection to them: as the stars are set in the highest place, but are for the benefit of the inferior world, by their light and heat and influence: Let them be for lights in the firmament of heaven, to give light upon the earth. Gen. i. 15. 2. Let them always remember, to command in God and for him; to prefer his honor to their own; and seeing he gives command concerning theirs, that they make it serviceable for the advancing of his. For, to this purpose hath he given them authority, and given command that they be honored; and his promise is, to honor those that honor him, but they that despise him, shall be despised. 1 Sam. ii. 30. This many superiors have felt, because they would not believe it and take notice of it.

Would parents teach their children to know God, and honor and obey him, this were the surest and most effectual way to make them obedient children to them. If they teach them to obey God, you see, he commands them to obey their parents: and therefore, in obedience to him, they will do so.

PRECEPT VI.

Thou shalt not kill. Or, Thou shalt do no murder.

THE world was at first perfect harmony, but sin made the breach at which discord entered, enmity between God and man, and enmity between man and man. As the sin that hath poisoned man's nature makes him a rebel to God, so it makes men tigers and wolves one to another; and that same serpent that at first envenomed our nature, doth still hiss on wretched men, both to disobedience against God, and enmity and cruelty against one another. We see how soon this evil followed upon the former: the first parents disobeyed God, and the first children, the one killed the other. In opposition to this evil, God hath given this to be one of his ten precepts, Thou shalt not kill.

Having given a rule touching the particular relations of men, the following commandments of the second table concern the general duties of all men, one to another; and this sixth regardeth his being or life.

[Not kill.] This ties not up the sword of justice, which is in the magistrate's hand, from punishing offenders, even with death those that deserve it; but rather calls for the use of it, not being to be carried in vain, as the apostle says, Rom. xiii. 4: not a gilt sword only for show, but to be drawn and wielded for the execution of justice; both that in the just punishment of sin [Κόλασις], the sinner may eat of the fruit of his own ways, and so, God the Supreme Judge and Fountain of justice may be honored [Τιμωρία], and that by that example [Παραδειγμα], others may be terrified from the like offences. And thus, just killing by the sword of the magistrate is a main means of the observing of this commandment among men, Thou shalt not kill.

By the like reason is just war likewise freed from the breach of this commandment. But,

The scope of the precept being the preservation and safety of the life of man, and guarding it from violence, it is evident that all injury to our neighbor's life, our own not excluded, is forbidden; and not only the heinous fault of murder, which human laws do punish, but all the seeds and beginnings of this sin in the heart, to which principally, as the fountain of our actions, the spiritual law of God is given: as the authentic interpretation of our Savior teacheth, Matt. v., and particularly touching this commandment, verse 21, &c.

1. All fixed hatred of our brethren is forbidden, as the highest degree of heart-murder. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart. Levit. xix. 17. And, Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer. 1 John iii. 15; and he adds, Ye know that no murderer hath life eternal abiding in him. So then, he is in a woful deadly condition, in whose heart this hatred dwells. This is an infernal kind of fire, like your fires under ground, that can not be quenched. So far is it from the temper of any truly spiritual and heavenly mind, to be subject to it, that there is not anything more contrary to the Spirit of God, and the work of his grace, than the spirit of malice. And although it never break forth to revenge, yet, if the heart rejoice when evil befalls those it dislikes, although it come from another hand, God accounts it as if he who is glad at it, had inflicted it and been the worker of it. Therefore Job protests thus, that he rejoiced not at the destruction of him that hated him, nor lift up his soul when evil found him. Job. xxxi. 29.

2. Rash anger, either that which is altogether without just cause, or which upon some just cause, arises to an undue measure. And is not this the ordinary disease of the greatest part—an habitual bitterness of spirit, that is put out of its seat and troubled with every trifling cause, peevishly stirred up with the shadow and imagination of a wrong, where none is done?

3. The vent of these passions of envy and hatred, or sudden rash anger, by railing, and strife, and bitter speakings, by scoffs and taunts, by whisperings and detraction, which are the common exercise of base and unworthy spirits.

This commandment requires that, to the avoiding and forbearance of all injury to the life of our neighbor, we add a charitable disposition and desire of preserving it, and do accordingly act that charity to our utmost power, to the good and comfort of his life; using toward him meekness and patience, clemency and beneficence; doing him good, supplying his wants, as we are able. For it is cruelty to the life of our poor brethren, to be straight-handed toward them in the day of their necessity and our abundance, at least, of our comparatively better estate. 1 John iii. 17.

But we think we do much this way, when, upon right trial, we should find ourselves exceedingly defective. We look upon our few and petty acts of charity with a multiplying glass, and see one as it were ten. Who almost are there, that will draw somewhat from their excesses, to turn into this channel? that will abate a lace from their garment, or a dish from their table, to bestow upon the necessities of the poor? In a word, we ought not only to be free from hurting, but be a tree of life to our neighbor.

Let us then be convinced of our guiltiness in the breach of this precept. Men think it much if they can forgive, upon the acknowledgment and submission of those who have injured them; but they aspire not to this, cordially to forgive those who still continue to wrong and provoke them, to compassionate them, and pray for them, and repay all their evil with meekness and good-will. We consider not how sublime the rule of Christianity is, and how low our spirits are, and how far off from it. Be not overcome of evil, says the apostle, but overcome evil with good. Rom.

xii. 21. It is easy to overcome a man who resists not, but yields; to pardon injury when it ceaseth, and entreats pardon; but when it holds out, and is so stout as still to fight against that goodness and meekness which it meets withal, yet, the Christian ought to persist in these, and overcome it with good. And see our Savior's rule to them who will be his disciples, against hatred and wrath, Matt. v. 44. Labor for humble spirits. Pride is the spring of malice and desire of revenge, and of rash anger and contention. This makes men easily swell against anything that crosses them, because they have laid down this with themselves, that they deserve to be observed and respected, and not crossed at all; and when they find it otherwise, it kindles them to anger. And it is not the degree of provocation, but the different temper of men's spirits, makes them more or less subject to anger. It matters not how great the fire be, but where it falls.

Consider, 1. That these turbulent passions carry their punishment along with them: they rankle and fester the soul, and fill it full of pain and disturbance. Whereas the spirit of meekness makes the soul of a Christian like the highest region of the air, constantly calm and serene. The apostle speaking of this commandment of love, says, that the commandments of God are not grievous. 1 John v. 3. Certainly, there is such a true pleasure in meekness, forgiving of injuries, and loving our very enemies, that did men know it, they would choose it for the very delight and sweetness of it, though there were no command to enforce it.

2. Consider, particularly against rash anger, how weak and foolish a thing it is. Anger resteth in the bosom of fools, saith Solomon. Eccl. vii. 9. A fool's breast is the very natural place of anger, where it dwells. But, as he says elsewhere, A man of understanding is of an excellent spirit. Prov. xvii. 9. The word is, a cool spirit. What a senseless mistake is it for men to think it strength and greatness of spirit, to bear nothing, to be sensible of every touch, and to stand upon their punctilios! Is it not evident weakness, to be able to suffer nothing? We see the weakest persons most subject to anger—women, children, and the sick, and aged persons; old age being both a continued sickness, and a childishness, as they call it, and as the dregs of a man's life turned into vinegar: it is the weakness of all these that makes them fretful.* In a word, it is the glory of a man to pass by a transgression. Every one can be angry, and most are they who are weakest; but to be above it, and have it under command, is the advantage of those who are truly wise, and therefore, worthy or our study to attain it.

3. That which should most prevail with Christians to study love and meekness of spirit, and a propension to do good to all, is, the conformity that is in this temper to our Head and Redeemer, Jesus Christ—to partake of his dove-like Spirit. Learn of me, says he, for I am meek and lowly in heart. The fruit of the Spirit is love. Gal. v. 22. And this he hath given as the commission and badge of his disciples, that, as he loved them, so they love one another. John xiii. 35.

* Omne infirmum naturâ querulum.

PRECEPT VII.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

As the perverseness of nature hath found out crooked ways, and sinful abuses of things that we enjoy and use, the holy law of God aims at the rectifying of these abuses, and the bounding and limiting of our ways by a strait rule.

And this precept particularly debars us from all sinful uncleanness, under the name of one kind of it; that, answerably to our condition or estate of it, whatsoever it is, single or married, we ought to endeavor that cleanness and purity of soul and body, that become the temples of the Holy Ghost.

I purpose not to reckon up particularly the several sorts and degrees of sin of this kind; for chastity is a delicate, tender grace, and can scarcely endure the much naming of itself, far less of those things that are so contrary to it. Though in the law of God, given to the people of the Jews, there is express mention of the gross abominations of this kind, because practised by the Gentiles, and to be forbidden them; and though the apostle writing to the Gentiles newly converted from those abominations, of necessity mentions particulars of them; yet, further than that necessity of reproving them where they are in custom requires, he hates the very naming of them. Eph. v. 3–12. As the old Roman satirists, while they seem to reprove vice, rather teach it by their impudent descriptions of it: the new Roman casuists, some of them, are as foul that way.

It may suffice to regulate us in this, if we believe this truth, that whatsoever is in this kind, besides the lawful use of marriage, is a breach of this holy law of God, whether it be in action or in words, or so much as in thought. And if this be true—as it is, if we believe truth itself, our Savior's interpretation—that an unchaste look, or thought, makes a man guilty, then, surely, whatsoever is beyond these is more grossly sinful.

What a shameful thing it is that our holy profession of religion should be so dishonored by the abounding of uncleanness among us! In many, it breaks forth scandalously; and if there be any who live in that way of wickedness undiscovered, and walk secretly in it, yet, the pure Lord who perfectly sees and hates it, will call them to account, and judge them, according to the apostle's word, Heb. xiii. 4. Consider this likewise, any of you who have not lamented your former impure conversation, but being reformed outwardly, oy your years or condition of life, yet never have inwardly repented, and been deeply humbled for the sins of your youth. True conversion is not so light a work. David remembers his former sins, and prays earnestly that God would not remember them against him. Psalm xxv. 7. And on the contrary, you who think not on them, may justly fear that God will remember them, because you yourselves have forgot them.

They who give their tongues the liberty of scurrilous jesting and impure speeches can not but have filthy hearts: their noisome breath argues rottenness within.

Yea, they who proceed no further in uncleanness than to entertain and lodge the fancies or thoughts of it, rolling them on their beds, and delighting in them, even such are exceedingly guilty and abominable in the sight of God, who doth not only see into the heart, but most of all eyes and regards it. Keep thy heart with all diligence, says Solomon, for from thence are the issues of life. Prov. iv. 23. Certainly, they who can dispense with themselves in these inward heart-uncleanesses and find no remorse, can not think the Spirit of God dwells within them; for, if he were there, he would be showing his discontent and anger against that unholiness which is so contrary to him.

And this, they who have any truth of grace will find, that if they be not either free from the assaults, or at least, if those filthy birds, such impure thoughts, be not perfectly beaten away when they light on the soul, if they stay but any time with them, although they afterward do chase them out with indignation, yet they do leave such a stain as grieves and saddens the Holy Spirit in them, and for a time they find it not act in prayer, and in spiritual comfort, so cheerfully as before. Let no corrupt (or rotten) communication proceed out of your mouth, says the apostle, and grieve not the Holy Spirit. Eph. iv. 29. Rotten speech grieves the Holy Spirit, and so do such thoughts too, which are man's speech with himself, and therefore being most familiar and frequent with him, ought to be most regarded and watched over. There is not anything will more readily dry up the sweetness and spiritual moisture of the soul, and cause the graces in it to wither, than the impure fire of lust. Therefore, you who have any beginnings of grace, and would have it flourish, beware of this, and quench it in its first sparkles; if you do not, it may in a little time, rise above your power, and still prove very dangerous.

If you would be freed from the danger and importunity of this evil, make use of these usual and very useful rules. [1.] Be sober and temperate in diet: withdraw fuel. [2.] Be modest and circumspect in your carriage. Guard your ears and eyes, and watch over all your department. Beware of undue and dangerous familiarities with any, upon what pretence soever. [3.] Be choice in your society, for there is much in that. [4.] In general, flee all occasions and incentives to uncleanness. But truly, the solid cure must begin within; otherwise, all these outward remedies will prove but empiric medicines, as they call them.

1. First, then, lean not upon moral resolves and particular purposes against uncleanness, but seek a total, entire change of the heart, and to find the sanctifying Spirit of grace dwelling within you.

2. Labor to have the heart possessed with a deep apprehension of the holiness and purity of God, and then of his presence and eye upon all thy actions, yea, thy most secret thoughts. His eye is more piercing than that any wickedness can be hid from him, and more pure than to behold it without indignation. The darkness is as noon-day to him. I can not steal a thought out of his sight, though it be never so sudden and short. Then think, if I pretend to communion and converse with my God, he is all holiness, therefore uncleanness can never attain that to which I aspire. What communion hath light with darkness, or Christ with Belial? And shall I lose or hazard the sweetness of his presence for so base a delight? How can I offer that heart to him in prayer, which hath been wallowing in the mire of unclean practice or imagination? Resolve to drive out the assaults which you are incident to: How shall I do, or think thus? My holy God is looking on me. This was Joseph's preservation, Shall I do this evil, and sin against God?

3. Acquaint yourselves with spiritual delights, and this will make a happy diversion from those which are sensual and earthly. Somewhat a man must have to delight in. It is the philosopher's remark, that they who know not the true pleasure of the mind, turn to the base pleasures of the body.

Some moral men, seeking the higher delight of the mind, in their way have persuaded themselves to a generous disdain of their bodies. How much more powerfully may supernatural delights of the soul, righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, wean it from these gross, sensual pleasures, which the beasts have in common with us; at least from the immoderate desire and all unlawful pursuit of them! Nothing indignifies the soul more than lust. When David had sinned this way, it had so made havoc of grace within him, that he cries not only for cleansing, but for a new creation, as if all were undone; Create in me a clean heart. He found it so slavish and ignoble a sin, that he prays to be re-established by God with a free (or noble) spirit. Psalm li. 10, 12.

4. Increase in the love of Christ. For, as that grows, there is a decrease of the love of sin, yea, of the immoderate love of all inferior things; as the sun-beams eat out the fire, this Divine and heavenly love consumes the other. All our love is too scarce or poor for him, when it is collected and drawn altogether to run only toward him; and therefore there is none to spare upon the flesh and the lusts of it, nor upon any creature, but as he allows and appoints. The sense of his love takes up the whole soul, and he lodging in it, is that true agnus castus that makes it chaste—that bundle of myrrh that hath a virtue to preserve the Christian from the corruptions of lust.

That love of Jesus Christ is strong as death, kills all opposite affections; and indeed, it alone is worthy of the soul, the noble, immortal soul. Oh, how is it abased, when it is drawn down to sensuality, and so made a slave to its servant, the flesh! Major sum, et ad majora genitus, could a Roman philosopher say, quàm ut sim mancipium mei corporis: Iam greater, and born to greater things, than to be a slave to my body. How unworthy is it, that being capable of the highest good, the fruition of God, we should forget ourselves so far as to serve vile lust, and forfeit the happiness and pleasures of eternity. Far be it from us. God hath called us to holiness, and not to uncleanness, says the apostle. 1 Thess. iv. 7.

Flee all unlawful and forbidden delights. And those that are lawful, do not engage your hearts to them, love them not immoderately; and they can scarcely be loved without excess, if loved at all. Shall I say then, If you use them, yet love them not, reserve that for purer enjoyments? Says not the apostle this? 1 Cor. vii. 30. Let them that rejoice, be as if they rejoiced not; and, particularly, they that marry, as if they married not. And his reason is weighty: For the fashion of this world passeth away.

Remember to what a pure and excellent condition we are called as Christians, and with what a price we are bought to be holy; and let it be our firm purpose and study to glorify God in our souls and bodies, for they are his.

PRECEPT VIII.

Thou shalt not steal.

GOD is the God of order, and not of confusion: it is he that hath authorized and appointed peculiarity of possessions unto men, and withal, that society and commerce among them which serves for their mutual good. And property reserved makes one man, in what he possesses, useful and helpful to another. And he hath given this precept of his law, to regulate them in these things, to be the rule of that which we call contentation or justice, equity toward our neighbor, in the matter of his goods or proper possessions.

This, then, being the scope of the commandment, whatsoever breaks this hedge, is, as comprehended under the name of theft, here forbidden:—all manner of injustice and wrong done to our neighbor in his estate, whether by violence or by sleight of hand, by force or fraud, yea, if it be but so much as in affection or desire; for (as we have often said) the law is spiritual, and binds not only the hands, but the heart. So, then, not only gross robberies and thefts are here forbidden, but all oppression and extortion in superiors, all purloining and unfaithfulness in inferiors; too strict exaction in masters, and slothfulness in servants, or whatsoever else may tend to their master's damage; all bribery and receiving of gifts, to the perverting of justice; all deceit and over-reaching in commerce, or trading, or bargaining; taking advantage in buying or selling, or any contract, upon the ignorance or simplicity of those we deal withal; all desire and seeking of our neighbor's loss to our gain; all the degrees of sacrilege and simony: all idleness and neglect in men's particular callings, by which they either impoverish themselves, and are worse than infidels, not providing for their families (1 Tim. v. 8), or, if they have certain provision by their callings, in neglecting the duties of them, they wrong those from whom, or for whose sakes they are so provided, as magistrates and ministers, who have, or should have, honorable maintenance for their public service, the one in the commonwealth, the other in the church. As it is a great sin to curtail or detain what is due that way, so it is no less wickedness in them, if they be remiss and careless of those duties to which they are obliged for the public good. In a word, whosoever can digest any kind of undue gain to themselves, or do any prejudice to their neighbor in the least, are guilty. Yea, they sin against this precept, who do not with all their power further the advantage and good of their neighbor in his outward condition; who do not help and relieve those they see in want, so far as their ability reaches.

There is a kind of right that the poor have to supply; it is not merely arbitrary to you. Though they have not such a right as to take it at their own hand, or to seek it at the houses of human justice, yet, they have such a right as that your hand ought not to detain it. Withhold not good from them to whom it is due. Prov. iii. 27. Which is evidently meant (and interpreters take it so) of all kind of doing good, even that of charity and beneficence to the needy, as appears by the following clause, When it is in the power of thine hand to do it. And the Septuagint reads ἐπιποιεῖν τὸν ἐνδεῆν. It is due; they have a right to it; though not such as they can plead for before men's courts or judicatures, yet, in the court of conscience, and in the sight of God, it is duly theirs. The word is from him who is Lord of it. Esurientium panis est qui apud te mucescit, et sitientium potus qui apud te acescit. [AMBROSE.] It is the bread of the hungry that moulds by thee, and the drink of the thirsty that sours by thee. Although thou art in possession, hast superfluity by thee, what he wants is his by right; he is lord of it; for the Lord of all hath turned over his right to thy poor brother. The Lord himself needs it not; thy goodness can not reach him. He hath furnished thee with such as need it, and may be his receivers, and have warrant from him to take it up in his stead. And be sure he will acknowledge the receipt of it: thou hast his own word and writ for it, a bill of exchange under his own hand, that what you give to the poor, be put upon his accounts. He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord, and he will repay it. Prov. xix. 17. And again, In that you did it unto one of these, says our Savior, ye did it unto me. Matt. xxv. 40. It is the surest and most lasting part of a man's estate, that is put into their hand. Quas dederis solas semper habebis opes. Thine alms alone, of all thy wealth, thou shalt possess for ever. If God be solvendo, if he be a sufficient debtor, it is treasure laid up in heaven.

So then, this precept requires uprightnes and equity in all our dealings; a desire to right and advantage our brethren as ourselves, willing their gain and prosperity as our own; diligence and industry in our callings, and giving to all others their due. Though men are not obliged to a sottish simplicity; but ought to endeavor so to understand their affairs, that they may avoid circumvention by others' craft; yet a prudent simplicity is the right stamp of a Christian mind, to be single and ingenuous, and rather to suffer loss from others, than to cause them any. In a word, the apostles' rule is express and full; 1 Thess. iv. 6: That no man over-reach or defraud his brother in any matter: and he adds a very forcible reason, Because the Lord is the avenger of all such; as we have also (says he) forewarned you and testified. Men are ready to find out poor shifts to deceive themselves, when they have some way deceived their brother, and to stop the mouth of their own conscience with some quibble and some slight excuse, and force themselves at length to believe they have done no wrong. Therefore, the apostle, to fright them out of their shifts, sets before them an exacter judge, who can not be deceived nor mocked, who shall one day unveil the conscience, and blow away these vain self-excuses as smoke; and that just Lord will punish all injustice: He is the avenger of all such.

At the first view, a man would think the breach of this commandment concerns but few persons, some thieves and robbers, and some professed deceivers, or if you add some cozening tradesmen and merchants; but the truth is, there is scarcely any one of the commandments so universally and frequently broken, and whereof the breach is so little observed, and therefore, so seldom repented of by the greatest part. As the Apostle James says, He is a perfect man who offends not in his words, truly, he is a rare man who offends not, and that remarkably (if men would remark themselves), against this commandment, Thou shalt not steal.

To say nothing of the oppression and hard exactions of such as are superiors of lands, grinding the faces of the poor, and squeezing them till the blood come, and so putting in the same blood of the poor, among their estates, which many times proves a canker to all the rest; and the thievishness of servants, and of the poorer sort, making no conscience at all of whatsoever they can filch from their masters, or those that are richer than they, counting all they can snatch good booty and lawful prize: to pass by, likewise, the particular deceits which are usual in several callings, and are incorporate with them through long custom, and become a part of the mystery of those callings, and therefore, men dispense with themselves in them as the inseparable sin of their calling, and have no remorse for them: not to insist on these and such like, consider, how frequently this meum et teum, mine and thine, proves the apple of strife between the nearest friends, and divides their affections, and begets debates among them; parents and children, and brethren, &c. And certainly, there is always some unjust desire on one side in those contentions, and sometimes, on both sides. How few are there who have hearts so weaned from the world, as in all things to prefer the smallest point of equity, to the greatest temptation of gain!—who in their affairs and all that concerns them, are universally careful to deal with an even hand and even heart, and to keep close to their golden rule, drawn in nature, but almost lost and smothered in the rubbish and corruption of nature, but drawn anew by our Savior's hand, not only in his gospel, but in the hearts of his real followers. That which thou wouldst have others do to thee, do thou unto them:—who, when they have anything to transact, wherein is their brother's interest, as well as their own, do in their thoughts change places with him, set him in their own room, and themselves in his, and deal with them after that manner; who think, What should I be willing to have done to me, were I he? That same will I do to him. Were I in that poor man's condition who begs an alms, would I not rather have some relief, than a churlish, or, at least, an empty answer? Were I he who buys, should I not, and might I not justly and reasonably, will to have it so, that no more be exacted of me than the right and due price? Then, so will I use him. How few are there that walk, I say, by this rule! And yet, all that do not thus, are breakers of this commandment in the sight of God.

How few, who are inviolable observers of equity, and are truly liberal and bountiful answerably to their power!—who will sometimes on purpose bate a dish from their table, or a lace from their garment, not to make their stock greater, but to bestow on the poor: who are truly desirous of the good and prosperity of others, and further it all they can!

It is to be like God; this is the particular,

Matt. v. 45, wherein likeness to our heavenly Father is pressed. And this is meant by Homo homini Deus. Certainly, were we acquainted with it, it is more true delight to be, not only just, but liberal, than to possess much. It is not to possess, but to be possessed by it, to have heaps, and no heart nor power to use them. He who is thus, doth not only defraud others, but himself; steals from his own necessities, to sacrifice to his god, his chest or baggy. Quicquid omnibus abstulit, sibi negat. When a man hath such a sum, and though he hath use for it, dares not break it, what is it better than if it were still underground in the mine? It is no more at his service; yea, so much the worse that he is racked between plenty and want, between having and not having it.

But the covetous and the prodigal sin against this commandment: the covetous, by unjust ways of gaining, and the unjust keeping of what he hath gained, keeping it up both from others and himself; and the prodigal, by profuseness, making foolish wants to himself, which drives him upon unjust ways of supply, Turpiter amittens quod turpius reparat, as Seneca speaks. Thus, he who is prodigal, must be covetous too, and though men think not so, these two vices which seem so opposite, not only may, but do often dwell together, and covetousness is prodigality's purveyor, being fire for it to feed it; for otherwise it could not subsist, but would starve within a while. Here, then, both avarice and prodigality are condemned: only true equity, and frugal and wise liberality, are obedience to it.

The main causes of all unjust and illiberal dealing, are these two: 1. Diffidence or distrust of the Divine providence and goodness. And 2. That ἡλεονεξία, that same amor secleratus habendi, the fond desire of having much.

1. When a man doth not fully trust God with providing for him, and blessing him in just and lawful ways, but apprehends want unless he take some more liberty and elbow-room, this makes him step now and then out of the way, to catch at undue gain by fraud and overreaching, or some such way. But this is a most foolish course. This is to break loose out of God's fatherly hand, and so to forego all that we can look for from him, and to take ways of our own; to choose rather to go a shifting for ourselves in the crooked and accursed ways of unrighteousness, than to be at his providing. Labor, therefore, for a fixed belief of his wisdom, and goodness, and all-sufficiency; and then the greatest straits and wants will not drive you to any indirect ways, wherein you run from him, but will still draw you nearer to himself, and there you will stay and wait upon his hand till he supply you.

2. Desire of having much, or covetousness, whether it be to hoard up or lavish out. But this is a madness. This desire of having much, is never cured by having much: it is Βουλμία, canina fames,—an insatiable dog-hunger.

That known determination of the moralist was most true, that "To be truly rich, is not to have much, but to desire little." Labor, then, not to desire much; or rather, desire much, desire to have the Lord for your portion. Non est illud desiderium, πλεονεξία, sed πνεύμα. That desire is not a grasping at much, but at all. And if you indeed desire him, you shall have him; and if you have him, you can not but be satisfied, for he is all. To him, therefore, be all praise, honor, and glory, for ever. Amen.

PRECEPT IX.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

THE Apostle St. James, in that sharp but most true censure of the tongue, might well call it an unruly evil. There are but ten precepts or words of the law of God, and you see, two of them, so far as concerns the outward organ and vent of the sins there forbidden, are bestowed on it, tending, if not only, yet mainly, to keep it in order; one in the first table, and this other in the second; as being ready to fly out both against God and man, if not thus bridled.

The end of this commandment is, to guard the good name of men from injury, as the former doth his goods; this possession being no less, yea, much more precious than the other: and because the great robber and murderer of a good name is the mischievous, detracting tongue, acted by a malignant heart, it requires in the heart a charitable tenderness of the good name of our brethren; and that will certainly prove truth and charitable speech in the tongue.

Though divines here usually speak of lying, in the general notion and extent of it, and not amiss, being most of all exercised in the kind here mentioned; yet, there be such lies as may be more fitly reputed a breach of some other commandment. And possibly the sin of lying in general, as it is a lie, a discrepancy of the speech from the mind, and so a subverting of the Divine ordinance set in nature, making that which he hath made the interpreter of the mind, to be the disguiser of the heart, and withal disregarding God as the searcher of the heart, and sovereign witness of truth, and avenger of falsehood; I say, thus, it may possibly be more proper to refer it to another commandment, particularly to the third. But it imports not much to be very punctual in this. It is seldom or never that one commandment is broken alone. Most sins are complicate disobedience, and in some sins, the breach of many at once is very apparent. As to instance, in perjury, if it be to testify a falsehood against our brethren, both the third commandment and this ninth are violated at once; and if it be in such a thing as toucheth his life, the sixth likewise suffers with them.

This perjury, or false testimony in a public judiciary way, is, we see, by the express words and letter of the command, forbidden, as the highest and most heinous wrong of this kind. Ut testis falsi aut testimonium falsi non dices aut respondebis. But, under the name of this (as it is in the other commandments), all the other kinds and degrees of offence against our neighbor's good name are comprised.

1. All private ways of calumny and false imputation.

2. All ungrounded and false surmises or suspicions; all uncharitable construction of others' actions and carriage.

3. Strict remarking of the faults of others, without any calling so to do, or honest intention of their good; which appears, if, having observed anything that of truth is reproveable, we seek not to reclaim them by secret and friendly admonition, but passing by themselves, divulge it abroad to others. Ephes. iv.

15. We must not only speak the truth, but, in love. For this is a most foolish self-deceit, to think that, because it is not forged, but true, that thou speakest, this keeps thee free of the commandment: no, thy false intention and malice make it calumny and falsehood in thee, although, for the matter of it, what thou sayest be most true. All thou gainest by it, is, that thou dost tumble and bemoire thyself in the sin of another, and maketh it possibly more thine than it is his own who committed it; for he, it may be, hath some touch of remorse for it, whereas it is evident thou delightest in it; and though thou preface it with a whining, feigned regret and semblance of pitying him, and add withal some word of commending him in somewhat else, this is but the gilding and sugaring the pill to make men swallow it the more easily, and thy bitter malice pass unperceived. They who by their calling ought to watch over the lives of others, must do it faithfully and diligently, admonishing and rebuking privately; and where that prevails not, they may, yea, they ought to do it more publicly; but all in love, seeking nothing but the glory of God, and the salvation of souls.

4. Easy hearing and entertaining of misreports and detractions when others speak them. Exod. xxiii. 1. This is that which maintains and gives subsistence to calumny; otherwise it would starve and die of itself, if nobody took it in and gave it lodging. When malice pours it out, if our ears be shut against it, and there be no vessel to receive it, it would fall like water upon the ground, and could no more be gathered up. But there is that same busy humor that men have—it is very busy, and yet the most have of it more or less—a kind of delight, and contentment to hear evil of others, unless it be of such as they affect, to hear others slighted and disesteemed, that they readily drink in, not without some pleasure, whatsoever is spoken of this kind. The ear trieth the words, as Job says, as the mouth tasteth meats; but certainly the most ears are perverse and distempered in their taste, as some kinds of palates are; they can find sweetness in sour calumny. But, because men understand one another's diet in this, that the most are so, this is the very thing that keeps up the trade, makes backbiting and detractions abound so in the world, and verifies that known observation in the most, that "The slanderer wounds three at once"—himself, him he speaks of, and him that hears. For this third, truly it is in his option to be none of the number: if he will, he may shift his part of the blow, by not believing the slander; yea, may beat it back again with ease upon the slanderer himself by a check or frown, and add that stroke of a repulse to the wound of guiltiness he gives himself.

5. They offend, who seek in any kind, at the expense of the good name and esteem of others, to increase their own; *ex alieni nominis jactura gradum sibi faciunt ad gloriam—out of others' ruins to make up themselves; and who therefore pull down as much as they can, and are glad to have others to help them to detract from the repute of their brethren, particularly any who are in likelihood to surpass and obscure them; and for this reason incline always rather to hear and speak of the imperfections and dispraise of others, than to their advantage; and would willingly, Ottoman-like, kill the good name of their brethren, that theirs may reign alone.† This is a vile disease, and such as can not be incident to any mind that is truly virtuous and gracious. No, such need not this base, dishonest way to raise themselves, but are glad to see virtue, and whatsoever is praiseworthy, to flourish in whomsoever. These are lovers of God indeed, and of his glory, and not their own; and therefore, as all he bestows on themselves, they render back the honor of it to him, so they are glad to see many enriched with his best gifts. For seeing all good that all have, belongs to God, as the sovereign owner and dispenser, this contents and rejoices his children when they see many partake of his bounty, for the more is his glory; and as in love to their brethren, they are always willing to take notice of what is commendable in them, and to commend it, so, they do this the more willingly, because they know that all praise of goodness at last terminates and ends in God. As Solomon says of the rivers, Unto the place whence they come, thither they return.

6. They sin against this commandment, who, although they no way wrong their neighbors' good name, yet are not careful to do their utmost to right it when it suffers, to remove aspersions from them, and to clear them all that may be. For this is here required, to desire and delight in, and further the good name of others, even as our own; to look most willingly on the fairest side of their actions, and take them in the best sense, and be as inventive of favorable constructions (yet without favoring vice), as malice is witty to misinterpret to the worst; to observe the commendable virtues of our brethren, and pass by their failings; as many, like scurvy flies, skip over what is sound in men, and love to sit upon their sores.

* Sallust.

† The Rabbits frequently condemn this.—HAMMITH CABBED, &c. Qui honorat se ex ignominia socii sui, non habet partem in seculo venturo. BERES. RAB. Item, qui per contemptum aliorum laudem suam querit, miserimus est omnium hominum. Quis est honore dignus! Qui honorat alios homines.—A BOTH., c. 4.

It is lamentable to consider how much this evil of mutual detraction and supplanting the good name one of another, is rooted in man's corrupt nature, and how it spreads and grows in their conversation: as the Apostle St. Paul cites it out of the psalmist, as the description of our nature, Their throat is an open sepulchre; they have deceitful tongues, and the poison of asps is under their lips. Rom. iii. 13. Their throat an open sepulchre, full of the bones, as it were, of others' good names that they have devoured; and, among other their endowments, they are whisperers, backbiters, spiteful, Rom. i. 30. But it is strange that Christians should retain so much of these evils, who profess themselves renewed, and sanctified, and guided by the Spirit of God. Consider, in your visits and discourses, if something of this kind doth not entertain you often, and lavish away that time you might spend in mutual edification, abusing it to descant upon the actions and life of others, in such a way as neither concerns nor profits us; taking an impertinent, foolish delight in inquiring and knowing how this party lives, and the other.* This is a very common disease, as Nazianzen observes.† And thus men are most strangers at home: have not leisure to study, and know, and censure themselves, they are so busied about others. It may be there is not always a height of malice in their discourses, but yet, by much babbling to no purpose, they slide into idle detraction and censure of others, beside their intention; for, in multitude of words there wants not sin. Prov. x. 9.

And the greatest part are so accustomed to this way, that, if they be put out of it, they must sit dumb and say nothing. There is, I confess, a prudent observation of the actions of others, a reading of men, as they call it, and it may be, by a Christian, done with Christian prudence and benefit; and there may be, too, a useful way of men's imparting their observation of this kind, one to another, concerning the good and evil, the abilities more or less, that they remark in the world: but truly, it is hard to find such as can do this aright, and know they agree in their purpose with honest, harmless minds, intending evil to none, but good to themselves, and admitting of nothing but what suits with this. Among a throng of acquaintance, a man shall, it may be, find very few by whose conversation he may be really bettered, and who return him some benefit for the expense of his time in their society. Howsoever, beware of such as delight in vanity and lying and defaming of others, and withdraw yourselves from them, and set a watch before your own lips. Learn to know the fit season of silence and speech; for that is a very great point of wisdom, and will help very much to the observing of this precept, to give your tongue to be governed by wisdom and piety. Let it not be as a thorny bush, pricking and hurting those who are about you, nor altogether a barren tree, yielding nothing; but a fruitful tree, a tree of life to your neighbor, as Solomon calls the tongue of the righteous. Prov. xv. 4.

* Curiosum genus ad cognoscendam vitam alienam, desidiosum, ad corrigendam suam.—AUGUSTINE. Conf. l. 10, cap. 3.

† Οὐδὲν οὕτως ἡδὺ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ὡς τὸ λαλεῖν τὰ ἀλλότρια.—NAZIANZEN. ORAT. 1.

And let your hearts be possessed of those two excellent graces, humility and charity. Then will your tongue not be in danger of hurting your neighbor; for it is pride and self-love, makes men delight in that. Those are the idols to which men make sacrifice of the good name and reputation of others. The humble man delights in self-disesteem, and is glad to see his brethren's name flourish; it is pleasing music to him to hear the virtues of others acknowledged and commended, and a harsh discord to his lowly thoughts to hear any thing of his own. And the other, charity, thinks no evil, is so far from casting false aspersions on any, that it rather casts a veil upon true failings and blemishes: Love covers a multitude of sins. It is like God's love that begets it, which covers all the sins of his own children.

PRECEPT X.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's.

It is a known truth, that there is no sound cure of diseases without a removal of their inward cause. Therefore, this second table of the law, containing the rule of equity for the redress of unrighteousness in men's dealing one with another, doth, in this last precept of it, strike at the very root of that unrighteousness, the corrupt desires and evil concupiscence of the heart; Thou shalt not covet.

The Romish division of this into two, is so grossly absurd, and so contrary both to the voice of antiquity and reason, that it needs not stay us much to show it such. The thing forbidden is one, Thou shalt not covet; and if the several things not to be coveted, divide it, it will be five or six as well as two. Though it be Peter's pretended sword make the division, yet, certainly, it is not Paul's ὀρθοταμεῖν, not a dividing of the word aright, but a cutting it, as it were, beside the joint. The truth is, they would never have mistook so far as to have offered at this division, were they not driven upon it by an evil necessity of their own making: because they have quite cut out the second, they are forced, for making up the number, to cut this in two. This is but to save a first wrong with a second; it is vitium primæ concoctionis quod non corrigitur in secunda, as they speak: having smothered one commandment, they would have this divided, as the harlot the living child.

The subject of this commandment, that which it forbids, is not, I confess, original sin in its nature and whole latitude; nor, nor all kinds of sinful motions immediately arising from it; but such as concern human things, belonging to this second table as their rule: as is clear in all the particulars named in the commandment, and the general word which closes it, including the rest and all other things of that kind. Nor anything that is thy neighbor's. For is it needful (with others) for the distinguishing of this precept from the rest, to call this concupiscence here forbidden, only the first risings of it in the heart without consent, whereas the other commandments forbid the consent of the will. I conceive there is no danger to say, that both are forbidden, both in this and in the rest, but in this more expressly.

For what great necessity is there of such subtle distinguishing? may not this be sufficient, that what is included in the other commandments duly understood, it pleased the Divine wisdom to deliver in this last more expressly, that none might pretend ignorance; and so to provide for the more exact observance of justice and equity among men in their actions, by a particular law given to the heart, the fountain of them, regulating it in its dispositions and motions, even the very first stirrings of it, which do most discover its disposition?

And that this is no tautology, nor a superfluous labor, unsuited the exquisite brevity of this law, we shall easily confess, if we consider that natural hypocrisy and self-indulgence that is in men, which makes them still less regard the temper and actings of their hearts, than their outward carriage, notwithstanding this express commandment concerning it. How much more would they have thought their thoughts, as least such as proceed not to full consent, exempted from the law, if there had been nothing spoken of them, but they only included in the other precepts! We know how the Doctors of Rome extenuate the matter, and how favorable their opinion is in this point, notwithstanding this clear voice of the law of God condemning all concupiscence. The apostle St. Paul confesses ingenuously his own short-sightedness, though a Pharisee instructed in the law, that unless the law had said, Thou shalt not lust, he had not found it out in the other commandments, nor known the sinfulness of it. Rom. vii. 7.

This all-wise Lawgiver knew both the blindness of man's mind, and the hypocrisy and deceitfulness of his heart, and therefore, takes away all pretext, and turns him out of all excuse, giving this last commandment expressly concerning the heart, and so teaching him the exact and spiritual nature of all the rest.

This commandment pursues the iniquity of man into its beginning and source. Our Savior calls the evil heart, an evil treasure; it is an inexhaustible treasure of evil, yea, it diminisheth not at all, but increaseth rather by spending; the acting of sin confirming and augmenting the corrupt habit of it in the heart. Out of this evil treasure issue forth those pollutions that defile the whole man—evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, &c. Matthew xv. 19.

It is not proper here to speak at large of the first motions of sin in general, and of the way to distinguish (if any such can be given as certain) the injections of Satan, evil thoughts darted in by him, and such as spring immediately from that corruption which lodgeth within our own breasts; and other things that concern the subject: only, this we ought to observe as pertinent and useful, that if we did consider the purity of the law of God and the impurity of our own hearts, the continual risings of sinful concupiscences within us, that stain us and all our actions, this would lay us a great deal lower in our own opinion than usually we are. The law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin, says the apostle. Rom. vii. 14.

Men think it is well with them, and they please themselves to think so, and glory in it, that their whole life has been outwardly unblameable, and, possibly, free from the secret commission of gross sins. But would they, who are thus most spotless, look a little deeper inward upon the incessant workings of vain, sinful thoughts, which at least touch upon the affection, and stir it somewhat; and consider their hearts naturally like boiling pots, still sending up of this scum of evil concupiscence, and, as a fountain casteth forth her water, as Jeremiah speaks, this bitter poison-spring still streaming forth, and even in the best, not fully dried up:* certainly the due sight of these would abate much of those gay thoughts which any can have of themselves, and, from the best and most sensible, would draw out the apostle's word, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me? There is nothing that doth more certainly both humble and grieve the godly man, than the sense of this; and because till then, it will not cease to vex him, nothing makes him more long for the day of his full deliverance, and makes him cry, Usquequo, Domine, usquequo? O, how long, O Lord, how long?

* Tres sunt transgressiones, à quibus homo nullo die, iniquiunt Talmudici, nunquam in hac vita liberabitur: cogitationes peccati; attentio orationis (i. e. quod nunquam satis attentò per omnem attentionem orare possit); et lingua mala. [BAVA. BOSCA. f. 1342.] There are three transgressions, say the Talmudists, from which a man can no day ever in this life be free: the thoughts of sin, wanderings in prayer, and an evil tongue.

We are taught by this commandment, that great point of spiritual prudence, to observe the beginnings and conception of sin within us, and to crush it then when it is weakest, before it pass on in its usual gradation, as the Apostle St. James makes it, James i. 14, 15. If it draw us away but to hear it, it will entice us, take us with delight; and then it will, by that, work us to consent, and having so conceived, it will bring forth sin, and sin finished will bring forth death.

Again, because, as we see, the very concupiscence itself, though it proceed no further, pollutes and leaves a stain behind it; this calls for our diligence, to seek that renovation and habitual purity of heart infused from above, and the daily increase of it, being begun, that may free us more and more from that depraved concupiscence and the defilements of it. Think it not enough to cleanse the tongue and the hands, but above all, endeavor for cleanness of heart, and that will keep all the rest clean. See Jam. iv. 8. Jeremiah iv. 14.

The concupiscence particularly here forbidden, we see, is an inordinate desire, or the least beginning of such a desire, of those outward things which belong not to us, Thy neighbor's house, &c. For all breach of the other commandments of this second table, have their rise and beginning from such a desire; therefore, this is set last, as the hedge to guard all the rest from violation. For certainly, he that flees the least motion of a wrongful thought, will never proceed to any injurious word or action. So then, this commandment is broken by the least envious look upon any good of others, or the least bendings of mind after it for ourselves; and by that common mischief of self-love, as the very thing which gives life to all such undue desires; and by that common folly of discontent at our own estate, which begets a wishing for that of others; and this, though it be not joined with an express desire of their loss or hurt, yet, because it is the seed and principle of injustice, therefore it is sinful, and here forbidden.

And, on the contrary, much of the observance of this precept lies in that αὐτάρκεια, that contentedness and satisfaction of mind with our own estate, which will surely keep us free from this disordered coveting. Therefore, chiefly labor to have that wise and sweet contentation dwelling within you, and banish all contrary thoughts, by these and other such like considerations:—

1. If you do indeed believe that it is the sovereign hand of God that divides to the nations their inheritance, as Moses speaks, Deut. xxxii. 8, and so, likewise, to particular men, that he carves to every one their condition and place in the world, you can not but think he hath done it more wisely than men could do for themselves. They could never agree upon it: every man would think it best for himself to be in the best and highest condition; and that is not possible. But it is best for the making up of the universe, that there be those differences God hath made, and, from the highest to the lowest, he hath set each one in that station he thought good. There is not a common soldier in an army, but would wish to be a commander, and so, if each might have his will, all would command, and none obey. The like holds in masters and servants, and in all such other differences. So then, seeing those differences are in the world, and seeing it wholly belongs to him who rules the world to dispose of them, our part is no other than contentedly to accept of his disposal, and to serve him in the station where he hath set us.

2. If you be such as have evidence you are the children of God, then you know, he doth not only allot your condition wisely, but withal, in peculiar love and favor. He perfectly knows what outward estate is particularly fittest for you, and will conduce most to your highest good, and will not miss to give you that, and no other. And certainly it is true in matter of estate, as of our garments, not that which is largest, but that which fits us best, is best for us.

3. Consider, that no outward condition hath contentment in it of itself: this must arise from somewhat within. Men see the great attendance, and train of servants that wait upon princes and other great persons, but they see not the train of cares and perplexing thoughts that many times go along too, and are more inseparable attendants than any of the rest: they see their fine clothes and stately buildings, but they see not the secret malcontents and vexations that dwell with them, and are the very linings of the rich apparel. Light things often discontent them. Look at their very pastimes and recreations; they are sometimes as much troubled with disappointment in those, as the poor man is wearied with his labor. It was not a much greater cross that vexed Haman: all his advancement availed not without Mordecai's courtesy. A strange disease, that he felt more the pain of another man's stiff knee, than the contentment of all his honors! But whoso knew their deeper vexations, would admire them less, when crossed in their ambition or friends, or the husband and wife not finding that harmony of dispositions and affections. Few, or none, but have something that a man would willingly leave out, if he were for his wish to be in their condition. The shorter and surer way, then, to contentment, is to be contentedly what he is.

4. Consider those who are below you, and in a far meaner condition, and by that argue yourself, not only to contentment, but to thankfulness. We pervert all: when we look below us, it raises our pride; and when above us, it casts us into discontent. Might we not as well, contrariwise, draw humility out of the one, and contentment out of the other ?

5. Seek to be assured that God is yours. Then, whatsoever others possess, you will be sure not to covet it, nor envy them. Those who have most, you will pity, if they want him ; and those who have him, you will have no envy at them for sharing with you, but love them the more. For that Infinite Good is enough for all that choose him : and none do so, but those whom he hath first chosen in eternal love.

A SHORT CATECHISM.

Question. WHAT is naturally every man's chief desire ?

Answer. To be happy.

Q. Which is the way to true happiness ?

A. True religion.

Q. What is true religion ?

A. The true and lively knowledge of the Only true God, and of him whom he hath sent, Jesus Christ.

Q. Whence is this knowledge to be learned ?

A. All the works of God declare his being, and his glory ; but the clearer knowledge of himself, and his Son Jesus Christ, is to be learned from his own word, contained in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament.

Q. What do those scriptures teach us concerning God ?

A. That he is one infinite, eternal Spirit, most wise, and holy, and just and merciful, and the all-powerful Maker, and Ruler of the world.

Q. What do they further teach us concerning him ?

A. That he is Three in One, and One in Three, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

Q. What will that lively knowledge of God effectually work in us ?

A. It will cause us to believe in him, and to love him above all things, even above ourselves, to adore and worship him, to pray to him, and to praise him, and exalt him with all our might, and to yield up ourselves to the obedience of all his commandments, as having both made us, and made himself known to us for that very end.

Reharse, then, the articles of our belief.

I believe in God the Father, &c.

Reharse the Ten Commandments of the Law, which are the rules of our obedience, and so, the trial of our love.

A. God spake these words, I am the Lord thy God, &c.

Q. What is the summary our Savior hath given us of this Law ?

A. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself.

Q. What is the effectual means of obtaining increase of faith and power to obey, and generally, all graces and blessings at the hand of God ?

A. Prayer.

Reharse that most excellent and perfect prayer that our Savior hath taught us.

A. Our Father, which art in heaven, &c.

Q. In what estate was man created ?

A. After the image of God in holiness and righteousness.

Q. Did he continue in that estate ?

A. No. But by breaking the commandment which his Maker gave him, eating of the fruit of that tree which was forbidden him, he made himself and his whole posterity subject to sin and death.

Q. Hath God left man in this misery, without all means and hopes of recovery ?

A. No. For he so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

Q. What is then the great doctrine of the gospel ?

A. That same coming of the Son of God in the flesh, and giving himself to the death of the cross, to take away the sin of the world, and his rising again from the dead, and ascending into glory.

Q. What doth that gospel mainly teach and really persuade all the followers of it to do ?

A. It teacheth them to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, and righteously, and godly in this present world.

Q. How hath our Lord Jesus himself expressed the great and necessary duty of all his disciples ?

A. That they deny themselves, and take up their cross, and follow him.

Reharse then some of the chief points wherein we are to follow our Lord Jesus Christ.

A. 1. To surrender ourselves wholly to our heavenly Father, and his good pleasure in all things, even in the sharpest afflictions and sufferings : and not at all to do our own will, or design our own praise or advantage, but in all things to do his will and intend his glory.

2. To be spotless, and chaste, and holy, in our whole conversation.

Add a third.

3. To be meek and lowly, not to slander or reproach, to mock or despise any ; and if any do so to us, to bear it patiently, yea to rejoice in it.

A fourth.

4. Unfeignedly to love our Christian brethren, and to be charitably and kindly affected toward all men, even to our enemies, forgiving them, yea, praying for them, and returning them good for evil ; to comfort the afflicted, and relieve the poor, and to do good for all, as we are able.

Q. Is it necessary that all Christians live according to these rules ?

A. So absolutely necessary, that they who do not so in some good measure, whatsoever they profess, do not really believe in Jesus Christ, nor have any portion in him.

Q. What visible seals hath our Savior annexed to that gospel, to confirm our faith, and to convey the grace of it to us ?

A. The two Sacraments of the New Testament, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper.

Q. What doth Baptism signify and seal ?

A. Our washing from sin, and our new birth in Jesus Christ.

Q. What doth the Lord's Supper signify and seal ?

A. Our spiritual nourishment and growth in him, and transforming us more and more into his likeness, by commemorating his death, and feeding on his body and blood, under the figures of bread and wine.

Q. What is required to make fit and worthy communicants of the Lord's Supper ?

A. Faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and repentance toward God, and charity toward all men.

Q. What is faith in our Lord Jesus ?

A. It is the grace by which we both believe his whole doctrine, and trust in him as the Redeemer and Savior of the world, and entirely deliver up ourselves to him, to be taught and saved and ruled by him, as our Prophet, Priest, and King.

Q. What is repentance ?

A. It is a godly sorrow for sin, and a hearty and real turning from all sin unto God.

Q. What is the final portion of unbelieving and unrepentant sinners ?

A. The everlasting torments of devils.

Q. What is the final portion of them who truly repent and believe and obey the gospel ?

A. The blessed life of angels, in the vision of God for ever.

A Question for young Persons, before their first admission to the Lord's Supper.

Q. Whereas you were, in your infancy, baptized into the name of Jesus Christ, do you now, upon distinct knowledge, and with a firm belief and pious affection, own that Christian faith of which you have given an account, and withal, your baptismal vow of renouncing the service of Satan, and the world, and the lusts of the flesh, and of devoting yourself to God in all holiness of life ?

A. I do sincerely and heartily declare my belief of that faith and own my engagement to that holy vow, and resolve, by the assistance of God's grace, to continue in the careful observance of it all my days.

THEOLOGICAL LECTURES.

PREFACE

BY

THE PUBLISHER OF THE LATIN EDITION.

TO THE READER,

“WHAT is grand and substantial,” says Quintilian, “pleases long; while that which is only neat and handsome, charms for a while, but soon cloyeth.”* Now, what can be imagined more grand and substantial, than to contemplate the great Creator of the universe, in his visible works; to view, in this vast volume, which lies always open, his infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, and admire the instances thereof, that appear always new and astonishing? Again, what can be more agreeable and sublime, than turning our eyes to the great mysteries of revealed religion, to read with wonder and delight what is contained in the sacred Scriptures, concerning the Savior and Redeemer of the human race from the dreadful gulf of death and misery into which they had fallen; to review with attention what is therein discovered, with regard to our highest happiness, the rewards of virtue, and the punishment of an impious life; and to have these important matters deeply impressed upon the heart? These truths, however great and interesting, are laid before thee, pious and Christian reader, in these theological dissertations; where thou wilt find them deduced with great learning, explained with clearness and accuracy, and confirmed by powerful arguments. For our author, now in heaven,† who, while he lived, was equally remarkable for learning and piety, never used to stray beyond the verge of this divine system.

That these remains of his were the sacred lectures he read in the public hall of the university of Edinburgh, while he was principal of that university, will admit of no manner of doubt: there are a great many still alive, who can attest this truth; as they were themselves present at these lectures, to their great satisfaction and improvement. They all heard them, some took notes of them; and it is to be hoped, some had the substance of them powerfully impressed upon their hearts. To these I appeal, and to them, I doubt not, this work will be very acceptable; since those instructions which gave so much pleasure when heard but once, and that in a cursory manner, they may now have recourse to as often as they please; they may read them at their leisure, and draw from them matter of most delightful meditation. And, to be sure, those who have the least divine disposition of mind, will make it the principal business of their life, and their highest pleasure to stray through those delightful gardens abounding with such sweet and fragrant flowers, and refresh their hearts with the celestial honey that may be drawn from them: nor is there any ground to fear that such supplies will fail; for how often soever you have recourse to them, you will always find them blooming, full of juice, and swelled with the dew of heaven: nay, when by deep and continued meditation, you imagine you have pulled the finest flower, it buds forth again, and what Virgil writes concerning his fabulous golden bough is, in strictest truth, applicable in this case:—

—Uno avulso, non deficit aller, Aureus.

The lectures I now present thee with, I caused to be copied out fair from a manuscript in the author's own handwriting; which was a work that required great care and attention, on account of the blots and interlinations of that original manuscript; for the author had written them in haste, and without the least thought of ever publishing them. This done, at the desire of a great many, I got them printed, and now lay them before the public, in the same order in which they were read, as far as can be recollected from circumstances.

You must not expect to find in these truly sacred lectures, the method commonly used in theological systems; for while our reverend author clearly explains the doctrines of religion, he intermixes to excellent purpose the principles of piety, and while he enlightens the understanding, he at the same time warms the heart.

Being to treat of religion, he uses a practical method, which is most suitable to his subject, and begins with happiness, that being the scope and design of religion, as well as the ultimate end of human life. He begins with an explanation of happiness in general, on which he treats at some length; then proceeds to consider the happiness of man, which may be called perfect and truly divine, as it has for its object the infinitely blessed and perfect Being who created him, and formally consists in the beatific vision and fruition of Him, which is reserved in heaven for those who by faith are travelling through this earth, toward that blessed country. He adds, with great propriety, that happiness, so far as it is compatible with this wretched life of sorrows, consists in true religion, and in religion alone; not only as it is the way which leads directly to that perfect happiness reserved in heaven; but because it is itself of Divine original, and, in reality, the beginning of that very happiness which is to be perfected in the life to come.

* Quæ solida et ampla sunt diu placent; quæ autem lepida et concinna, paululum quidem iulectent, sed citò satiant. Fab. Quint.

† Ομακρίτης.

He observes, that the doctrine of religion is most justly called theology, as it has the most high God for its author, object, and end. He suggests many excellent thoughts concerning the Divine existence, and reasons from the common consent of nations, from the creatures we see about us, and from what we feel and experience within ourselves, as all these so loudly proclaim the being of God: but the argument taken from the harmony and beautiful order of the universe, he prosecutes at great length; and from this consideration, which is attended with greater evidence than all the demonstrations of the sciences, he clearly proves the existence of an eternal, independent Being.

With regard to the nature of God, he advances but little, and with great caution; for concerning the Supreme Being he thought it dangerous even to speak truth: but is very earnest and diffuse in his exhortations to make the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, that shine forth with great lustre in all his works, the subject of our constant and most serious meditation. As to the unfathomable depth of his eternal decrees, he was greatly pleased with that expression of Augustin, "Let others dispute, I will admire."^{*}

Among his works, the first is that vast and stupendous one, the primitive creation of all things, which, besides the infallible testimony of the inspired oracles, our author, by a concise, but clear dissertation on the subject, proves quite consonant and agreeable to reason. He then treats of man, of his original integrity, and the most unhappy fall that soon followed. But to this most lamentable story he subjoins another as happy and encouraging as the other is moving, I mean, the admirable scheme of Divine love for the salvation of sinners. A glorious and blessed method, that to the account of the most shocking misery subjoins the doctrine of incomparable mercy! Man, forsaking God, falls into the miserable condition of devils; God, from whom he revolted, determines to extricate him, by his powerful hand, out of this misery; and that this might be the more wonderfully effected, God himself becomes man. "This is the glory of man, by such means raised from his woful state! this the wonder of angels, and this the sum and substance of all miracles united in one!"* The word was made flesh! He who died as man, as God rose again, and having been seen on earth, returns to heaven, whence he came. On each of these he advances a few thoughts that are weighty and serious, but, at the same time pleasing and agreeable.

^{*} Alii disputent, ego mirabor.

To these lectures, I have added some exhortations by our author, to the candidates for the degree of master of arts, delivered at the annual solemnity held in the university for that purpose; together with his meditations on Psalms the 4th, 32d, and 130th; † because I was unwilling that any of the works of so great a man should continue in obscurity, to be devoured by moths and bookworms, especially one calculated for forming the morals of mankind, and for the direction of life. For in these meditations, he exhorts and excites the youth under his care, not by labored oratory and pompous expressions, but by powerful eloquence, earnest entreaties, and solid arguments, to the love of Christ, purity of life, and contempt of the world.

But what will all this signify to thee, reader, if thy mind is carried away with childish folly, or the wild rage of passions, or even if thou art still laboring under a stupid negligence of the means of grace, and unconcerned about eternal happiness and thy immortal soul? I doubt not, however, but these truly divine essays will fall into the hands of some, who are endued with a better disposition of mind; nor are we to despair of the rest, "for the Father of spirits liveth still, and he hath his seat in heaven, who instructs the hearts of men on this earth."‡ May, therefore, the greatest and best of Beings grant, that these academical exercises may have happy effects! And that our heavenly Father would second these means with his all-powerful grace, shall be, while he lives, the humble and ardent prayer of him,

Who earnestly desire thy salvation,

J. A. FALL.

LECTURE I.

INTRODUCTION.

WITH little strength I undertake a great work, or rather, with the least abilities I venture upon a task which is of all others the greatest and most important. Among the various undertakings of men, can an instance be given, of one more sublime than an intention to form the human mind anew, after the Divine image? Yet it will, I doubt not, be universally acknowledged, that this is the ^{*} Hic hominis ex tanto dedecore resurgentis honos, hic angelorum stupor, hoc miraculorum omnium compendium!

† These were likewise written in Latin, and have been translated.

‡ Vivit enim spirituum pater, et cathedram habet in cælo, qui corda docet in terris.

true end and design, not only of ministers in their several congregations, but also of professors of divinity in schools. And though, in most respects, the ministerial office is evidently superior to that of professors of theology in colleges, in one respect the other seems to have the preference, as it is, at least for the most part, the business of the former to instruct the common sort of men, the ignorant and illiterate; while it is the work of the latter to season with heavenly doctrine the minds of select societies of youth, who have had a learned education, and are devoted to a studious life; many of whom, it is to be hoped, will, by the Divine blessing, become preachers of the same salutary doctrine themselves. And surely this ought to be a powerful motive with all those who, by the Divine dispensation, are employed in such a work, to exert themselves with the greater life and spirit in the discharge of their duty; especially when they consider that those Christian instructions and seeds of true piety, which they instil into the tender minds of their pupils, will by them be spread far and wide, and in due time, conveyed, as it were, by so many canals and aqueducts, to many parts of the Lord's vineyard. Plutarch employs an argument of this kind, to prevail with the philosophers to exert themselves in the instruction of princes and great men, rather than with a haughty sullenness to avoid their company; "For thus," says he, "you will find a short way to be useful to many." And to be sure, he that conveys the principles of virtue and wisdom into the minds of the lower classes of men, or the illiterate, whatever progress his disciples may make, employs his time and talents only for the advantage of his pupils; but he that forms the minds of magistrates and great men, or such as are intended for high and exalted stations, by improving one single person, becomes a benefactor to large and numerous societies. Every physician of generous principles, as Plutarch expresses it [Φιλοκαλος], would have an uncommon ambition to cure an eye intended to watch over many persons, and convey the sense of seeing to numbers; and a musical instrument-maker would, with uncommon pleasure, exert his skill in perfecting a harp, if he knew that it was to be employed by the hands of Amphion, and by the force of its music, to draw stones together for building the walls of Thebes. A learned and ingenious author, alluding to this fable, and applying it to our present purpose, calls professors of theology in schools, makers of harps for building the walls of a far more famed and beautiful city, meaning the heavenly Jerusalem, in such a manner, that the stones of this building being truly, and without a fable, living, and charmed by the pleasant harmony of the gospel, come of their own accord to take their places in the wall.

I am not so little acquainted with myself, as to entertain the least hope of success in so great a work by my own strength and abilities; but, while I humbly depend upon the Divine goodness and favor, I have no reason to despair; for in the hand of Omnipotence, all instruments are alike. Nor can it be questioned that He, who made all things out of nothing, can produce any change he pleases in his creatures that are already made: He who gives Ζωην, και ωσωση, και ωαντα, life and breath, and all things, can easily strengthen the weak, and give riches in abundance to the poor and needy. Our emptiness only serves to lay us open to, and attract the fullness of Him "who fills all things, and is over all; who gives wisdom to the mind, and prevents its irregular sallies."

Under his auspices, therefore, young gentlemen, we are to aspire to true and saving wisdom, and to try to raise ourselves above this sublunary world. For it is not my intention to perplex you with curious questions, and lead you through the thorny paths of disputation; but, if I had any share of that excellent art, it would be my delight to direct your way, through the easy and pleasant paths of righteousness, to a life of endless felicity, and be myself your companion in that blessed pursuit. I would take pleasure to kindle in your souls the most ardent desires, and fervent love of heavenly things; and to use the expression of a great divine, add "wings to your souls, to snatch them away from this world, and restore them to God." For, if I may be allowed to speak with freedom, most part of the notions that are treated of in theological schools, that are taught with great pomp and ostentation, and disputed with vast bustle and noise, may possibly have the sharpness of thorns; but they have also their barrenness: they may prick and tear, but they can afford no solid nourishment to the minds of men. No man ever gathered grapes off thorns, nor figs off thistles. "To what purpose," saith A Kempis, "dost thou reason profoundly concerning the Trinity, if thou art without humility, and thereby displeasest that Trinity?"* And St. Augustine, upon the words of Isaiah, I am the Lord that teacheth thee to profit, observes with great propriety, that the prophet here mentions utility in opposition to subtily.† Such are the principles I would wish to communicate to you; and it is my earnest desire and fervent prayer, that, while I, according to my measure of strength, propose them to your understanding, He who sits in heaven, yet condescends to instruct the hearts of men on this earth, may effectually impress them upon your minds.

But that you may be capable of this supernatural light and heavenly instruction, it is, first of all, absolutely necessary, that your minds be called off from foreign objects; and turned in upon themselves; for, as long as your thoughts are dispersed and scattered in pursuit of vanity and insignificant trifles, he that would lay before them the principles and precepts of this spiritual wisdom, would commit them, like the sybil's prophecies, that were written on loose leaves of trees, to the mercy of the inconstant winds, and thereby render them entirely useless. It is certainly a matter of great difficulty, and requires uncommon art, to fix the thoughts of men, especially young men and boys, and turn them in upon themselves. We read in the parable of the gospel concerning the prodigal son, that, first of all, he came to himself, and then returned to his father. It is certainly a very considerable step toward conversion to God, to have the mind fixed upon itself, and disposed to think seriously of its own immediate concerns; which the pious St. Bernard excellently expresses in this prayer: "May I," says he, "return from external objects to my own inward concerns, and from inferior objects rise to those of a superior nature."* I should look upon it as no small happiness, if, out of this whole society, I could gain but one, but wish earnestly I could prevail with many, and still more ardently that I could send you all away, fully determined to entertain more serious and secret thoughts than ever you had before, with regard to your immortal state and eternal concerns. But how vain are the thoughts of men! What a darkness overclouds their minds † It is the great complaint of God concerning his people, that they have not a heart to understand. It is at once the great disgrace and misery of mankind, that they live without forethought. That brutish thoughtlessness, pardon the expression, or, to speak more intelligibly, want of consideration, is the death and ruin of souls. And the ancients observe, with great truth and justice that, "a thoughtful mind is the spring and source of every good thing." ‡

* Quorsum alta de Trinitate disputare, si careas humilitate, et sic Trinitate displiceas?

† Utilia non subtilia.

It is the advice of the psalmist, that we should converse much with ourselves: an advice, indeed, which is regarded by few; for the greatest part of mankind are nowhere greater strangers than at home. But it is my earnest request to you, that you would be intimately acquainted with yourselves, and as becomes persons devoted to a studious life, be much at home, much in your own company, and very often engaged in serious conversation with yourselves. Think gravely, "To what purpose do I live? Whither am I going?" Ask thyself, hast thou any fixed and determined purpose, any end that thou pursuest with steadfastness? § "The principles I have embraced under the name of the Christian religion, the things I have so often heard about a future state and life, and death eternal, are they true or false?" If they are true, as we all absolutely profess to believe they are, then, to be sure, the greatest and most important matters of this world are vain and even less than vanity itself: all our knowledge is but ignorance, our riches poverty, our pleasure bitterness, and our honors vile and dishonorable. How little do those men know who are ambitious of glory, what it really is, and how to be attained! Nay, they eagerly catch at the empty shadow of it, while they avoid and turn their backs upon that glory which is real, substantial, and everlasting. The happiness of good men in the life to come, is not only infinitely above all our expressions, but even beyond our most enlarged thoughts. By comparing, however, great things with small, we attain some faint notions of these exalted and invisible blessings, from the earthly and visible enjoyments of this world. In this respect, even the Holy Scriptures descend to the weakness of our capacities, and as the Hebrews express it, "The law of God speaks the language of the children of men."* They speak of this celestial life, under the representations of a heritage, of riches, of a kingdom, and a crown, but with uncommon epithets, and such as are by no means applicable to earthly glory or opulence, however great. It is an inheritance, but one that is uncontaminated, undefiled, and that fadeth not away; a kingdom, but one that can never be shaken, much less ruined, which can never be said of the thrones of this sublunary world, as evidently appears from the histories of all nations, and our own recent experience. Here, ye sons of Adam, a covetous and ambitious race, here is room for a laudable avarice; here are motives to excite your ambition, and, at the same time, the means of satisfying it to the full. But it must be acknowledged, that the belief of these things is far from being common. What a rare attainment is faith, seeing that among the prodigious crowds of those who profess to believe in this world, one might justly cry out—"Where is a true believer to be found?" That man shall never persuade me that he believes the truth and certainty of heavenly enjoyments, who cleaves to this earth, nay, who does not scorn and despise it, with all its baits and allurements, and employ all his powers, as well as his utmost industry, to obtain these immense and eternal blessings.

Nor is there anything in the way to these enjoyments that can deter you from it, unless holiness in heart and life appear to be a heavy and troublesome task to you: whereas, on the contrary, nothing surely can be named, that is either more suited to the dignity of human nature, more beautiful and becoming, or attended with greater pleasure. I therefore beseech and entreat you, by the bowels of Divine mercy, and by your own most precious souls, that you would seriously consider these

* Ab exterioribus ad interiora redeam, et ab inferioribus ad superiora ascendam.

† O vanas hominum mentes! O pectora cæca!

‡ Intellectus cogitantibus principium omnium boni.

§ Est aliquid quo tendis et in quid dirigis arcum?

* Lex Dei loquitur linguam filiorum hominum.

things, and make them your principal study. Try an experiment, attended with no danger or expense; make a trial of the ways of this wisdom, and I doubt not but you will be so charmed with the pleasantness thereof, that you will never thenceforward depart from them. For this purpose, I earnestly recommend to you to be constant and assiduous in prayer. Nay, it is St. Paul's exhortation that you pray without ceasing. 1 Thess. v. 17. So that prayer may be, not only, according to the old saying, Clavis diei, et sera noctis—"The key that opens the day, and the lock that shuts up the night"—but also, so to speak, a staff for support in the daytime, and a bed for rest and comfort in the night; two conveniences which are commonly expressed by one single Hebrew word. And be assured, that the more frequently you pray, with so much the greater ease and pleasure will your prayers be attended, not only from the common and necessary connexion between acts and habits, but also from the nature of this duty. For prayer, being a kind of conversation with God, gradually purifies the soul, and makes it continually more and more like unto him. Our love to God is also very much improved by this frequent intercourse with him; and by his love, on the other hand, the soul is effectually disposed to fervency, as well as frequently in prayer, and can, by no means, subsist without it.

LECTURE II.

HAPPINESS, ITS NAME AND NATURE, AND THE DESIRE OF IT IMPLANTED IN THE HUMAN HEART.

How deep and dark is that abyss of misery into which man is precipitated by his deplorable fall; since he has thereby lost, not only the possession, but also the knowledge of his chief or principal good! He has no distinct notion of what it is, of the means of recovering it, or the way he has to take in pursuit of it. Yet the human mind, however stunned and weakened by so dreadful a fall, still retains some faint idea, some confused and obscure notions of the good it has lost, and some remaining seeds of its heavenly original.* It has also still remaining a kind of languid sense of its misery and indigence, with affections suitable to those obscure notions. From this imperfect sense of its poverty, and these feeble affections, arise some motions and efforts of the mind, like those of one groping in the dark, and seeking rest everywhere, but meeting with it nowhere. This, at least, is beyond all doubt, and indisputable, that all men wish well to themselves, nay, that they all catch at, and desire to attain, the enjoyment of the most absolute and perfect good; even the worst of men have not lost this regard for themselves, nor can they possibly divest themselves of it. And though, alas! it is but too true, that, as we are naturally blind, we run ourselves upon misery, under the disguise of happiness, and not only embrace, according to the common saying, "a cloud instead of Juno,"* but death itself instead of life: yet, even from this most fatal error, it is evident that we naturally pursue either real happiness, or what, to our mistaken judgment, appears to be such. Nor can the mind of man divest itself of this propensity, without divesting itself of its being. This is what the schoolmen mean, when, in their manner of expression, they say, that "The will is carried toward happiness, not simply as will, but as nature."†

* Cognati semina cœli.

It is true, indeed, the generality of mankind are not well acquainted with the motions of their own minds, nor at pains to observe them, but, like brutes, by a kind of secret impulse, are violently carried toward such enjoyments as fall in their way. they do but very little, or not at all, enter into themselves, and review the state and operations of their own minds; yet, in all their actions, all their wishes and desires (though they are not always aware of it themselves), this thirst after immortality exerts and discovers itself. Consider the busy part of mankind hurrying to and fro in the exercise of their several professions—physicians, lawyers, merchants, mechanics, farmers, and even soldiers themselves—they all toil and labor, in order to obtain rest, if success attend their endeavors, and any fortunate event answer their expectations; encouraged by these fond hopes, they eat their bread with the sweat of their brow. But their toil, after all, is endless, constantly returning in a circle; and the days of men pass away in suffering real evils, and entertaining fond hopes of apparent good, which they seldom or never attain. Every man walks in a vain show: he torments himself in vain. Psalm xxxix. 6. He pursues rest and ease, like his shadow, and never overtakes them; but, for the most part, ceases to live, before he begins to live to purpose. However, after all this confused and fluctuating appetite, which determines us to the pursuit of good, either real or apparent, as it is congenial with us, and deeply rooted in the human heart, so it is the great handle by which Divine grace lays hold, as it were, upon our nature, draws us to itself, and extricates us out of the profound abyss of misery into which we are fallen.

From this it evidently follows, that the design of sacred theology is the very same with that of human nature, and he that rejects it hates his own soul (for so the wise king of Israel emphatically expresses it, Prov. viii. 36); he is the most irreconcilable enemy to his own happiness, and absolutely at variance with himself; according to that of St. Bernard, "After I was set in opposition to Thee, I became also contrary to myself."*

* Nubem pro Junone.

† In beatitudinem fertur voluntas, non ut voluntas, sed ut natura.

These considerations have determined me to begin these instructions, such as they are, which, with Divine assistance, I intend to give you, concerning the principles of the Christian religion, with a short disquisition concerning the chief or ultimate end of man. And here it is to be, first of all, observed, that the transcendent and supreme end of all, is the glory of God; all things returning, in a most beautiful circle, to this, as the original source from which they at first took their rise. But the end of true religion, as far as it regards us, which is immediately connected with the former, and serves, in a most glorious manner, to promote it, is, the salvation and happiness of mankind.

Though I should not tell you what is to be understood by the term happiness or felicity in general, I can not imagine any of you would be at a loss about it. Yet, I shall give a brief explication of it, that you may have the more distinct ideas of the thing itself, and the juster notions of what is to be further advanced on the subject. Nor is there, indeed, any controversy on this head; for all are agreed that by the terms commonly used in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, † to express happiness or felicity, we are to understand that perfect and complete good, which is suited and adapted to intelligent nature. I say to intelligent nature, because the brute creatures can not be said to be happy, but in a very improper sense. Happiness can not be ascribed to horses or oxen, let them be never so well fed, and left in the full possession of liberty and ease. And as good in general is peculiar to intelligent beings; so, more especially, that perfect good, which constitutes felicity in its full and most extensive acceptation. It is true, indeed, in common conversation, men are very prodigal of this term, and, with extravagant levity, misapply it to every common enjoyment of life, or apparent good they meet with, especially such as is most suited to their present exigencies; and thus, as Aristotle, in his Ethics, expresses it, "The sick person considers health, and the poor man riches, as the chief good." It is also true, that learned men, and even the sacred Scriptures, give the name of felicity to some symptoms and small beginnings of future happiness. But, as we have already observed, this term, in its true and complete sense, comprehends in it that absolute and full perfection of good which entirely excludes all uneasiness, and brings with it everything that can contribute to satisfaction and delight. Consequently, that good, whatever it be, that most perfectly supplies all the wants, and satisfies all the cravings of our rational appetites, is objective felicity, as the schools express it; and actual, or formal felicity, is the full possession and enjoyment of that complete and chief good. It consists of a perfect tranquillity of the mind, and not a dull and stupid indolence, like the calm that reigns in the Dead sea; but such a piece of mind as is lively, active, and constantly attended with the purest joy: not a mere absence of uneasiness and pain; but such a perfect ease as is constantly accompanied with the most perfect satisfaction, and supreme delight; and if the term had not been degraded by the mean uses to which it has been prostituted, I should not scruple to call it pleasure.* And, indeed, we may still call it by this name, provided we purify the term, and guard it by the following limitations; so as to understand by felicity, such a pleasure as is perfect, constant, pure, spiritual, and divine. For never, since I ventured to think upon such subjects, could I be satisfied with the opinion of Aristotle and the schoolmen, who distinguish between the fruition of the chief good, which constitutes true felicity, and the delight and satisfaction attending that fruition: because, at this rate, that good would not be the ultimate end and completion of our desires, nor desired on its own account: for whatever good we wish to possess, the end of our wishing is, that we may enjoy it with tranquillity and delight; and this uninterrupted delight or satisfaction, which admits of no alloy, is, love in possession of the beloved object, and at the height of its ambition.

* Postquam posuisti me contrarium tibi, factus sum contrarius mihi.

† אֲשֵׁר in Hebrew, μακαριότης et ευδαιμονία in Greek, felicitas et beatitudo in Latin.

LECTURE III.

HAPPINESS OF MAN, AND THAT IT IS REALLY TO BE FOUND.

You will not, I imagine, be offended, nor think I intend to insult you, because I have once and again, with great earnestness and sincerity, wished you and myself a sound and serious temper of mind: for, if we may represent things as they really are, very few men are possessed of so valuable a blessing. The far greater part of them are intoxicated either with the pleasures or the cares of this world; they stagger about with a tottering and unstable pace; and, as Solomon expresses it, The labor of the foolish wearieth every one of them: because he knoweth not how to go to the city: Eccles. x. 15:—the heavenly city, and the vision of peace, which very few have a just notion of, or are at pains to seek after. Nay, they know not what it is they are seeking. They flutter from one object to another, and live at hazard. They have no certain harbor in view, nor direct their course by any fixed star. But to him that knoweth not the port to which he is bound, no wind can be favorable ; neither can he who has not yet determined at what mark he is to shoot, direct his arrow aright. That this may not be our case, but that we may have a proper object to aim at, I propose to speak of the chief end of our being.

* Η ευδαιμονία ηδονή ἀμεταβλητὸς: Happiness is pleasure perpetuated.

And to begin at the Father of Spirits, or pure intelligences, God, blessed for ever, completely happy in himself from all eternity, is his own happiness. His self-sufficiency [Αυτάρκεια], that external and infinite satisfaction and complacency he has in himself, is the peculiar and most complete felicity of that Supreme Being who derives his existence from himself, and has given being to every thing else. Which Chrysostom has well expressed by saying, that "it is God's peculiar property to stand in need of nothing."* And Claudius Victor beautifully describes him as "vested with all the majesty of creative power, comprehending in his infinite mind all the creatures to be afterward produced, having all the revolutions of time constantly present to his all-seeing eye, and being an immense and most glorious kingdom to himself."†

Yet all we can say of this Primary, Uncreated Majesty and Felicity, is but mere talking to little or no sort of purpose : for here, not only words fail us, but even thought is at a stand, and quite overpowered, when we survey the Supreme, self-existent Being,‡ perfectly happy and glorious in the sole enjoyment of his own own infinite perfections, throughout numberless ages, without angels, men, or any other creature : so that the poet had reason to say, "What eye so strong, that the matchless brightness of thy glory will not dazzle it, and make it close !"§

Let us, therefore, descend into ourselves, but with a view to return to him again ; and not only so, but in such a manner, that the end and design of our descending to inquire into our own situation, be, that we may, with greater advantage, return and reascend to God. For, if we inquire into our own ultimate end, this disquisition must rise above all other beings, and at last terminate in him ; because he himself is that very end, and out of him, there is neither beginning nor end. The felicity of angels, which is an intermediate degree of happiness, we shall not insist on, not only because it is foreign to our purpose, but also, because our felicity and theirs will be found upon the matter, to be precisely the same.

* Θεοῦ μάλιστα ἴδιον το ἀνένδεες.

† Regnabatque ; potens in majestate creandi, Et facienda videns, gignendaque ; mente capaci, Secula despiciens, et quicquid tempora volunt Presens semper habens : immensum mole beatâ Regnum erat ipse sibi.

‡ Ἀθβαιαστον τὸν ὄντας

§ Τίνος ὄμμα σοφον
Ταῖς σαῖς στεροπαῖς

Ἀνακοπόμενοι

Ὁυ καμῦσται.

Synos. Hym. Tert.

With regard to our own happiness, we shall first show, that such happiness really exists ; and next inquire, what it is, and wherein it consists.

We assert, then, that there is such a thing as human felicity, and this ought rather to be taken for granted as a matter unquestionable, than strictly proved. But when I speak of human felicity, I am well satisfied you will not imagine, I mean such a happiness as may be had from human things, but that I take the term subjectively, and understand by it the happiness of man. Now, he who would deny, that this is not only among the number of possibles, but actually attained by some part, at least, of the human race, would not only render himself unworthy of such happiness, but even of human nature itself ; because he would thereby do all in his power to deprive it of its highest expectations and its greatest honor : but whoever allows, that all things were produced by the hand of an infinitely wise Creator, can not possibly doubt, that man, the head and ornament of all his visible works, was made capable of a proper and suitable end. The principal beauty of the creation consists in this, that all things in it are disposed in the most excellent order, and every particular intended for some noble and suitable end ; and if this could not be said of man, who is the glory of the visible world what a great deformity must it be, how great a gap in nature ! And this gap must be the greater, in that, as we have already observed, man is naturally endued with strong and vigorous desires toward such an end. Yet, on this absurd supposition, all such desires and expectations would be vain, and to no purpose ; and so, something might be said in defence of that peevish and impatient expression which escaped the psalmist in a fit of excessive sorrow, and he might have an excuse for saying, Why hast thou made all men in vain? Psalm lxxxix. 47. This would not only have been a frightful gap in nature, but if I am allowed so to speak, at this rate, the whole human race must have been created in misery, and exposed to unavoidable torments, from which they could never have been relieved, had they been formed, not only capable of a good quite unattainable and altogether without their reach, but also with strong and restless desires toward that impossible good. Now, as this is by no means to be admitted, there must necessarily be some full, permanent, and satisfying good, that may be attained by man, and in the possession of which he must be truly happy.

When we revolve these things in our minds, do we not feel from within, a powerful impulse, exciting us to set aside all other cares, that we may discover the one chief good, and attain to the enjoyment of it ? While we inhabit these bodies, I own, we lie under a necessity of using corporeal and fading things :

but there is no necessity that we should be slaves to our bellies and the lusts of the flesh, or have our affections glued to this earth: nay, that it should be so, is the highest and most intolerable indignity. Can it be thought, that man was born merely to cram himself with victuals and drink, or gratify the other appetites of a body which he has in common with the brutes? to snuff up the wind, to entertain delusive and vain hopes all the days of his life, and, when that short scene of madness is over, to be laid in the grave, and reduced to its original dust? Far be it from us to draw such conclusions: there is certainly something beyond this, something so great and lasting, that, in respect of it, the short point of time we live here, with all its bustle of business and pleasures, is more empty and vanishing than smoke. "I am more considerable," says one, "and born to greater matters, than to become the slave of my diminutive body."* With how much greater truth might we speak thus, were we regenerated from heaven! Let us be ashamed to live with our heads bowed down, like groveling beasts gazing upon the earth, or even to catch at the vain and airy shadows of science, while, in the mean time, we know not, or do not consider, whence we took our rise, and whither we are soon to return, what place is to receive our souls, when they are set at liberty from these bodily prisons. If it is the principal desire of your souls to understand the nature of this felicity, and the way that leads to it, search the Scriptures; for, from them alone, we all think, or profess to think, we can have eternal life. I exhort and beseech you, never to suffer so much as one day to pass, either through lazy negligence or too much eagerness in inferior studies, without reading some part of the sacred records with a pious and attentive disposition of mind; still joining with your reading, fervent prayer, that you may thereby draw down that divine light, without which spiritual things can not be read and understood. But with this light shining upon them, it is not possible to express how much sweeter you will find these inspired writings, than Cicero, Demosthenes, Homer, Aristotle, and all the other orators, poets, and philosophers. They reason about an imaginary felicity, and every one in his own way advances some precarious and uncertain thoughts upon it; but this book alone shows clearly, and with absolute certainty, what it is, and points out the way that leads to the attainment of it. This is that which prevailed with St. Augustine to study the Scriptures, and engaged his affections to them. "In Cicero, and Plato, and other such writers," says he, "I meet with many things wittily said, and things that have a moderate tendency to move the passions; but in none of them do I find these words, Come un- to me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."*

LECTURE IV.

IN WHICH IT IS PROVED THAT HUMAN FELICITY CAN NOT BE FOUND EITHER IN THE EARTH OR EARTHLY THINGS.

WE are all in quest of one thing, but almost all of us out of the right road; therefore, to be sure, the longer and the more swiftly we move in a wrong path, the further we depart from the object of our desires: and if it is so, we can speak or think of nothing more proper and seasonable, than of inquiring about the only right way, whereby we may all come "to see the bright fountain of goodness."† I know you will remember, that on the last occasion, we proposed the most important of all questions, viz., that concerning our ultimate end, or the way to discover true happiness; to which we asserted that all mankind do aspire with a natural, and therefore a constant and uniform ardor; or rather, we supposed, that all are sufficiently acquainted with this happiness, nay, really do, or at least may feel it within them, if they thoroughly know themselves. For this is the end of the labors of men; to this tend all their toils. This is the general aim of all, not only of the sharp-sighted, but the blear-eyed and short-sighted; nay even of those that are quite blind, who though they can not see the mark they propose to themselves, yet are in hopes of reaching it at last: that is to say, though their ideas of it are very confused and imperfect, they all desire happiness in the obvious sense of the word. We have also observed, that this term, in its general acceptation, imports that full and perfect good which is suited to intelligent nature.‡ It is not to be doubted but the felicity of the Deity, as well as his being, is in himself, and from himself. But our inquiry is concerning our own happiness. We also positively determined, that there is some blessed end suited and adapted to our nature, and that this can by no means be denied; for since all parts of the universe have proper ends suited and adapted to their natures, that the most noble and excellent creature of the whole sublunary world should in this be defective, and therefore created in vain, would be so great a sollecism, such a deformity in the whole fabric, and so unworthy of the supreme and all-wise Creator, that it can by no means be admitted, nor even so much as imagined. This point being settled, viz., that there is some deter-

* Apud Ciceronem et Platonem, aliosque ejusmodi scriptores, multa sunt acute dicta, et leniter calentia sed in iis omnibus hoc non invenio, Venite ad me, &c. [Matt. xi. 28.]

† Boni fontem visere lucidum.

‡ Πρωτῶν τε, εσχάτων τε, καὶ μέγιστον καλόν.

* Major sum, et ad majora gentius, quam ut sim mancipium mei corpusculi.

minate good, in the possession whereof the mind of man may be fully satisfied and at perfect rest, we now proceed to inquire what this good is, and where it may be found.

The first thing, and at the same time a very considerable step toward this discovery, will be to show where and in what things this perfect good is not to be found; not only because this point being settled, it will be easier to determine wherein it actually consists; nay, the latter will naturally flow from the former; but also because, as has been observed, we shall find the far greater part of mankind pursuing vain shadows and phantoms of happiness, and, throughout their whole lives, wandering in a great variety of by-paths, seeking the way to make a proper improvement of life, almost always hunting for that chief good where it is not to be found. They must first be recalled from this rambling and fruitless course, before they can possibly be directed into the right road. I shall not spin out this negative proposition by dividing the subject of it into several branches, and insisting separately upon every one of them; but consider all these errors and mistakes, both vulgar and practical, speculative and philosophical, however numerous they may be, as comprehended under one general head, and fully obviate them all by one single proposition, which, with Divine assistance, I shall explain to you in this lecture, and that very briefly.

The proposition is, that human felicity, or that full and complete good that is suited to the nature of man, is not to be found in the earth, nor in earthly things.

Now, what if, instead of further proof or illustration, I should only say—If this perfect felicity is to be found within this visible world, or the verge of this earthly life, let him, I pray, who hath found it out, stand forth; let him tell who can, what star, of whatever magnitude, what constellation or combination of stars, has so favorable an aspect, and so benign an influence, or what is that singular good, or assemblage of good things in this earth, that can confer upon mankind a happy life. All things that, like bright stars, have hitherto attracted the eyes of men, vanishing in a few days, have proved themselves to be comets, not only of no benign, but even of pernicious influence: according to the saying, “There is no comet but what brings some mischief along with it.”* All that have ever lived during so many ages that the world has hitherto lasted, noble and ignoble, learned and unlearned, fools and wise men, have gone in search of happiness: has ever any one of them all, in times past, or is there any one at this day that has said, Ευρηκα, I have found it? Different men have given different definitions and descriptions of it, and according to their various turns of mind, have painted it in a great variety of shapes; but, since the creation of the world, there has not been so much as one who ever pretended to say, Here it is, I have it, and have attained the full possession of it. Even those from whom most was to be expected, men of the utmost penetration, and most properly qualified for such researches, after all their labor and industry, have acknowledged their disappointment, and that they have not found it. But it would be wonderful indeed, that there should be any good suited to human nature, and to which mankind were born, and yet that it never fell to the share of any one individual of the sons of men: unless it be said, that the things of life, in this respect, resemble the speculations of the schools; and that, as they talk about objects of knowledge that were never known, so there is some good attainable by men, which was never actually attained.

But to look a little more narrowly into this matter, and take a transient view of the several periods of life. Infants are so far from attaining to happiness, that they have not yet arrived at human life; yet, if they are compared with those of riper years, they are in a low and improper sense, with regard to two things, innocence and ignorance, happier than men; for there is nothing that years add to infancy so invariably, and in so great abundance, as guilt and pollution; and the experience and knowledge of the world which they give us, do not so much improve the head, as they vex and distress the heart. So that the great man represented in the tragedy embracing his infant who knew nothing of his own misery, seems to have had some reason to say, that “those who know nothing enjoy the happiest life.”* And to be sure, what we gain by our progress from infancy to youth, is that we thereby become more exposed to the miseries of life, and, as we improve in the knowledge of things, our pains and torments are also increased; for either children are put to servile employments, or mechanic arts; or if they happen to have a more genteel and liberal education, this very thing turns to a punishment, as they are thereby subjected to rods and chastisements, and the power of parents and instructors, which is often a kind of petty tyranny; and when the yoke is lightened with the greatest prudence, it still seems hard to be borne, as it is above the capacity of their young minds, thwarts their wishes and inclinations, and encroaches upon their beloved liberty.

Youth, put in full possession of this liberty, for the most part ceases to be master of itself; nor can it be truly said to be delivered from its former misery, as to exchange it for a worse, even that very liberty. It leaves the harbor to sail through quicksands and sirens; and when both these are passed, launches out into the deep sea. Alas! to what various fates is it there exposed! How many contrary winds does it meet with! How many storms threatening it with shipwreck! How many shocks has it to bear from avarice, ambition, and envy, either in consequence of the violent stirrings of those passions within itself, or the fierce attacks of them from without! Amid all these tempests, the ship is either early overwhelmed, or broken by storms; and worn out by old age, at last falls to pieces.

* Ἄνδρες γὰρ κομήτες ὅστις οὐ κακὸν φέρει.

* Τὸ γινῶναι μηδὲν ἐστὶν ἡδίστος βίος.

Nor does it much signify what state of life one enters into, or what rank he holds in human society; for all forms of business and conditions of life, however various you may suppose them to be, are exposed to a much greater variety of troubles and distresses, some to pressures more numerous and more grievous than others, but all to a great many, and every one to some peculiar to itself. If you devote yourself to ease and retirement, you can not avoid the reproach and uneasiness that constantly attend an indolent, a useless, and lazy life. If you engage in business, whatever it be, whether you commence merchant, soldier, farmer, or lawyer, you always meet with toil and hazard, and often with heavy misfortunes and losses. Celibacy exposes to solitude; marriage, to solicitude and cares. Without learning, you appear plain and unpolished; but on the other hand, the study of letters is a matter of immense labor, and, for the most part, brings in but very little, either with regard to the knowledge you acquire by it, or the conveniences of life it procures. But I will enlarge no further. You find the Greek and Latin poets lamenting the calamities of life in many parts of their works, and at great length: nor do they exaggerate in the least; they even fall short of the truth, and only enumerate a few evils out of many.

The Greek epigram ascribed by some to Prosidipus, by others to Crates the cynic philosopher, begins thus, "What state of life ought one to choose?" and having enumerated them all, concludes in this manner: "There are then only two things eligible, either never to have been born, or to die as soon as one makes his appearance in the world."*

But now, leaving the various periods and conditions of life, let us, with great brevity, run over those things which are looked upon to be the greatest blessings in it, and see whether any of them can make it completely happy. Can this be expected from a beautiful outside? No; this has rendered many miserable, but never made one happy. For suppose it to be sometimes attended with innocence, it is surely of a fading and perishing nature, "the sport of time or disease."† Can it be expected from riches? Surely no;

for how little of them does the owner possess, even supposing his wealth to be ever so great! What a small part of them does he use or enjoy himself! And what has he of the rest but the pleasure of seeing them with his eyes? Let his table be loaded with the greatest variety of delicious dishes, he fills his belly out of one; and if he has a hundred beds, he lies but in one of them. Can the kingdoms, thrones, and sceptres of this world, confer happiness? No: we learn from the histories of all ages, that not a few have been tumbled down from these by sudden and unexpected revolutions, and those not such as were void of conduct or courage, but men of great and extraordinary abilities. And that those who met with no such misfortunes, were still far enough from happiness, is very plain from the situation of their affairs, and in many cases, from their own confession. The saying of Augustus is well known: "I wish I had never been married, and had died childless."* And the expression of Severus at his death, "I became all things, and yet it does not profit me."† But the most noted saying of all, and that which best deserves to be known, is that of the wisest and most flourishing king, as well as the greatest preacher, who, having exactly computed all the advantages of his exalted dignity and royal opulence, found this to be the sum total of all, and left it on record for the inspection of posterity and future ages, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

All this may possibly be true with regard to the external advantages of men; but may not happiness be found in the internal goods of the mind, such as wisdom and virtue? Suppose this granted; still that they may confer perfect felicity, they must of necessity be perfect themselves. Now, show me the man, who, even in his own judgment, has attained to perfection in wisdom and virtue: even those who were accounted the wisest, and actually were so, acknowledged they knew nothing: nor was there one among the most approved philosophers, whose virtues were not allayed with many blemishes. The same must be said of piety and true religion, which, though it is the beginning of felicity, and tends directly to perfection, yet, as in this earth it is not full and complete in itself, it can not make its possessors perfectly happy. The knowledge of the most exalted minds is very obscure, and almost quite dark, and their practice of virtue lame and imperfect. And indeed, who can have the boldness to boast of perfection in this respect, when he hears the great apostle complaining of the law of the flesh, and pathetically exclaiming, Who shall deliver me from this body of death? Rom. vii. 24. Besides, though wisdom and virtue, or piety were perfect, so long as we have bodies, we must at the same time have all bodily advan-

* Ποιην τοι βίβτοια τάμοις τριβον.—Εστ' ἀβύ τοῦ θνοῖν ενός ἀρεσις ἢ τὸ γενεσθαι μεδεποτ ἢ βανεῖν ἀντίκα τικτομανον.

† Χρόνον ἢ νόσου ταιγνυειν.

* Αἰθ' ὄφελον αγαρῶς τ' ἔμναι αγαρῶς τ' ἀπολεσαι.

† Πάντα γενεθμην και οὐ λουιτελει.

tages, in order to perfect felicity. Therefore the satirist smartly ridicules the wise man of the stoics: "He is," says he, "free, honored, beautiful, king of kings, and particularly happy, except when he is troubled with phlegm."^{*}

Since these things are so, we must raise our minds higher, and not live with our heads bowed down like the common sort of mankind: who, as St. Augustine expresses it, "look for a happy life in the region of death."[†] To set our hearts upon the perishing goods of this wretched life and its muddy pleasures, is not the happiness of men, but of hogs. And if pleasure is dirt, other things are but smoke. Were this the only good proposed to the desires and hopes of men, it would not have been so great a privilege to have been born. Be therefore advised, young gentlemen, and beware of this poisonous cup, lest your minds thereby become brutish, and fall into a fatal oblivion of your original, and your end. Turn that part of your composition which is Divine, to God its creator and father, without whom we can neither be happy, nor indeed be at all.

LECTURE V.

IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

THERE are many things that keep mankind employed, particularly business, or rather trifles; for so the affairs which are in this world considered as most important, ought to be called, when compared with that of minding our own valuable concerns, knowing ourselves, and truly consulting our highest interest; but how few are there that make this their study? The definition you commonly give of man, is, that he is a rational creature; though, to be sure, it is not applicable to the generality of mankind, unless you understand, that they are such, not actually, but in power only, and that very remote. They are, for the most part at least, more silly and foolish than children, and, like them, fond of toys and rattles; they fatigue themselves, running about and sauntering from place to place, but do nothing to purpose.

What a wonder it is, that souls of a heavenly original have so far forgot their native country, and are so immersed in dirt and mud, that there are few men who frequently converse with themselves about their own state, thinking gravely of their original and their end, seriously laying to heart, that as the poet expresses it, "good and evil are set before mankind;"[‡] and who after mature consideration, not only think it the most wise and reasonable course, but are also fully resolved to exert themselves to the utmost, in order to arrive at a sovereign contempt of earthly things, and aspire to those enjoyments that are Divine and eternal. For our parts, I am fully persuaded we shall be of this mind, if we seriously reflect upon what has been said. For if there is, of necessity, a complete, permanent, and satisfying good intended for man, and no such good is to be found in the earth or earthly things, we must proceed farther, and look for it somewhere else; and, in consequence of this, conclude, that man is not quite extinguished by death, but removes to another place, and that the human soul is by all means immortal.

Many men have added a great variety of different arguments to support this conclusion, some of them strong and solid, and others, to speak freely, too metaphysical, and of little strength, especially as they are as obscure, as easily denied, and as hard to be proved, as that very conclusion, in support of which they are adduced.

They who reason from the immaterial nature of the soul, and from its being infused into the body, as also from its method of operation, which is confined to none of the bodily organs, may easily prevail with those who believe these principles, to admit the truth of the conclusion they want to draw from them; but if they meet with any who obstinately deny the premises, or even doubt the truth of them, it will be a matter of difficulty to support such hypotheses with clear and conclusive arguments. If the soul of man was well acquainted with itself, and fully understood its own nature, if it could investigate the nature of its union with the body, and the method of its operation therein, we doubt not but thence it might draw these and other such arguments of its immortality; but since, shut up in the prison of a dark body, it is so little known, and so incomprehensible to itself, and since, in so great obscurity, it can scarce, if at all, discover the least of its own features and complexion, it would be a very difficult matter for it to say much concerning its internal nature, or nicely determine the methods of its operation. But it would be surprising, if any one should deny, that the very operations it performs, especially those of the more noble and exalted sort, are strong marks and conspicuous characters of its excellence and immortality.

Nothing is more evident than that, besides life, and sense, and animal spirits, which he has in common with the brutes, there is in man something more exalted, more pure, and that more nearly approaches to Divinity. God has given to the former a sensitive soul, but to us a mind also; and, to speak distinctly, that spirit which is peculiar to man, and whereby he is raised above all other animals, ought to be called mind rather than soul.* Be this as it may, it is hardly possible to say, how vastly the human mind excels the other with regard to its wonderful powers, and next ^{*} Dives,

Liber, honoratus, pulcher, rex denique regum,
Præcipue fœlix, nisi cum pituita molesta est.

[†] Beatam vitam quærent in regione mortis.

[‡] Ἐτε τοι ἀνθρώποισι κακόν τ' ἀγαθόν τε τεύχεται.

* Animus potius dicendus est quam anima.

to them, with respect to its works, devices, and inventions. For it performs such great and wonderful things, that the brutes, even those of the greatest sagacity, can neither imitate, nor at all understand, much less invent. Nay, man, though he is much less in bulk, and inferior in strength to the greatest part of them, yet, as lord and king of them all, he can, by surprising means, bend and apply the strength and industry of all the other creatures, the virtues of all herbs and plants, and, in a word, all the parts and powers of this visible world, to the convenience and accommodation of his own life. He also builds cities, erects commonwealths, makes laws, conducts armies, fits out fleets, measures not only the earth, but the heavens also, and investigates the motions of the stars. He foretells eclipses many years before they happen; and, with very little difficulty, sends his thoughts to a great distance, bids them visit the remotest cities and countries, mount above the sun and the stars, and even the heavens themselves.

But all these things are inconsiderable, and contribute but little to our present purpose, in respect of that one incomparable dignity that results to the human mind from its being capable of religion, and having indelible characters thereof naturally stamped upon it. It acknowledges a God, and worships him; it builds temples to his honor; it celebrates his never enough exalted majesty with sacrifices, prayers, and praises; depends upon his bounty; implores his aid; and so carries on a constant correspondence with heaven: and, which is a very strong proof of its being originally from heaven, it hopes at last to return to it. And, truly, in my judgment, this previous impression and hope of immortality, and these earnest desires after it, are a very strong evidence of that immortality. These impressions, though in most men they lie overpowered and almost quite extinguished by the weight of their bodies, and an extravagant love to present enjoyments; yet, now and then, in time of adversity, break forth and exert themselves, especially under the pressure of severe distempers, and at the approaches of death. But those whose minds are purified, and their thoughts habituated to Divine things, with what constant and ardent wishes do they breathe after that blessed immortality! How often do their souls complain within them, that they have dwelt so long in these earthly tabernacles! Like exiles, they earnestly wish, make interest, and struggle hard to regain their native country. Moreover does not that noble neglect of the body and its senses, and that contempt of all the pleasures of the flesh, which these heavenly souls have attained, evidently show, that, in a short time, they will be taken hence, and that the body and soul are of a very different, and almost contrary nature to one another; that, therefore, the duration of the one depends not upon the other, but is quite of another kind; and that the soul, set at liberty from the body, is not only exempted from death, but, in some sense, then begins to live, and then first sees the light? Had we not this hope to support us, what ground should we have to lament our first nativity, which placed us in a life so short, so destitute of good, and so crowded with miseries; a life which we pass entirely in grasping phantoms of felicity, and suffering real calamities! So that if there were not, beyond this, a life and happiness that more truly deserves these names, who can help seeing, that, of all creatures, man would be the most miserable, and, of all men, the best the most unhappy?

For, although every wise man looks upon the belief of the immortality of the soul, as one of the great and principal supports of religion, there may possibly be some rare, exalted, and truly divine minds, who would choose the pure and noble path of virtue for its own sake, would constantly walk in it, and out of love to it, would not decline the severest hardships, if they should happen to be exposed to them on its account. Yet it can not be denied, that the common sort of Christians, though they are really and at heart sound believers and true Christians, fall very far short of this attainment, and would scarcely, if at all, embrace virtue and religion, if you take away the rewards; which I think the Apostle Paul hints at in this expression, If in this life only we have hope, we are of all men the most miserable. 1 Cor. xv. 19. The apostle, indeed, does not intend these words as a direct proof of the immortality of the soul in a separate state, but an argument to prove the resurrection of the body; which is a doctrine near akin, and closely connected with the former. For that great restoration is added as an instance of the superabundance and immensity of the Divine goodness, whose pleasure it is, that not only the better and more divine part of man, which, upon its return to its original source, is, without the body, capable of enjoying a perfectly happy and eternal life, should have a glorious immortality, but also that this earthly tabernacle, as being the faithful attendant and constant companion of the soul through all its toils and labors in this world, be also admitted to a share and participation of its heavenly and eternal felicity; that so, according to our Lord's expression, every faithful soul may have returned into its bosom, good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over. Luke vi. 38.

Let our belief of this immortality be founded entirely upon Divine Revelation, and then like a city fortified with a rampart of earth drawn round it, let it be outwardly guarded and defended by reason; which in this case, suggests arguments as strong and convincing as the subject will admit of. If any one, in the present case, promises demonstration, his undertaking is certainly too much, if he desires or expects it from another, he requires too much. There are, indeed, very few demonstrations in philosophy, if you except mathematical sciences, that can be truly and strictly so called, and, if we inquire narrowly into the matter, perhaps we shall find none at all : nay, if even the mathematical demonstrations are examined by the strict rules and ideas of Aristotle, the greatest part of them will be found imperfect and defective. The saying of that philosopher is, therefore, wise and applicable to many cases : " Demonstrations are not to be expected in all cases, but so far as the subject will admit of them."* But if we were well acquainted with the nature and essence of the soul, or even its precise method of operation on the body, it is highly probable we could draw these evident and undeniable demonstrations of that immortality which we are now asserting : whereas, so long as the mind of man is so little acquainted with its own nature, we must not expect any such.

But that unquenchable thirst of the soul, which we have already mentioned, is a strong proof of its Divine nature : a thirst not to be allayed with the impure and turbid waters of any earthly good, or of all worldly enjoyments taken together. It thirsts after the never-failing fountain of good, according to that of the psalmist, As the hart panteth after the water-brooks : it thirsts after a good, invisible, immaterial, and immortal, to the enjoyment whereof the ministry of a body is so far from being absolutely necessary, that it feels itself shut up and confined by that to which it is now united, as by a partition-wall, and groans under the pressure of it. And those souls that are quite insensible of this thirst, are certainly buried in the body, as in the carcass of an impure hog ; nor have they so entirely divested themselves of this appetite we have mentioned, nor can they possibly so divest themselves of it, as not to feel it severely, to their great misery, sooner or later, either when they awake out of their lethargy within the body, or when they are obliged to leave it. To conclude : Nobody, I believe, will deny, that we are to form our judgment of the true nature of the human mind, not from the sloth and stupidity of the most degenerate and vilest of men, but from the sentiments and fervent desires of the best and wisest of the species.

These sentiments concerning the immortality of the soul in its future existence, not only include no impossibility or absurdity in them, but are also every way agreeable to sound reason, wisdom, and virtue, to the Divine economy, and the natural wishes and desires of men. Wherefore, most nations have, with the greatest reason, universally adopted them, and the wisest in all countries and in all ages have cheerfully embraced them ; and though they could not confirm them with any argument of irresistible force, yet they felt something within them that corresponded with this doctrine, and always looked upon it as most beautiful and worthy of credit. " Nobody," says Atticus in Cicero, " shall drive me from the immortality of the soul."* And Seneca's words are, " I took pleasure to inquire into the eternity of the soul, and even indeed to believe it. I resigned myself to so glorious a hope, for now I begin to despise the remains of a broken constitution, as being to remove into that immensity of time, and into the possession of endless ages."† O how much does the soul gain by this removal!

* Ἦσιν ἐν πᾶσιν ἀποδείξει αἰτήσεων, ἀλλ' ἐφ' ὅσον δέχεται τὸ ὑποκείμενον.

As for you, young gentlemen, I doubt not but you will embrace this doctrine, not only as agreeable to reason, but as it is an article of the Christian faith. I only put you in mind to revolve it often within yourselves, and with a serious disposition of mind ; for you will find it the strongest incitement to wisdom, good morals, and true piety. Nor can you imagine anything that will more effectually divert you from a foolish admiration of present and perishing things, and from the allurements and sordid pleasures of this earthly body. Consider, I pray you, how unbecoming it is to make a heaven-born soul, that is to live for ever, a slave to the meanest, vilest, and most trifling things ; and, as it were, to thrust down to the kitchen a prince that is obliged to leave his country only for a short time. St. Bernard pathetically addresses himself to the body in favor of the soul, persuading it to treat the latter honorably, not only on account of its dignity, but also for the advantage that will thereby redound to the body itself : " Thou hast a noble guest, O flesh ! a most noble one indeed, and all thy safety depends upon its salvation : it will certainly remember thee for good, if thou serve it well ; and when it comes to its Lord, it will put him in mind of thee, and the mighty God himself will come to make thee, who art now a vile body, like unto his glorious One : and, O wretched flesh, he who came in humility and obscurity to redeem souls, will come in great majesty to glorify thee, and every eye shall see him."‡ Be mindful, therefore, young gentlemen, of your better part, and accustom it to think of its own eternity, always and everywhere having its eyes fixed upon that world to which it is most nearly related. And thus it will look down, as from on high, on all those things which the world considers as lofty and exalted, and will see them under its feet; and of all the things which are confined within the narrow verge of this present life, it will have nothing to desire, and nothing to fear.

* Me nemo de immortalitate depellet.

† Juvabat de æternitate animarum quærere, imo meretricule credere : dabam me spei tantæ, jam enim reliquias infractæ ætatis contemnebam, in immensum illud tempus, et in possessionem omnium ævis transisturus.—SEN. Epis. 102.

‡ Nobilem hospitem habes, O caro ! nobilem valde, et tota tua salus de ejus salute pendet : omnino etiam memor erit tui in bonum, si bene servieris illi ; et cum pervenerit ad Dominum suum, suggeret ei de te, et veniet ipse Dominus virtutum, et te vile corpus configurabit corpori suo glorioso, qui ad animas redimendas humilis ante venerat, et occultus, pro te glorificando, O misera caro, sublimis veniet et manifestus.

LECTURE VI.

HAPPINESS OF THE LIFE TO COME.

OF all the thoughts of men, there is certainly none that more often occurs to a serious mind that has its own interest at heart, than that to which all others are subordinate and subservient, with regard to the intention, the ultimate and most desirable end, of all our toils and cares, and even of life itself. And this important thought will the more closely beset the mind, the more sharp-sighted it is in prying into the real torments, the delusive hopes, and the false joys of this our wretched state; which is indeed so miserable, that it can never be sufficiently lamented; and as for laughter amid so many sorrows, dangers, and fears, it must be considered as downright madness. Such was the opinion of the wisest of kings: I have said of laughter, says he, It is mad; and of mirth, What doth it? Eccl. ii. 2. We have, therefore, no cause to be much surprised at the bitter complaints which a grievous weight of afflictions has extorted, even from great and good men: nay, it is rather a wonder, if the same causes do not often oblige us to repeat them.

If we look about us, how often are we shocked to observe either the calamities of our country, or the sad disasters of our relations and friends, whom we have daily occasion to mourn, either as groaning under the pressure of poverty, pining away under languishing diseases, tortured by acute ones, or carried off by death, while we ourselves are, in like manner, very soon to draw tears from the eyes of others! Nay, how often are we a burden to ourselves, and groan heavily under afflictions of our own, that press hard upon our estates, our bodies, or our minds! Even those who seem to meet with the fewest and the least inconveniences in this life, and dazzle the eyes of spectators with the brightness of a seemingly constant and uniform felicity, beside that they often suffer from secret vexations and cares which destroy their inward peace, and prey upon their distressed hearts, how uncertain, weak, and brittle, is that false happiness which appears about them, and when it shines brightest, how easily is it broken to pieces! So that it has been justly said, "They want another felicity to secure that which they are already possessed of."* If, after all, there are some whose minds are hardened against all the forms and appearances of external things, and who look down with equal contempt upon all the events of this world, whether of a dreadful or an engaging aspect, even this disposition of mind does not make them happy: nor do they think themselves so; they have still something to make them uneasy, the obscure darkness that overspreads their minds, their ignorance of heavenly things, and the strength of their carnal affections, not yet entirely subdued. And though these we are now speaking of, are by far the noblest and most beautiful part of the human race, yet, if they had not within them that blessed hope of removing hence, in a little time, to the regions of light, the more severely they feel the straits and afflictions to which their souls are exposed by being shut up in this narrow earthly cottage, so much they certainly would be more miserable than the rest of mankind.

As oft, therefore, as we reflect upon these things, we shall find that the whole comes to this one conclusion: "There is certainly some end;"*—there is, to be sure, some end suited to the nature of man, and worthy of it; some particular, complete, and permanent good; and since we in vain look for it within the narrow verge of this life, and among the many miseries that swarm on it from beginning to end, we must of necessity conclude that there is certainly some more fruitful country, and a more lasting life, to which our felicity is reserved, and into which we shall be received when we remove hence. This is not our rest, nor have we any place of residence here: it is the region of fleas and gnats; and while we search for happiness among these mean and perishing things, we are not only sure to be disappointed, but also not to escape those miseries which, in great numbers, continually beset us. So that we may apply to ourselves the saying of the famous artist confined in the island of Crete, and truly say, "The earth and the sea are shut up against us, and neither of them can favor our escape: the way to heaven is alone open, and this way we will strive to go."†

Thus far we have advanced by degrees, and very lately we have discoursed upon the immortality of the soul, to which we have added the resurrection of our earthly body, by way of appendix. It remains that we now inquire into the happiness of the life to come.

Yet, I own, I am almost deterred from entering upon this inquiry, by the vast obscurity and sublimity of the subject, which in its nature is such, that we can neither understand it, nor, if we could, can it be expressed in words. The divine apostle, who had had some glimpse of this felicity, describes it no otherwise than by his silence, calling the words he heard, unspeakable, and such as it was not lawful for a man to utter.‡ 2 Cor. xii. 4. And if he neither could nor would ex-

* Ἐστίν ἀρα τέλος.

† Nec tellus nostræ, nec patet unda fugæ,
Restat iter cæli, cælo tentabimus ire.

‡ Ἄβρητα βήματα, α, οὐκ εἶδόν ἀνθρώπου λαλῆσαι.

* Alia felicitate ad illam elicitem tuendam opus est.

press what he saw, far be it from us boldly to force ourselves into or intrude upon what we have seen ; especially as the same apostle, in another place, acquaints us, for our future caution, that this was unwarrantably done by some rash and forward persons in his own time. But since in the sacred archives of this new world, however invisible and unknown to us, we have some maps and descriptions of it suited to our capacity : we are not only allowed to look at them, but as they were drawn for that very purpose, it would certainly be the greatest ingratitude, as well as the highest negligence in us, not to make some improvement of them. Here, however, we must remember what a great odds there is between the description of a kingdom in a small and imperfect map, and the extent and beauty of that very kingdom when viewed by the traveller's eye ; and how much greater the difference must be between the felicity of that heavenly kingdom to which we are aspiring, and all, even the most striking figurative expressions, taken from the things of this earth, that are used to convey some faint and imperfect notion of it to our minds. What are these things, the false glare and shadows whereof, in this earth, are pursued with such keen and furious impetuosity—riches, honors, pleasures ? All these, in their justest, purest, and sublimest sense, are comprehended in this blessed life : it is a treasure, that can neither fail nor be carried a way by force or fraud : it is an inheritance uncorrupted and undefiled, a crown that fadeth not away ; a never-failing stream of joy and delight : it is a marriage-feast, and of all others the most joyous and most sumptuous ; one that always satisfies, and never cloy the appetite : it is an eternal spring, and an everlasting light, a day without an evening : it is a paradise, where the lilies are always white and in full bloom, the saffron blooming, the trees sweat out their balsams, and the tree of life in the midst thereof : it is a city, where the houses are built of living pearls, the gates of precious stones, and the streets paved with the purest gold. Yet, all these are nothing but veils of the happiness to be revealed on that most blessed day : nay, the light itself, which we have mentioned among the rest, though it be the most beautiful ornament in this visible world, is at best but a shadow of that heavenly glory ; and how small soever that portion of this inaccessible brightness may be, which, in the sacred Scriptures, shines upon us through these veils, it certainly very well deserves that we should often turn our eyes toward it, and view it with the closest attention.

1. Now, the first that necessarily occurs in the constitution of happiness, is a full and complete deliverance from every evil and every grievance ; which we may as certainly expect to meet with in that heavenly life, as it is impossible to be attained while we sojourn here below. All tears shall be wiped away from our eyes, and every cause and occasional of tears for ever removed from our sight. There, there are no tumults, no wars, no poverty, no death, nor disease ; there, there is neither mourning, nor fear, nor sin, which is the source and fountain of all other evils : there is neither violence within doors nor without, nor any complaint, in the streets of that blessed city. There, no friend goes out, nor enemy comes in.

2. Full vigor of body and mind, health, beauty, purity, and perfect tranquillity.

3. The most delightful society of angels, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and all the saints ; among whom there are no reproaches, contentions, controversies, nor party-spirit, because there are, there, none of the sources whence they can spring, nor anything to encourage their growth ; for there is, there, particularly, no ignorance, no blind self-love, no vain-glory nor envy, which is quite excluded from those divine regions ; but, on the contrary, perfect charity, whereby every one, together with his own felicity, enjoys that of his neighbors, and is happy in the one as well as the other : hence there is among them a kind of infinite reflection and multiplication of happiness, like that of a spacious hall adorned with gold and precious stones, dignified with a full assembly of kings and potentates, and having its walls quite covered with the brightest looking-glasses.

4. But what infinitely exceeds, and quite eclipses all the rest, is that boundless ocean of happiness, which results from the beatific vision of the ever-blessed God ; without which, neither the tranquillity they enjoy, nor the society of saints, nor the possession of any particular finite good, nor indeed of all such taken together, can satisfy the soul, or make it completely happy. The manner of this enjoyment we can only expect to understand, when we enter upon the full possession of it ; till then, to dispute and raise many questions about it, is nothing but vain, foolish talking, and fighting with phantoms of our own brain. But the schoolmen, who confine the whole of this felicity to bare speculation, or, as they call it, actus intellectualis, an intellectual act, are, in this, as in many other cases, guilty of great presumption, and their conclusion is built upon a very weak foundation. For although contemplation be the highest and noblest act of the mind, yet complete happiness necessarily requires some present good suited to the whole man, the whole soul, and all its faculties. Nor is it any objection to this doctrine, that the whole of this felicity is commonly comprehended in Scripture under the term of vision ; for the mental vision, or contemplation of the primary and infinite good, most properly signifies, or at least includes in it, the full enjoyment of that good ; and the observation of the Rabbins concerning Scripture phrases, “ That words expressing the senses, include also the affections naturally arising from those sensations,”* is very well known. Thus knowing is often put for approving and loving; and seeing for enjoying and attaining. Taste and see that God is good, says the psalmist. And, in fact, it is no small pleasure to lovers to dwell together, and mutually to enjoy the sight of one another. "Nothing is more agreeable to lovers, than to live together."*

* Verba sensus connotant affectus.

We must, therefore, by all means conclude, that this beatific vision includes in it not only a distinct and intuitive knowledge of God, but, so to speak, such a knowledge as gives us the enjoyment of that most perfect Being, and, in some sense, unites us to him; for such a vision it must, of necessity, be, that converts that love of the Infinite Good which blazes in the souls of the saints, into full possession; that crowns all their wishes, and fills them with an abundant and overflowing fulness of joy, that vents itself in everlasting blessings and songs of praise.

And this is the only doctrine, if you believe it (and I make no doubt but you do), this, I say, is the only doctrine that will transport your whole souls, and raise them up on high. Hence you will learn to trample under feet all the turbid and muddy pleasures of the flesh, and all the allurements and splendid trifles of the present world. However those earthly enjoyments that are swelled up, by false names and the strength of imagination, to a vast size, may appear grand and beautiful, and still greater and more engaging to those that are unacquainted with them: how small, how inconsiderable do they all appear to a soul that looks for a heavenly country, that expects to share the joys of angels, and has its thoughts constantly employed about these objects! To conclude, the more the soul withdraws, so to speak, from the body, and retires within itself, the more it rises above itself; and the more closely it cleaves to God, the more the life it lives in this earth resembles that which it will enjoy in heaven, and the larger foretastes it has of the first-fruits of that blessed harvest. Aspire, therefore, to holiness, young gentlemen, without which no man shall see the Lord.

LECTURE VII.

THE BEING OF GOD.

THOUGH, on most subjects, the opinions of men are various, and often quite opposite, inasmuch that they seem to be more remarkable for the vast variety of their sentiments, than that of their faces and languages; there are, however, two things wherein all nations are agreed, and in which there seems to be a perfect harmony throughout the whole human race—the desire of happiness and a sense of religion. The former no man desires to shake off: and though some, possibly, would willingly part with the latter, it is not in their power to eradicate it entirely: they can not banish God altogether out of their thoughts, nor extinguish every spark of religion within them. It is certainly true, that, for the most part, this desire of happiness wanders in darkness from one object to another without fixing upon any; and the sense of religion is either suffered to lie inactive, or deviates into superstition. Yet, the great Creator of the world employs these two, as the materials of a fallen building, to repair the ruins of the human race, and as handles whereby he draws his earthen vessels out of the deep gulf of misery into which it is fallen.

Of the former of these, that is, felicity, we have already spoken on another occasion: we shall therefore now, with Divine assistance, employ some part of our time in considering that sense of religion which is naturally impressed on the mind of man.

Nor will our labor, I imagine, be unprofitably employed in collecting together those few general principles in which so many and so very dissimilar forms of religion and sentiments, extremely different, harmoniously agree; for, as every science most properly begins with universal propositions and things more generally known, so, in the present case, besides the other advantages, it will be no small support to a weak and wavering mind, that amid all the disputes and contentions subsisting between the various sects and parties in religion, the great and necessary articles, at least, of our faith, are established in some particulars by the general consent of mankind, and, in all the rest, by that of the whole Christian world.

I would therefore most earnestly wish, that your minds, rooted and established in the faith, were firmly united in this delightful bond of religion, which, like a golden chain, will be no burden, but an ornament; not a yoke of slavery, but a badge of true and generous liberty. I would by no means have you to be Christians upon the authority of mere tradition, or education, and the example and precepts of parents and masters, but purely from a full conviction of your own understandings, and a fervent disposition of the will and affections proceeding therefrom. For piety "is the sole and only good among mankind,"* and you can expect none of the fruits of religion, unless the root of it be well laid, and firmly established by faith: "for all the virtues are the daughters of faith,"† says Clemens Alexandrinus.

Lucretius, with very ill-advised praises, extols his favorite Grecian philosopher as one fallen down from heaven to be the deliverer of mankind, and dispel their distressing terrors and fears, because he fancied he had found out an effectual method to banish all religion entirely out of the minds of men. And to say the truth, in no age has there been want-

* Ἐν γὰρ καὶ μόνον ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀγαθὸν ἡ ἐπιείθεια.

Trismegist.

† Ἡσαῖα γὰρ ἀρεταὶ πίστεως θυγατέρες.

* Οὐδὲν οὐτῶ τῶν φίλων ὡς το σὺζη.

ing brutish souls, too much enslaved to their corporeal senses, who would wish these opinions to be true; yet, after all, there are very few of them who are able to persuade themselves of the truth of those vicious principles which, with great impudence and importunity, they commonly inculcate upon others: they belch out with full mouth their foolish dreams, often in direct opposition to conscience and knowledge; and what they unhappily would wish to be true, they can scarcely, if at all, believe themselves. You are acquainted with Horace's recantation, wherein he tells us, that "he had been long bigoted to the mad tenets of the Epicurean philosophy, but found himself at last obliged to alter his sentiments, and deny all he had asserted before."^{*}

Some souls lose the whole exercise of their reason, because they inform bodies which labor under the defect of temperance or of proper organs; yet, you continue to give the old definition of man, and call him a rational creature; and should any one think proper to call him a religious creature, he would, to be sure, have as much reason on his side, and needed not fear his opinion would be rejected, because of a few madmen who laugh at religion. Nor is it improbable, as some of the ancients have asserted, that those few among the Greeks who were called Atheists, had not that epithet because they absolutely denied the being of God, but only because they rejected and justly laughed at the fictitious and ridiculous deities of the nations.

Of all the institutions and customs received among men, we meet with nothing more solemn and general that of religion and sacred rites performed to the honor of some deity: which is a very strong argument, that that persuasion, in preference to any other, is written, nay, rather engraven, in strong and indelible characters upon the mind of man. This is, as it were, the name of the great Creator stamped upon the noblest of all his visible works, that thus man may acknowledge himself to be his, and, concluding from the inscription he finds impressed upon his mind, that what belongs to God ought, in strict justice, to be restored to him,† be wholly reunited to his first principle, that immense Ocean of goodness whence he took his rise. The distemper that has invaded mankind is, indeed, grievous and epidemical: it consists in a mean and degenerate love to the body and corporeal things, and, in consequence of this, a stupid and brutish forgetfulness of God, though he can never be entirely blotted out of the mind. This forgetfulness, a few, and but very, alarmed and awakened by the Divine rod, early shake off. And even in the most stupid, and such as are buried in the deepest sleep, the original impression sometimes discovers itself when they are under the pressure of some grievous calamity, or on the approach of danger, and especially upon a near prospect of death. Then, the thoughts of God, that had lain hid and been long suppressed, forced out by the weight of pain and the impressions of fear, come to be remembered; and the whole soul being, as it were, roused out of its long and deep sleep, men begin to look about them, inquire what the matter is, and seriously reflect whence they came, and whither they are going. Then, the truth comes naturally from their hearts. The stormy sea alarmed even profane sailors so much, that they awakened the sleeping prophet: Awake, say they, thou sleeper, and call upon thy God. Jonah i. 6.

But however weak or imperfect this original or innate knowledge of God may be, it discovers itself everywhere so far, at least, that you can meet with no man, or society of men, that, by some form of worship or ceremonies, do not acknowledge a Deity, and, according to their capacity, and the custom of their country, pay him homage. It is true, some late travellers have reported, that, in that part of the new world called Brazil, there are some tribes of the natives among whom you can discover no symptoms that they have the least sense of a Deity: but, besides that the truth of this report is very far from being well ascertained, and that the observation might have been too precipitately made by new-comers who had not made sufficient inquiry—even supposing it to be true, it is not of such consequence, when opposed to all the rest of the world, and the universal agreement of all nations and ages upon this subject, that the least regard should be paid to it. Nor must we imagine that it at all lessens the weight of this great argument, which has been generally and most justly urged, both by ancients and moderns, to establish the first and common foundation of religion.

Now, whoever accurately considers this universal sense of religion of which we have been speaking, will find that it comprehends in it these particulars: 1. That there is a God. 2. That he is to be worshipped. 3. Which is a consequence of the former, that he regards the affairs of men. 4. That he has given them a law, enforced by rewards and punishments, and that the distribution of these is, in a very great measure, reserved to a life different from that we live in this earth, is the firm belief, if not of all, at least of the generality of mankind. And though our present purpose does not require that we should confirm the truth of all these points with those strong arguments that might be urged in their favor, but rather that we should take them for granted, as being sufficiently established by the common consent of mankind; we shall, however, subjoin a few thoughts on each of them separately, with as great brevity and perspicuity as we can.

* Parcus Decrum cultor et infrequens.

Insanientis dum sapientiæ

Consultus erro, &c. Od. xxxiv., lib. 1.

† Τα τοῦ Θεοῦ τῷ Θεῷ.

1. THAT THERE IS A GOD. And here I can not help fearing, that when we endeavor to confirm this leading truth, with regard to the first and uncreated being, by a long and labor-ed series of arguments, we may seem, instead of a service, to do a kind of injury to God and man both. For why should we use the pitiful light of a candle to discover the sun, and eagerly go about to prove the being of Him who gave being to everything else—who alone exists necessarily, nay, we may boldly say, who alone exists; seeing all other things were by him extracted out of nothing, and, when compared with him, they are nothing, and even less than nothing, and vanity? And would not any man think himself insulted, should it be suspected that he doubted of the being of Him, without whom he could neither doubt, nor think, nor be at all? This persuasion, without doubt, is innate, and strongly impressed upon the mind of man, if anything at all can be said to be so.* Nor does Iamblicus scruple to say, that “to know God is our very being;”† and in another place, that “it is the very being of the soul to know God, on whom it depends.”‡ Nor would he think amiss, who, in this, should espouse the opinion of Plato; for, to know this, is nothing more than to call to remembrance what was formerly impressed upon the mind; and when one forgets it (which, alas! is too much the case of us all), he has as many remembrancers, so to speak, within him, as he has members, and as many without him, as the individuals of the vast variety of creatures to be seen around him. Let, therefore, the indolent soul that has almost forgot God, be roused up, and every now and then say to itself, “Behold this beautiful starry heaven,” &c.

But because we have too many of that sort of fools that say in their heart, “There is no God” (and if we are not to answer a fool, so as to be like unto him, yet we are, by all means, to answer him according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit); again, because a criminal forgetfulness of this leading truth is the sole source of all the wickedness in the world; and finally, because it may not be quite unprofitable, nor unpleasant, even to the best of men, sometimes to recollect their thoughts on this subject, but, on the contrary, a very pleasant exercise to every well-disposed mind, to reflect upon what a solid and unshaken foundation the whole fabric of religion is built, and to think and speak of the Eternal Fountain of goodness and of all other beings, and consequently of his necessary existence; we reckon it will not be amiss to give a few thoughts upon it. Therefore, not to insist upon several arguments, which are urged with great advantage on this subject, we shall produce only one or two, and shall reason thus.

It is by all means necessary that there should be some eternal being, otherwise nothing could ever have been; since it must be a most shocking contradiction to say, that anything could have produced itself out of nothing. But if we say, that anything existed from eternity, it is most agreeable to reason that that should be an Eternal Mind, or Thinking Being, that so the noblest property may be ascribed to the most exalted being. Nay, that Eternal Being must, of absolute necessity, excel in wisdom and power, and, indeed, in every other perfection, since it must itself be uncreated, and the cause and origin of all the creatures; otherwise, some difficulty will remain concerning their production. And thus, all the parts of the universe, taken singly, suggest arguments in favor of their Creator.

The beautiful order of the universe, and the mutual relation that subsists between all its parts, present us with another strong and convincing argument. This order is itself an effect, and, indeed, a wonderful one; and it is also evidently distinct from the things themselves, taken singly; therefore it must proceed from some cause, and a cause endowed with superior wisdom: for it would be the greatest folly, as well as impudence, to say it could be owing to mere chance. Now, it could not proceed from man, nor could it be owing to any concert or mutual agreement between the things themselves, separately considered; seeing the greatest part of them are evidently incapable of consultation and concert: it must, therefore, proceed from some one superior being, and that being is God, “who commanded the stars to move by stated laws, the fruits of the earth to be produced at different seasons, the changeable moon to shine with borrowed light, and the sun with his own.”*

He is the monarch of the universe, and the most absolute monarch in nature. For who else assigned to every rank of creatures its particular form and uses, so that the stars, subjected to no human authority or laws, should be placed on high, and serve to bring about to the earth and the inhabitants thereof the regular returns of day and night, and distinguish the seasons of the year? Let us take, in particular, any one species of sublunary things, for instance, man, the noblest of all, and see how he came by the form wherewith he is invested, that frame or constitution of body, that vigor of mind, and that precise rank in the nature of things, which he now obtains, and no other. He must, certainly, either have made choice of these things for himself, or must have had them assigned him by another, whom we must consider as the principal actor, and sole architect of the whole fabric. That he made choice of them for himself, nobody will imagine; for either he

* Primum visibile lux, et primum intelligibile Deus.
† Esse nostrum est Deum cognoscere.

‡ Esse animæ, est quoddam intelligere, scilicet Deum, unde dependet.

• ————— Qui lege moveri
Sidera, qui fruges diverso tempore nasci,
Qui variam Phœben alino jussisset igne Compleri, solemne suo.

made this choice before he had any existence of his own, or after he began to be : but it is not easy to say which of these suppositions is most absurd. It remains, therefore, that he must be indebted for all he enjoys, to the mere good pleasure of his great and all-wise Creator, who framed his earthly body in such a wonderful and surprising manner, animated him with his own breath, and thus introduced him into this great palace of his, which we now behold, where his manifold wisdom, most properly so called, displays itself so gloriously in the whole machine, and in every one of its wonderfully variegated parts.

The first argument, taken from the very being of things, may be further illustrated by the same instance of man. For unless the first man was created, we must suppose an infinite series of generations from eternity, and so, the human race must be supposed independent, and to owe its being to itself. But, by this hypothesis, mankind came into the world by generation, therefore every individual of the race owes its being to another ; consequently, the whole race is from itself, and at the same time from another, which is absurd. Therefore, the hypothesis implies a plain and evident contradiction. "O ! immense wisdom that produced the world ! Let us for ever admire the riches and skill of thy right hand ;"* often viewing with attention thy wonders, and, while we view them, frequently crying out with the divine psalmist, O Lord, how manifold are thy works ! In wisdom hast thou made them all. The earth is full of thy riches ! Psalm civ. 24. From everlasting to everlasting thou art God, and besides thee, there is no other. Psalm xc. 2. And with Hermes, "The Father of all, being himself understanding, life, and brightness, created man like himself, and cherished him as his own son. Thou Creator of universal nature, who hast extended the earth, who poiest the heavens, and commandest the waters to flow from all parts of the sea, we praise thee, who art the one exalted God, for by thy will all things are perfected."† The same author asserts that "God was prior to human nature."

In vain would any one endeavor to evade the force of our argument, by substituting nature in the place of God, as the principal and cause of this beautiful order. For either, by nature, he understands the particular frame and composition of every single thing ; which would be saying nothing at all to the purpose in hand, because it is evident, that this manifold nature, which in most instances is quite void of reason, could never be the cause of that beautiful order and harmony which is everywhere conspicuous throughout the whole system : or, he means a universal and intelligent nature disposing and ordering everything to advantage. But this is only another name for God ; of whom it may be said, in a sacred sense, that he, as an infinite nature and mind, pervades and fills all his works. Not as an informing form, according to the expression of the schools, and as the part of a compounded whole ; which is the idlest fiction that can be imagined, for, at this rate, he must not only be a part of the vilest insects, but also of stocks and stones, and clods of earth ; but a pure, unmixed nature, which orders and governs all things with the greatest freedom and wisdom, and supports them with unwearied and almighty power. In this acceptance, when you name nature, you mean God. Seneca's words are very apposite to this purpose. "Whithersoever you turn yourself, you see God meeting you ; nothing excludes his presence ; he fills all his works. Therefore, it is in vain for thee, most ungrateful of all men, to say thou art not indebted to God, but to Nature, because they are, in fact, the same. If thou hadst received anything from Seneca, and should say, thou owedst it to Annæus or Lucius, thou wouldst not thereby change thy creditor, but only his name, because, whether thou mentionest his name or his surname, his person is still the same."*

* O ! immensa, opifex rerum sapientia ! dextræ Divitiarum artemque tuam miremur in ævum.

† Ο πάντων πατήρ ὁ νοῦς ὢν ζωῆς καὶ φῶς ἀπεκύησε ἀνθρώπων οὐ πρῶτον ὡς ἴδιον τόκου, Πίστης φύσεως κτίστης ὡς πῆξας τὴν γῆν καὶ οὐρανὸν κρεμίσας καὶ ἐπιτάξας τὸ γλῶκκί δῶμαρ ἐξ αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἀέραου ἵπταρχειν, ὕμνωμεν δε τὸ πᾶν, καὶ τὸ ἐν, σοῦ γὰρ βουλομενα πάντα τελείται.

An evident and most natural consequence of this universal and necessary idea of a God, is, his unity. All who mention the term God, intend to convey by it the idea of the first, most exalted, necessarily existent, and infinitely perfect being ; and it is plain, there can be but one being endued with all these perfections. Nay, even the polytheism that prevailed among the heathen nations was not carried so far, but that they acknowledged one God, by way of eminence, as supreme and absolutely above all the rest, whom they styled the greatest and best of Beings, and the Father of gods and men. From him all the rest had their being and all that they were, and from him, also, they had the title of gods, but still in a limited and subordinate sense. In confirmation of this, we meet with very many of the clearest testimonies with regard to the unity of God, in the works of all the heathen authors. That of Sophocles is very remarkable : "there is indeed," says he, "one God, and but one, who has made the heavens, and the wide extended earth, the blue surges of the sea, and the strength of the winds."†

As to the mystery of the sacred Trinity,

* Quocunque te flexeris, ibi Deum vides occurrentem tibi, nihil ab illo vacat ; opes suam ipse implet : ergo nihil agis, ingratissime mortalium, qui te negas Deo debere, sed nature, quia eidem est utrumque officium. Si quid a Seneca accepisses, et Annæo te diceres debere vel Lucio, non creditorem mutares, sed nomen, quoniam vive nomen ejus dicas, sive prænomen, sive cognomen, idem tamen ipse est. SENECA, 4. de Benef.

† Εἰς ταῖς ἀθρηναίαι, εἰς ἐστὶν Θεός, Ὁσ ἀνόαν' τ' εἰνευε καὶ γαίαν μακράν Πόντον τε χαράπον ὄμαρ καὶ ανεμῶν βίας.

which has a near and necessary connexion with the present subject, I always thought it was to be received and adored with the most humble faith, but by no means to be curiously searched into, or perplexed with the absurd questions of the schoolmen. We fell by an arrogant ambition after knowledge; by mere faith we rise again, and are reinstated. And this mystery, indeed, rather than any other, seems to be a tree of knowledge, prohibited to us while we sojourn in these mortal bodies. This most profound mystery, though obscurely represented by the shadows of the Old Testament, rather than clearly revealed, was not unknown to the most ancient and celebrated doctors among the Jews, nor altogether unattested, however obstinately later authors may maintain the contrary. Nay, learned men have observed, that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are expressly acknowledged in the books of the cabalists, and they produce surprising things to this purpose out of the book of Zohar, which is ascribed to R. Simeon, Ben Joch, and some other cabalistical writers. Nay, the book just now mentioned, after saying a great deal concerning the Three in One essence, adds, "That this secret will not be revealed to all till the coming of the Messias."* I insist not upon what is said of the name consisting of twelve letters, and another larger one of forty-two, as containing a fuller explication of that most sacred name, which they call Hammephorash.†

Nor is it improbable, that some dawn, at least, of this mystery had reached even the heathen philosophers. There are some who think they can prove, by arguments of no inconsiderable weight, that Anaxagoras, by his νοῦς, or mind, meant nothing but the Son, or Wisdom that made the world. But the testimonies are clearer, which you find frequently among the Platonic philosophers, concerning the Three subsisting from one:‡ moreover, they all call the self-existing Being, the creating word, or, the mind and the soul of the world.|| But the words of the Egyptian Hermes are very surprising: "The mind, which is God, together with his word, produced another creating-mind; nor do they differ from one another, for their union is life."§

But what we now insist upon is the plain and evident necessity of one Supreme, and therefore, of one Only Principle of all things, and the harmonious agreement of mankind in the belief of the absolute necessity of this same principle.

This is the God whom we admire, whom we worship, whom we entirely love, or, at

* Hoc arcana non revelabitur unicuique, quousque venerit Messias.

† Maim. Mor. Nev., part. i., c. 16.

‡ Περὶ τριῶν ἐξ ἑνὸς ὑποστάτων.

|| Τὸ αὐτὸ, ὃν τον δημιουργον λογον, seu νοῦν, καὶ τὴν του κέρου ψυχην.

§ Ὁ νοῦς Θεός ἀπέκρυψε λογον ετερον νοῦν δημιουργόν, ἀλλ' οὐ δύστανται ἀπ' ἀλλήλων, ενωσις γὰρ τούτων ἐστίν ἡ ζωή.

least, whom we desire to love above all things; whom we can neither express in words, nor conceive in our thoughts; and the less we are capable of these things, so much the more necessary it is to adore him with the profoundest humility, and to love him with the greatest intentness and fervor.

LECTURE VIII.

THE WORSHIP OF GOD, PROVIDENCE, AND THE LAW GIVEN TO MAN.

THOUGH I thought it by no means proper to proceed without taking notice of the arguments that serve to confirm the first and leading truth of religion, and the general consent of mankind with regard to it; yet the end I chiefly proposed to myself, was to examine this consent, and point out its force, and the use to which it ought to be applied; to call off your minds from the numberless disputes about religion, to the contemplation of this universal agreement, as into a more quiet and peaceable country; and to show you, what I wish I could effectually convince you of, that there is more weight and force in this universal harmony and consent of mankind in a few of the great and universal principles, to confirm our minds in the sum and substance of religion, than the innumerable disputes that still subsist with regard to the other points, ought to have to discourage us in the exercise of true piety, or in the least to weaken our faith.

In consequence of this, it will be proper to lay before you the other propositions contained in this general consent of mankind, with regard to religion. Now, the first of these being, that there is one, and but one Eternal principle of all things; from this it will most naturally follow, that this Principle or Deity is to be honored with some worship; and from these two taken together, it must be, with the same necessity, concluded, that there is a providence, or, that God doth not despise or neglect the world which he has created, and mankind by whom he ought to be, and actually is worshipped, but governs them with the most watchful and perfect wisdom.

All mankind acknowledge, that some kind of worship is due to God, and that to perform it is by all means worthy of man; and upon the minds of all is strongly impressed that sentiment which Lactantius expressed with great perspicuity and brevity in these words, "To know God is wisdom, and to worship him, justice."*

In this worship some things are natural, and therefore of more general use among all nations, such as vows and prayers, hymns and praises; as also some bodily gestures, especially such as seem most proper to express reverence and respect. All the rest, for the most part, actually consist of ceremonies, either of Divine institution or human invention. Of this sort are sacrifices, the use whereof in old times, very much prevailed in all nations, and still continues in the greater part of the world.

* Deum nosse, sapientia; colere, justitia.

A Majesty so exalted, no doubt, deserves the highest honor, and the sublimest praises on his own account; but still if men were not persuaded that the testimonies of homage and respect they offer to God, were known to him, and accepted of him, even on this account all human piety would cool and presently disappear; and indeed, prayers and vows, whereby we implore the Divine assistance, and solicit blessings from above, offered to a God, who neither hears nor in the least regards them, would be an instance of the greatest folly; nor is it to be imagined, that all nations would ever have agreed in the extravagant custom of addressing themselves to gods that did not hear.

Supposing, therefore, any religion, or divine worship, it immediately follows therefrom, that there is also a providence. This was acknowledged of old, and is still acknowledged by the generality of all nations throughout the world, and the most famous philosophers. There were, indeed, particular men, and some whole sects that denied it. Others, who acknowledged a kind of Providence, confined it to the heavens, among whom was Aristotle, as appears from his book De Mundo; which notion is justly slighted by Nazianzen, who calls it "a mere limited Providence."* Others allowed it some place in things of this world, but only extended it to generals, in opposition to individuals. But others, with the greatest justice, acknowledged that all things, even the most minute and inconsiderable, were the objects of it. "He fills his own work, nor is he only over it, but also in it."† Moreover, if we ascribe to God the origin of this fabric and all things in it, it will be most absurd and inconsistent to deny him the preservation and government of it: for, if he does not preserve and govern his creatures, it must be either because he can not, or because he will not; but his infinite power and wisdom make it impossible to doubt of the former, and his infinite goodness, of the latter. The words of Epictetus are admirable: "There were five great men," said he, "of which number were Ulysses and Socrates, who said that they could not so much as move without the knowledge of God."‡ And in another place, "If I was a nightingale, I would act the part of a nightingale; if a swan, that of a swan; now that I am a reasonable creature, it is my duty to praise God."*

It would be needless to show, that so great a fabric could not stand without some being properly qualified to watch over it; that the unerring course of the stars is not the effect of blind fortune; that what chance sets on foot, is often put out of order, and soon falls to pieces; that, therefore, this unerring and regular velocity is owing to the influence of a fixed, eternal law. It is, to be sure, a very great miracle, merely to know so great a multitude, and such a vast variety of things, not only particular towns, but also provinces and kingdoms, even the whole earth, all the myriads of creatures that crawl upon the earth, and all their thoughts; in a word, at the same instant to hear and see all that happens† on both hemispheres of this globe: how much more wonderful must it be, to rule and govern all these at once, and, as it were, with one glance of the eye! When we consider this, may we not cry out with the poet, "O thou great Creator of heaven and earth, who governest the world with constant and unerring sway, who biddest time to flow throughout ages, and continuing unmoved thyself, givest motion to everything else," &c.‡

It is a great comfort, to have the faith of this Providence constantly impressed upon the mind, so as to have recourse to it in the midst of all confusions, whether public or private, and all calamities from without or from within; to be able to say—the great King, who is also my Father, is the supreme ruler of all these things, and with him all my interests are secure; to stand firm, with Moses, when no relief appears, and to look for the salvation of God from on high, and, finally in every distress, when all hope of human assistance is swallowed up in despair, to have the remarkable saying of the father of the faithful stamped upon the mind, and to silence all fears with these comfortable words, God will provide. In a word, there is nothing that can so effectually conform the heart of man, and his inmost thoughts, and consequently the whole tenor of his life, to the most perfect rule of religion and piety, as a firm belief and frequent meditation on this Divine Providence, which superintends and governs the world. He who is firmly persuaded, that an exalted God of infinite wisdom and purity is constantly present with him, and sees all that he thinks or acts, will, to be sure, have no occasion to overawe his mind with the imaginary presence of a Læli-

* Εἰ μὲν ἀπόων μὲν, ἐποίουν τὰ τῆς ἀπόωνος, εἰ κύκνος τὰ τοῦ κύκνου, νῦν ἐε λογικός εἰμι ἐμὲν με δεῖ τον Θεόν. Ibid. cap. 16.

† Παντ' ἐφορῶν, καὶ παντ' ἐπακούειν.

‡ O! qui perpetua mundum ratione gubernas

Terrarum cælique sator, qui tempus ab ævo,
Ire jubes; stabilisque manens das cuncta moveri,
&c.

ΒΟΥΤΗ, de Con. Philosoph. lib. iii., metr. 9.

* Μικρόλογον πρόβουσιαν.

† Opus suum ipse, implet, nec solum præest, sed inest.

‡ Πεμπτοι ἐε ὧν ἦν καὶ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ Σωκράτης, δι λεγομετες, ὅτι οὐδὲ σελήθω κινουμενος. ARRIAN, lib. i., cap. 12. l. rei. Θεῶων, &c.

us or a Cato. Josephus assigns this as the source or root of Abel's purity: "In all his actions," says he, "he considered that God was present with him, and therefore made virtue his constant study."*

Moreover, the heathen nations acknowledge this superintendence of Divine Providence over human affairs in this very respect, and that it is exercised in observing the morals of mankind, and in distributing rewards and punishments. But this supposes some law or rule, either revealed from heaven or stamped upon the hearts of men, to be the measure and test of moral good and evil, that is, virtue and vice. Man, therefore, is not Ζῶον ἄνορον, a lawless creature, but capable of a law, and actually born under one, which he himself is also ready to own. "We are born in a kingdom," says the Rabbinical philosopher, "and to obey God is liberty."† But this doctrine, however perspicuous and clear in itself, seems to be a little obscured by one cloud, that is, the extraordinary success which bad men often meet with, and the misfortunes and calamities to which virtue is frequently exposed. The saying of Brutus, "O! wretched virtue, thou art regarded as nothing," &c.‡ is well known: as are also those elegant verses of the poet, containing a lively picture of the perplexity of a mind wavering and at a loss upon this subject: "My mind," says he, "has often been perplexed with difficulties and doubts, whether the gods regard the affairs of this earth, or whether there was no Providence at all. . . . For, when I considered the order and disposition of the world, and the boundaries set to the sea—I thence concluded, that all things were secured by the providence of God. . . . But when I saw the affairs of men involved in so much darkness and confusion," &c.¶

But not to insist upon a great many other considerations, which even the philosophy of the heathens suggested, in vindication of the doctrine of Providence; there is one consideration of great weight to be set in opposition to the whole of this prejudice, viz., that it is an evidence of a rash and forward mind, to pass sentence upon things that are not yet perfect and brought to a final conclusion; which even the Roman stoic and the philosopher of Cheronea insist upon, at large, on this subject. If we will judge from events, let us put off the cause and delay sentence, till the whole series of these events come before us; and let us not pass sentence upon a successful tyrant while he is triumphant before our eyes, and while we are quite ignorant of the fate that may be awaiting himself or his son, or, at least, his more remote posterity. The ways of Divine justice are wonderful. "Punishment stalks silently, and with a slow pace; it will, however, at last overtake the wicked."* But after all, if we expect another scene of things to be exhibited, not here, but in the world to come, the whole dispute concerning the events of this short and precarious life, immediately disappears and comes to nothing. And to conclude, the consent of wise men, states, and nations, on this subject, though it is not quite unanimous and universal, is very great, and ought to have the greatest weight.

But all these maxims we have mentioned are more clearly taught, and more firmly established, in the Christian religion, which is of undoubted truth: it has also some doctrines peculiar to itself [Κυρίως ὁφέας], annexed to the former, and most closely connected with them, in which the whole Christian world, though by far too much divided with regard to other disputed articles, are unanimously agreed and firmly united together.

LECTURE IX.

THE PLEASURE AND UTILITY OF RELIGION.

THOUGH the author of the following passage was a great proficient in the mad philosophy of Epicurus, yet he had truth strongly on his side when he said, that "Nothing was more pleasant than to be stationed on the lofty temples, well defended and secured by the pure and peaceable doctrines of the wise philosophers."†

Now, can any doctrine be imagined more wise, more pure and peaceable, and more sacred, than that which flowed from the most perfect fountain of wisdom and purity, which was sent down from heaven to earth, that it might guide all its followers to that happy place whence it took its rise? It is, to be sure, the wisdom of mankind to know God, and their indispensable duty to worship him. Without this, men of the brightest parts and greatest learning seem to be born with excellent talents only to make themselves miserable; and, according to the expression of the wisest of kings, He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow, Eccles. i. 18. We must, therefore, first of all, consider this as a sure and settled point, that religion is the sole foundation of human peace and felicity. This, even the profane scoffers at religion are, in some sort, obliged to own, though much

* Πάσιν τοῖς ὑπὸ αὐτοῦ πραττομένοις παρέβαινον Θεοῦ νομίζων, ἀρετῆς προνέτρο. Antiq., lib. i., cap. 3.

† In regno nati sumus, Deo parere, libertas.

‡ Ο τλῶμον ἀρετῆ ὡς οὐδὲν, &c.

¶ Sepe mihi dubiam traxit sententia mentem Curarent superi terras, &c.

Nam cum dispositi quævissem fœdera mundi

Præsartisque mafis fines—

———— hinc omnia rebar

Consilia firmata Dei, &c.

Sed cum res hominum tanta caligine volvi

Aspicerem, &c.—CLAUDIAN in Rufinum. lib. i.

* Σιγῇ καὶ βραδείῃ ποδὶ στενίχουσα μάρψει τοῦς κακοῦς ὄταν τῶχλν.

† Bene quam munita tenere

Edita doctrinâ sapientum templa serena.

LUCRETIVS

against their will, even while they are pointing their wit against it: for nothing is more commonly to be heard from them than that the whole doctrine of religion was invented by some wise men to encourage the practice of justice and virtue through the world. Surely, then, religion, whatever else may be said of it, must be a matter of the highest value, since it is found necessary to secure advantages of so very great importance. But, in the meantime, how unhappy is the case of integrity and virtue, if what they want to support them is merely fictitious, and they can not keep their ground but by means of a monstrous forgery! But far be it from us to entertain such an absurdity! For the first rule of righteousness can not be otherwise than right, nor is there anything more nearly allied or more friendly to virtue, than truth.

But religion is not only highly conducive to all the great advantages of human life, but is also, at the same time, most pleasant and delightful. Nay, if it is so useful, and absolutely necessary to the interests of virtue, it must, for this very reason, be also pleasant; unless one will call in question a maxim universally approved by all wise men, that "Life can not be agreeable without virtue;"* a maxim of such irrefragable and undoubted truth, that it was adopted even by Epicurus himself.

How great, therefore, must have been the madness of that noted Grecian philosopher, who, while he openly maintained the dignity and pleasantness of virtue, at the same time employed the whole force of his understanding to ruin and sap its foundations! For that this was his fixed purpose, Lucretius not only owns, but also boasts of it, and loads him with ill-advised praises for endeavoring, through the whole course of his philosophy, to free the minds of men from all the bonds and ties of religion. As if there was no possible way to make them happy and free without involving them in the guilt of sacrilege and atheism! As if to eradicate all sense of a Deity out of the mind, were the only way to free it from the heaviest chains and fetters! Though in reality this would be effectually robbing man of all his valuable jewels, of his golden crown and chain, all the riches, ornaments, and pleasures of his life: which is inculcated at large, and with great eloquence, by a greater and more divine master of wisdom, the royal author of the Proverbs, who, speaking of the precepts of religion, says, They shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck: and of religion, under the name of wisdom, If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hidden treasure. Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding. For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom, and with all thy getting, get understanding. Prov. i. 9; ii. 4; xiii. 14; iv. 7.

* Οὐκ εἶναι ἡδέως ἦν ἀνέν τῆς ἀρετῆς.

And it is, indeed, very plain, that if it were possible entirely to dissolve all the bonds and ties of religion, yet that it should be so, would certainly be the interest of none but the worst and most abandoned part of mankind. All the good and wise, if the matter was freely left to their choice, would rather have the world governed by the Supreme and most perfect Being, mankind subjected to his just and righteous laws, and all the affairs of men superintended by his watchful providence, than that it should be otherwise. Nor do they believe the doctrines of religion with aversion or any sort of reluctance, but embrace them with pleasure, and are excessively glad to find them true. So that, if it was possible to abolish them entirely, and any person, out of mere good will to them, should attempt to do it, they would look upon the favor as highly prejudicial to their interest, and think his good will more hurtful than the keenest hatred. Nor would any one in his wits choose to live in the world, at large, and without any sort of government, more than he would think it eligible to be put on board a ship without a helm or pilot, and in this condition to be tossed amid rocks and quicksands. On the other hand, can anything give greater consolation, or more substantial joy,* than to be firmly persuaded, not only that there is an infinitely good and wise Being, but also that this being preserves and continually governs the universe which himself has framed, and holds the reins of all things in his powerful hand; that he is our Father, that we and all our interests are his constant concern; and that after we have sojourned a short while here below, we shall be again taken into his immediate presence? Or can this wretched life be attended with any sort of satisfaction, if it is divested of this Divine faith, and bereaved of such a blessed hope?

Moreover, every one who thinks a generous fortitude and purity of mind preferable to the charms and muddy pleasures of the flesh, finds all the precepts of religion not only not grievous, but exceeding pleasant and extremely delightful. So that, upon the whole, the saying of Hermes is very consistent with the nature of things: "There is one, and but one good thing among men, and that is religion."† Even the vulgar could not bear the degenerate expression of the player, who called out upon the stage, "Money is the chief good among mankind."‡ But should any one say, "Religion is the principal good of mankind," no objection could be made against it; for, without doubt, it is the only object the beauties whereof engage the love both of God and man.

But the principal things in religion, as I

* Φεῖ τι τοῦτων χάριμα μείζον ἢ λαβοῖς.

† Ἐν καὶ μόνον, ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀγαθὸν ἢ εὐσεβεία.

‡ Pecunia magnum generis humani bonum.

have frequently observed, are just conceptions of God. Now, concerning this Infinite Being, some things are known by the light of nature and reason, others only by the revelation which he hath been pleased to make of himself from heaven. That there is a God, is the distinct voice of every man, and of everything without him. How much more, then, shall we be confirmed in the belief of this truth, if we attentively view the whole creation, and the wonderful order and harmony that subsist between all the parts of the whole system! It is quite unnecessary to show that so great a fabric could never have been brought into being without an all-wise and powerful Creator; nor could it now subsist without the same Almighty Being to support and preserve it. "Let men, therefore, make this their constant study," says Lactantius, "even to know their common Parent and Lord, whose power can never be perfectly known, whose greatness can not be fathomed, nor his eternity comprehended."* When the mind of man, with its faculties, comes to be once intensely fixed upon him, all other objects disappearing, and being, as it were, removed quite out of sight, it is entirely at a stand and overpowered, nor can it possibly proceed further. But concerning the doctrine of this vast volume of the works of God, and that still brighter light which shines forth in the Scriptures, we shall speak more fully hereafter.

LECTURE X.

THE DECREES OF GOD.

As the glory and brightness of the Divine Majesty is so great, that the strongest human eye can not bear the direct rays of it, he has exhibited himself to be viewed in the glass of those works which he created first, and, by his unwearied hand, continually supports and governs. Nor are we allowed to view his eternal counsels and purposes through any other medium than this. So that, in our catechisms, especially the shorter one, designed for the instruction of the ignorant, it might, perhaps, have been full as proper to have passed over the awful speculation concerning the Divine decrees, and to have proceeded directly to the consideration of the works of God; but the thoughts you find in it, on this subject, are few, sober, clear, and certain; and in explaining them, I think it most reasonable and most safe to confine ourselves within these limits, in any audience whatever, but especially in this congregation, consisting of youths, not to say, in a great measure, of boys. Seeing, therefore, the decrees of God are mentioned in our catechism, and it would not be proper to pass over in silence a matter of so great moment, I shall accordingly lay before you some few thoughts upon this arduous subject.

* Ut Parentum suum, Dominumque cognoscant: cujus nec virtus æstimari potest, nec magnitudo percipi, nec eternitas comprehendi.

And here, if anywhere, we ought, according to the common saying, to reason but in few words. I should, indeed, think it very improper to do otherwise; for such theories ought to be cautiously touched, rather than be spun out to a great length. One thing we may confidently assert, that all those things which the great Creator produces in different periods of time, were perfectly known to him, and, as it were, present with him, from eternity; and that everything that happens, throughout the several ages of the world, proceeds in the same order and same precise manner as the Eternal Mind at first intended it should; that none of his counsels can be disappointed or rendered ineffectual, or in the least changed or altered by any event whatsoever. Known to God are all his works, says the apostle in the council of Jerusalem. Acts xv. 18. And the son of Sirach, God sees from everlasting to everlasting, and nothing is wonderful in his sight. Nothing is new or unexpected to him; nothing can come to pass that he has not foreseen. And his first thoughts are so wise, that they admit no second ones that can be supposed wiser. And this stability and immutability of the Divine decrees, is asserted even by the Roman philosopher: "It is necessary," says he, "that the same things be always pleasing to him, who can never be pleased but with what is best."*

Every artist, to be sure, as you also well know, works according to some pattern, which is the immediate object of his mind; and this pattern, in the all-wise Creator, must necessarily be entirely perfect, and every way complete. And if this is what Plato intended by his ideas (which, not a few, and these by no means unlearned, think very likely), his own scholar, the great Stagyrice, and your favorite philosopher, had, surely, no reason so often and so bitterly to inveigh against them. Be this as it may, all who acknowledge God to be the author of this wonderful fabric, and all these things in it, which succeed one another in their turns, can not possibly doubt that he has brought, and continues to bring them all about, according to that most perfect pattern subsisting in his eternal councils; and that these things that we call casual, are all unalterably fixed and determined to him. For according to that of the philosopher, "Where there is most wisdom, there is least chance,"† and therefore, surely, where there is infinite wisdom, there is nothing left to chance at all.

This maxim, concerning the eternal counsels of the supreme Sovereign of the world, besides that it everywhere shines clearly in the books of the sacred Scriptures, is also, in itself, so evident and consistent with reason, that we meet with it in almost all the works of the philosophers, and often, also, in those of the poets. Nor does it appear, that they mean anything else, at least, for the most part, by the term fate; though you may meet with some things in their works, which, I own, sound a little harsh, and can scarcely be sufficiently softened by any, even the most favorable interpretation.

* Necessè est illi eadem semper placere, cui nisi optima placere non possunt.

† Ubi plus est sapientiæ, ibi minus est casus

But, whatever else may seem to be comprehended under the term fate, whether taken in the mathematical or physical sense, as some are pleased to distinguish, it must at last of necessity be resolved into the appointment and good pleasure of the supreme Governor of the world. If even the blundering astrologers and fortune-tellers acknowledge, that the wise man has dominion over the stars; how much more evident is it, that all these things, and all their power and influence, are subject and subservient to the decrees of the all-wise God! Whence the saying of the Hebrews, "There is no planet to Israel."*

And according as all these things in the heavens above and the earth beneath, are daily regulated and directed by the Eternal King, in the same precise manner were they all from eternity ordered and disposed by him, who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will, Eph. i. 11, who is more ancient than the sea and the mountains, or even the heavens themselves.

These things we are warranted, and it is safe, to believe. But what perverseness, or rather madness, is it, to endeavor to break into the sacred repositories of heaven, and pretend to accommodate those secrets of the Divine kingdom to the measures and methods of our weak capacities! To say the truth, I acknowledge that I am astonished and greatly at a loss, when I hear learned men, and professors of theology, talking presumptuously about the order of the Divine decrees, and when I read such things in their works. "Paul," says St. Chrysostom, "considering this awful subject as an immense sea, was astonished at it, and viewing the vast abyss, started back, and cried out with a loud voice, Oh! the depth!" † Nor is there much more sobriety or moderation in the many notions that are entertained, and the disputes that are commonly raised, about reconciling these Divine decrees with the liberty and free-will of man.

It is indeed true, that neither religion nor right reason will suffer the actions and designs of men, and consequently, even the very motions of the will, to be exempted from the empire of the counsel and good pleasure of God. Even the books of the heathens are filled with most express testimonies of the most absolute sovereignty of God, even with regard to these. The sentiments of Homer are well known;* and with him agrees the tragic poet, Euripides; "O! Jupiter," says he, "why are we wretched mortals called wise? For we depend entirely upon thee, and we do whatever thou intendest we should." ‡

And it would be easy to bring together a vast collection of such sayings, but these are sufficient for our present purpose.

They always seem to me to act a very ridiculous part, who contend, that the effect of the Divine decrees is absolutely irreconcilable with human liberty, because the natural and necessary liberty of a rational creature is, to act or choose from a rational motive, or spontaneously, and of purpose. But who sees not, that, on the supposition of the most absolute decree, this liberty is not taken away, but rather established and confirmed? For the decree is, that such a one shall make choice of, or do some particular thing, freely; and whoever pretends to deny, that whatever is done or chosen, whether good or indifferent, is so done or chosen, or, at least, may be so, espouses an absurdity. But, in a word, the great difficulty in all this dispute, is that with regard to the origin of evil. Some distinguish, and justly, the substance of the action, as you call it, or that which is physical in the action, from the morality of it. This is of some weight, but whether it takes away the whole difficulty, I will not pretend to say. Believe me, young gentleman, it is an abyss; it is an abyss never to be perfectly sounded by any plummet of human understanding. Should any one say, "I am not to be blamed, but Jove and fate," † he will not get off so, but may be nonplused by turning his own wit against him. The servant of Zeno, the stoic philosopher, being caught in an act of theft, either with a design to ridicule his master's doctrine, or to avail himself of it in order to evade punishment, said, "It was my fate to be a thief." "And to be punished for it," said Zeno. || Wherefore, if you will take my advice, withdraw your minds from a curious search into this mystery, and turn them directly to the study of piety, and a due reverence to the awful majesty of God. Think and speak of God and his secrets with fear and trembling, but dispute very little about them; and, if you would not undo yourselves, beware of disputing with him. If you transgress in anything, blame yourselves: if you do any good, or repent of evil, offer thanksgiving to God. This is what I

* Τοῖος γὰρ νος ἐστίν, &c. CHRYS.

† Ὡ Ζεῦτι δὴ· τὰ τοῦ ταλαίφρουτος, Φρονεῖν λέγουσι, σου γὰρ ἐξήρηθημα, Δρίωμεν, τε τοιαῦτ', ἀν σὺ τογχανῆς θέλων. ΙΚΕΤ, 1, 734.

‡ Ὅτι ἐγὼ αἰτίος ἐμῆ, ἀλλὰ ζεὺς καὶ μοῖρα.

|| In fatis mihi, inquit, fuit furari. Et cædi, inquit Zeno.

* Non est planetam Israeli.

† Ὁ Πάυλος ἄσπερ πρὸς πέλαγος ἄπειρον ἰλιγγιάτας καὶ βάθος ἴδων ἀχανές, ἀπεπήδησεν ἐνθῶς καὶ μεγάλα ἀνεβόησεν, εἰπων, ὦ βάθος, &c.

earnestly recommend to you; in this I acquiesce myself; and to this, when much tossed and distressed with doubt and difficulties, I had recourse, as to a safe harbor. If any of you think proper, he may apply to men of greater learning; but let him take care he meet not with such as have more forwardness and presumption.

LECTURE XI.

THE CREATION OF THE WORLD.

WHOEVER looks upon this great system of the universe, of which he himself is but a very small part, with a little more than ordinary attention, unless his mind is become quite brutish within him, it will, of necessity, put him upon considering whence this beautiful frame of things proceeded, and what was its first original; or, in the words of the poet, "From what principles all the elements were formed, and how the various parts of the world at first came together."*

Now, as we have already observed in our dissertation concerning God, that the mind rises directly from the consideration of this visible world, to that of its invisible Creator: so, from the contemplation of the first and Infinite Mind, it descends to this visible fabric; and again, the contemplation of this latter determines it to return, with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction, to that eternal Fountain of goodness, and of everything that exists. Nor is this a vicious and faulty circle, but the constant course of a pious soul, travelling, as it were, backward and forward from earth to heaven, and from heaven to earth: a notion quite similar to that of the angels ascending and descending upon the ladder which Jacob saw in his vision. But this contemplation by all means requires a pure and divine temper of mind, according to the maxims of the philosopher: "He that would see God and goodness, must first be himself good, and like the Deity."† And those who have the eyes of their mind pure and bright, will sooner be able to read in those objects that are exposed to the outward eye, the great and evident characters of his eternal power and Godhead.

We shall, therefore, now advance some thoughts upon the creation, which was the first and most stupendous of all the Divine works; and the rather, that some of the philosophers, who were, to be sure, positive in asserting the being of a God, did not acknowledge him to be the Author or Creator of the world. As for us, according to that of the epistle to the Hebrews, ch. xi. 3, By faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God. Of this we have a distinct history in the first book of Moses and of the sacred Scriptures, which we receive as divine. And this same doctrine, the prophets and apostles, and, together with them, all the sacred writers, frequently repeat in their sermons and writings, as the great foundation of faith, and of all true religion. For which reason, it ought to be diligently inculcated upon the minds of all, even those of the most ignorant, as far as they are able to conceive and believe it; though, to be sure, it contains in it so many mysteries, that they are sufficient not only to exercise the most acute and learned understandings, but even far to exceed their capacities, and quite overpower them: which the Jewish doctors seem to have been so sensible, or, if I may use the expression, so over sensible, of, that they admitted not their disciples to look into the first three chapters of Genesis, till they arrived at the age required for entering on the priestly office.

Although the faith of this doctrine immediately depends upon the authority and testimony of the Supreme God of truth—for, as St. Ambrose expresses it, "To whom should I give greater credit concerning God than to God himself?"*—it is, however, so agreeable to reason, that if any one choose to enter into the dispute, he will find the strongest arguments presenting themselves in confirmation of the faith of it, but those on the opposite side, if any such there be that deserve the name, quite frivolous, and of no manner of force. Tatian declared, that no argument more effectually determined him to believe the Scriptures, and embrace the Christian faith, than "the consistent, intelligible account they gave of the creation of the universe."†

Let any one that pleases, choose what other opinion he will adopt upon this subject, or, as it is a matter of doubt and obscurity, any of the other hypotheses he thinks most feasible. Is he for the atoms of Epicurus, dancing at random in an empty space, and, after innumerable trials, throwing themselves at last into the beautiful fabric which we behold, and that merely by a kind of lucky hit, or fortunate throw of the dice, without any Amphion with his harp, to charm them by his music, and lead them into the building? To say the truth, the Greek philosopher had dreamed these things very prettily, or, according to more probable accounts, borrowed them from two other blundering philosophers, Democritus and Leucippus, though he used all possible art to conceal it, that he might have to himself the whole glory of this noble invention. But whoever first invented or published this hypothesis, how, pray, will he persuade us that things are actually so? By what convincing arguments will he prove them? Or what credi-

* Omnia, et ipse tener mundi concreverit orbis.—
VIR., Ecl. vi.

† Γενίσθω δε πρώτων βροσιδής πᾶς καὶ καλὸς εἰ μέλλει θεατασθαι θεῶν τε καὶ καλόν. PLOT.

* Cui enim magis de Deo, quam Deo credam?—AM-BROSE.

† Ἐκ καταλήπτον τῆς τοῦ παντός ποιούσεως. TATIAN.

ble witnesses will he produce to attest his facts? For it would neither be modest nor decent for him nor his followers, to expect implicit faith in a matter truly philosophical and physical, and at the same time of so great importance; especially as it is their common method, smartly to ridicule and superciliously to despise the rest of mankind, as being, according to their opinion, too credulous in matters of religion. But what we have now said is more than enough upon an hypothesis so silly, monstrous, and inconsistent.

After leaving the Epicureans, there is no other noted shift that I know of, remaining for one that rejects the doctrine of creation, but only that fiction of the peripatetic school, concerning the eternity of the world. This Aristotle is said to have borrowed from a Pythagorean philosopher, named Ocellus Lucanus, who, in that instance, seems to have deserted not only the doctrine of his master, Pythagoras, but also that of all the more ancient philosophers. It is true, two or three others are named, Parmenio, Melissus, &c., who are suspected to have been of the same sentiments with Ocellus; but this is a matter of uncertainty, and therefore to be left undetermined. And, indeed, both Aristotle and Ocellus seem to have done this at random, or without proof, as they have advanced no arguments in favor of their new doctrine, that can be thought very favorable, much less cogent and convincing.

It is surely impossible to demonstrate the truth of their opinion à priori; nor did these authors attempt it. They only endeavored to muster up some difficulties against the production of the world in time, the great weakness whereof, any one who is but tolerably acquainted with the Christian religion, will easily perceive. Aristotle's arguments rather make against some notions espoused by the old philosophers, or rather forged by himself, than against the doctrine of the creation. Nay, he himself sometimes speaks with great diffidence of his own opinion on this subject, particularly in his topics, where, among other logical problems, he proposes this as one, viz., "Whether the world existed from eternity or not."^{*}

On the contrary, that the world has evident marks of novelty, is acknowledged by Lucretius in a remarkable passage of his poems, which is very well known. "Besides," says he, "if the earth and the heavens were not originally created, but existed from eternity, why did not earlier poets describe the remarkable actions of their times long before the Theban war and the destruction of Troy? But, in my opinion, the universe is not of old standing, the world is but of late establishment, and it is not long since it had its beginning." And more to that purpose.† But,

^{*} Πότερον ὁ κόσμος αἰδιος, ἢ οὐ.

† Præterea si nulla fuit genitælis origo

Terræ et Cæli, semperque æterna fuere, besides this, if we duly consider the matter, and acknowledge the course of the stars not only to be owing to a first mover, but also, that the whole fabric, with all the creatures therein, derive their existence from some Supreme Mind, who is the only Fountain of Being; we must certainly conclude, that that self-existing Principle, or Source of all beings, is by all means eternal, but there is no necessity at all that we should suppose all other things to be coeval with it: nay, if it is not absolutely necessary, it is at least highly reasonable and consistent, to believe the contrary.

For, that this world, compounded of so many and such heterogeneous parts, should proceed, by way of natural and necessary emanation, from that One First, purest, and most simple Nature, nobody, I imagine, could believe, or in the least suspect. Can it possibly be thought that mortality should proceed from the Immortal, corruption from the incorruptible, and, what ought never to be so much as mentioned, even worms, the vilest animalcules, and most abject insects, from the best, most exalted, and most blessed Majesty? But, if he produced all these things freely, merely out of his good pleasure, and with the facility that constantly attends almighty power, how much more consistent is it to believe, that this was done in time, than to imagine it was from eternity!

It is a very difficult matter to argue at all about that, the nature whereof our most enlarged thoughts can never comprehend. And though, among philosophers and divines, it is disputed whether such a production from eternity is possible or not, there is probably something concealed in the nature of the thing, though unknown to us, that might suggest a demonstration of the impossibility of this conceit. For, what is finite in bulk, power, and every other respect, seems scarcely capable of this infinity of duration; and divines generally place eternity among the incommunicable attributes of God, as they are called. It seems, to be sure, most agreeable to reason, and, for aught we know, it is absolutely necessary, that in all external productions by a free agent, the cause should be, even in time, prior to the effect: that is, that that there must have been some point of time wherein the being producing did, but the thing produced did not, exist. As to the eternal generation in which we believe, it is within God himself, nor does it constitute anything without him, or different from his nature and essence. Moreover, the external production of a created being, of a nature vastly different from the agent that is supposed to produce it, and to act freely in that production, implies, in its formal conception

Cur supra bellum Thebanum et funera Trojæ,
Non alias aliâ quoque res cecinere Poetæ, Verum, ât opinor, habet novitatem somma, recensque
Natura est mundi, neque pridem exordia cepit.

(as the schools express it), a translation from nonentity into being; whence it seems necessarily to follow, that there must have been some point of time, wherein that created being did not exist.

The notions of the Platonists concerning pre-existent matter, do not concern the present subject; but, to be sure, they are as idle and empty as the imaginary eternity of the world in its present form. As angels were not produced out of matter, it is surely surprising, that those who assert their creation by God, should find difficulty in acknowledging the production of other things without pre-existent matter, or even of matter itself. The celebrated maxim of the philosophers, that out of nothing, nothing is produced, we receive, but in a different and sounder sense, viz., that nothing can be produced but either from pre-existent matter, or by a productive power in which it was virtually contained. And, in this sense, this famous maxim affords an invincible demonstration à posteriori (for the subject is not capable of any other), to prove that there must be some being that existed before any creature, and the unity and eternity of that being.

The great Creator of the world, having all things virtually in himself, needed neither matter nor instruments in order to produce them. By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. Psalm xxxiii. 6. These were his levers and tools, the word of the Lord, or that effectual act of his will which gave being to all things. "The mighty Lord of all, called directly to his holy, intelligent, and creating word, Let there be a sun, and a sun immediately appeared."* Here, he spoke, and it was done. "The word and the effect showed themselves together."† If you ask what moved infinite Goodness to perform this great work; I answer, that very Goodness you mention. For if, as they say, it is the nature of goodness to be always communicative, that Goodness, to be sure, must be the most diffusive, which is in itself greatest, richest, and so very immense, that it can not be in the least diminished, much less exhausted, by the greatest munificence. Here, there is no danger that that should happen, which Cicero prudently cautions against, in the case of human goodness, viz., "That liberality should undo itself."‡ For that liberality must be immortal and endless, the treasures whereof are infinite.

Nor is it to be doubted, but from this very goodness, together with the immense power and wisdom which shine forth so brightly in the creation and all the creatures, an immense weight of glory is reflected upon the Creator himself, and the source of all these perfec-tions. Nor must it be denied that the manifold wisdom of God proposed this end likewise. And there is nothing more certain than that, from all these taken together, his works, his benevolent and diffusive goodness, his power and wisdom illustrated in the creation, and the glory that continually results therefrom, from his wise counsels, and his own most perfect nature, whence all these things flow: nothing is more certain, I say, than that, from all these taken together, the Divine Majesty enjoys an eternal and inexpressible delight and satisfaction. And thus all things return to that vast and immense Ocean, whence they at first took their rise, according to the expression in the Proverbs, He hath made all things for himself. Proverbs xvi. 4. And the words of the song in the Revelations are most express to this purpose: Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power, for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and were created. Rev. iv. 11. Nor could it, indeed, be otherwise, than that he who is the Beginning of all things, should also be the End of all; a wonderful Beginning without a beginning, and an End without an end. So that, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews reasons concerning the oath of God, As he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself; in like manner we may argue here, as he could propose no greater end or design, he proposed himself. It was the saying of Epicurus, that "the wise man does everything for his own sake:"* we, who are otherwise taught, should rather say, that the wise man does nothing for his own sake, but all for that of God. But the most exalted, to be sure, and the wisest of all beings, because he is so, must of necessity do all things for himself; yet, at the same time, all his dispensations toward his creatures are most bountiful and benevolent.

That the world was made directly and immediately for man, is the doctrine, not only of the stoics, but also of the master of the peripatetic school: "We are," says he, "in some respect, the end of all things."† And in another place, "Nature has made all these things for the sake of man."‡ Cicero speaks to the same purpose; § and Lactantius more fully than either.¶ But Moses gives the greatest light on this subject, not only in his history of the creation, but also in Deuteronomy, wherein he warns the Israelites against the worshipping of angels, for this reason: because, says he, they were created for the service of man. And the sun, in Hebrew, is called Shemesh, which signifies a servant.

But O! whither do our hearts stray?—Ought we not to dwell upon this pleasant

* Sapientem omnia facere sui causa.

† Sumus enim et nos quadammodo omnium finis. 2 Phys., tit. 23.

‡ Natura hominum gratia omnia fecit.

§ De Legibus.

¶ Sol irrequietis cursibus et spatiis inaequalibus orbis conficit, &c., ad finem capitis, De ira Deo. Cap. 13, 14.

* Ὁ δὲ παντῶν κύριος ἐνθίως οὐφύεισε τῷ ἑαυτοῦ ἀγγέλω καὶ νοσητῶ καὶ δημιουργικῶ λογῶσατω ἔλιο; καὶ ἅμα τῷ φά- ναι, &c.

† Ἄμα ἔπος, ἅμα ἔργον.

‡ Ne liberalitate pereat liberalitas.

contemplation, and even die in it? I should choose to be quite lost in it, and to be rendered altogether insensible, and, as it were, dead to these earthly trifles that make a noise around us. O sweet reciprocation of mutual delights! The Lord shall rejoice in his works, says the psalmist; and presently after, My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord. Psalm civ. 31-34. Let us look sometimes to the heavens, sometimes to the sea and the earth, with the animals and plants that are therein, and very often to ourselves: and in all these, and in everything else, but in ourselves particularly, let us contemplate God, the common Father of all, and our most exalted Creator, and let our contemplation excite our love.

They who have sent the ignorant and unlearned to pictures and images, as books proper for their instruction, have not acted very wisely; nor has that expedient turned out happily or luckily for the advantage of that part of mankind. But surely, this great volume, or system, which is always open and exposed to the view of all, is admirably adapted to the instruction both of the vulgar and the wise; so that Chrysostom had good reason to call it "The great book for the learned and unlearned."* And the saying of St. Basil is very much to the purpose: "From the beauty of those things which are obvious to the eyes of all, we acknowledge that his inexpressible beauty excels that of all the creatures; and from the magnitude of those sensible bodies that surround us, we conclude the infinite and immense goodness of their Creator, whose plenitude of power exceeds all thought, as well as expression."†

For this very end, it evidently appears that all things were made, and we are the only visible beings that are capable of this contemplation. "The world," says St. Basil, "is a school, or seminary, very proper for the instruction of rational souls in the knowledge of God."‡ We have also the angels, those ministers of fire, to be spectators with us on this theatre. But will any of us venture to conjecture what they felt, and what admiration seized them, when they beheld those new kinds of creatures rising into being, and those unexpected scenes that were successively added to the preceding ones, on each of the six days of that first remarkable week, when he laid the foundations of the earth, and placed the corner stone thereof; when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Job. xxxviii. 6, 7.

But O, the stupidity of mankind! All those stupendous objects are daily around us; but, because they are constantly exposed to our view, they never affect our minds: so natural is it for us to admire new, rather than grand objects. Therefore, the vast multitude of stars which diversify the beauty of this immense body, does not call the people together; but when any change happens therein, the eyes of all are fixed upon the heavens. "Nobody looks at the sun, but when he is obscured; nobody observes the moon, but when she is eclipsed; then nature seems to be in danger; then vain superstition is alarmed, and every one is afraid for himself."*—"But surely," says St. Bernard, concerning the sun and moon, "these are great miracles, very great, to be sure; but the first production or creation of all things, is a vast miracle, and makes it easy to believe all the rest; so that, after it, nothing ought to excite our wonder."†

* Βιβλίον μέγιστον καὶ ἰδιώταις καὶ σοφοῖς.

† Ἐκ τῶν κάλλους τῶν ὁραμένων τον ὑπέρκalon ἐνώμεθα καὶ ἐκ τοῦ μεγέθους τῶν αἰσθητων τουτων καὶ περιγασθητων σωμάτων ἀναλογιζόμεθα ἄπειρον καὶ ὑπερμεγέθη καὶ πᾶσαν διάνοιαν ἐν τοῦ πλήθους τῆς ἐαυτου ὀυλαμεως ὑπερβαίνοντα.—ALEX. hom. i.

‡ Ὁ κόσμος ψυχῶν λογικῶν διδασκαλεῖον καὶ τῆς θεογνωσις παιδείνησι.—ALEX. hom. i.

LECTURE XII.

THE CREATION OF MAN.

THIS great theatre being built, beside those spectators who had been but lately placed in the higher seats, it pleased the supreme Creator and Lord to have another company below, as it were, in the area: these he called forth into being by creation, and a man was introduced into this area, to be a spectator of him and of his works, yet not a spectator only, but also to be the interpreter of them.‡ Nor yet was man placed therein merely to be a spectator and an interpreter; but also, in a great measure, to be possessor and lord thereof; or, as it were, the Creator's "substitute,"§ in a spacious and convenient house, ready-built, and stored with all sorts of useful furniture.

Now, that man himself is a grand and noble piece of workmanship, appears even from this circumstance, that the most wise Operator, when he was going to create him, thought fit to preface his design with these words, Let us make man. So that he was created not merely by a word of command, like the rest of the creatures, but "by a consultation of the blessed Trinity."§

And, indeed, man is a wonderful composition, the conjunction of heaven and earth;

* Sol spectatorem, nisi cum deficit, non habet; neque observat lunam nisi laborantem; tunc orbis exclamant, tunc pro se quisque superstitione vana trepidat.—SENECA.

† Magna sunt hæc miracula, magna nimis ita est; miraculum autem immensum est ipsa prima omnium productio, seu creatio, quæ miraculorem omnium adeo facilem fidem, facit, ut post eam nihil sit mirum.

‡ Ὡς θεατῆρ τε αὐτοῦ καὶ τῶν αὐτοῦ ἔρλων καὶ οὐ μόνον θεατῆρ ἀγαθὰ καὶ ἐξηγήτην.—ARRIAN.

§ Ὑποκατάστατον.

§ Faciamus hominem. Ut non solo jubentis sermone sicut reliquia, sed consilio sanctæ Trinitatis conditus sit.—ARNOB.

“the breath of God, and the dust of the ground;” the bond of union between the visible and the invisible world, and truly a “world in miniature, a kind of mixed world, nearly related to the other two.”* Nor is he only a lively epitome and representation of the greater world, but also dignified with the image of his great Creator. He made the heavens and the earth, the sea and the stars, and then all sorts of living creatures; but, in the words of the poet, “A more divine creature, and more capable of elevated sentiments, was yet wanting, and one that could rule over the rest; therefore man was born.”†

The rest of the creatures, according to the observation of the schoolmen, which is not amiss, had the impression of the Divine foot stamped upon them, but not the image of the Deity. These he created, and reviewing them, found them to be good, yet he did not rest in them; but upon the creation of man, the sabbath immediately followed. He made man, and then rested, having a creature capable of knowing that he was his Creator, one that could worship him, and celebrate his sabbath, whose sins, if he should commit any, he might forgive, and send, clothed with human nature, his only begotten Son, in whom he is absolutely well pleased, and over whom, as the person who fulfilled his good pleasure, he rejoices for ever, to redeem his favorite creature. By the production of man, the supreme Creator exhibited himself in the most admirable light, and at the same time, had a creature capable of admiring and loving him: and, as St. Ambrose observes, “One that was under obligation to love his Creator the more ardently, the more wonderfully he perceived himself to be made.”‡—“And man,” says the same author, “was made a two-footed animal, that he might be, as it were, one of the inhabitants of the air, that he might aspire at high things, and fly with the wings of sublime thoughts.”||

And, indeed, the structure of man is an instance of wonderful art and ingenuity, whether you consider the symmetry of his whole fabric taken together, or all his parts and members separately. Gregory Nyssen speaks very much to the purpose, when he says, “The frame of man is awful and hard to be explained, and contains in it a lively representation of many of the hidden mysteries of God.”§ How wonderful is even the structure of his body! which, after all, is but the

* Μικροκόσμος, μικτός τις κόσμος, συγγνήης τῶν δύο κόσμων.—GREG. NYSS.

† Sanctius his animal, mentisque; capacius alte. Deerat ad huc, et quod dominari in cætera posset, Natus homo est.—OVID. 1 Met.

‡ Et quidem tanto ardentius amaret conditorem, quanto mirabilius se ab eo conditum intelligeret.

|| Et factus est homo bipes, ut sit unus quasi de volatilibus, qui alta visu petat, et quodam remigio volitet sublimem cogitationum.

§ Ἡ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου κατασκευὴ φοβερά τις καὶ δυσερμήνευτος καὶ πολλὰ καὶ ἀπόκρυφα ἐν αὐτῇ μυστήρια θεοῦ ἐξικάλυψαι.

earthen case of his soul; accordingly, it is in the Chaldaic language called Nidne, which signifies a sheath. How far does the workmanship exceed the materials! And how justly may we say, “What a glorious creature out of the meanest elements!” The psalmist’s mind seems to have dwelt upon this meditation till he was quite lost in it: How fearfully, says he, and wonderfully am I made! Psalm cxxxix. 14. And that celebrated physician who studied nature with such unwearied application, in his book upon the structure of the human body, in which, after all, there is nothing divine, often expresses his admiration in these words, “Who is worthy to praise the wisdom and power of the Creator!”* and many other such exclamations. The Christian writers, however, are most full upon this subject, particularly St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and others, who carry their observations so far as the nails and the hair, especially that on the eyelids. And Nyssen, on the words, Let us make man, has the following observation: “Man is a grand and noble creature. How can man be said to be any great matter, seeing he is a mortal creature, subject to a great many passions; from the time of his birth, to that of his old age, exposed to a vast many evils and distresses; and of whom it is written, Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst be mindful of him?”

“The history we have of the production of man, delivered me from this difficulty; for we are told that God took some of the dust of the earth, and out of it formed man: from these words I understood, that man was at once nothing, and yet something very grand.”† He intended to say, that the materials out of which man was made were low, and as it were, nothing; but, if you consider the wonderful workmanship, how great was the honor conferred upon him! “The earth did not spontaneously produce man, as it did grasshoppers. God did not commit the production of this or that particular creature to his ministering powers; no, the gracious Creator took the earth in his own hand.”‡ But besides the noble frame of his body, though it was made of the dust of the earth, that Divine breath, and, by means of it, the infusion of a precious soul, mixes heaven and earth together; not indeed in the common acceptation of that term, as if things so vastly different were promiscuously jumbled together, and the order of nature subverted; but only implying that the two parts of the human constitution are compounded with inexpressible art, and joined in a close union. As to the misery of the human race, and the contemptible figure in which the life of man appears, it is to be ascribed to another source, very different from the earthly materials out of which his body was made. That he was created happy, beautiful, and honorable, he owed to his great and good Creator; but he himself is the author of his own misery. And hence it is, that though, with regard to his original and pure nature, we ought, for the strongest reasons, to speak more honorably of him than of any other part of the visible world; yet, if we view him in his present circumstances, no part of the creation, to be sure, deserves to be lamented in more mournful strains.

* Τίς ἴκανος εἰς τὴν δημιουργοῦ σοφίαντὴ καὶ δύναμιν εἰπαίνειν.

† Μέγα ἄνθρωπος καὶ τιμίον. Ἀλλὰ πῶς μετὰ ἄνθρωπος; πῶς ἐπικρον ζῶον τὸ μυρίαις πάθειν ὑποκειμενον, το ἐκγίνετῆς ἐἰς γῆρας μυρίων κακῶν ἐσθὸν ἐξαιτῶλον Περὶ οὗ εἰρηται. Κύριε τίς ἐστὶν ὁ ἄνθρωπος, ὅτι μνησθήσεται αὐτοῦ; &c. ἔλλα μοι τὴν τοιάυτην διαπόθησαν ἔλυσαν ἰστοροῖα τῆς γεννήσεων του ἀνθρώπου ἀναγνωσθεῖσα, &c. Orat. ii.

‡ Οὐκ ἡ γῆ αὐτομάτως ὕπερ, τοὺς τέττιγας ἐξέβασι, ἀλλ’ οὐκ εἶπε τῶδε καὶ τῶδε ποιῆσαι λειτουργίαις δυνάμεσιν, ἀλλ’ ἰδιὰ χειρὶ φιλοτεχνεῖ γῆν ἔλαβεν.

But what words can express, what thoughts can comprehend, the dignity and powers of that heavenly soul that inhabits this earthly body, and the Divine image that is stamped upon it? The philosophers of all ages and nations have been inquiring into the nature of it, and have not yet found it out.

A great many have also amused themselves with too whimsical conjectures and fancies, and have endeavored to discover, by very different methods, a figure of the blessed Trinity in the faculties of the soul. Nor was Methodius satisfied with finding a representation of this mystery in the soul of every particular man, but also imagined he had discovered it in the first three persons of the human race, viz. Adam, Eve, and their first-born son; because in them he found unbegotten, begotten, and proceeding, as also unity of nature, and the origination of all mankind. But not to insist upon these, it is certain the rational, or intellectual, and immortal soul, so long as it retained its original purity, was adorned with the lively and refulgent image of the Father of Spirits, its eternal Creator: but afterward, when it became polluted and stained with sin, this image, though not immediately quite ruined, was, however, miserably obscured and defaced. It is true, the beautiful and erect frame of the human body, which gives it an advantage over all other creatures, and some other external graces that man possesses, may possibly be some reflected rays of the Divine excellence; but I should hardly call them the image of God. As St. Ambrose well observes, "How can flesh, which is but earth, be said to be made after the image of God, in whom there is no earth at all? And shall we be said to be like God, because we are of a higher rank than sheep and does?"*

The dominion over the rest of the creatures which man enjoys, is a kind of faint shadow of the absolute and unlimited sway of the supreme Majesty of heaven and earth. I dare not, however, venture to say, it is that image of which we are speaking; but, as those who draw the picture of a king, after laying down the lineaments of the face and body, use to add the purple robe and other ensigns of royalty, this dominion may certainly supply the place of these, with regard to this image of God on man. But the lively colors in which the image itself is drawn, are, says Nysseus, "purity, absence of evil, understanding, and speech."* For even the eternal Son and the wisdom of the Father, seem to be intended by the philosophers under the term of The Creating Mind † and by the divine apostle, John, he is called The Word. To these we have very good ground to add, charity, as nothing can be named that renders man liker to God; ‡ for "God is love, and the fountain of it."|| It is true, charity is a valuable disposition of the mind, but it also discovers itself in the frame of the human body; for man was made quite defenceless, having neither horns, claws, nor sting, but naked and harmless, and, as it were, entirely formed for meekness, peace, and charity.

* Caro terra est qui dicatur ad imaginem Dei facta, cum in Deo terra non sit? et an eo Dei similes dicimur, quia damulit atque ovisbus celoioribus sumus?

The same author, speaking of the image of God on man, expresses himself as follows: "Wherefore, that you may be like God, exercise liberality and beneficence, study to be innocent, avoid every crime, subdue all the motions of sin—conquer all the beasts that are within you. What, you will say, have I beasts within me? Yes, you have beasts, and a vast number of them. And that you may not think I intend to insult you, is anger an inconsiderable beast, when it barks in your heart? What is deceit, when it lies hid in a cunning mind; is it not a fox? Is not the man who is furiously bent upon calumny, a scorpion? Is not the person who is eagerly set on resentment and revenge, a most venomous viper? What do you say of a covetous man; is he not a ravenous wolf? And is not the luxurious man, as the prophet expresseth it, a neighing horse? Nay, there is no wild beast but is found within us. And do you consider yourself as lord and prince of the wild beasts, because you command those that are without, though you never think of subduing or setting bounds to those that are within you? What advantage have you by your reason, which enables you to overcome lions, if, after all, you yourself are overcome by anger? To what purpose do you rule over the birds, and catch them with gins, if you yourself, with the inconsistency of a bird, are hurried hither and thither, and sometimes flying high, are ensnared by pride, sometimes brought down and caught by pleasure? But, as it is shameful for him who rules over nations to be a slave at home, and for the man who sits at the helm of the state to be meanly subjected to the beck of † Δημιουργόν.

* Καθαρότης κακοῦ ἀλλοτριώσις, νοῦς, καὶ λόγος.

‡ Θεοειδέστερόν.

|| Ἀγάπη ὁ Θεός, καὶ ἀγάπης πληγή.

a contemptible harlot, or even of an imperious wife; will it not be, in like manner, disgraceful for you, who exercise dominion over the beasts that are without you, to be subject to a great many, and those of the worst sort, that roar and domineer in your distempered mind?"*

I shall, last of all, here subjoin what some of the ancients have observed, viz., that the nature of the human soul, as it lies hid out of sight, and is to us quite unknown, bears an evident resemblance to that of God, who is himself unsearchable, and past finding out.†

"But when we have well considered all these things, and the many other thoughts of this kind that may occur, may we not cry out, How surprising and shocking is the madness and folly of mankind; the far greater part whereof, as if they had quite forgot their original and native dignity, disparage themselves so far as to pursue the meanest objects, and shamefully plunge themselves in mud."

The words of Epictetus are divine, and have a wonderful savor of piety: "You go to the city of Olympia," says he, "to see some of the works of Phidias; but you have no ambition to converse, in order to understand and look at those works which may be seen without travelling at all. Will you never understand what you are, nor why you were brought into the world; nor, finally, what that is which you have now an opportunity to view and contemplate?"‡ And in another place, "For if we were wise, what have we else to do, both in public and in private, but to praise and celebrate the Deity, and to return our thanks to him? Ought we not, while we are digging, ploughing, and eating, to sing to God this hymn?—Great is the Lord, who has provided us with those necessities of life."|| &c.

As for you, young gentlemen, I would have you to be sensible of the honor and dignity of your original state; and to be deeply impressed with the indignity and disgrace of your nature, now fallen and vitiated. And dwell particularly upon the contemplation of it. Suffer not the great honor

* Θεῷ δὴν μοις ἔση δια τῆς χρηστότητος, δια τῆς ἀνεξικακίας, δια κοι, βωμίας, μισοσηπρός ὦν καὶ κατάρκατων τῶν πάθων τῶν ἐνδον, ἄρχε θερίων, τὶ οὐν εἶπες, ἐγὼ θήρια ἔχω ἐν ἱμαντί; καὶ μυρία πολλὴν δχλον ἐν σοὶ θηρίων ἔχεις, καὶ μὴ ὕβων νομισας εἶναι τῷ λήγμενον. Πόσον θηρίον ἐστὶν ὁ θόμος θταν ἑλακτη τῇ καρδία, &c.

† Κατ' εἰκόνα τοπικὴν τοῦ ἀνάνυρου, καὶ ἀγνωριστοῦ Θεοῦ.

‡ Εἰς ὀλυμπίαν μεν ἀποδημιεῖτε, ἰν εἰδῆτε τὸ ἔργον τοῦ φειδίου—δπου δε οὐδ' ἀποδημῆσαι χρεία ἐστιν ταυτα ἕε θεῶσσαι καὶ κατανοῆσαι οὐκ ἐπιθυμῆσατε οὐκ αἰσθησεσθε τοῖνυν οὐτε τίνες, ἰστέ, οὐτέ ἐπὶ τί γαγύνατε, οὐ' ἐπὶ τί τοῦτο ἐστὶν ἰπ' ὁ του θεῶν παρελῆφατες. ARR. lib. i., cap. 6.

|| 'Εἰ γαρ νοῦν ἔχομεν, ἀλλὸ τὶ εἶδει ἡμᾶς ποιεῖν καὶ κοῦνῃ καὶ ἰδία ἡμῶν τὸ θεῶν καὶ εὐφμεῖν καὶ ἐπεξέρχασθαι τὰς χάριτας; οὐκ εἶδει καὶ σκάπτουνας καὶ ἀρούνας καὶ ἐθλοῦτας ἄδων, λέγας ὁ θεος οτι ἡμῖν παρέχων ὄργανα ταυτα. IBD, cap. 18.

and dignity of the human race, which is to know the eternal and invisible God, to acknowledge him, love him, and worship him, to decay and die away within you. This, alas! is the way of the far greater part of the world; but do you live in continual remembrance of your original, and assert your claim to heaven, as being originally from it, and soon to return to it again.

LECTURE XIII.

PROVIDENCE.

THE doctrines we have been handling, are the great supports of faith, piety, and the whole of religion: wherefore, it is most just, that the zeal and care of the scholars should concur with that of their teachers, to have them well secured in the mind and affections; for, "a weak foundation," as the lawyers observe, "is the ruin of the work."* There are two principal pillars, and, as it were, the Jachin and Boaz of the living temples of God, which the apostle to the Hebrews lays down in these words: He that cometh to God (under which expression are comprehended every devout affection and every act of religious worship) must believe that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. Heb. xi. 6.

That God is, implies not only that he is eternal and self-existent, but also, that he is, to all other beings, the spring and fountain of what they are, and what they have; and consequently, that he is the wise and powerful Creator of angels and men, and even of the whole universe. This is the first particular, that God is. The second, that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him, ascertains the providence and government of God, exemplified in its most eminent effect, with regard to mankind. For providence extends further than this, and comprehends in it a constant preservation and support of all things visible and invisible, whether in heaven or earth, and the sovereign government and disposal of them. Mechanics, when they have completed houses, ships, and other works they have been engaged in, leave them to take their fate in the world, and, for the most part, give themselves no further trouble about the accidents that may befall them. But the supreme Architect and wise Creator, never forsakes the work of his hands, but keeps his arms continually about it, to preserve it; sits at the helm to rule and govern it; is himself in every part of it, and fills the whole with his presence. So great a fabric could not possibly stand without some guardian and ruler; nor can this be any other than the Creator himself. For who can pay a greater regard to it, support it more effectually, or govern it with greater wisdom, than he who made it? "Nothing can be more perfect than God; therefore it is necessary the world should be governed by him," says Cicero. And "they who take away providence, though they acknowledge God in words, in fact deny him."*

* Debile enim fundamentum fallit opus.

If we believe that all things were produced out of nothing, the consequence is, that, by the same powerful Hand that created them, they must be preserved and supported, to keep them from falling back into their primitive nothingness. It must be also owned, that by the same powerful Hand, the regular motions of the stars, the contexture of the elementary world, the various kinds of creatures, and the uninterrupted succession of their generations, are continued and preserved. Nor is Divine providence to be confined within the heavens, or in the lower world, restrained to the care of generals in opposition to individuals; although the peripatetic school inclined too much to this opinion, and even the master of that school, Aristotle himself, in his often-quoted book, if it really be his, De Mundo. For that providence extends to all things in this lower globe, from the highest to the lowest, and comprehends within its sphere particular as well as general things, the least as well as the greatest, is confirmed not only by the doctrine of the sacred Scripture, but also by the testimony of all sound philosophy.

Therefore, in maintaining the doctrine of Providence, we affirm, 1st, That the Eternal Mind has an absolute and perfect knowledge of all things in general, and every single one in particular. Nor does he see only those that are actually present, as they appear in their order upon the stage of the world, but, at one view, comprehends all that are passed, as well as that are to come, as if they were actually present before him.† This, the ancient philosopher Thales is said to have asserted expressly, even with regard to the hidden motions and most secret thoughts of the human mind: for being asked, "If any one that does evil can conceal it from God?" he answered, "No, not even his evil thoughts."‡ "Nothing is left unprovided for," says St. Basil, "nothing is overlooked by God: his watchful eye sees all things; he is present everywhere to give salvation to all."|| Epictetus has also the same divine thoughts upon this subject.§

And here, were any one to reflect seriously on the vast number of affairs that are constantly in agitation in one province, or even in one city, the many political schemes and projects, the multiplicity of law matters, the still greater number of family affairs, and all the particulars comprehended under so many general heads, he would be amazed and overpowered with the thoughts of a knowledge so incomprehensibly extensive. This was the very thought which excited the divine psalmist's admiration, and made him cry out with wonder and astonishment, Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain unto it. Psalm cxxxix. 6.

2dly, He not only knows all things, and takes notice of them, but he also rules and governs them. He hath done whatever he pleased in the heavens and the earth, says the psalmist, Psalm cxxxv. 6. And he worketh all things, says the apostle, according to the counsel of his own will. Eph. i. 11. He does all things according to his pleasure, but that pleasure is influenced by his reason; all things absolutely, but yet all things with the greatest justice, sanctity, and prudence.

He views and governs the actions of man in a particular manner: he hath given him a law: he hath proposed rewards, annexed punishments to enforce it, and engage man's obedience. And having discovered, as it were, an extraordinary concern about him, when he made him (as we have observed upon the words Let us make man), in like manner, he still continues to maintain an uncommon good-will toward him, and, so to speak, an anxious concern about him. So that one of the ancients most justly called man "God's favorite creature." And he spoke much to the purpose, who said, "God is neither a lover of horses, nor of birds, but of mankind."* With regard to the justice of the supreme government of Providence, we meet with a great deal, even in the ancient poets.

"O father Jove," says Æschylus, "thou reignest in heaven, thou takest notice of the rash and wicked actions of gods and men. Thy care even extends to the wild beasts; thou observest the wrongs done them, and securest their privileges."†

"Though justice," says Euripides, "comes late, it still is justice: it lies hid, as it were, in ambush, till it finds an opportunity to inflict due punishment upon the wicked man."‡

"Dost thou think," says Æschylus, "to get the better of the divine knowledge, and that justice stands at a distance from the human race? She is near at hand, and sees without being seen; she knows who ought to be punished; but when she will sudden-

* Nihil Deo prestantius, ab eo igitur regi necesse est. Qui providentiam negant, veris licet Deum potent. reipsa tollunt.

† Τατ' εοντα τατ' εσομενα προτ' εοντα.

‡ Ει Θεον τις λαθοι κακων τι πρασσωσιν; αλλ ουδε διανοημενος.

|| Ουδεν απρονητον, ουδεν ημελημενον παρὰ Θεω παντα σκοπειει ο ακοιμητος οφθαλμος πασι παρει, σκορτιζων εκαστω την σωταριαν.

§ Arr., lib. i., cap. 12.

* Ο Θεός Φιλίππος, ουδε Φιλορρις αλλα φιλόανθρωπος.

† Ω Ζευ πάτερ, Ζευ, σόν μεν ουρανοῦ κράτος,

Συ δ' ἐργ' ἐπουρανόων και ανθρώπων ὄρας

Λεωργία κήθεμιστα. Σοι και θηρίων

Υβρις τέ και δικη μελει.

‡ Δικα τοτ δικά χρόνιος

Αλλ' ὅμως υποπεσοῦσ'

Ἐλάθεν οταν ἐχη

Τιν' ἀσεβη βροτῶν.

ly fall upon the wicked, that thou knowest not.*

“The weight of justice,” says the same author, in another place, “falls upon some quickly in the daytime, it lies in wait for some sins till the twilight; the longer it is delayed, the severer the punishment; accordingly, some are consigned to eternal night.”†

There are two difficulties, however, on this head, which are not easily solved. 1st, The success that commonly attends the wicked in this world, and the evil to which the good are exposed. On this subject, even the philosophers, pleading the cause of God (which, if we take their word, they thought a matter of no great difficulty), advanced a great many things. Seneca tells us, “There is a settled friendship, nay, a near relation and similitude between God and good men: he is even their father; but, in their education he inures them to hardships. When, therefore, you see them struggling with difficulties, sweating, and employed in up-hill work; while the wicked, on the other hand, are in high spirits, and swim in pleasures; consider, that we are pleased with modesty in our children, and forwardness in our slaves; the former we keep under by severe discipline, while we encourage impudence in the latter. Be persuaded that God takes the same method. He does not pamper the good man with delicious fare, but tries him; he accustoms him to hardships, and (which is a wonderful expression in a heathen) PREPARES HIM FOR HIMSELF.”‡ And in another place, “Those luxurious persons whom he seems to indulge and to spare, he reserves for evils to come. For you are mistaken, if you think any one spared, will at last have his portion of misery; and that he seems to have been dismissed, is only delayed for a time.”|| And a vast deal more to this purpose. The same sort of sentiments we meet with in Plutarch: “God takes the same method,” says he, “with good men, that teachers do with their scholars, when they exact more than ordinary of those children of whom they have the greatest hopes.”* And it is a noble thought which we meet with in the same author: “If he who transgresses in the morning,” says he, “is punished in the evening, you will not say that, in this case, justice is slow; but to God, one, or even several ages, are but as one day.”† How near is this to St. Peter’s saying on the same subject! 2 Pet. iii. 8.

2dly, The other point upon this subject, which perplexes men fond of controversy, and is perplexed by them, is, how to reconcile human liberty with Divine providence, which we have taken notice of before. But to both these difficulties, and to all others that may occur upon the subject, I would oppose the saying of St. Augustine: “Let us grant that he can do some things which we can not understand.”‡

What a melancholy thing it would be to live in a world where anarchy reigned! It would certainly be a woful situation to all; but more especially to the best and most inoffensive part of mankind. It would have been no great privilege, to have been born into a world without God and without providence. For, if there were no Supreme Ruler of the world, then, undoubtedly, the wickedness of men would reign without any curb or impediment, and the great and powerful would unavoidably devour the weak and helpless, “as the great fishes often eat up the small, and the hawk makes havoc among the weaker birds.”||

It may be objected, that this frequently happens, even in the present world, as appears from the prophecies of Habakkuk, ch. i. 15. But the prophet, immediately after, asserts, that there is a Supreme Power, which holds the reins in the midst of these irregularities; and though they are sometimes permitted, yet, there is a determinate time appointed for setting all things to rights again, which the just man expects, and, till it comes, lives by faith, Hab. ii. 3, 4. Some passages of Ariston’s Iambics are admirable to this purpose.

“A. Be patient; for God uses to support worthy men, such as you are, in a remarkable manner. And unless those who act in a becoming manner, are to receive some great reward, to what purpose is it, pray, to cultivate piety any longer? B. I wish that may be the case; but I too often see those who conform themselves to the rules of piety and virtue, oppressed by calamity; while those

* Hanc rationem Deus sequitur in bonis viris, quam in discipulis suis preceptores, qui plus laboris ab iis exigunt, in quibus certior spes est. PLUT. περί των βραδεως τιμωρομένων.

† Si qui manc peccavit, vespere puniatur, tardum hoc non dices: at Deo seculum, vel etiam plura secula, pro die uno.

‡ Demus illum aliquod facere, et nos non posse intelligere.

|| ——— Pisces ut sæpe minutos Magna comest, et aves enecat accipiter.

* Δοκεῖς τὰ θεῶν οὐ ξυνητὰ νικῆσαι ποτε
Καὶ τὴν δίκην ποῦ μακρὸ ἀποικεῖσθαι βροτῶν;
‘ Η δ’ ἐγγυς ἐστὶν οὐχ ἀρωμένη δ’ ὀρᾷ
‘ Οὐ χοῆ κορᾶζειν τ’ ἴδεν. Ἄλλ’ οὐκ οἶδα σο ‘ Ὅσπῳτα ἀφ’ ἡμῶν μολοῦσα διαλέση κακοῦς.

† Ρωπὴ δ’ ἐπισκοπεῖ δίκας
Ταχεῖα τοῦς μὲν ἐν φάει
Τὰ δ’ ἐν μεταχειρίω σκόβου
Μένει, χρονίζοντ’ ἄχρη βροτεῖ Τοῦς δ’ κραντος ἔχει νύξ.

‡ Inter bonus viros ac DEUM est amicitia, imo necessitudo, et similitudo, imo ille eorum pater, sed durius eos educat, cum itaque eos videris laborare, sudare, et arduum ascendere, malos autem lascivire, et voluptatibus fluere, cogita, filiorum nos modestia delectare, vernularum licentia: illos disciplina tristorio contineri, horum ali audaciam. Idem tibi de Deo liqueat, bonum virum delicis non inuntrit, experitur, indurat, et SIBI ILLUM PREPARAT.

|| Eos autem quibus indulgere videtur, quibus parcere, molles venturis malis servat. Erratis enim si quem judicatis exceptum. Veniet ad illum diu feliciem sua portio. Et qui videtur dimissus esse, delatus est. SEN. DE GUERN. MUNDI.

who mind nothing but what they are prompted to by private interest and profit, thrive and flourish much better than we. A. For the present it is so, indeed; but it becomes us to look a great way forward, and wait till the world has completed its full revolution. For it is by no means true, that this life is entirely under the dominion of blind chance, or fortune; though many entertain this wicked notion, and the corrupt part of mankind, from this consideration, encourage themselves in immorality; but the virtues of the good will meet with a proper reward, and the wicked will be punished for their crimes. For nothing happens without the will of heaven.*

What the poets sometimes advance concerning a supreme fate, which governs all things, they often ascribe to God; though now and then they forget themselves, and subject even the Supreme Being to their fate, as the stoic philosophers did also. But possibly they both had a sound meaning, though it was couched under words that sound a little harsh; and this meaning now and then breaks forth, particularly when they celebrate God for disposing all things, by an eternal law, according to his own good pleasure, and thereby make him the supreme and universal governor, subject to no other, but, in some respect, to himself, or to his decrees: which, if you understand them in a sound sense, is all that they can mean by their το σοφώτατον and their το ἀμεταβλητον. The same judgment is to be passed with regard to what we find said about fortune: for either that word signifies nothing at all, or you must understand by it, the Supreme Mind, freely disposing of all things. And this is very clearly attested by the following excellent verses of Menander: "Cease to improve your minds, for the mind of man is nothing at all. The government of all things is solely in the hands of fortune: whether this fortune be a mind, or the Spirit of God, or whatever else it is, it carries all before it. Human prudence is but a vapor, a mere trifle," &c.†

We have also a great many proofs, that, in the opinion of the old poets, fate and fortune were precisely the same; one instance whereof we meet with in the following passage: "Fortune and fate, Pericles, are the givers of all that man enjoys."‡

And, instead of the terms fate and fortune, they sometimes used the word necessity. But all these were but other names, though ill-chosen, for Providence. Euripides having said a great deal concerning fate or necessity, at last resolves the whole into this: "Jupiter executes, with thee, all he had decreed before."*

And Homer's words are very remarkable: "Jupiter," says he, "increases or diminishes the valor of men, as he thinks proper: for he is the most powerful of all."† And in another place: "Jove from Olympus, distributes happiness to good and bad men in general, and every one in particular, as he himself thinks proper."‡

Let us, therefore, look upon God as our Father, and venture to trust him with our all. Let us ask and beg of him what we want, and look for supplies from no other quarter. This, the indulgent father in Terence desired: and much more our heavenly Father. And surely everything is better conducted by a dutiful love and confidence, than by an ignoble and servile fear; and we are very injurious both to him and ourselves, when we think not, that all things, on his part, are managed with the greatest goodness and bounty. It is a true test of religion and obedience, when, with honorable thoughts, and a firm confidence in our Father, we absolutely depend upon him, and serve him from a principle of love. "Be not," says Augustine, "a froward boy, in the house of the best of fathers, loving him when he is fond of thee, and hating him when he gives thee chastisement, as if, in both cases, he did not intend to provide an inheritance for thee."§ If we suppose this Providence to be the wisest and the best, it is necessary that in every instance our wills should be perfectly submissive to its designs: otherwise we prefer our own pleasure to the will of Heaven, which appears very unnatural. St. Augustine, on the expression upright in heart, which we frequently meet with in the psalms, makes an excellent observation: "If you cheerfully embrace," says he, "the Divine will in some things, but in others would rather prefer your own, you are crooked in heart, and would not have your crooked inclinations conformed to his upright intentions, but, on the contrary, would bend his upright will to yours."||

* Καὶ γὰρ Ζεὺς, νευσθ Συν σοι τοῦτο τελευτᾷ.—EURIP. IN ALCESTIDE.

† Ζεὺς δ' ἀρετῆν ἀνδράσιν ὀφέλλει τε μνῆθι τε
 *Ὅπως κεν ἐδῆλθιν δ' γὰρ κάρτιστος ἀπύτων.

HOM. IL. XX.

‡ Ζεὺς δ' ἀντὸς νέμει ὄλβον Ὀλύμπιος ἀνθρώποισι Ἐσθλοῖς ἢδὲ κακοῖσιν, ὅπως ἐθέλησιν ἐκάστω.

HOM. ODYSSEY. IV.

§ Ne sis peur insulsum in domo optimi patris, amans patrem, si tibi blanditur, et odio habens, quando te flagellat; quasi non et blandiens, et flagellans hereditatem pareat.

|| Si voluntatem divinam in quibusdam amplecteris, in aliis tuam malles, curvus es corde, et non vis curvam tuam voluntatem ad illius rectam dirigere, sed illius rectam vis ad tuam curvam incurvare.

* A. θίρει. Βοηθεῖν πᾶσιν τοῖσιν ἀξίοις Εἴθωεν δ θεος, &c.

† Παῖκασθε νοῦν ἔχοντες, οὐδέν γάρ πλὴν
 Ἀνθρώπων νοῦς ἐστιν, ἀλλ' ὁ τῆς τύχης,
 Εἰρ' ἐστὶ τοῦτο πνεῦμα θεῶν εἴτε νοῦς,
 Τοῦτ' ἐστὶ παντὰ καὶ κυβερνῶν, καὶ στρεφοῖ
 Καὶ σώζον, ἢ πρόνοια δ' ἡ θνητῆ, κἀπνοῦς, Καὶ φλῆναρας, &c.

‡ Πάντα τύχη καὶ μοῖρα, Περίκλεες ἀνδρὶ δίδωσι.

LECTURE XIV.

CHRIST THE SAVIOR.

It is acknowledged, that the publication of the gospel is exceeding agreeable, and perfectly answers its original name, which signifies good tidings. How much sweeter is this joyful news, than the most ravishing and delightful concerts of music! Nay, these are the best tidings that were ever heard in any age of the world. O happy shepherds, to whom this news was sent down from heaven! Ye, to be sure, though watching in the fields, exposed to the severe cold of the night, were, in this, more happy than kings that slept at their ease in gilded beds; that the wonderful nativity of the Supreme King, begotten from eternity, that nativity which brought salvation to the whole world, was first communicated to you, and just at the time it happened. Behold, says the angel, I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day a Savior. Luke ii. 10, 11. And immediately, a great company of the heavenly host joined the angel, and in your hearing sung, Glory to God in the highest. And indeed, then, in the strictest truth, "A most extraordinary child was sent down from the lofty heavens," &c.* Whence also, his name was sent down along with him: His name shall be called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins. Matt. i. 21. "O sweet name of Jesus," says St. Bernard, "honey in the mouth, melody in the ears, and healing to the heart." This is the Savior, who, though we were so miserable, and so justly miserable, yet, would not suffer us to perish. Nor did he only put on our nature, but also our sins; that in a legal sense, our guilt being transferred to him. Whence we not only read, that the word was made flesh, John i. 14, but also, that he was made sin for us, who knew no sin: 2 Cor. v. 12: and even, as we have it in the epistle to the Galatians, ch. iii. 13, that he was made a curse, that from him an eternal blessing and felicity might be derived to us. The spotless Lamb of God bore our sins, that were devolved upon him: by thus bearing them, he destroyed them; and by dying for them, gained a complete victory over death. And how wonderful is the gradation of the blessings he procured for us! He not only delivered us from a prison and death, but presents us with a kingdom: according to that of the psalmist, Who redeemeth thee from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies. Psalm ciii. 4.

I believe there are none so stupid or insensible, as to refuse that these tidings are very agreeable and pleasing to the ear. But we may, not without some reason, suspect of the greatest part of nominal Christians, who commonly receive these truths with great applause, that it may be said to them, without any injustice, what is all this to you? These privileges are truly great and manifold, and indifferently directed to all to whom they are preached, unless they reject them, and shut the door against happiness offering to come in: and this in not only the case of a great part of mankind, but they also impose upon themselves by false hopes, as if it were enough to hear of these great blessings, and dream themselves happy, because these sounds had reached their ears. But, O unhappy men! what will all these immense riches signify to you, I must indeed say, if you are not allowed to use them, but rather, if you know not how to avail yourselves of them? I therefore earnestly wish that these words of the gospel were well fixed in your minds: He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not; but as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God. John i. 10-12. In him all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid, Col. ii. 3; and without him, there is nothing but emptiness, because in him all fulness doth dwell. But what advantage can it be to us to hear these riches of our Jesus spoken of at great length, and to excellent purpose, or even to speak of them ourselves, if, all the while, we talk of them as a good foreign to us, and in which we have no concern, because our hearts are not yet open to receive him? What, pray, would the most accurate description of the Fortunate islands, as they called, or all the wealth of the Indies and the New World, with all its golden mines, signify to a poor man half naked, struggling with all the rigors of cold and hunger? Should one, in these circumstances, I say, hear or read of these immense treasures, or should any one describe them to him in the most striking manner, either by word of mouth, or with the advantage of an accurate pen; can it be doubted, but this empty display of riches, this phantom of wealth and affluence, would make his sense of want and misery the more intolerable? Unless it be supposed, that despair had already reduced him to a state of insensibility. What further enhances the misery of those who hear of this treasure, and think of it to no purpose, is this, that there is no one of them, who is not miserable by choice, and a beggar in the midst of the greatest wealth; and not only miserable by choice, but obstinately so, from an invincible and distracted fondness for the immediate causes of his misery. "For who but a downright madman would reject such golden offers?"*

* Jam nova progenies cœlo demittitur alto, &c. VIRG. Æc.

To give a brief and plain state of the case: to those who sincerely and with all their hearts receive him, Christ is all things; to those who receive him not, nothing. For, how can any good, however suitable or extensive, be actually enjoyed, or indeed any such enjoyment conceived, without some kind of union, between that good and the person supposed to stand in need of it? Behold says, the psalmist, all those that are far from thee shall perish. Psalm lxxiii. 27. To be united to God, is the great and the only good of mankind. And the only means of this union, is Jesus. In whatever sense you take it, he ought truly to be called the union of unions; who, that he might with the greater consistency, and the more closely, unite our souls to God, did not disdain to unite himself to a human body.

* Quis enim nisi mentis inops oblatum noc respuat aurum?

The great business of our life, therefore, young gentlemen, is this acceptance of Christ, and this inseparable union with him, which we are now recommending. Thrice happy, and more than thrice happy, are they who are joined with him in this undivided union, which no complaints, nor even the day of death, can dissolve. Nay, the last day is happy above all other days, for this very reason, that it fully and finally completes this union, and is so far from dissolving it, that it renders it absolutely perfect and everlasting.

But, that it may be coeval with eternity, and last for ever, it is absolutely necessary that this union should have its beginning in this short and fleeting life. And pray, what hinders those of us that have not entered into this union before, to enter into it without delay? seeing the bountiful Jesus not only rejects none that come unto him, but also offers himself to all that do not wilfully reject him, and standing at the door, earnestly beg to be admitted. Oh, why do not these everlasting doors open, that the King of glory may enter, and reign within us? Nay, though he were to be sought in a far country, and with great labor, why should we delay, and what unhappy chains detain us? Why do we not, after shaking them all off, and even ourselves, go as it were out of ourselves, and seek him incessantly till we find him? Then, rejoicing over him, say with the heavenly Spouse, I held him, and would not let him go; and further add, with the same Spouse, that blessed expression, My beloved is mine, and I am his. And, indeed, this interest is always reciprocal. No man truly receives Jesus, who does not at the same time deliver up himself wholly to him. Among all the advantages we pursue, there is nothing comparable to this exchange. Our gain is immense from both; not only from the acceptance of him, but also from surrendering ourselves to him. So long as this is delayed, we are the most abject slaves. When one has delivered himself up to Christ, then, and then only, he is truly free, and becomes master of himself. Why should we wander about to no purpose? To him let us turn our eyes, on him fix our thoughts, that he who is ours by the donation of the Father, and his own free gift, may be ours by a cheerful and joyous acceptance. As St. Bernard says in those words of the prophet, To us a child is born, to us a son is given: "Let us therefore make use of what is ours, for our own advantage."^{*} So, then, let him be ours by possession and use,† and let us be his for ever, never forgetting how dearly he has bought us.

LECTURE XV.

REGENERATION.

THE Platonists divide the world into two, the sensible and the intellectual world: they imagine the one to be the type of the other, and that sensible and spiritual things are stamped, as it were, with the same stamp or seal. These sentiments are not unlike the notions which the masters of the cabalistical doctrine among the Jews, held concerning God's sephiroth and seal, wherewith, according to them, all the worlds, and everything in them, are stamped or sealed. And these are probably near akin to what Lord Bacon of Verulam calls, his parallela signacula, and symbolizantes schematismi. According to this hypothesis, these parables and metaphors, which are often taken from natural things to illustrate such as are Divine, will not be similitudes taken entirely at pleasure, but are often, in a great measure, founded in nature and the things themselves. Be this as it may, that great change which happens in the souls of men by a real and effectual conversion to God, is illustrated in the Holy Scriptures by several remarkable changes, both natural and civil, particularly by a deliverance from chains, prison, and slavery; by a transition from one kingdom to another; and from darkness to light; by a restoration from death to life; by a new creation; by a marriage; and by adoption, and regeneration. Concerning this great change, as it is represented under the last of these figures, we propose, with Divine assistance, to offer a few thoughts from those words of St. John's gospel which we have already mentioned: To as many as received him, to them gave he power (or the privilege) to become the sons of God. John i. 12. Together with these words of our Savior, in another place of the same gospel: Except a man be born again, of water and of the Spirit, he can not enter into the kingdom of God. John iii. 3.

If, indeed, we consider the nature and the original of man, it is not without reason that he is called the son of God, according to that passage which the apostle, in his short, but most weighty sermon to the Athenians, quotes from the poet Aratus, and at the same time approves of, For we are all his offspring.‡ Acts xvii. 28. Our first parent, in St. Luke's gospel, is also expressly called the son of God; Luke iii. ult., not only because he was created immediately by God, without any earthly father, but also on account of the Divine image that was originally impressed upon the human nature.

* Puer natus est nobis, filius nobis datus est; utamur, inquit, nostro utilitatem nostram.

† Κλησεί και χρισσει.

‡ Του γαρ και γενος εσμεν.

And this glorious title, which distinguishes him from all other corporeal beings, he has in common with the angels, who are also so called in several places in the book of Job. Job i. 6; xxxviii. 7. It is indeed true, to use the words of St. Basil, that "every piece of workmanship bears some mark or character of the workman who made it."* For I should rather choose, in this case, to use the word mark, or character, than likeness. But of man alone it is said, Let us make him after our own image. And this distinction is not improperly expressed by the schoolmen, who say, as we have already observed, that all the other works of God are stamped with the print of his foot, but only man, of all the visible creation, honored with the image or likeness of his face. And indeed, on account of this image or resemblance it is that he is in dignity very nearly equal to the angels, though made inferior to them. Here it is to be observed that this inferiority is but little, Who was made, saith the apostle, a little lower than the angels. Heb. ii. 9. So that, with regard to his body, he is nearly related to the brute creatures, and only a little superior to them with regard to temperament and the beautiful elegance of his frame, but made out of the very same materials, the same moist and soft clay, taken from the bosom of their great and common mother; whereas, to use the words of the poet, "The soul is the breath of God, which takes its rise from heaven, and is closely united to his earthly body, like a light shut up in a dark cavern."†

That Divine part of the human composition derives its original from the Father of Spirits, in the same manner with those ministers of fire, who are not confined to corporeal vehicles; concerning whom, the oracle, having acknowledged one Supreme Divine Majesty, immediately subjoins, "And we angels are but a small part of God."‡

And with regard to this principle which excels in man, which actually constitutes the man, and on account of which he most truly deserves that name, he is a noble and divine animal. And whatever some fanciful and proud men may boast concerning their families, "If we consider our originals, and that God was the author of the human kind, none of Adam's race can be called ignoble."||

But if, on the other hand, we regard our woful fall, which was the consequence of sin, we are all degenerate; we have all fallen from the highest honor into the greatest disgrace, and the deepest gulf of all sorts of misery; we have given away our liberty and greatest dignity, in exchange for the most shameful and most deplorable bondage; instead of the sons of God, we are become the slaves of Satan: and if we now want to know to what family we belong, the apostle will tell us that we are children of wrath, and sons of disobedience.* Eph. ii. 2, 3.

But, as the overflowing Fountain of goodness and bounty did not choose that so noble a monument of his wisdom should be entirely ruined by this dismal fall, could any one be more proper to raise it up again, or better qualified to restore men to the dignity of the sons of God, than his own eternal Son, who is the most perfect and express image of the Father? Nor does this glorious person decline the severe service. Though he was the son of his Father's love, the heir and Lord of the whole universe; though he might be called the delight of his most exalted Father, and of all blessed spirits, and now, with the greatest justice, the darling of the human kind; yet he left his Father's bosom, and, O wonderful condescension! became the son of man, that men might anew become the sons of God. Whence he is also called The second Adam, because he recovered all that was lost by the first.

That all who sincerely receive him, might be again admitted into the embraces of the Father, and no more be called children of wrath, he himself submitted to the punishment due to our disobedience; and by bearing it, removed our guilt, and pacified justice. He also went into the flames of Divine wrath, to deliver us from them; and by a plentiful stream of his most precious blood, quite extinguished them. He likewise took effectual care that those who were no longer to be called children of wrath, should also cease to be children of disobedience, by pouring out upon them a plentiful effusion of his sanctifying Spirit; that their hearts being thereby purged from all impure affections and the love of earthly things, they might, under the influence of the same good Spirit, cheerfully lead a life of sincere and universal obedience. Now, it can not be doubted that those who are so actuated and conducted by the Divine Spirit, are truly the sons of God; whence that spirit whereby they call God their Father, and with confidence apply to him as such, is called the Spirit of adoption.

Moreover, this wonderful restoration is often called adoption, not only to distinguish it from the natural and incomparable dignity which belongs to the only begotten Son, but also because we by no means derive this privilege from nature, but absolutely from the free donation of the Father, through the mediation of his only Son. We must not, however, conclude from this, that this privilege

* Πάν τὸ ἐργαζόμενον ἔχειν τινὰ τοῦ τέκτονος τύπον.

† Ψυχὴ ἑστίν ἄμμα Θεοῦ καὶ μίξιν ἀνετλή Οὐρανίη χθονίσιον, φάος σπλνγγυὶ κάλυθθεν.

N. A. Z. DE ANIMA.

‡ Μικρὴ δὲ Θεοῦ μερὶς ἀγγελοὶ ἡμεῖς.

|| Si primordia nostra,

Anthoremque Deum spectes,

Nullus degener extat.—BOETH. DE CONS. PHIL.,

lib. iii., met. 6.

* Ὅμοιοι ἀπειθείας καὶ τέκνα ὀργῆς.

has nothing more in it than an honorable title, or, as they call it, an external relation. For it is not only inseparably connected with a real and internal change, but with a remarkable renovation, and, as it were, a transformation of all the faculties of the soul, nay, even of the whole man. You will accordingly find these words applied to this purpose, by the Apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, ch. xii. 2. And, to conclude, it is with a view to convince us, that, together with the title of sons, the Spirit of God is given to believers, and they are inwardly renewed thereby, that we so often in Scripture meet with this regeneration which is the subject of our present discourse.

If we consider the lives of men, we shall be apt to imagine that the generality of mankind who live in the world under the name of Christians, think it sufficient for them to be called by this name, and dream of nothing further. The common sort of mankind hear with pleasure and delight of remission of sins, imputed righteousness, of the dignity of the sons of God, and the eternal inheritance annexed to that dignity; but when they are told that repentance, a new heart, and a new life, contempt of the world and the pleasures of the flesh, fasting and prayer, are absolutely necessary for a Christian, These are hard sayings, who can bear them? Though at the same time it must be said, that they who do not regard these necessary duties, will have no share in the reward annexed to them.

There are many things which distinguish this Divine adoption from that which obtains among men. 1st, The former is not an expedient to supply the want of children, which is commonly the case among men; for God has his only begotten Son, who is incomparably preferable to all the rest taken together; who is immortal as his Father; and though, from a principle of wonderful humility, he condescended to become mortal, and even to die, yet he rose again from the dead, and liveth for ever. From him is derived all that felicity which our heavenly Father is pleased to confer upon us, out of his mere grace and bounty, through the merits and mediation of his dear Son. And is there any one on whom this felicity is bestowed, who will not freely acknowledge himself to be quite unworthy of so great an honor? Yet, such honor has the eternal and incomprehensible love of God condescended to bestow on us, who are quite unworthy and undeserving. And in this also the Divine adoption differs from that which is customary among men, who generally choose the most deserving they can meet with: but all those whom God maketh choice of, are unworthy, and some even are remarkably so.

2dly, Men generally adopt but one apiece, or, at most, a few; but Divine adoption admits into the heavenly family a most numerous host, extending even unto myriads, that Jesus, who is at the head of the family, may be the first-born among many brethren. Romans viii. 29.

And 3dly, They are all heirs. Whence it is said, in another place, That he might bring many sons unto glory. Heb. ii. 10. Nor is the inheritance of any individual in the least diminished in consequence of so vast a multitude of heirs; for it is an inheritance in light, and every one has the whole of it. Nor do the children come into the possession of this inheritance by the death of the Father, but every one when he dies himself; for the Father is immortal, and, according to the apostle, the only one that has immortality; that is, in an absolute, primary, and independent sense. Nay, he himself is the eternal inheritance of his sons, and death alone brings them into his presence, and admits them into the full enjoyment of him.

4thly (which I would have particularly observed), This Divine adoption is not a matter of mere external honor, nor simply the bestowing of riches and an inheritance; but is always attended with a real internal change of the man himself to a being quite different from what he was before (which is also recorded in sacred Scripture, concerning Saul, when he was anointed king); but this, human adoption can by no means perform. This last, in the choice of a proper object, justly pays regard to merit. For though the richest and even the best of men, may clothe richly the person whom he has thought proper to adopt, and get him instructed in the best principles and rules of conduct, yet, he can not effectually divest him of his innate dispositions, or those manners that have become natural by custom; he can not form his mind to noble actions, nor plant within him the principles of fortitude and virtue. But He who formed the heart of man, can reform it at his pleasure; and this he actually does: whenever he admits a person into his royal family, he, at the same time, endows him with royal and divine dispositions. And therefore, if he honors any person with his love, that person thereby becomes deserving: because, if he was not so before, he makes him so: he stamps his own image upon him in true and lively colors; and, as he is holy himself, he makes him holy likewise. Hence, it is, that this heavenly adoption is no less properly, truly, or frequently, in the sacred Scriptures, called regeneration. [Παλιγγενεσία.] And though a Jew, and a celebrated doctor of the Jewish law, excepted against this doctrine, when it was proposed to him under this name; yet, neither all of that nation, nor even the Gentile philosophers, were quite unacquainted with it. Rabbi Israel calls proselytes, new-born Jews. And those passages which we frequently meet with, concerning the seed of Abraham, and, in the prophets, concerning the numerous converts that were to be made to the church, are, by their Rabbins, and the Chaldee paraphrase, applied to this spiritual generation, which they believed would remarkably take place in the days of the Messiah; particularly those two passages in the Psalms, in one whereof the spiritual sons of the church are compared to the drops of the morning dew, Psalm xlv. 16; ex. 3; not only on account of its celestial purity, but also with regard to the vast multitude of them. Some of these doctores also observe, that the number of proselytes would be so great in the days of the Messiah, that the church, omitting the ceremony of circumcision, would receive them into its bosom, and initiate them by ablution or baptism. Concerning this renovation of the mind, Philo Judæus says expressly, "God, who is unbegotten himself, and begets all things, sows this seed, as it were, with his own hand," &c.* Hierocles, and other Pythagorean philosophers, treat also of this moral or mystical regeneration; and under this very name, Plutarch also makes mention of it, and defines it to be "the mortification of irrational and irregular appetites." And Seneca's words relative to this subject are: "The families of the arts and sciences are the most noble; choose into which of them you will be adopted, for by this means we may be born according to our own choice; nor will you be adopted into the name only, but also into the goods of the family."†

Is not, also, the common custom that prevailed among the ancients, of honoring their heroes, and those men who were remarkable for exalted virtue, with the title of sons of God, a plain allusion to this adoption we have under our consideration? And what we have observed on the philosophers, who acknowledged this moral or metaphorical regeneration, is so very true, that it gave a handle to the fictions of those ancient heretics who evaded the whole doctrine and faith of the last resurrection, by putting this figurative sense upon it. As to what the Roman philosopher observes, that we may be born in this manner at our own pleasure or discretion, though to be sure it is not without our consent, yet, it does not altogether, nor principally depend upon us. Our sacred and apostolic doctrine presents us with much more just and pure notions on this subject when it teaches us, that, Of his own will he begat us by the word of truth. James i. 18. This is also represented in express terms in those words of the gospel which immediately follow the passage we mentioned at the beginning of this discourse. Which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. John i. 13. And, with great propriety, there is immediately added, another generation still more wonderful and mysterious, which is the principal and source of this renovation of ours: The word was made flesh. For, to this end, God was pleased to clothe himself with our flesh, that he might put his Spirit within us, whereby we, though carnal in consequence of the corruption of our nature, might be born again into a new, spiritual, and Divine life. The Holy Ghost, by overshadowing the blessed Virgin, was, in a very particular manner, the author of the human nature of the Son of God; and to the virtue and Divine power of the same Spirit, all the adopted children of the Deity owe their new birth. And as creation goes sometimes under the name of generation (for instance, in the words of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 18), Of the Rock that begot thee thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten the God that formed thee: that book also of the Bible, which, from the first word of it, is called Bereshith, is by the Greeks named Genesis, and in the oldest copy of the Septuagint, The generation of the world; and, in the beginning of it, Moses, speaking of the creation of the world, says, These are the generations of the heaven and the earth. (Gen. ii. 4.) So on the other hand, this spiritual generation is called creation, and with an additional epithet, the new creation. It has also, for its author, the same powerful Spirit of God, who of old sat upon the face of the waters as a bird upon its young, or as St. Basil renders it, hatched: so, also, in conversion the same Spirit rests upon our unformed minds, that are lifeless, unprepared, and nothing at all but emptiness and obscurity, and out of this darkness brings forth light, which was the first and most beautiful ornament of the universe. To which the apostle also alludes in his second epistle to the Corinthians, ch. iv. 6. The resurrection of the dead, is also the peculiar work of this living Spirit of God; and to him the apostle Peter expressly ascribes the resurrection of Christ: For Christ also, says he, hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit. 1 Peter iii. 18. And here, again, there is a mutual exchange of names; for, in the gospel according to Matthew, the resurrection of the dead is called the regeneration: Verily, I say unto you, says our Lord, that ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye shall also sit upon twelve thrones. Matt. xix. 28. Here, In the generation, must be connected with the following words, and by no means with those that go before. And that this was the common method of speaking among the Jews, appears from Josephus: "To those," says he, "whose fate it is to die for observing the law, God has given the privileges of being born again, and enjoying a more happy life, so that they are gainers by the exchange."* In like manner Philo

* Ἀγέννητος ὁ Θεός, καὶ τὸ συμπαντὰ γεννῶν, σπεύρει μὲν τοῦτο τὸ γεννητὰ τὸ ἴδιον, &c.

† Nobilissimæ sunt ingeniorum familiæ, elige in quam adscici, velis, hac enim ratione, nobis ad arbitrium nostrum nasci licet; nec in nomen tantum adoptaberis, sed et in ipsa bona.

* Τοῖς ὑπὲρ νόμων διαφυλάχεντων ἀποθανοῦσι ἴδωκεν saith, "We shall hasten to the generation after death, &c."* On the other hand, it is very well known, that this spiritual regeneration we are speaking of, is often in Scripture called the resurrection.

Of this resurrection, the word of the gospel is, as it were, the trumpet: and, at the same time, the immortal seed of this new birth, and therefore, of immortality itself. Thus it is represented by the apostle Peter, 1 Pet. i. 23, and by the apostle James, who expressly tells us, that He hath begotten us with the word of truth. James i. 18. Now, the enlivening virtue and plastic power of this word is derived from the Holy Ghost, who is the true spring and fountain of this new life. Nor are the most extended powers of the human mind, or the strength of its understanding, any more able to restore this life within it, even upon hearing the glad tidings of the gospel, than it was capable of producing itself at first, or of being the author of its own being, or, after death, of restoring itself to life.

To this exalted dignity are admitted the humble, the poor, the obscure, the ignorant, barbarians, slaves, sinners, whom the world look upon as nothing, and hold in the greatest contempt: of these nothing is required but true and sincere faith; no learning, nor noble extract, nor any submission to the Mosaic law; but upon every man of whatever rank or condition, who believes this word, he in return bestows this dignity, that they should become the sons of God; that is, that what Christ was by nature, they should become by grace. Now, what is more sublime and exalted than this honor, that those who were formerly children of Satan, and heirs of hell, should by faith alone be made the sons of God, brethren of Christ, and joint heirs of the heavenly kingdom? If the sacred fire of the Romans happened at any time to be extinguished, it could only be lighted again at the rays of the sun. The life of souls to be sure, is a sacred flame of Divine love: this flame, as we are now born into the froward race of fallen mankind, is, alas! but too truly and unhappily extinguished, and by no means to be kindled again, but by the enlivening light and heat of the Sun of righteousness, who is most auspiciously risen upon us.

LECTURE XVI.

REGENERATION.

THE great corruption of mankind, and their innate disposition to every sort of wickedness, even the doctors of the heathen nations, that is, their philosophers and theologers, and their

δ Θεός γίνεσθαι τέ παλιν και βιον αμεινω λαβειν εκ περιτροπης.—Lib. i. CONT. APP.

* Εις παλιγγενεσιν ορηρησμεν μετα τον θανατον.

poets also, were sensible of and acknowledged: though they were quite ignorant of the source from which this calamity was derived. They all own, that "it is natural to man to sin."* Even your favorite philosopher, who prevails in the schools, declares that we are "strongly inclined to vice;"† and speaking of the charms and allurements of forbidden pleasures, he observes, that mankind by nature "is easily caught in these snares."‡ The Roman philosopher takes notice, that "the way to vice is not only a descent, but a downright precipice."|| And the comic poet, that "mankind has always been, in every respect, a deceitful, subtle creature."§ The satirist likewise observes, that "we are all easily prevailed on to imitate things that are in their nature wicked and disgraceful."¶ And the lyric poet, that "the human race, bold to attempt the greatest dangers, rushes with impetuosity upon forbidden crimes."

All the wise men among the heathens exerted their utmost to remedy this evil by precepts and institutions of philosophy, but to very little purpose. They could not, by all their arts and all their precepts, make others better: nay, with regard to most of them, we may say, nor even themselves. But, "when there was no wisdom in the earth," says Lactantius, "that blessed doctor was sent down from heaven, who is the way, the truth, and the life: †† and, by an almighty power, effected what all others had attempted in vain.

It is not at all to be doubted, but the end proposed by philosophy, was to renew and reform mankind, and to reduce the course of their lives to a conformity with the precepts of wisdom and virtue. Whence the common definition given of philosophy, is, that "it is the rule of life, and the art or science of living uprightly." To this purpose Seneca says, "Philosophy is the law of living honestly and uprightly." True religion, to be sure, has the same tendency; but it promotes its end with much greater force, and better success: because its principles are much more exalted, its precepts and instructions are of greater purity, and it is, besides, attended with a Divine power, whereby it makes its way into the hearts of men, and purifies them with the greatest force and efficacy, and yet, at the same time, with the most wonderful pleasure and delight. And this is the regeneration of which we are speaking, and whereof we have

* Συμφυτον ειναι τοις ανθρωποις το αμαρτανειν.

† Εικαταφορους. ARIST., Eth. ii.

‡ Ευθηρατον ειναι υπο των τοιουτων.

|| Ad vitia, non tantum pronum iter, sed et præceps.

§ Δολερος μιν ει κατα παντα ηη τροπον.

¶ Πέφυκεν ανθρωπος.

¶ Dociles imitandi

Turpibus et pravis omnes sumus.

Juv. Satyr. xiv.

 ——— Audax omnia perpeti,

Gens humana ruit per vetitum nefas.

HOR. Carm., lib. 1., Od. 3.

†† Sed cum nulla esset sapientia in terris, missus este cælo doctor ille, via, veritas et vita.

already observed, that philosophy acknowledged it, even under the same name. But that it effected it, we absolutely deny. Now, it is evident from the very name, that we are to understand by it an inward change, and that a very remarkable one. And since God is called the author and source of this change, whatever the philosophers may have disputed, pro and con, concerning the origin of moral virtue, we are by no means to doubt but this sacred and Divine change upon the heart of man is produced by an influence truly Divine. And this was even Plato's opinion concerning virtue; nor do I imagine you are unacquainted with it. The same philosopher, and several others besides him, expressly asserted, that virtue was a kind of image or likeness of God, nay, that it was the effect of inspiration, and partook, in some respect, of a kind of Divine nature. "No mind can be rightly disposed without divine influence," says Seneca.* And it was the saying of the Pythagorean philosophers, that "the end of man is to be made like to God."† "This mind," says Trismegistus, "is God in man, and therefore some of the number of men are gods."‡ And a little farther on, "In whatever souls the mind presides, it illustrates them with its own brightness, opposing their immoralities and mad inclinations, just as a learned physician inflicts pain upon the body of his patient, by burning and cutting it, in order to recover it to health: in the same manner, the mind afflicts a voluptuous soul, that it may pull up pleasure by the very roots. For all diseases of the soul proceed from it: impiety is the severest distemper of the soul."||

What wonder is it, then, if these very thoughts are expressed in the more Divine oracles of the sacred Scriptures more fully, and with greater clearness? and this confirmation of the human mind to the Divine nature, is commonly represented therein, as the great business and the end of all religion.

What was more frequently inculcated upon the ancient church of the Jews, than these words, Be ye holy, because I am holy? And that the same ambition is recommended to Christians, appears from the first sermon we meet with in the gospel of our Lord and Savior, who came down to this earth, that he might restore the Divine image upon men. Be merciful, says he, as your Father, who is in heaven, is merciful. And according to Luke, Be perfect, as your Father is perfect. And again, Blessed are the pure in heart. And, indeed, this is the true beauty of the heart, and its true nobility; but vice introduces degeneracy, and deformity also.

Now, the more the mind disengages and withdraws itself from "matter that pollutes it,"* that is, from the body it inhabits, the purer and more Divine it constantly becomes; because it attains to a greater resemblance with the Father of spirits, and, as the Apostle Peter expresses, partakes more fully of the Divine nature. Hence it is, that the Apostle Paul warns us at so great length, and in such strong terms, against living after the flesh, as the very death of the soul, and directly opposite to the renewed nature of a Christian. He that is born of God is endued with a greatness of soul, that makes him easily despise, and consider as nothing, those things which he prized at a very high rate before: he considers heaven as his country, even while he lives as a stranger on this earth; he aspires at the highest objects, and, flying up toward heaven, with soaring wings, he "looks down with contempt upon the earth."†

And yet, with all this sublimity of mind he joins the deepest humility. But all the allurements of sin, though they continue to have the same appearance they had before, and possibly throw themselves in his way, as the very same that were formerly dear to him, he will reject with indignation, and give them the same answer as St. Ambrose tells us was given by a young convert to his mistress, with whom he had formerly lived in great familiarity: "Though you may be the same, I am not the same I was before."‡

Lactantius elegantly sets forth the wonderful power of religion in this respect; "Give me," says he, "a man that is passionate, a slanderer, one that is headstrong and unmanageable; with a very few of the words of God, I will make him as quiet as a lamb. Give me a covetous, avaricious, or close-handed person; I will presently make him liberal, and oblige him to give away his money in large quantities with his own hands. Give me one that is afraid of pain or of death; he shall, in a very little time, despise crosses, flames, and even Phalaris's bull. Show me a lustful person, an adulterer, a complete debauchee; you shall presently see him sober, chaste, and temperate."|| So great is the power of Divine wisdom, that, as soon as it is infused into the human breast, it presently expels folly, which is the source and fountain of sin, and so changes the whole man, so refines, and as it were renews him, that you would not know him to be the same. It is prophesied of the days of the Messiah, that the wolf and the lamb shall dwell together, and

* Ἀπὸ τῆς ἕλης βροβορώσας.

† ———— udam

‡ Spermit humum fugiente penna.

§ At ego certe non sum ego.

|| Da mihi virum qui sit iracundus, maledicus, effrænatus; paucissimis Dei verbis tam placidum quam ovem reddam. Da cupidum, avarum, tenacem; jam tibi eum liberalem dabo, et pecuniam suam propriis plenisque; manibus largientem. Da timidum doloris ac mortis; jam cruces, et ignes, et Phalaridis taurum contemnet. Da libidinosum, adulterum, ganeonem; jam sobrium, castum, continentem videbis.

* Nulla sine Deo bona mens est.

† Τελος ἀνθρώπου μοίωσις Θεοῦ.

‡ Οὗτος ὁ νοῦς ἐν μὲν ἀνθρώποις Θεὸς ἐστίν, διὰ καὶ τίνες τῶν ἀνθρώπων θεοὶ εἰσι. [Trismeg.] περι του κοινοῦ προς τατ.

|| *Οσαίς ἂν νῦν ψῆχαις, &c.

the leopard lie down with the kid. Isa. xi. 6. The gospel has a wonderful effect in softening even the roughest dispositions, and "there is none so wild, but he may be tamed, if he will but patiently give attention to this wholesome doctrine."^{*}

Now, whether you call this renovation or change of the mind, repentance, or Divine love, it makes no difference; for all these, and, indeed, all the Christian graces in general, are, at bottom, one and the same, and, taken together, constitute what we may call the health and vigor of the mind; the term under which Aristo of Chios comprehended all the moral virtues. The Apostle Paul, in his second Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. vi. 17, describes these adopted children of God by their repentance: in the Epistle to the Romans, they are characterized by their love, Rom. viii. 28; and in the passage of St. John's gospel we have mentioned already, by their faith, John i. 12. But whatever name it is conveyed by, the change itself is effected by the right hand of the Most High. As to the manner of this divine operation, to raise many disputes about it, and make many curious disquisitions with regard to it, would be not only quite needless, but even absurd. Solomon, in his Ecclesiastes, chap. xi. 5, gives some grave admonitions with regard to the secret processes of nature in forming the fœtus in the womb, to convince us of our blindness with respect to the other works of God: how much more hidden and intricate, and even past our finding out, is this regeneration, which is purely spiritual! This is what our Savior also teaches us, when he compares this new birth to the unconfined and unknown turnings and revolutions of the wind; a similitude which Solomon had lightly touched before, in that passage of the Ecclesiastes, to which we just now alluded. O! that we felt within ourselves this blessed change, though we should remain ignorant with regard to the manner of it; since we are sufficiently apprized of one thing, which it is greatly our interest frequently and seriously to reflect upon! Unless a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God. This spiritual progeny is also compared to the dew, the generation whereof is hidden and undiscovered. Hath the rain a father, and who hath begotten the drops of the dew? Job xxxiii. 28. Good men are also called children of light, and light in the Lord, 1 Thess. v. 5; Eph. v. 8. But it is from the Father of lights himself, and from his only begotten Son, that these stars (for this title of the angels may, without injustice, be applied to them) derive all the light they enjoy. Now, the nature of light is very intricate, and the emanation and the manner of its production is yet a secret even to the most sharp-sighted of those who have made nature their study, and no satisfactory theory of it has yet appeared. But, whatever it is, it was produced by that first and powerful word of Eternal and uncreated light. Let there be light. By the same powerful word of the Almighty Father, there immediately springs up in the mind which was formerly quite involved in the darkness of ignorance and error, a Divine and immortal light, which is the life of men, and, in effect, the true regeneration. And because this is the most effectual means of purifying the soul, it is ascribed to the water and to the Spirit. For this illumination of the Holy Ghost is, indeed, the inward baptism of the Spirit; but, in the primitive times of Christianity, the baptism of water, on account of the supposed concurrence of the Spirit, was commonly called the illumination, and the solemn seasons appointed for the celebration of this mystery, days of illumination or light. And in the very same manner, the baptism of the Holy Ghost is by John Baptist called the baptism of fire, on account of the wonderful influence it has in illuminating and purifying the soul. It is, to be sure, a celestial fire, quite invisible to our eyes, and of such a nature, that the secret communications of it to our souls can not be investigated. But the sum of all is what follows.

It seemed good to Infinite Goodness and Wisdom, to form a noble piece of coin out of clay, and to stamp his own image upon it, with this inscription, "The earthly son of God;" this is what we call man. But, alas! how soon did this piece of coin fall back to clay again, and thereby lost that true image, and had the inscription shamefully blotted out! From that time, man, who was formerly a Divine creature, and an angel clothed with flesh, became entirely fleshly, and in reality a brute: the soul, that noble and celestial inhabitant of his earthly body, became now quite immersed in matter, and, as it were, entirely converted into flesh, as if it had drunk of the river Lethe. Or, like the son of an illustrious family, carried away in infancy to a far country, it is quite ignorant of its present misery, or the liberty and felicity it has lost, becomes an abject slave, degraded to the vilest employments, which it naturally and with pleasure performs; because, having lost all sense of its native excellence and dignity, and forgotten its heavenly original, it now relishes nothing but earthly things, and, catching at present advantages, disregards eternal enjoyments, as altogether unknown, or removed quite out of sight. But if in any particular soul, either from some spark of its native excellency still remaining alive, or any indistinct report that reaches it, some desires or emotions toward the recovery of its native liberty should arise; yet, as it has no sufficient strength of its own, nor finds any way open that can lead to so great a blessing, these ineffectual wishes come to nothing; and the unhappy soul having lost its hopes, languishes in its chains, and is at last quite stupified.

Philosophy, as we have already observed, perceiving that man was born to higher views

^{*} Nemo adeo ferus est, ut non mitescere possit Huic modo doctrinæ patientem commodet aurem.

than this world affords, attempted to raise him from his present dejection, secure his claim to heaven, and restore him to a conformity and likeness to God; but in vain. To redeem the sons of man, and restore them to what they had lost, it was necessary that the eternal Son of God should come down from heaven. Our fall was easily brought about, but our restoration was a work of the greatest difficulty, and only to be performed by the powerful hand of God. There are but few whom the exalted Father of spirits has loved, and Christ has raised up to heaven. He is the source whence the Spirit of God flows down to us; he is the fountain of that new life and sanctified nature, by which we mount toward God, whereby we overcome the world, and, in consequence thereof, are admitted into heaven. And, happy, to be sure, are those truly noble souls whose fate it is to be thus born again, to be admitted into the choirs of the holy angels, and to be clothed with those glorious robes that are whiter than snow! They will follow the Lamb wherever he goes, and he will lead them to the crystal streams, and even to the fountain of life itself.

But all those that are to be the attendants of the Lamb in those blessed pastures which are to be met with in his heavenly country, must, of necessity, even while they live in this lower world, be followers of him in his humble innocence and purity. This spotless, holy, and pure Lamb of God, is the guide and shepherd of a pure and holy flock, a flock dear to God, and of distinguished beauty; but "the shepherd is still more beautiful than they."* But the impure goats and uncleanly hogs he beholds at a distance, and leaves them to unclean spirits, to be possessed by them at pleasure, and afterward to be precipitated into the depth of misery; unless it be determined to deliver some of them from that shocking form, by a wonderful and divine change, and to convert them into lambs, which is effected in proper time, by the influence of the Holy Ghost. Whence they are called the holy, pure, and divine sons of God; and all love to earthly things, all carnal, impure affections, are banished out of those hearts, which are, as it were, temples consecrated henceforth to God: "For the dwelling place of the Holy One must be holy also."†

LECTURE XVII.

TRUE FELICITY AND ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

OW insipid and unsatisfactory are all the pleasures of this earthly life which we now live, in respect of that incomparable and altogether heavenly delight which attends the meditation and contemplation of Divine things! When mortals are thus employed, they eat the bread of angels; and if there are any who do not relish the sweetness of this food, it is because the divine part of their composition is become brutish, and, forgetting its original, lies buried in earth and mud. But though the soul is reduced to these woful circumstances, it is not yet so entirely divested of itself, but it still retains some faint remains of its heavenly original and more exalted nature; insomuch, that it can not acquiesce in, or be at all satisfied with those fading enjoyments wherewith it is surrounded, nor think itself happy or easy in the greatest abundance of earthly comforts. And though, possibly, it may not be fully sensible of what it wants; yet it perceives, not without some pain and uneasiness, that something is still wanting to make it happy. The truth is, besides that great and unknown good, even those whom, by an abuse of that term, we call most happy, are in want of a great many things. For, if we look narrowly into the condition of those who are arrived at the highest pitch of earthly splendor, we shall certainly find some defect and imperfection in it, and be obliged to conclude with the poet, that "since the earth began to be inhabited by men, a full cup of good things, without any mixture of evil, never fell to the share of one man; a graceful body is often dishonored by bad morals, and a mind of uncommon beauty is sometime joined to a deformed body," &c.*

But what we call the chief and supreme good must of necessity be complete and entirely free from every defect: and, therefore, what is not in every respect perfect, properly speaking, is not perfect at all. The happiness of rich and great men, which the poor admire and respect, is only a gaudy and splendid species of misery. What St. Bernard says of the rash and ill-founded opinion which the generality of mankind form of the lives of the saints, from the imperfect knowledge they have of them, "They see our crosses, but they see not our comforts,"† may be here inverted: we see the advantages of those men that are puffed up with riches and honors, but we see not their troubles, and vexations. "I wish," says one, "that those who desire riches would consult rich men; they would then, to be sure, be of another opinion."‡

I will spend no more time in describing or lamenting the wretched state of mankind on this earth, because it would answer no end. For, suppose a more complete assemblage of sublunary enjoyments, and a more perfect system of earthly felicity than ever the sun beheld, the mind of man would instantly devour it, and, as if it were still empty and un-

* ——— Etenim mortabilis ex quo
Tellus cæpta coli, nunquam sincera bonorum
Sors ulli concessa viro; quem corpus honestat Dedecorant mores; animus quem pulchrior ornat Corpus destituit, &c.

† Cruces nostras vident. unctioes non vident.

‡ Utinam, utinam qui divitias appetunt, cum divitiis deliberarent; certe vota mutarent.

* Formosi pecoris custos formosior.

† Ἀγίου γὰρ ἄγιον ἐστὶν δικητήριον.

satisfied, would require something more. And, indeed, by this insatiable thirst, the mind of man discovers its natural excellence and dignity; for thus it proves, that all things here below are insufficient to satisfy or make it happy; and its capacity is so great and extensive, that it can not be filled by the whole of this visible frame of things. For, as St. Augustine observes, "Thou hast made us, O Lord, for thyself, and our hearts are restless till they return to thee."* The mind that makes God its refuge, after it has been much tossed to and fro, and distressed in the world, enjoys perfect peace and absolute security; and it is the fate of those, and those only, who put into this safe harbor, to have what the same St. Augustine calls a very great matter, "The frailty of man, together with the security of God."†

Therefore, it is not without reason, that the royal psalmist boasts not of his victories, nor the splendor of his royal crown, but of this one advantage: The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance, and of my cup; thou maintainest my lot; and, on the justest grounds, he immediately adds, The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage. Psalm xvi. 5, 6. And it is quite agreeable to reason that what improves and completes anything else must be itself more complete and perfect: so that the mind of man can neither be made happy by earthly enjoyments, which are all far inferior to it in dignity, nor be so in itself. Nay, neither can the angels, though of a more perfect and sublime nature, confer felicity either upon men or themselves; but both they and we have our happiness lodged in that Eternal Mind, which alone is its own felicity. Nor is it possible for us to find it anywhere else, but in our union with that Original Wisdom and goodness, from which we at first took our rise. Away, then, with all the fictitious schemes of felicity proposed by the philosophers, even those of them that were most artfully contrived; for even Aristotle's perfection of virtue, as well as what the stoics fancied concerning their wise man, are mere fictions. They are nothing but dreams and fancies, that ought to be banished to Utopia. For what they describe is nowhere to be found among men, and if it were, it would not constitute complete felicity. So far, indeed, they are to be commended, that they call in the mind from external enjoyments to itself; but in this they are defective, that when the mind is returned to itself, they carry it no further, nor direct it to ascend, as it were, above itself. They sometimes, it is true, drop such expressions as these, that "there can be no good disposition of the mind without God;"‡ and that, in order to be happy, the soul must be raised up to divine things: they also tell us, that "the wise man loves God most of all, and for this reason is the most happy man."* But these expressions they drop only at random, and by-the-by. O! how much fuller and clearer are the instructions of the Teacher sent down from heaven: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Matt. v. 3.

But because the purest minds of the saints, while they sojourn in this earth, still retain some mixture of earthly dross, and arise not to perfect purity; therefore they can not yet enjoy the full vision of God, nor, consequently, that perfect happiness which is inseparably connected with it. For they see only darkly, and through a glass. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. But with the advantage even of this obscure light, they direct their steps, and go on cheerful and unwearied. The long-wished-for day will at length come, when they will be admitted into the fullest light. That day, which the unhappy men of this world dread as their last, the sons of light wish for, as their nativity into an endless life, and embrace it with the greatest joy when it comes. And this, indeed, seems to me to be the strongest argument for another life and an immortality to come. For since no complete or absolutely perfect happiness is to be found in this life, it must certainly follow, that either there is no such thing to be had anywhere, or we must live again somewhere after our period here is out. And O! what fools are we, and how slow of heart to believe, who think so rarely, and with such coolness, of that blessed country; and that, in this parched and thirsty land, where even those few who are so happy have only some foretastes of that supreme happiness. But when they remove hence, they shall be abundantly satisfied (or, as the word ought to be translated, inebriauntur, intoxicated), O Lord, with the fatness of thy house, and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. Psalm xxxvi. 9. Thus the divine psalmist expresses it; and, to be sure, it is very surprising that the great and ancient philosopher Pythagoras, in communicating his thoughts upon the same subject, should happen to fall upon the very same figure; for he used to promise those of his disciples who conducted themselves right in this life, that they should be continually drunk† in that which is to come.

But what we said formerly, of the felicity of the life to come, and all that we could say, were we to treat of the same subject over again, is but mere trifling. And yet it is not disagreeable to hear children speak, even with stammering, about the dignity of their father, and of the riches and magnificence of his inheritance. It is pleasant and decent to speak of our native country, even while we are sojourning in a foreign land. But, for the pres-

* Fecisti nos, Domine, propter te, et inquietum est cor nostrum, donec in te redeat.

† Habere fragilitatem hominis et securitatem Dei.

‡ Nullum posse esse in Deo bonam mentem.

* Ἄρα ὁ σόφρος Θεοφιλέστατος, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο εὐδαιμονεστάτος.

† Μεθην ἀναιῶσον.

ent, I shall insist no longer on this subject, but, turning the tables, lay before you that dreadful punishment which stands in opposition to this happiness, by presenting you only with a transient view of the future misery of the wicked. And though this is indeed a most unpleasant task, yet nothing but our own carelessness and inattention can render it useless.

Here, first of all, it is to be observed, that as, in this life, there is no perfect felicity; so neither here is there any complete misery. Those whom we look upon as the most wretched in this world, have their sufferings checked with many intervals of ease. But the misery to come admits of no abatement; it is all of a piece, without admitting any mixture of relief. They are surely mad with their notions, who here talk of the advantages of being or existence, and contend that it is more desirable to be miserably than not to be at all.* For my part, I am fully satisfied they can never persuade any man of the truth of their assertion; nor even believe it themselves, when they think seriously on the subject. But not to insist on this, it is certain that all kind of delights are for ever banished from that eternal and frightful prison. There there is no light, no day, no sleep, which is the blessing of the night, and, indeed, nothing at all but places full of darkness, precipices, nakedness, and all kinds of horror; no entertainments, merry meetings, nor any sensible pleasure; and to be for ever separated from all such must be no small misery, especially to those who used to pass their time amid such scenes of mirth and jollity, and imagined themselves in some measure happy therein. And that the remembrance of this may distress them the more, they will be continually haunted with a thought that will cleave to them like a worm devouring their bowels, and constantly keep them in mind, that out of a distracted fondness for those fleeting pleasures which have now flown away, without hope of returning, they have lost those joys that are heavenly and eternal, whereof they will have some knowledge; but what kind of knowledge that will be, and how far extended to enhance their torments, is not ours to determine. But who will attempt to express the excess of their misery, or describe those streams of brimstone, and eternal flames of Divine wrath? Or rather, who will not tremble, I say not in describing them, but even in thinking of them, and be quite overpowered with an idea so shocking?

That I may no further attempt to speak things unutterable,† and to derogate from a grand subject by inadequate expressions,‡ behold now, my dear youths, if you believe these things, behold, I say, you have now life and death laid before you; choose for yourselves. And that you may not put off a matter of such importance, consider these things, I pray, seriously, and say to your selves, concerning the vanishing shadows of external things, How long will these enjoyments last? O! how soon will they pass! Even while I am speaking these words, while I am thinking of them, they fly past me. Is any one oppressed with calamities? Let them say cheerfully, with a remarkably good man, "Lord, while I am here, kill me, burn me, only spare me there."* Is there any one among you of weak capacity, unhappy in expressing himself, of an unfavorable aspect, or deformed in body? Let him say with himself, "It is a matter of small consequence; I shall soon leave this habitation, and, if I am but good myself, be soon removed to the mansions of the blessed." Let these thoughts prevent his being dejected in mind, or overcome with too much sorrow. If any one is distinguished by a good understanding, or outward beauty, or riches, let him reflect, and seriously consider, how soon all excellencies of this kind will pass away, that he may not be vain, or lifted up with the advantage of fortune. Let it be the chief care and study of you all to avoid the works of darkness, that so you may escape utter and eternal darkness; and to embrace with open and cheerful hearts that Divine light which hath shone from heaven, that, when you are divested of these bodies, you may be received into the glorious mansions of that blessed and perfect light.

* Miserum esse quam non esse.

† Τα ἀάλητρα λαλεισθαι.

‡ Magna modis tenere parvis.

LECTURE XVIII.

THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, AND THAT IT IS THE TRUE WAY TO HAPPINESS.

I CONFESS, young gentlemen, that whenever I think on the subject, I can not help wondering at the indolence and madness of mankind. For though we boast that to order our affairs with prudence and discretion, and conduct our lives according to the principles of reason, is the great privilege and ornament of our nature, which distinguishes us from the brute creatures; how few are there, who, in this respect, act like men, who propose to themselves an end, and direct all their actions to the attainment of it! It is very certain that the greatest part of mankind, with a folly something more than childish, go in quest of painted butterflies, or commonly pursue the birds with stones and clods. And even those who spin out their lives to the utmost extent of old age, for the most part gain little by it, but only this, that they may be called Παῖδες πολυχρόνιοι, very aged children; being as ignorant as infants why they came into the world, and what will become of them when they leave it. Of all questions, therefore, none can be more properly proposed to you, who are just upon the verge of manhood, I mean entering upon a rational life, than this, Whither are you going? What good have you in view? To what end do you propose to live? For hence, possibly, your minds may be excited within you to an earnest desire after that perfect and supreme good; and you may not content yourselves with cool speculations upon this subject, as if it were a logical or philosophical problem that falls in your way of course, but with that application which is proper in a question concerning a matter of the greatest moment, where it highly concerns us to be well informed, and where the highest rewards and greatest dangers are proposed to our view. And in this hope, I have often addressed myself to you upon the subject of happiness, or the supreme good, at different periods of time; entertaining you, in the intervals, with essays and suitable exhortations upon other subjects, yet so as to observe a kind of method, and keep up a connexion throughout the whole. I have taken notice of the name and general notion of happiness, the universal desires and wishes whereby men are excited to the pursuit of it, the no less universal because natural ignorance of mankind, and their errors and mistakes in the search of it. Whence it happens, that, as they all run in the wrong road, the faster they advance, the farther they depart from it; and like those who ply the oars in a boat, they look one way and move another. And though it seemed almost unnecessary, as facts sufficiently demonstrate the truth of our assertion, yet, by a brief recapitulation, wherein we took notice only of the principal heads and classes of things, we proved that happiness is by no means to be found in this earth, nor in any earthly enjoyments whatsoever. And this is no more than all, even fools as well as wise men, are willing to own: they not only pronounce one another unhappy, but, with regard to this life, all of them in general, and every one for himself in particular, acknowledge that they are so. And, in this respect, experience fully justify their relief; so that, if there were no further prospect, I am apt to believe all mankind would agree in that common saying, that "if mankind were apprized beforehand of the nature of this life, and it were left to their own option, none would accept of it."* As the immortality of the soul has a near connexion with this subject, and is a natural consequence from it, we therefore, in the next place, bestowed some time in illustrating that doctrine. In the last place, we advanced some thoughts upon future happiness and misery, so far as is consistent with the weakness of our capacities to comprehend things so little known, and to express such as are in a great measure ineffable.

‡ Domine, hic ure, cæde, modo ibi parcas.

Having treated of these things according to

* Vitam hanc, si scientibus daretur, neminem accepturum.—SENECA.

our measure, it remains that we now inquire about the way which directly leads into that happy city, or to that happiness which is reserved in the heavens. This is a great and important article, comprehending the end and design of our life, as well as the hopes and comforts of it; and is very proper to be first treated of in a catechetical, or, indeed, any methodical system of theology, as appears from reason and precedents: for by this discussion we are immediately introduced into the whole doctrine of true religion. Accordingly, the first question in the generally-received catechism, which you have in your hands, is, "What is your only consolation in life and death?"* And the first question of another catechism, which not long ago was used, particularly in this university, is, "What is the only way to true felicity?"† For the salvation and happiness of mankind, in subordination to the glory of God (which is, to be sure, the supreme end of all), is the peculiar and genuine scope of theology; and from it, the definition of this science seems to be most properly drawn. Nor do I imagine that any one is so weak as hence to conclude that it ought to be called anthropology, rather than theology; for though it not only treats of the happiness of mankind, but also has this happiness, as has been observed, for its chief end and design; yet, with good reason, and on many accounts, it has obtained this more sublime title. It has God for its author, whom the wisest of men would in vain attempt to find out, but from the revelation he has made of himself; every such attempt being as vain as it would be to look for the sun, in the nighttime, by the light of a candle; for the former, like the latter, can only be seen by his own light. God can not be known but so far as he reveals himself: which Sophocles has also admirably well expressed: "You will never," says he, "understand those divine things which the gods have thought proper to conceal, even though you should ransack all nature."‡

Nor has this sacred science God for its author only, but also for its subject and its ultimate end; because the knowledge of him and his worship comprehends the whole of religion, the beatific vision of him includes in it the whole of our happiness, and that happiness is at last resolved into the Divine grace and bounty.

I should therefore choose to give this brief and clear definition of theology, viz.: That it is a divine doctrine, directing man to real felicity as his chief end, and conducting him to it by the way of true religion. I call it a doctrine, because it is not considered here as a habit in the mind, but as a summary of celestial truth. I call it a divine doctrine, for all the reasons already mentioned; because, for

* Quæ est unica tua consolatio in vita et in morte?

† Quæ est unica ad veram felicitatem via?

‡ Ἄλλ' οὐ λάρ ἀν τὰ θεῖα κρύπτοντος Θεοῦ, Μάθοις ἀν, ἀδ' ἔτι πάντ' ἐπέβληθις σκοπῶν.

instance, it is from God, he is the subject of it, and it all terminates in him at last. I call it a doctrine directing man, for I confine my notion of it to that doctrine only which was sent down from heaven for that purpose. What signifiy, then, those distinctions, which are indeed sounding, but quite tedious and foreign to the purpose, that divide theology into archetypal and ectypal, and again into the theology of the church militant, and that of the church triumphant? What they call archetypal theology is very improperly so named, for it is that perfect knowledge (ανωκοσμία) which God has of himself. And the theology of the church triumphant ought rather to be called θεοψα, the beatific vision of God. The theology in question is that day-spring from on high, which hath visited us, to give light to them which sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace. Luke i. 78, 79. That peace is true happiness, and the way of peace is true religion; concerning which I shall offer a few thoughts, and very briefly. First of all, you are to observe that man is not a lawless creature, but capable of a law, and actually subject to one. This expression conveys no harsh, no dishonorable idea; nay, this subjection is so far from being a burden, that it is the greatest honor. To be capable of a law, is the mark and ornament of an intelligent, rational soul, and that which distinguishes it from the brutes: it evidently supposes a resemblance to God, and an intercourse with heaven. And to live actually under the direction of religion and the law, is the great honor and ornament of human life, and that distinguishes it from the irregular conduct of the brute creation. For, as the poet expresses it, "One beast devours another, fishes prey upon fishes, and birds upon birds, because they are subject to no law; but mankind lives under a just law, which makes their condition far preferable."*

The brute creatures devour one another without blame, because they have no law: but, as Juvenal observes, "Men alone, of all earthly creatures, as they derive their reason from the highest heaven, are venerable for their understanding, which renders them capable of inquiring into Divine things, and qualifies them for learning arts, and reducing them to practice."†

And hence it appears that we were born subjects to religion and an eternal law of nature: for since our blessed Creator has thought proper to endow us with a mind and understanding and powers sufficient for that purpose, to be sure we are bound by an indispensable law to acknowledge the primary and

* Ἰχθῆσι μὲν καὶ θηροῖσι, καὶ ὀϊωνοῖσι πεπενηνοῖσι Ἐσθῆιν ἁλλήλοισι, ἐπεὶ οὐ δίκον ἐστὶν ἐν' αὐτοῖσι.
Ἀθροαποῖσι δ' ἔδωκε δίκην ἢ πολλῶν ἀρίστη Γίνεταί.

† ———— Venerabile soli
Sortiti ingenium divinorumque capaces,
Atque exercendis, capiendisque artibus apte
Sensum à cœlesti demissum traximus arce.

JUVENAL, SAT. XV.

eternal Fountain of our own being and of all created things, to love him above all other objects, and obey his commands without reserve or exception. So that in this very law of nature is founded a strong obligation upon us to give due obedience to every Divine positive institution which he shall think proper to add for securing the purposes of religion and equity. Wherefore, when our first parents, by eating the forbidden fruit, transgressed the symbolical command intended as a proof of their obedience, by that very act they most basely broke the primary and great law of nature, which is the foundation of religion, and of every other law whatever.

It is not my intention to speak here of our redemption by the Messiah, the only begotten Son of God the Creator: it is sufficient for our present purpose to observe, that our great Redeemer has indeed delivered us from the chains of sin and death, but has by no means dissolved the bonds of religion, and the everlasting law of nature. Nay, these are, in many respects, strengthened and confirmed by this redemption: and a cheerful submission to them by virtue of his Spirit, who is poured out upon us, is a great part of that royal liberty of the sons of God, which is secured to us by his means, as by imitating his example, we arrive at the full possession of it, which is reserved for us in the heavenly kingdom. The way, therefore, to happiness, which we are in search of, is true religion, and such, in a very remarkable manner, is that of Christianity.

On the truth and excellence of this religion you have a great many learned writers, both ancient and modern. And indeed, it is exceeding plain, from its own internal evidence, that, of all the forms of religion that ever the world saw, there is none more excellent than that of Christianity, which we profess, wherein we glory, and in which we think ourselves happy amid all the troubles of the world: there is none that is more certain and infallible, with regard to its history; more sublime with regard to its mysteries; more pure and perfect in its precepts, or more venerable for the grave simplicity of its rites and worship: nay, it appears evident that this religion alone is, in every respect, incomparably preferable to every other. It remains, young gentlemen—What do you think I am going to say? It remains, that we become true Christians. I repeat it again, if we will be happy, let us be Christians. You will say, "Your wish is easily satisfied: you have your desire—we are all Christians already." I wish it may be so! I will not, however, object to any particular person on this head. But every one of you, by a short trial, wherein he will be both witness and judge, may settle this important point within himself. We are all Christians. Be it so. But are we poor in spirit? Are we humble, meek, and pure in heart? Do we pray without ceasing? Have we nailed all our carnal appetites and desires to our Savior's cross, living no longer to ourselves, but to him that died for us? This is the true description of a Christian, by the testimony of that gospel which we acknowledge to be Christ's. And those who are entire strangers to these dispositions of mind, know not, to be sure, the way of peace. These I earnestly entreat and beseech to rouse themselves, and shake off their indolence and sloth, lest, by indulging the vile desires of the flesh, they lose their souls for ever. But if there are any among you, and, indeed, I believe there are some, who with all their hearts aspire to these Christian virtues, and by their means, to that kingdom, which can never be shaken, Be strong in the Lord, have your loins girt about with truth, and be sober, and hope to the end. You will never repent of this holy warfare, where the battle is so short, the victory so certain, and your triumphal crown, and the peace procured by this conflict, will last for ever.

LECTURE XIX.

THAT HOLINESS IS THE ONLY HAPPINESS ON THIS EARTH.

THE journey we are engaged in is indeed great, and the way up-hill; but the glorious prize which is set before us is also great, and our great and valiant Captain, who has long ago ascended up on high, supplies us with strength. If our courage at any time fails us, let us fix our eyes upon him, and, according to the advice of the apostle, in his divine epistle to the Hebrews (chap. xii. 2), Look unto Jesus, removing our eyes from all inferior objects, that, being carried up aloft, they may be fixed upon him; which the original words seem to import. Then, being supported by the Spirit of Christ, we shall overcome all those obstacles in our way, that seem most difficult to our indolent and effeminate flesh. And though the way from the earth toward heaven is by no means easy, yet even the very difficulty will give us pleasure, when our hearts are thus eagerly engaged and powerfully supported. Even difficulties and hardships are attended with particular pleasure, when they fall in the way of a courageous mind. As the poet expresses it, "Serpents, thirst, and burning sand, are pleasing to virtue. Patience delights in hardships; and honor, when it is dearly purchased, is possessed with the greater satisfaction."*

If what we are told concerning that glorious city, obtain credit with us, we shall cheerfully travel toward it, nor shall we be at all deterred by the difficulties that may be in the way. But, however, as it is true, and more suitable to the weakness of our minds, which are rather apt to be affected with things present and near, than such as are at a great distance, we ought not to pass over in silence that the way to the happiness reserved in heaven, which leads through this earth, is not only agreeable because of the blessed prospect it opens, and the glorious end to which it conducts, but also for its own sake, and on account of the innate pleasure to be found in it, far preferable to any other way of life that can be made choice of, or indeed imagined. Nay, that we may not, by low expressions, derogate from a matter so grand and so conspicuous, that holiness and true religion which leads directly to the highest felicity, is itself the only happiness, as far as it can be enjoyed on this earth. Whatever naturally tends to the attainment of any other advantage, participates, in some measure, of the nature of that advantage. Now the way to perfect felicity, if anything can be so, is a means that, in a very great measure, participates of the nature of its end; nay, it is the beginning of that happiness: it is also to be considered as a part of it, and differs from it, in its completest state, not so much in kind as in degree. So that in Scripture it has the same names: as, for instance, in that passage of the evangelist, This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God. John xvii. 3. That is, not only the way to eternal life, but also the beginning and first rudiments of it, seeing the same knowledge, when completed, or the full beatific vision of God, is eternal life in its fulness and perfection. Nor does the divine apostle make any distinction between these two: Now, says he, we see darkly through a glass; but then we shall see openly, or, as he expresses it, face to face. Now I know in part; but then I shall know as I also am known. I Cor. xiii. 12. That celestial life is called an inheritance in light, Col. i. 12; and the heirs of it, even while they are sojourning in this earth, children of the light, 1 Thess. v. 5; and, expressly, light in the Lord. You were, says the apostle, sometime darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord. Eph. v. 8. They will be there perfectly holy, and without spot; and even here they are called holy, and, in some respect, they are so. Hence it is, that those who are really and truly good and pious, are, in Scripture, often called blessed, though they are not fully and perfectly so. Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord. Psalm cxii. 1. And blessed are the undefiled in the way. Psalm cxix. 1.

Even the philosophers give their testimony to this truth; and their sentiments, on this subject, are not altogether to be rejected: for they almost unanimously are agreed, that felicity, so far as it can be enjoyed in this life, consists solely, or at least principally, in virtue. But, as to their assertion, that this virtue is perfect in a perfect life, it is rather expressing what were to be wished, than describing things as they are. They might

* ——— Serpens, sitis, ardor arenæ Dulcia virtuti. Gaudet patientia duris:
Lætius est quoties magno sibi constat honestum.
LUCAN, lib. ix., 9.

have said with more truth and justice, that it is imperfect in an imperfect life; which, no doubt, would have satisfied them, if they had known that it was to be made perfect in another place, and another life, that truly deserves the name, and will be complete and perfect. In this, however, we heartily agree with them, that virtue, or, as we rather choose to express it, piety, which is absolutely the sum and substance of all virtues and all wisdom, is the only happiness of this life, so far as it is capable thereof.

And if we seriously consider this subject but a little, we shall find the saying of the wise king Solomon concerning this wisdom, to be unexceptionably true: Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

Both religion require anything of us more than that we live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world? Now what, I pray, can be more pleasant or peaceable than these? Temperance is always at leisure, luxury always in a hurry: the latter weakens the body and pollutes the soul; the former is the sanctity, purity, and sound state of both. It is one of Epicurus's fixed maxims, that "life can never be pleasant without virtue."* Vices seize upon men with the violence and rage of furies; but the Christian virtues replenish the breast which they inhabit, with a heavenly peace and abundant joy, and thereby render it like that of an angel. The slaves of pleasure and carnal affections, have within them, even now, an earnest of future torments; so that in this present life, we may truly apply to them that expression in the Revelations, They that worship the beast have no rest day nor night. "There is perpetual peace with the humble," says the most devout à Kempis; "but the proud and the covetous are never at rest."†

If we speak of charity, which is the root and spring of justice, what a lasting pleasure does it diffuse through the soul! "Envy," as the saying is, "has no days of festivity;"‡ it enjoys not even its own advantages, while it is tormented with those it sees in the possession of others. But charity is happy, not only in its own enjoyments, but also in those of others, even as if they were its own: nay, it is then most happy in the enjoyment of its own good things, when, by liberality, it makes them the property of others. In short, it is a Godlike virtue.¶ There is nothing more Divine in man, "than to wish well to man, and to do good to as many as one possibly can."§ But piety, which worships God in constant prayer, and celebrates him with the highest praises, raises man above himself, and gives him rank among the angels. And contemplation, which is indeed the most genuine and purest pleasure of the human soul, and the very summit of felicity, is nowhere so sublime and enriched, as it will be found to be in true religion, where it may expatiate in a system of Divine truths most extensive, clear, and infallibly certain, mysteries that are most profound, and hopes that are the most exalted: and he that can render these subjects familiar to his mind, even on this earth, enjoys a life replete with heavenly pleasure.

I might enlarge greatly on this subject, and add a great many other considerations to those I have already offered; but I shall only further observe, that that sweet virtue of contentment, so effectual for quieting the mind, which philosophy sought for in vain, religion alone has found; and also discovered, that it takes its rise from a firm confidence in the almighty power of Divine Providence. For what is there that can possibly give uneasiness to him who commits himself entirely to that Paternal Goodness and Wisdom, which he knows to be infinite, and securely devolves the care of all his concerns upon it.

If any of you object (what has been observed before), that we often see good men meet with severe treatment, and also read that many are the afflictions of the just; I answer, do you not also read what immediately follows? But the Lord delivereth him out of them all. Psalm xxxiv. 19. And it would be madness to deny, that this more than compensates the other. But neither are the wicked quite exempted from the misfortunes and calamities of life; and when they fall upon them, they have nothing to support them under such pressures, none to extricate or deliver them.

But a true Christian, encouraged by a good conscience, and depending upon the Divine favor, bears with patience all these evils, by the efforts of generous love and unshaken faith: they all seem light to him; he despises what he suffers, while he waits with patience for the object of his hope. And, indeed, what, either in life or in death, can he be afraid of, whose life is hid with Christ in God; and of whom it may be justly said, without exaggeration, "If the world should be crushed and broken to pieces, he would be undaunted, even while the ruins fell upon his head?"

LECTURE XX.

OUR HAPPINESS, PARTICULARLY THAT IT LIES IN GOD, WHO ALONE CAN DIRECT US TO THE TRUE WAY OF ATTAINING TO IT; THAT THIS WAY HE HAS DISCOVERED IN THE SACRED SCRIPTURES, THE DIVINE AUTHORITY WHEREOF IS ASSERTED AND ILLUSTRATED.

THESE two expressions, that "there is a beginning, and that there is also an end,"† con-

* Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinae.—HOR., lib. iii., Od. 3.

† Ἐστὶν ἀρα τὸς ἀρχῆ, καὶ ἔστιν ἀρα τὸ τέλος.

* Ἄνευ ἀρετῆς οὐκ εἶναι ἡδὺς ζῆν.

† Jugis pax cum humili, superbus autem et avarus nunquam quiescunt.

‡ Invidia festos dies non agit.

¶ Ἀρετῆ θεο-εὐκλος.

§ Omnibus bene velle, et quam plurimis possit benefacere.

vey matters great in themselves, and which ought to be considered as of vast importance to us. It is absolutely necessary that there should be some one Principle of all things; and by an equal degree of necessity, this Principle must be, of all others, the greatest and the best. It is also necessary that He who gave being to all things, must have proposed to himself some end to be attained by the production and disposal of them; but, as the end of the Best of all agents must itself also be the highest and the best, this end can be no other than himself. And the reasonings of the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, concerning the oath of God, may also be applied to this case: As he had no greater to swear by, says the apostle, he swore by HIMSELF. In like manner, as he had no greater or better end to propose, he proposed HIMSELF. He hath made all things for himself, says the author of the book of Proverbs, even the wicked for the day of evil. Prov. xvi. 4. And the apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, gives us a lively description of that incomparable circle, the most complete of all figures: Of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever, Amen. Rom. x. 36.

Now man, the ornament and masterpiece of all the visible creation, by extraordinary art, and in a method peculiar to himself, returns to his first Original, and has his Creator, not only for the principle of his being, and of his well-being, but also for his end. Thus, by a wonderful instance of wisdom and goodness, God has so connected his own glory with our happiness, that we can not properly intend or desire the one, but the other must follow of course, and our felicity is at last resolved into his eternal glory. The other works of God serve to promote his honor; but man, by rational knowledge and will, offers himself, and all that he has, as a sacrifice to his Creator. From his knowledge of him, he is induced to love him; and in consequence of his love, he attains at last to the enjoyment of him. And it is the wisdom, as well as the happiness of man, to propose to himself, as the scope and ultimate end of his life, that very thing which his exalted Creator had proposed before.

But, that we may proceed gradually in our speculations upon this subject, we must first conclude, that there is a proper end intended for man; that this end is suited to his nature, and perfectly accommodated to all his wants and desires; that so the principal part of this wonderful fabric may not be quite irregular, and labor under a manifest imperfection.

Nor can there be a more important speculation, nor one more worthy of man, than that which concerns his own end, and that good which is fully and perfectly suited to his circumstances. Chance of fortune must, of necessity, have a great influence in our life, when we live at random: we must, therefore, if we be wise, or rather that we may be wise, propose to ourselves an end, to which all our actions ought to have a reference, and by which, as a certain fixed star, we are to direct our course. But it is surprising to observe, how much all the wisest men among the heathens were perplexed in their inquiries after this end, and into how many different opinions they were divided about it. Of this, however, we have spoken at greater length in another place.

Now, to be brief, it is necessary, that this good, or end, should be "perfectly suitable, not easily taken away, nay, such as we can by no means be deprived of; and finally, it must consist of such things as have a particular relation to the soul, and not of eternal enjoyments."* Whence "slavish and brutal pleasures,"† vain and perishing honors and riches, which only serve to support and promote the former, are in this inquiry, justly, and without the least hesitation, hissed off the stage by all sound philosophers; who with great unanimity acknowledge, that our felicity consists solely, or at least principally, in virtue. But your favorite philosopher, Aristotle, and the peripatetics who are his followers, seem to doubt whether virtue alone be sufficient for this purpose, and not to be very consistent with themselves. The stoics, who proceeded with greater courage, and acted more like men, affirmed, that virtue was fully sufficient for this purpose, without the helps and supplements required by the former. And that, while they bestowed such high praises on virtue, they might not seem to have quite forgotten God, they not only said, that virtue was something Divine, in which they were joined by Aristotle, but also concluded, that their wise man did all things "with a direct reference to God."‡ It was also a general maxim with the followers of Plato, that "the end of man is, to be, as far as is possible, made like unto God."§ And Plato himself, in his second book of laws, and in his Phædo, asserts, that man's chief good is the knowledge of the truth: yet, as this knowledge is not perfect in the present life, he is of opinion, that it can scarcely be said of any man, that he is happy here below; but there is hope to be entertained concerning the dead, provided they are purified before they leave the world. But there are two things particularly, with regard to this question, which our religion and most precious faith teaches with incomparably greater fulness and evidence, than all the schools and books of the philosophers.

1. That our felicity is not to terminate in ourselves, but in God. Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord; and, The pure in heart shall see God. Psalm cxii. 1; Matt. v. 8.

† Τελείον, καὶ ἀνταρκές, καὶ ὀυσαφάμετον, ἰμο ἀναφάιστον, καὶ τὸν περὶ ψυχῆς, καὶ οὐ τὸν ἔκτος.

‡ Ἀνθρωποῦδεις καὶ θεοῦδεις ἦδοναι.

§ Μετ' ἀναφορᾶς εἰς τὸν Θεόν.

|| Τέλος ἀνθρώπου ἰμοῖσιν Θεῷ κατα τὸ δόξατον.

“To seek God,” says St. Augustine, “is to desire happiness; and to find him is that happiness.”*

2. That our happiness is not confined within the limits of this short life, nor does it end with it: on the contrary, it is scarce begun in this world, but when the present life comes to a period, then this happiness is completed and becomes eternal. Our life on this earth, therefore, is only so far happy as it has a resemblance to that we shall enjoy in heaven, and becomes, as it were, an earnest of it: that is, when it is employed in pure and sincere piety, in obedience to the will of God, and an ambition to promote his glory, till we arrive at that happy state, where our hunger and thirst shall be abundantly satisfied, and yet our appetites never cloyed.

For it is evident, that man, in this life, becomes so much the more perfect and happy, in proportion as he has his mind and affections more thoroughly conformed to the pattern of that most blessed and perfect life. And this is, indeed, the great ambition of a true Christian; this is his study, which he ceases not to pursue with ardor day and night: nor does he let so much as one day pass without copying some lines of that perfect pattern. And the more he advances in purity of mind, the greater progress he makes in the knowledge and contemplation of Divine things.

But who will instruct us with regard to the means of reaching this blessed mark? Who will show us how we may attain this conformity to God, and most effectually promote his honor and glory, so that at last we may come to the enjoyment of him in that endless life, and be for ever satisfied with the beatific vision of him? What faithful guide shall we find to direct us in this way? Surely he himself must be our leader: there is no other besides him who can answer our purpose. It is he alone that acquaints us with his own nature, as far as it is necessary for us to know it; and he alone that directs us to the way wherein he chooses to be worshipped. “God can not be known but by his own revelation of himself.”† When he is pleased to wrap himself up in a cloud, neither man in his original integrity, nay, nor even the angels, can know or investigate his nature or his intentions. We are indeed acquainted in the sacred records, That the heavens declare the glory of God (Psalm xix. 1); and this, to be sure, is very true in certain respects; but they do by no means declare the hidden mysteries of the Creator, nor his intentions, and the manner of that worship and service he requires from his reasonable creatures. And therefore the psalmist, having begun the psalm with the voice and declaration of the heavens, immediately after mentions another light much clearer than the sun himself, and a volume or book more perfect than the language of all the spheres. Nothing is more certain than that the doctrine which leads us to God, must take its rise from him: for, by no art whatever can the waters be made to rise higher than their fountain. It was therefore absolutely necessary for the purpose I have mentioned, that some revelation concerning God should be made to mankind by himself: and, accordingly, he did reveal himself to them from the beginning. And these revelations, the father of lies mimicked by those delusions of his, that were published by the heathen oracles. The Divine wisdom, in revealing himself to mankind, has thought proper, at different periods of time, to make use of different methods and ways, or, according to that of the Epistle to the Hebrews, at sundry times, and in divers manners; but at last it seemed good to him, that this sacred doctrine should be committed to writing, that with the greater certainty and purity it might be handed down to succeeding ages. If we consider his absolute power, it would certainly have been as easy for him to have preserved this doctrine pure and entire, without committing it to writing; but, for the most part, he has been pleased to make use of means naturally suited and adapted to his purpose, and disposes all things so as effectually to secure his ends, yet, in an easy natural manner, suited to our capacities and conceptions of things.

If any one would prove, that these books, which we receive as such, are in fact the repositories of this sacred and celestial doctrine, the most proper method he could take, would be first to show that the sacred history and doctrines contained in them, are true; and then from their own testimony to conclude them Divine.

For, the truth of our religion being once well established, it is, to be sure, a most just postulatum, and such as ought not to be denied to any sect of men, that in this instance, the testimony of the Christian church should be believed, when it points out the books wherein the sum and substance of that religion are originally and authentically deposited.

The truth of the sacred history being once granted, the Divinity of the doctrine will naturally follow of course, as the history mentions so many and so great miracles that were wrought in confirmation of the doctrine: those particularly that were performed in proof of the Old Testament by Moses, the servant of God, by whose ministry the law was given to the Jews; and those that were wrought in confirmation of the New, by Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, and author of the Evangelic Law; as, also, those that were wrought by his servants the apostles, and other Christians. And absolutely to deny the force of all these, would be an instance of impudence and obstinacy so great, that the keenest enemies of the Christian name of old, did not venture upon it. But the Scriptures have two great evidences of their Divinity,— their own internal character, and that external testimony.

* Secutio Dei appetitus beatitatis, consecutio beatitas.

† Non potest Deus, nisi de Deo, intelligi.

There are two things which principally prove their external character. 1. The incomparable sublimity and purity of the doctrine they contain: for in vain will you look for such profound mysteries, and such pure and holy precepts, anywhere else. 2. The inimitable and evidently Divine majesty of the style, attended, at the same time, with a surprising and wonderful simplicity. Their voice is not the voice of man; but the whole of them, notwithstanding their great extent, sounds something more grand than can be expected from the mouths of mortal men. Nor ought we to pass over that Divine efficacy which the Scriptures have not only to move the minds of men, but also, by a Divine operation,* to change them into something quite different from what they were before: according to that of Lactantius, "Give me a fierce, cruel, and passionate man, with a few of the words of God I will make him as meek as a lamb," &c.† And the external testimony already mentioned, has, to be sure, as much weight as anything of that kind can possibly have. Who would deny to the regular succession of the catholic church, the credit of a witness? Who, on the other hand, would claim the authority of a judge and arbitrator? It would be quite silly to ascribe to the church a decisive power; as if, when a book were first presented to it, or brought out of any place where it had been long concealed, it could immediately pronounce whether that book was of Divine authority or not. The church is only a witness with regard to those books we acknowledge; and its testimony extends no further than this, that they were received in the first ages of Christianity, as sacred and Divinely inspired, and, as such, handed down from age to age, to the church that now is. And he that would venture to discredit this testimony, must have a heart of lead and a face of brass.

There is no occasion to dispute so fiercely about the inward testimony of the Holy Ghost: for I am persuaded that those who talk about it, understand nothing more by it, than that the Holy Spirit produces in the hearts of men that faith whereby they cheerfully and sincerely receive these books, and the doctrine contained in them, as Divine: because such a faith either includes, in the very notion of it, or at least is necessarily connected with, a religious frame of mind, and a sincere disposition to universal obedience. And he that believeth, as the Apostle John expresseth it, has this testimony in himself, though he can not convey, or transfer it to others, 1 John v. 10. Now, to assert the necessity of such an internal testimony, is nothing more than to say, that whatever evidence the Scripture may have it itself, or from other considerations, yet, the Divine faith of this truth must be from above. And he that would deny this, would thereby plainly discover that he was an entire stranger to that faith itself. "The Scripture," says Thomas à Kempis, "must surely be believed and understood, by means of the same Spirit by whom it was at first delivered."* And, as St. Augustine expresses it, "the only effectual teacher is he who has his chair in heaven, and yet, instructs the hearts of men on this earth."† The same Divine Spirit plants faith in the mind, together with the proper intelligence of Divine things, and daily augments and improves these dispositions. This great gift of the Spirit is, therefore, to be sought by fervent and constant prayer; and the Son of God, who is truth itself, has assured us, that his most bountiful Father will give it to those that ask him. Aristotle has told us, that "Divine inspiration is to be sought by sacrifices."‡ And it is no less true, that "the faith and understanding of things revealed by Divine inspiration, are to be sought by prayer."|| Varro tells us, that he wrote first of human, and then of Divine institutions, because societies of men existed first, and the latter were instituted by them. True religion, on the contrary, instead of being instituted by any city or society on earth, hath instituted a city altogether heavenly and Divine, and is itself inspired by God, who is the giver of eternal life, to all that worship him in sincerity.§

* Θεουργῶ μεταμορφώσιαι.

† Da mihi f-rum, &c., ut supra.

It is truly surprising to observe how differently this religion was of old received among men, and what different entertainment it meets with even to this day, though the doctrine has been always the same, though it is still enforced by the same arguments, and has the same difficulties and prejudices to struggle with. When the divine apostle preached in the Areopages at Athens, a great many mocked and ridiculed him: others said, We will hear thee again of this matter: but certain men clave unto him, and believed. Acts xvii. 32, 34. And that we may not think this faith, in those who believed, was owing to their uncommon penetration or sagacity on the one hand, or to their weakness and simplicity on the other, of the two mentioned in Scripture, who believed on this occasion, the one was a philosopher, and the other a woman. Now, though, without doubt, human liberty is to be allowed its due weight in this matter, yet, we can not help acknowledging, that a certain influence or energy¶ seems to discover itself here.

The basis of religion is faith,—just apprehension or *right notions of God, according to Epictetus. St. Ignatius says, "Faith is the

* Eodem certe spiritu et credenda et intelligenda sacra scriptura, quo tradita est.

† Qui cathedram habet in celo, corde docet in terris.

‡ Τὸ θεόπνευστον ταῖς θυσίαις ζητητέον.

|| Τῶν τῶν θεοπνευστων πιστων και σενσεων εσχαις ζηητητέον.

§ St. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. vi., c. 3.

¶ Θεϊαν τινα μοτραν vel ενεργειαν.

 Ὅρθαι ὑπολήψεις.

beginning of life, and love the end of it."* And the words of the apostle are, He that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. So that the giving of a law to man, and the enforcing it with the motives of rewards and punishments, is not inconsistent with the filial and disinterested obedience of a rational creature, even in a state of innocence.

All true and lively faith begets love; and thus, that heavenly light is the vehicle of heat. And as, by this means, true faith has a tendency to the practice of obedience, so, all true obedience depends upon faith, and flows from it. But it also proceeds from love, because faith first produces love, and then works by it. All knowledge of mysteries is vain and of no value, unless it have an influence upon the affections, and thereby, upon the whole conduct of life. The luminaries of heaven are placed on high; but they are so placed, that they may shine, and perform their periods, for the benefit of this earth. Gen. i. 17.

We must first believe, that God is. This truth is written in capital letters on every page of the sacred books of Scripture; for all things that are therein delivered by God, and concerning him, confirm this, and take it for a primary and undoubted principle. But these sacred books acknowledge another universal evidence of this leading truth, and an evidence quite distinct from theirs, to which they refer all, even the most obstinate unbelievers and those that are entirely ignorant of this celestial doctrine, for full conviction. Rom. i. 20. As it is quite plain, that the testimony of the written word will have little or no influence upon men who have not received the least tincture of Divine faith, should any person, disputing with them, reason after this manner—There is a God, because this is asserted in the sacred Scriptures, and their testimony must by all means be believed, because they are the word of God;—an argument of this kind, to be sure, would have no other effect than to expose the person who urged it, to the ridicule of atheists and unbelievers; because it evidently begs the question, and runs into a vicious circle. He, therefore, who would bring over such persons to the faith, must reason after a quite different manner. But let him, on the other hand, who once accepts these books with the submission due to their real dignity and Divine authenticity, receive light and edification from them on every article of faith, and with regard to the whole system of religion in general. Let him, also, in congratulation to their exalted Author, cry out, With thee, O Lord, is the fountain of life; and in thy light we shall see light. Ps. cxvii. 9. And let him that desires to be, not only a nominal proficient in theology, but φιλόθεος και θεοδιδάκτος—a real lover of God, and willing to be taught by him, resolve within himself, above all things, to make this sacred volume his constant study, mixing his reading with frequent and fervent prayer: for if this be omitted, his labor will be altogether in vain, supposing him to be ever so well versed, not only in these books, but also to have all the advantages that can be had from the knowledge of languages, and the assistance of commentators and interpreters. Different men have different views in reading this book. As, in the same field, the ox looks for grass, the hound for a hare, and the stork for a lizard, some fond of critical remarks, pick up nothing but little stones and shells; others run in pursuit of sublime mysteries, giving themselves but very little trouble about the precepts and instructions that are clear and evident, and these plunge themselves into a pit that has no bottom. But the genuine disciples of this true wisdom, are those who make it their daily employment, to purify their hearts by the water of those fountains, and reduce their whole lives to a conformity with this heavenly doctrine. They desire not to know these things, only that they may have the reputation of knowledge, or to be distinguished in the world; but that their souls may be healed, and their steps directed, so that they may be led through the paths of righteousness, to the glorious felicity which is set before them.

The sum of all is, that our felicity lies solely and entirely in that blessed God, who is also the fountain and source of our being; that the only means of our union with him, is true religion; and this, again, consists in our entertaining just notions of God, worshipping him acceptably, and endeavoring after a constant and unwearied obedience to all his commands, according to that most pure and perfect rule laid down in those Divine books which we profess to receive as such. Let us, therefore, have constantly fixed in our minds these words of the psalmist, Blessed are the undefiled in the way, that walk in the way of the Lord. Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently. O! that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes. Ps. cxix. 1-4, 5.

LECTURE XXI.

THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES.

OF all the maxims that are naturally written on the heart of man, there is none more certain or more universally known, than THAT GOD IS; concerning which I have given a dissertation some time ago. But of all the secrets and hidden things of nature, which have been the subject of human study and inquiry, there is nothing, by a prodigious odds, so difficult or unsearchable, as to know WHAT HE IS. The saying of St. Augustine concerning time is well known in the schools; with how much greater truth might it be said of Him, who is more ancient than time, and "who bade time flow from the beginning,"* That he hath made darkness his hiding-place, and amidst that darkness dwells in light inaccessible. Psalm xviii. 11. Which, to our eyes, is to be sure more dark than darkness itself! "O the Divine darkness!" says a great man;† and another, most acutely, "If you divide or cut asunder this darkness, who will shine forth?"‡ When, therefore, we are to speak of him, let us always call to remembrance the admonition which bids us speak with reverence and fear. For what can we say that is worthy of him, since man, when he speaks of God, is but a blind person describing light? Yet, blind as we are, there is one thing we may, with great truth, say of that glorious light, and let us frequently repeat it: O when will that blessed day shine forth, which shall deliver the soul from those thick integuments of flesh, that like scales on the eye, obstruct its sight, and shall introduce it into a more full and open view of that primitive, and eternal Light! Perhaps, the properest answer we could give to the question, What is God? would be to observe a most profound silence; or, if we should think proper to give any answer it ought to be something next to this absolute silence: viz. GOD IS; which gives us a higher and better idea of him, than any thing we can either express or conceive.

* Ἀρχὴ ζωῆς πίστις, τέλος δὲ ἠγάπη.

Theological writers mention three methods whereby men come to some kind of knowledge of God themselves, and communicate that knowledge to others, viz., the way of negation, the way of causation, and the way of eminence. Yet the very terms that are used to express these ways, show what a faint knowledge of the invisible Being is to be attained by them; so that the last two may be justly reduced to the first, and all our knowledge of this kind called negative. For, to pretend to give any explanation of the Divine essence as distinct from what we call his attributes, would be a refinement so absurd, that under the appearance of more accurate knowledge, it would betray our ignorance the more. And so unaccountable would it be to attempt any such thing, with regard to the unsearchable majesty of God, that possibly the most towering and exalted genius on earth ought frankly to acknowledge, that we know neither our own essence, nor that of any other creature, even the meanest and most contemptible. Though, in the schools, they distinguish the Divine attributes or excellencies, and that by no means improperly, into communicable and incommunicable; yet we ought so to guard this distinction, as always to remember that those which are called communicable, when applied to God, are not only to be understood in a manner incommunicable and quite peculiar to himself, but also, that in him they are, in reality, infinitely different from those virtues, or rather, in a matter where the disparity of the subjects is so very great, those shadows of virtues that go under the same name either in men or angels. For it is not only true, that all things, in the infinite and eternal Being, are infinite and eternal, but they are also, though in a manner quite inexpressible, HIMSELF. He is good without quality, great without quantity, &c. He is good in such a sense as to be called by the evangelist, the only good Being, Matt. xix. 17. He is also the only wise Being: To the only wise God, saith the apostle. 1 Tim. i. 17. And the same apostle tells us, in another place, that he only hath immortality; 1 Tim. vi. 16, that is, from his own nature, and not from the will or disposition of another. "If we are considered as joined to, or united with God," says an ancient writer of great note, "we have a being, we live, and in some sort are wise; but if we are compared with God, we have no wisdom at all, nor do we live, or so much as have any existence."* All other things were by him brought out of nothing, in consequence of a free act of his will, by means of his infinite power; so that they may be justly called mere contingencies, and he is the only necessarily existent Being. Nay, he is the only really existent Being; τὸ ὄντως ὄν; or as Plotinus expresses, τὸ ὑπερόντως ὄν. Thus, also, the Septuagint speaks of him as the only existent Being, ὁ ὄν. And so also does the heathen poet.† This is likewise implied, in the exalted name Jehovah, which expresses his being, and that he has it from himself; but what that being is, or wherein its essence, so to speak, consists, it does not say; nor if it did, could we at all conceive it. Nay, so far is that name from discovering what his being is, that it plainly insinuates that his existence is hid and covered with a veil. I am who I am: or, I am what I am. As if he had said, I myself know what I am, but you neither know nor can know it; and if I should declare wherein my being consists, you could not conceive it. He has, however, manifested in his works and in his word, what it is our interest to know, that he is the Lord God, merciful and gracious, abundant in goodness and truth.

We call him a most pure Spirit, and mean to say, that he is of a nature entirely incorporeal: yet, this word, in the Greek, and Hebrew, and all other languages, according to its primitive and natural signification, conveys no other idea than that of a gentle gale, or wind, which every one knows to be a body, though rarefied to a very great degree: so that, when we speak of that Infinite

* Qui tempus ab ævo

Ire jubet. ΒΟΕΘ. Cons. Phil., lib. iii., met. 9.

† ὅτι τὸ θεῶν σκότος.

‡ Ἄν τὸ σκότος πέμψῃ, ὃ τὴν ἀναστράπτειται.

* Deo si conjungimur, sumus, vivimus, sapimus; Deo si comparamus, nec sapimus omnino, nec vivimus, imo nec sumus. GREG. MAG. MOR.

† Οὐδὲ τις ἐστὶ ἕτερος χωρὶς μεγάλου βασιλῆος.

Purity, all words fail us; and even when we think of it, all the refinements of the acutest understanding are quite at a stand, and become entirely useless. It is, in every respect, as necessary to acknowledge his eternity as his being; provided that, when we mention the term, God, we mean by it the First Being, supposing that expression to include also his self-existence. This idea of a First and eternal Being is again inseparably connected with an infinite degree of all possible perfection, together with immutability, and absolute perseverance therein. But all these are treated of, at great length, in theological books, whereof you have a very large collection.

In like manner, if we suppose God to be the first of all Beings, we must unavoidably therefrom conclude his unity. As to the ineffable Trinity subsisting in this Unity, a mystery discovered only by the sacred Scriptures, especially in the New Testament, where it is more clearly revealed than in the Old, let others boldly pry into it, if they please, while we receive it with an humble faith, and think it sufficient for us to admire and adore.

The other attributes that used to be mentioned on this subject may be supposed to be perfectly comprehended under the following three, viz., power, wisdom, and goodness: for holiness, justice, mercy, infinite bounty, &c., may be, with great propriety, ranked under the general term of goodness.

But rather than insist upon metaphysical speculations, let us, while we walk daily in these pleasant fields, be constantly culling fresh and never-fading flowers. "When the psalmist cries out, Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised, and of his greatness there is no end, he wanted to show," saith St. Augustine, "how great he is. But how can this be done? Though he repeated, Great, Great, the whole day, it would have been to little purpose, for he must have ended at last, because the day would have ended; but his greatness was before the beginning of days, and will reach beyond the end of time."* The poet expresses himself admirably well: "I will praise thee, O blessed God, with my voice, I will praise thee also, with silence. For thou, O inexpressible Father, who canst never be known, understandest the silence of the mind, as well as any words or expressions."[†]

* Volebat dicere quam magnus sit, sed hoc qui fieri potest? Etsi tota die magnum dicerit, parum esset, finiret enim aliquando, quia, finiretur dies; magnitudo autem illius ante dies, et ultra dies.

* Ὑμῶ σὺ μάκαρ,
καὶ διὰ φωνᾶς.
Ὑμῶ σὺ μάκαρ,
καὶ διὰ σιγᾶς.
* Ὅσα γὰρ φωνᾶς
τῶσα καὶ σιγᾶς,
Ἄεισι νοεῖται.
Πάτερ ἀγνωστέ,
Πάτερ ἄρρητε.—SYN. HYMNOS., 4to.

LECTURE XXII.

HOW TO REGULATE LIFE ACCORDING TO THE RULES OF RELIGION.

I HAVE NOW, at different times, addressed myself to you upon several subjects of great importance, and of the utmost necessity; though what I have hitherto said, was only designed as a preface or introduction to what I further proposed. But to attempt to prosecute this design at the very end of the year, would be quite improper, and to little or no purpose: I shall, therefore, altogether forbear entering upon it, and for this time, lay before you a few advices, which may be useful, not only in order to employ to greater advantage the months of vacation that are now at hand, but also the better to regulate your whole lives.

And my first advice shall be, to avoid too much sleep, which wastes the morning hours, that are most proper for study, as well as for the exercises of religion, and stupefies and enervates the strength of body and mind. I remember that the famous abbot of Clairvaux, Bernard, when he found the friars sleeping immoderately, used to say, that "they slept like the secular clergy."* And though we do not admit of the severe rules to which the monks subjected themselves, we must at least allow, that the measure and degree of sleep and other bodily refreshments, suitable for a young man devoted to study and devotion, is very far different from that excess in which the common sort of mankind indulge themselves.

Another advice, which is akin to, and nearly connected with, the former, shall be, to observe temperance in eating and drinking. For moderation in sleeping, generally follows sobriety in eating and other sensual gratifications; but that thick cloud of vapors that arises from a full stomach must of necessity overwhelm all the animal spirits, and keep them long locked up in an indolent, inactive state. Therefore, the Greeks, not without reason, express these two duties, to be sober and to be watchful, indifferently by the same term. And the Apostle Peter, that he might make this connexion more evident, uses, indeed, two words for this purpose; but exhorts to these duties as closely connected together, or rather, as if they were, in some respect, but one, Be sober, be vigilant. 1 Pet. v. 8. And in the same epistle, having substituted another word for sobriety, he expresses watchfulness by the same word he had put for sobriety in the other place [Νηψατε]: Be sober and watch. 1 Pet. iv. 7. Both these dispositions are so applied to the mind, as to include a sober and watchful state of the body and senses; as this is exceeding useful, nay, quite necessary, in order to a correspondent frame of the mind, and that disposition both of body and mind, not only subservient, but also necessary to piety and constancy in prayer: Be sober and watch unto prayer. 1 Peter, iv. 7.

* Seculariter dormire

When the body is reduced to its lightest and most active state, still, as it is corruptible, it is, to be sure, a burden to the mind. How much more must it be so, when it is depressed with an immoderate load of meat and drink, and, in consequence of this, of sleep! Nor can the mind rouse itself, or use the wings of contemplation and prayer with freedom, when it is overpowered with so heavy a load: nay, neither can it make any remarkable progress in the study of human literature, but will move slowly and embarrassed, be at a stand, like a wheel-carriage in deep clay. The Greeks very justly expressed the virtue we are now recommending, by the term Σωφροσύνη, it being, as your favorite philosopher, Aristotle, observes in his Ethics, the great preservative of the mind. He is certainly a very great enemy to his own understanding, who lives high and indulges himself in luxury. "A fat belly is seldom accompanied with an acute understanding."* Nor is it my intention in this, only to warn you against drunkenness and luxury; I would willingly hope that such an advice would be superfluous to you: but, in this conflict, I would willingly carry you to such a pitch of victory, that, at your ordinary and least delicious meals, you would always stop some degrees within the bounds to which your appetite would carry you. Consider that, as Cato said, "the belly has no ears;"† but it has a mouth, into which a bridle must be put, and therefore I address not myself to it, but to the directing mind that is set over it, which, for that reason, ought to govern the body with all its senses, and curb them at its pleasure. St. Bernard's words are admirable to this purpose. "A prudent mind devoted to God, ought so to act in its body, as the master of a family in his own house. He ought not to suffer his flesh to be, as Solomon expresses it, like a brawling woman, nor any carnal appetite to act like a rebellious servant; but to inure them to obedience and patience. He must not have his senses for his guides, but bring them into subjection and subserviency to reason and religion. He must, by all means, have his house and family so ordered and well disciplined, that he can say to one, Go, and he goeth, and to another, Come, and he cometh, and to his servant the body, Do this, and it doeth what it is bid without murmuring. The body must also be treated with a little hardship, that it may not be disobedient to the mind."‡ For he, saith Solomon,

* Παχεῖα λατῆρο γηπτόν οὐ τίκειν ὄνον.

† Ventrem non habere aures.

‡ Sic prudens et Deo dicitur animus habere se debet in corpore suo, sicut pater-familias in domo sua. Non habet, sicut Solomon dicit, mulierem litigiosam carnem suam, nec ullum appetitum carnis ut servum rebellum, sed ad obedientiam et patientiam assuefactum. Habeat sensus suos non duces, sed rationi et that delicately bringeth up his servant from a child, shall have him become a (rebellious) son at last. Prov. xxix. 21. This is what I would have you aspire to, a conquest over your flesh, and all its lusts; for they carry on a deadly war against your souls, and their desires are then most to be resisted, when they flatter most. What an unhappy and dishonorable inversion of nature is it, when the flesh commands, and the mind is in subjection; when the flesh, which is vile, gross, earthly, and soon to be the food of worms, governs the soul, that is the breath of God!

Another thing I would have you beware of, is, immoderate speech. The evils of the tongue are many: but the shortest way to find a way for them all, is, to study silence, and avoid, as the poet expresses it, "excessive prating, and a vast desire of speaking."*

He is a perfect man, as the Apostle James expresses it, who offends not in word. James iii. 2. And therefore, doubtless, he that speaks least, offends in this respect more rarely. But, in the multitude of words, as the wise man observes, there wants not sin. Proverbs x. 19. To speak much, and also to the purpose, seldom falls to the share of one man.† Now, that we may avoid loquacity, we must love solitude, and render it familiar, that so every one may have an opportunity to speak much to himself, and little to other people. "We must, to be sure," says † Kempis, "be in charity with all men; but it is not expedient to be familiar with every one."‡ General and indiscriminate conversation with every one we meet, is a mean and silly thing. Even when we promise ourselves comfort and satisfaction from free conversation, we often return from such interviews with uneasiness; or, at least, have spoken and heard such things as, upon serious reflection, may justly give us concern.

But, if we would secure our tongues and senses, or keep safe our hearts and all the issues of life, we must be frequent at prayer, in the morning, at noon, and at night, or oftener throughout the day, and continually walk as in the presence of God; always remembering that he observes not only our words and actions, but also takes notice of our most secret thoughts. This is the sum and substance of true piety; for he who is always sensible that that pure and all-seeing Eye is continually upon him, will never venture to sin with set purpose, or full consent of mind. This sense of the Divine presence would certainly make our life on this earth like that of the angels; for, according to our Lord's expresreligioni servientes et sequaces; habeat omnem omnino domum vel familiam suam sic ordinatam, et discipline subditam, ut dicat huic, Vade, et vadat, et alii, Veni, et veniat, et servo corpori, Facito hoc, et sine murmure fiat quod jubetur; et paulo certe durius tractandum est corpus, ne animo male pareat.

* Improbata garullitas, studiumque immane loquendi

† Χωρίς το ῥ' εἶπεν πολλά καὶ τὰ καίρια.

‡ Charitas certe habenda est erga omnes, sed familiaritas non expedit.

sion, it is their peculiar advantage, continually to behold the face of our Father who is in heaven. By this means, Joseph escaped the snares laid for him by an imperious mistress; and, as if he had thrown water upon it, extinguished that fiery dart with this seasonable reflection: Shall I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? Genesis xxxix. 9. He might have escaped the eyes of men, but he stood in awe of that Invisible Eye from which nothing can be hid. We read of a good man of old, who got the better of a temptation of the same kind, by the same serious consideration; for, being carried from one chamber to another by the woman that tempted him, he still demanded a place of greater secrecy, till having brought him to the most retired place of the whole house, "Here," said she, "no person will find us out, no eye can see us." To this he answered, "Will no eye see? will not that of God perceive us?" By which saying, he himself escaped the snare, and, by the influence of Divine grace, brought the sinful woman to repentance. But now,

Let us pray.

PRAISE waits for thee, O Lord, in Zion; and to be employed in paying thee that tribute is a becoming and pleasant exercise. It is due to thee from all the works of thy hands, but particularly proper from thy saints and celestial spirits. Elevate, O Lord, our minds, that they may not grovel on the earth, and plunge themselves in the mire; but, being carried upward, may taste the pleasures of thy house, that exalted house of thine, the inhabitants whereof are continually singing thy praises. Their praises add nothing to thee; but they themselves are perfectly happy therein, while they behold thy boundless goodness without any veil, admire thy uncreated beauty, and celebrate the praises thereof throughout all ages. Grant us, that we may walk in the paths of holiness, and, according to our measure, exalt thy name even on this earth, until we also be translated into the glorious assembly of those who serve thee in thy higher house.

Remember thy goodness and thy covenant to thy church militant upon this earth, and exposed to dangers amid so many enemies; yet we believe that, notwithstanding all these dangers, it will be safe at last: it may be distressed, and plunged in the waters, but it can not be quite overwhelmed, or finally perish. Pour out thy blessings upon this our nation, our city, and university. We depend upon thee, O Father, without whose hand we should not have been, and without whose favor we can never be happy. Inspire our hearts with gladness, thou who alone art the fountain of solid, pure, and permanent joy; and lead us, by the paths of righteousness and grace, to the rest and light of glory, for the sake of thy Son, our Redeemer, Jesus Christ. Amen.

LECTURE XXIII.

PURITY OF LIFE.

IN every act of religious worship, what a great advantage would it be, to remember that saying of our great Master, which nobody is altogether ignorant of, and yet scarcely any know as they ought: "That God, whom we worship, is a spirit, and therefore to be worshipped in spirit and in truth."* He is a spirit, a most pure spirit, and the Father of spirits: he is truth, primitive truth, and the most pure fountain of all truth: "But we all have erred in heart."† We are indeed spirits, but spirits immersed in flesh; nay, as it were, converted into flesh, and, the light of truth being extinguished within us, quite involved in the darkness of error: and what still sets us in greater opposition to the truth, everything about us is false and delusive: "There is no soundness."‡ How improper, therefore, are we, who are deceitful and carnal,|| to worship that Spirit of supreme truth! Though we pray, and fast often, yet all our sacrifices, as they are polluted by the impure hands wherewith we offer them, must be offensive, and unacceptable to God: and the more they are multiplied, the more the pure and spotless Deity must complain of them, as the grievance is thereby enhanced. Thus, by his prophet, he complained of his people of old: "Your new moons," saith he, "and your appointed feasts, my soul hateth: they are a trouble to me; I am weary to bear them; therefore, when you spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you, and, as it were, turn my back upon you with disdain: but if you will wash you, and make you clean, then come and let us reason together:‡"§ as if he had said, "Then let us converse together, and if there be any difference between us, let us talk over the matter, and settle it in a friendly manner, that our complaints may be turned into mutual embraces, and all your sins being freely and fully forgiven, you may be restored to perfect innocence."—"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; as though they be redder than crimson, they shall be whiter than wool; wash yourselves, and I will also wash you, and most completely wipe away all your stains."

But that we may be the better provided for this useful and altogether necessary exercise of cleansing our hearts and ways, and apply to it with the greater vigor, let us dwell a little upon that sacred expression in the Psalms, "Wherewith shall a young man purify his way?" The answer is, "By taking heed thereto according to thy word."¶ In this ques-

* John iv. 24.

† Ἡμεῖς δὲ πολλοὶ καρδίᾳ πλανώμενοι.

‡ Οὐδὲν ἔργει.

§ Σάρκοιο καὶ ψέσσαι.

¶ Isaiah i. 14—16, 18.

¶ Psalm cxix. 9.

tion, several things offer themselves to our observation.

1. That, without controversy,* purity of life, or conversation, is a most beautiful and desirable attainment, and that it must, by all means, begin at the very fountain, that is, the heart; whence, as Solomon observes, "proceed the issues of life." In the beginning of the Psalm, they are pronounced blessed "who are pure, or undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord." And, in another place, "Truly, God is good to Israel," says the psalmist, "even to such as are of a clean heart."† And the words of our Savior to this purpose are, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."‡ Nor is the true and genuine beauty of the soul anything distinct from this purity and sanctity; this is the true image of its great Creator; that golden crown which most unhappily dropped off the head of man, when he fell: so that, with the greatest justice, we may lament and say, "Wo unto us that we have sinned!" And it is the general design and intention of all religion, all its mysteries, and all its precepts, that this crown may be again restored, at least to some part of the human race, and this image again stamped upon them; which image, when fully completed, and for ever confirmed, will certainly constitute a great part of that happiness we now hope for, and aspire after. Then, we trust, we shall attain to a more full conformity and resemblance to our beloved Head. And, even in this wayfaring state, the more deeply and thoroughly our souls are tintured with the divine flame of charity, joined with this beautiful purity, the more we resemble him who is white and ruddy, and fairer than the sons of men. The Father of mercies has made choice of us, that we may be holy; the Son of God, blessed for ever, has once for all shed his blood upon earth, in order to purify us, and daily pours out his Spirit from heaven upon us, for the same purpose.

But to consider the matter, as it is in itself, where is the person that does not, even by the force of natural instinct, disdain filth and nastiness, or at least prefer to it purity and neatness of body? Now, as the soul greatly excels the body, so much the more desirable is it, that it should be found in a state of beauty and purity. In like manner, were we to travel a journey, who would not prefer a plain and clean way to one that were rough and dirty? But the way of life, which is not the case in other matters, will be altogether such as you would have it or choose to make it. With God's assistance, and the influence of his grace, a good man is at pains to purify his own way; but men of an impure and beastly disposition, who delight to wallow in the mire, may always easily obtain their sordid wish. But I hope that you, disdaining such a brutish indignity, will, in preference to everything else, give your most serious attention to this inquiry, by what means even young men and boys may purify their way, and, avoiding the dirty paths of the common sort of mankind, walk in such as are more pleasant and agreeable.

2. Observe, that purity is not such an easy matter that it may fall by chance in the way of those that are not in quest of it, but a work of great art and industry. Hence you may also learn, that the way, even of young men or boys,* stands very much in need of this careful attention. It is indeed true, that, in some respect, the reformation of youth is easier and sooner accomplished, in that they are not accustomed to shameful and wicked ways, nor confirmed in sinful habits: but there are other regards wherein it is more difficult to reduce that period of life to purity, particularly as it is more strongly impressed with the outward objects that surround it, and easily disposed to imbibe the very worst: the examples and incitements to vice beset youth in greater abundance, and those of that age are more apt to fall in with them.

But whatever may be said of the easiness or difficulty of reforming youth and childhood, it is evident from the question, which, without doubt, is proposed with wisdom and seriousness, that this matter is within the verge of possibility, and of the number of such as are fit to be attempted. Youth is not so headstrong, nor childhood so foolish, but by proper means they can be bent and formed to virtue and piety. Notwithstanding the irregular desires and forwardness of youth, and that madness whereby they are hurried to forbidden enjoyments, there are words and expressions that can sooth this impetuosity, even such, that by them youth can tame and compose itself, By attending to itself and its ways, according to thy word: that matchless word, which contains all those particular words and expressions, not only that are proper to purify and quiet all the motions and affections of the soul, but also, by a certain Divine power, are wonderfully efficacious for that purpose. And what was said of old concerning Sparta and its discipline, may be, with much greater truth, asserted of the Divine law and true religion, viz., that it had a surprising power to tame and subdue mankind.† And this leads us directly to the answer of the question in the text: By attending thereto according to thy word.

This is not, therefore, to be done according to our philosophy, but according to thy word, O eternal Light, Truth, and Purity! The philosophy of the heathens, it is true, contains some moral instructions and precepts that are by no means despicable; but this is only so far as they are agreeable to the word of God and the Divine law, though the philosophers themselves knew nothing of it.

* Ὁμολογουμένως.

† Psalm lxxiii. 1.

‡ Matt. v. 8.

* The Hebrew word used in the text, properly signifies a boy.

† Διαμασίμβροτον.

But the only perfect system of moral philosophy, that ought to be universally received, is the doctrine of Christianity. This the ancient fathers of the primitive church have asserted, and fully proved, to the honor of our religion. But those who spend their lives in the study of philosophy can neither reform themselves nor others, if nature be but a little obstinate; and their wisdom, when it does its utmost, rather conceals vices, than eradicates them; but the Divine precepts make so great a change upon the man, and, subduing his old habits, so reform him, that you would not know him to be the same. If any of you, then, aspire to this purity of mind and way, you must, with all possible care, conform yourself, and everything about you, to the instructions and precepts of this Divine word. Nor think this a hard saying; for the study of purity has nothing in it that is unpleasant or disagreeable, unless you think it a grievance to become like unto God.

Consider now, young men, nay, you who, without offence, will suffer yourselves to be called boys: consider, I say, wherein consists that true wisdom which deserves to be pursued with the most earnest study and application, and whereby, if you will, you may far exceed those that are your superiors in years. Be ambitious to attain the advantage mentioned in the text, and consequently the condition upon which it depends, for they are inseparably connected together. Reconcile your minds to a strict attention to your ways, according to the Divine word; and by this means (which is a very rare attainment), you will reconcile youth, and even childhood, to the purity here recommended. Account the Divine word and precepts preferable to your daily food; yea, let them be dearer to you than your eyes, and even than life itself.

LECTURE XXIV.

BEFORE THE COMMUNION.

It is the advice of the wise man, "Dwell at home," or, with yourself; and though there are very few that do this, yet it is surprising that the greatest part of mankind can not be prevailed upon, at least to visit themselves sometimes; but, according to the saying of the wise Solomon, The eyes of the fool are in the ends of the earth. It is the peculiar property of the human mind, and its signal privilege, to reflect upon itself; yet we, foolishly neglecting this most valuable gift conferred upon us by our Creator, and the great ornament of our nature, spend our lives in a brutish thoughtlessness. Were a man not only to turn in upon himself, carefully to search and examine his own heart, and daily endeavor to improve it more and more in puriety, but also to excite others with whom he conversed, to this laudable practice, by seasonable advice and affecting exhortations, he would certainly think himself very happy in these exercises. Now, though this expedient is never unseasonable, yet, it will be particularly proper on such an occasion as this, to try it upon yourselves; as you are not ignorant, that it is the great apostolical rule with respect to all who are called to celebrate the Divine mysteries. Let every man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. 1 Cor. xi. 28.

I do not here intend a full explication of this mystery, but only to put you in mind, that, in order to a saving use and participation thereof, a twofold judgment must of necessity be formed; the first with respect to our own souls, and the other, to that of the Lord's body. These the apostle considers as closely connected together, and therefore expresses both by the same word. The trial we are to make of ourselves is indeed expressed by the word δοκιμάζειν, which signifies to prove or to try; but immediately after, he expresses it by judging ourselves [Εἰ γὰρ ἑαυτοὺς δοκιμοῦμεν]; For if we should judge ourselves, &c. Whereas, in the preceding verses, he had mentioned the other judgment to be formed, and expressed it by the same word [διακρίνειν], which signifies to judge or discern: [Μὴ διακρίνῃ τὸ σῶμα τοῦ Κυρίου.] Not discerning the Lord's body. And this is that which renders a vast many unworthy of so great an honor; they approach this heavenly feast without forming a right judgment either of themselves or of it. But, that we form a judgment of ourselves, it is necessary that we first bring ourselves to an impartial trial: and, to be sure, I should much rather advise you to this inward self-examination, and heartily wish I could persuade you to it, than that you should content yourselves with a lifeless trial of your memory, by repeating compositions on this subject.

Consider with yourselves, I pray, and think seriously, what madness, what unaccountable folly it is, to trifle with the majesty of the Most High God, and to offer to infinite Wisdom the sacrifices of distraction and folly? Shall we who are but insignificant worms, thus provoke the almighty King to jealousy, as if we were stronger than he, and of purpose run our heads, as it were, against that Power, the slightest touch whereof would crush us to dust? Do we not know, that the same God who is an enlivening and saving light to all that worship with humble piety, is, nevertheless, a consuming fire to all the impious and profane, who pollute his sacrifices with impure hearts and unclean hands? And that those especially who have been employed in his church, and in the Divine offices, yet have not experienced his influence as a pure and shining light, will unavoidably feel him as a flaming fire? Let his saints rejoice and exult before God, for this he not only allows, but even commands: yet, let even those of them who have made the greatest advances in holiness, remember, that this holy and spiritual joy is to be joined with holy fear and trembling: nay, the greater progress they have made in holiness, the more deeply will they feel this impressed upon their minds, so that they can by no means forget it, "The great Eye is over us, let us be afraid."* Great is our God, and holy: even the angels worship him. Let his saints approach him, but with humility and fear; but as for the slothful and those that are immersed in guilt, who securely and with pleasure indulge themselves in impure affections, let them not dare to come near. Yet if there are any, let their guilt and pollution be ever so great, who find arising within them a hearty aversion to their own impurity, and an earnest desire after holiness; behold, there is opened for you a living and pure fountain, most effectual for cleansing and washing away all sorts of stains, as well as for refreshing languishing and thirsty souls. And he who is the living and never-failing fountain of purity and grace, encourages, calls, and exhorts you to come to him. Come unto me, all ye that are athirst, &c. And again, All that the Father giveth me, shall come unto me; and him that cometh unto me, I will by no means reject or cast out. John vi. 37.

Ask yourselves, therefore, what you would be at, and with what dispositions you come to this most sacred table. Say, Whither art thou going, and what seekest thou, O my soul? For it would be an instance of the most extravagant sloth and folly, to set about a matter of so great importance, and so serious, without any end, without the prospect of any advantage, and therefore without any serious turn of mind, or as one doing nothing. Yet this is the case of vast numbers that meet together in Divine assemblies, and at this holy sacrament. Is it any wonder that those should find nothing, who absolutely have nothing in view; and that he who is bound for no harbor, should meet with no favorable wind? They give themselves up to the torrent of custom, and steer not their course to any particular port, but fluctuate and know not whither they are carried; or, if they are alarmed with any sting of conscience, it is only a kind of inconsiderate and irregular motion, and reaches no farther than the exterior surface of sacred institutions. But as for you, who, according to the expression of the angels, seek Jesus, fear not; you will certainly find him, and in him all things. For it hath pleased the Father, that in him all fulness shall dwell. Col. i. 10. So that in him there is no vacuity, and without him, nothing else but emptiness and vanity. Let us embrace him, therefore, with our whole hearts, and on him alone let us depend and rely.

Let his death, which we commemorate by this mystery, extinguish in us all worldly affections. May we feel his Divine power working us into a conformity to his sacred image; and having our strength, as it were, renewed by his means, let us travel toward our heavenly country, constantly following him with a resolute and accelerated pace.

* Ὅμμα μέγα τρομαίνεν.

The concern of purifying the heart in good earnest, taking proper measures for conforming the life to the rules of the gospel, is equally incumbent upon all. For this is the great and true design of all Divine worship, and of all religious institutions; though the greater part of mankind satisfy themselves with the outward surface of them, and therefore catch nothing but shadows in religion itself, as well as in the other concerns of life. We have public prayers and solemn sacraments: yet, if amid all these, one should look for the true and lively characters of Christian faith, or in the vast numbers that attend these institutions, he should search for those that, in the course of their lives, approve themselves the true followers of their great Master, he would find reason to compare them to a "few persons swimming at a great distance from one another, in a vast ocean."*

It has been observed long ago by one, "that in Rome itself he had found nothing of Rome,"† which with too great truth might be applied to religion, about which we make so great a bustle at present; there is scarcely anything at all of religion in it, unless we imagine that religion consists of words, as a grove does of trees. For, if we suppose it lies in the mortification of sin, unfeigned humility, brotherly charity, and a noble contempt of the world and the flesh, whither has it gone and left us? As for you, young gentlemen, if you would apply to this matter in good earnest, you must, of necessity, bestow some time and pains upon it, and not fondly dream that such great advantages can be met with by chance, or in consequence of a negligent and superficial inquiry. If we are to alter the course of our life for the time to come, we must look narrowly into our conduct during the preceding part of it; for the measures to be taken for the future are, in a great degree, suggested by what is past. He acts wisely, and is a happy man, who frequently, nay, daily reviews his words and actions; because he will doubtless perform the same duty with greater ease, and to better purpose, when he is called to it with more than ordinary solemnity. And, therefore, they who have experienced how pleasant this work is, and what a mixture of utility is joined with this pleasure, will apply to it with a cheerful mind, whenever opportunity requires it. As to others, they must of necessity set about it some time or other: I say of necessity, if I am allowed to say it is necessary to avoid the wrath to come, and to obtain peace and salvation. Repentance may possibly appear a laborious and unpleasant work to our indolence, and to repent, may seem a harsh expression: to perish, however, is still more harsh; but a sinful man has no other choice. Our Lord, who is truth itself, being acquainted with the cruel execution performed by Herod upon the Galileans, takes this opportunity to declare to his hearers, that unless they repented, they should all likewise perish. Luke xiii. 3. The Savior of the world, it is true, came for this very purpose, that he might save those that were miserable and lost, from the fatal necessity of being utterly undone; but he never intended to take away the happy and pleasant necessity of repentance: nay, he strengthened the obligation to it, and imposed it as a duty inseparably connected with grace and happiness. And this connexion, he not only preached in expressions to the same purpose with his forerunner, John the Baptist, but even in the very same words: Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Matt. iv. 7. And in another place, having told us that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners, Matt ix. 13, he immediately adds, to what he called those sinners; not to a liberty of indulging themselves in sin, but from sin to repentance. His blood which was shed on the cross is indeed a balsam more precious than all the balm of Gilead and Arabia, and all the ointments of the whole world; but it is solely intended for curing the contrite in heart.

* Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

† Se in Româ, Romæ nihil invenisse.

But alas! that gross ignorance of God that overclouds our mind is the great and the unhappy cause of all the guilt we have contracted, and of that impotence which engages us to continue in it. Had men but the least knowledge how disagreeable and hateful all sinful pollution renders us to his eternal and infinite purity; and, on the other hand, what a likeness to him we attain by holiness, and how amiable we are thereby rendered in his sight; they would look upon this as the only valuable attainment, they would pursue it with the most vigorous efforts of their minds, and would make it their constant study day and night; that, according to the divine advice of the apostle, being cleansed from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, they might perfect holiness in the fear of God. 2 Cor. vi. 9.

AN EXHORTATION TO THE STUDENTS,

UPON THEIR RETURN TO THE UNIVERSITY AFTER THE VACATION.

WE are at last returned, and some are for the first time brought hither by that Supreme Hand which holds the reins of this vast universe, which rules the stormy winds and swelling sea, and distributes peace and war to nations according to its pleasure. The great Lord of the universe, and Father of mankind, while he rules the world with absolute sway, does not despise this little flock, provided we look up unto him, and humbly pray that we may feel the favorable effects of his presence and bounty: nay, he will not disdain to dwell within us, and in our hearts, unless we, through folly, and ignorance of our true happiness, shut the door against him when he offers to come in. He is the Most High, yet has chosen the humble heart for the most agreeable place of his residence on this earth: but the proud and haughty, who look with disdain on their inferiors, he, on his part, despises, and beholds, as it were, afar off. He is most holy, and dwells in no hearts but such as are purged from the dross of earthly affections; and that these may be holy, and really capable of receiving his sacred Majesty, they must, of necessity, be purified. Know ye not, says the divine apostle, that you, even your bodies, are the temples of the Holy Ghost, and therefore are to be preserved pure and holy? 1 Cor. vi. 19. But the mind that dwells within them must be still more holy, as being the priest that, with constant and unwearyed piety, offers up the sacrifices and sweet incense of pious affections, cheerful obedience, ardent prayers, and divine praises, to the Deity of that temple.

Of your studies and exotic learning, I intend not to say much. The knowledge, I own, that men of letters, who are the most indefatigable in study, and have the advantage of the greatest abilities, can possibly attain to, is at best but very small. But since the knowledge of languages and sciences, however inconsiderable it may be, is the business of this society of ours, and of that period of years you are to pass here, let us do, I pray, as the Hebrews express it, "the work of the day while the day lasts;"* "for time slips silently away, and every succeeding hour is attended with greater disadvantages than that which went before it."†

Study to acquire such a philosophy as is not barren and babbling, but solid and true;

* Opus diei in die suo.

† Tempus nam tacitum subruit, horaque Semper præteritâ deterior subit.

not such a one as floats upon the surface of endless verbal controversies, but one that enters into the nature of things: for he spoke good sense, who said, "The philosophy of the Greeks was a mere jargon and noise of words."*

You who are engaged in philosophical inquiries ought to remember, in the meanwhile, that you are not so strictly confined to that study, but you may, at the same time, become proficient in elocution; and, indeed, it is proper you should. I would therefore have you to apply to both these studies with equal attention, that so you may not only attain some knowledge of nature, but also be in condition to communicate your sentiments with ease, upon those subjects you understand, and clothe your thoughts with words and expressions; without which, all your knowledge will differ but very little from buried ignorance.

In joining these two studies together, you have not only reason for your guide, but also Aristotle himself for your example; for we are told, that it was his custom to walk up and down in the school in the morning, teaching philosophy, particularly those speculative and more obscure points which in that age were called rationes acroamaticæ; and thus he was rational till the hour appointed for anointing, and going to exercise; † but, after dinner, he applied to the more entertaining arts of persuasion, and made his scholars declaim upon such subjects as he appointed them.

But to return to my own province; for, to say the truth, I reckon all other things foreign to my purpose; whatever you do with regard to other studies, give always the preference to sacred Christian philosophy, which is, indeed, the chief philosophy, and has the pre-eminence over every other science, because it holds Christ to be the Head, ‡ in whom all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hid. Col. ii. 3, 9. This, the apostle tells us, was not the case of those false Christians in his time, whose philosophy regarded only some idle superstitions and vain observations. Cultivate, therefore, I say, this sacred wisdom sent down from heaven. Let this be your main study; for its mysteries are the most profound, its precepts the most pure, and, at the same time, the most pleasant. In this study, a weak understanding will be no disadvantage, if you have but a willing mind and ardent desires. Here, if anywhere, the observation holds, that "if you love learning, you can not fail to make great progress therein."|| For some who have applied with great industry to human philosophy, have found it to be like a disdainful mistress, and lost their labor; but Divine philosophy invites and encourages even those of the meanest parts.

And, indeed, it may be no small comfort and relief to young men of slow capacities, who make but little progress in human sciences, even when they apply to them with the most excessive labor and diligence, that this heavenly doctrine, though it be the most exalted in its own nature, is not only accessible to those of the lowest and meanest parts, but they are cheerfully admitted to it, graciously received, preferred to those that are proud of their learning, and very often advanced to higher degrees of knowledge therein; according to that of the psalmist, The law of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes; the entrance of his word giveth light; it giveth also understanding unto the simple. Psalm cxix. 130. You, therefore, whom some very forward youths leave far behind in other studies, take courage; and to wipe off this stain, if it be one, and compensate this discouragement, make this your refuge: you can not possibly arrive at an equal pitch of eloquence or philosophy with some others, but what hinders you, I pray, from being as pious, as modest, as meek and humble, as holy and pure in heart, as any other person whatever? And by this means, in a very short time, you will be completely happy in the enjoyment of God, and live for ever in the blessed society of angels and spirits of just men made perfect.

But if you want to make a happy progress in this wisdom, you must, to be sure, declare war against all the lusts of the world and the flesh, which enervate your minds, weaken your strength, and deprive you of all disposition and fitness for imbibing this pure and immaculate doctrine. How stupid is it to catch so greedily at advantages so vanishing and fleeting in their nature, if, indeed, they can be called advantages at all; "advantages that are carried hither and thither, hurried from place to place by the uncertainty of their nature, and often fly away before they can be possessed." An author remarkable for his attainments in religion, justly cries out, "O! what peace and tranquillity might he possess who could be prevailed upon to cut off all vain anxiety, and think only of those things that are of a Divine and saving nature! †† Peace and tranquillity is, without doubt, what we all seek after, yet, there are very few that know the way to it, though it be quite plain and open. It is, indeed, no wonder that the blind who wander about without a guide, should mistake the plainest and most open path: but we have an infallible guide, and a most valiant leader. Let us follow him alone; for he that treadeth in his steps, can never walk in darkness.

* Φιλοσοφία Ἑλλήνων λόγων ὑποφω.

† Μέχρι τοῦ αἵματος.

‡ Ὁ κεφαλήν κράτει.

|| Ἐάν τις φιλόμαθος, ἔση πολυμάθης.—ISOC. AD DEM.

* Τα ἄνω καὶ κάτω φερόμενα, καὶ περιτρεπόμενα, καὶ πρὶν λησθῆναι, ἀπιοντα.

† O qui omnem vanam sollicitudinem amputaret, et salutaria duntaxat ac divina cogitaret, quantam quietem et pacem possideret!

Let us pray.

O! INVINCIBLE God, who seest all things! Eternal Light, before whom all darkness is light, and in comparison with whom, every other light is but darkness! The weak eyes of our understanding can not bear the open and full rays of thy inaccessible light; and yet, without some glimpses of that light from heaven, we can never direct our steps, nor proceed toward that country which is the habitation of light. May it therefore please thee, O Father of Lights, to send forth thy light and thy truth, that they may lead us directly to thy holy mountain. Thou art good, and the fountain of goodness; give us understanding, that we may keep thy precepts. That part of our past lives, which we have lost in pursuing shadows, is enough, and, indeed, too much: bring back our souls into the paths of life, and let the wonderful sweetness thereof, which far exceeds all the pleasures of this earth, powerfully, yet pleasantly, preserve us from being drawn aside therefrom by any temptation from sin or the world. Purify, we pray thee, our souls from all impure imaginations, that thy most beautiful and holy image may be again renewed within us, and, by contemplating thy glorious perfections, we may feel daily improved within us that Divine similitude, the perfection whereof we hope will at last make us for ever happy in that full and beatific vision we aspire after. Till this most blessed day break, and the shadows fly away, let thy Spirit be continually with us, and may we feel the powerful effects of his Divine grace constantly directing and supporting our steps; that all our endeavors, not only in this society, but throughout the whole remaining part of our lives, may serve to promote the honor of thy blessed name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

EXHORTATIONS

TO THE CANDIDATES FOR THE DEGREE OF MASTER OF ARTS, IN THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

EXHORTATION I.

WERE I allowed to speak freely what I sincerely think of most of the affairs of human life, even those that are accounted of the highest importance, and transacted with the greatest eagerness and bustle, I should be apt to say, Magno conatu magnas nugas—that a great noise is made about trifles. But if you should take this amiss, as a little unseasonable upon the present occasion, and an insult upon your solemnity, I hope you will the more easily forgive me, that I place in the same rank with this philosophical convention of yours, the most famous councils and general assemblies of princes and great men; and say of their golden crowns, as well as your crowns of laurel, that they are Καπνοῦ σκίας οὐκ ἀντιρίστην—things of no value, and not worth the purchasing. Even the triumphal, inaugural, or nuptial processions of the greatest kings and generals of armies, with whatever pomp and magnificence, as well as art, they may be set off; they are, after all, so far true representations of their false, painted, and tinsel happiness, that, while we look at them, they fly away; and, in a very short time, they are followed by their funeral processions, which are the triumphs of death over those who have, themselves, triumphed during their lives. The scenes are shifted, the actors also disappear; and, in the same manner, the greatest shows of this vain world likewise pass away. Let us, that we may lop off the luxuriant branches of our vines, take a nearer view of this object, and remember that what we now call a laurel crown, will soon be followed by cypress wreaths. It will be also proper to consider how many, who, in their time, were employed as we are now, have long ago acted their parts, and are now consigned to a long oblivion: as also, what vast numbers of the rising generation are following us at the heels, and, as it were, pushing us forward to the same land of forgetfulness! who, while they are hurrying us away, are, at the same time, hastening thither themselves. All that we see, all that we do, and all that we are, are but mere dreams; and if we are not sensible of this truth, it is because we are still asleep: none but minds that are awake can discern it; they, and they only, can perceive and despise these ἐπιταίγματα—illusions of the night. In the meantime, nothing hinders us from submitting to these, and other such customary formalities, provided our doing it interfere not with matters of much greater importance, and prospects of a different and more exalted nature. What is it, pray, to which with the most ardent wishes you have been aspiring throughout the whole course of these last four years? Here you have a cap and a title, and nothing at all more.

But perhaps taking this amiss, you secretly blame me in your hearts, and wish me to congratulate you upon the honor you have obtained. I cheerfully comply with your desire, and am willing to explain myself. These small presents are not the principal reward of your labors, nor the chief end of your studies; but honorary marks and badges of that erudition and knowledge wherewith your minds have been stored by the uninterrupted labors of four whole years. But whatever attainments in learning you have reached, I would have you seriously to reflect, how inconsiderable they are, and how little they differ from nothing. Nay, if what we know, is compared with what we know not, it will be found even vastly less than nothing: at least, it is an argument of little knowledge, and the sign of a vain and weak mind, to be puffed up with an overbearing opinion of our own knowledge; while, on the contrary, it is an evidence of a great proficiency in knowledge, to be sensible of our ignorance and inability. "He is the wisest man," says Plato, "who knows himself to be very ill qualified for the attainment of wisdom."* Whatever be in this, we often find the sciences and arts which you cultivate, to be useless and entirely barren, with regard to the advantages of life; and, generally speaking, those other professions that are illiterate and illiberal, nay, even unlawful, meet with better treatment, and greater encouragement than what we call the liberal arts. "He that ventures upon the sea, is enriched by his voyage; he that engages in war, glitters with gold; the mean parasite lies drunk on a rich bed; and even he who endeavors to corrupt married women is rewarded for his villany: learning alone starves in tattered rags, and invokes the abandoned arts in vain."†

But, as sometimes the learned meet with a better fate, you, young gentlemen, I imagine, entertain better hopes with regard to your fortune, nor would I discourage them; yet, I would gladly moderate them a little by this wholesome advice: lean not upon a broken reed, neither let any one who values his peace, his real dignity, and his satisfaction, give himself up to hopes that are uncertain, frail, and deceitful. The human race are, perhaps, the only creatures that by this means become a torment to themselves: for, as we always grasp at futurity, we vainly promise ourselves many and great things, in which, as commonly happens, being for the most part disappointed, we must, of necessity, pay for our foolish pleasure with a proportionate degree of pain. Thus, the greatest part of mankind find the whole of this wretched life chequered with delusive joys and real torments, ill-grounded hopes and fears, equally imaginary; amid these, we live in continual suspense, and die so too.

But a few, alas! a few only, yet some, who think more justly, having set their hearts upon heavenly enjoyments, take pleasure in despising with a proper greatness of mind, and trampling upon the fading enjoyments of this world. These make it their only study, and exert their utmost efforts, that, having the more Divine part of their composition weaned from the world and the flesh, they may be brought to a resemblance and union with the holy and supreme God, the Father of spirits, by purity, piety, and an habitual contemplation of Divine objects. And this, to be sure, is the principal thing, with a noble ambition whereof I would have your minds inflamed; and whatever profession or manner of life you devote yourselves to, it is my earnest exhortation and request, that you would make this your constant and principal study. Fly, if you have any regard to my advice, fly far from that controversial, contentious school-divinity, which, in fact, consists in fruitless disputes about words, and rather deserves the name of vain and foolish talking.

Almost all mankind are constantly catching at something more than they possess, and torment themselves in vain. Nor is our rest to be found among these enjoyments of the world, where all things are covered with a deluge of vanity, as with a flood of fluctuating, restless waters; and the soul flying about, looking in vain for a place on which it may set its foot, most unhappily loses its time, its labor, and itself at last; like the birds in the days of the flood, which "having long sought for land, till their strength was quite exhausted, fell down at last, and perished in the waters."*

O! how greatly preferable to these bushes, and briars, and thorns, are the delightful fields of the gospel, wherein pleasure and profit are agreeably mixed together, whence you may learn the way to everlasting peace; that poverty of spirit which is the only true riches, that purity of heart which is our greatest beauty, and that inexpressible satisfaction which attends the exercise of charity, humility, and meekness! When your minds are stored and adorned with these graces, they will enjoy the most pleasant tranquillity, even amid the noise and tumults of this present life; and you will be, to use the words of Tertullian, candidates for eternity; a title infinitely more glorious and sublime than what has been this day conferred upon you. And that great and last day, which is so much dreaded by the slaves of this present world, will be the most happy and auspicious to you; as it will deliver you from a dark, dismal prison, and place you in the regions of the most full and marvellous light.

Let us pray.

MOST exalted God, who hast alone created, and dost govern this whole frame, and all the

* Ὁρθὸς σαφιστάτος ὄστις ἐγγυάκεν ὅτι οὐδένας ἡζῖος ἐστὶν πρὸς σοφίαν.—PHILO. APOC. SOCR.

† Qui pelago credit, magno se fenore tollit:
Qui pugnas et castra petit, præcingitur auro:
Vilis adulator picto jacet ebrius ostro;
Et qui sollicitat nuptas, ad præmia peccat.
Sola pruinosi horret facundia pannis,
Atque inopi lingua desertas invocat artes.

* Quæsitisque diu terris ubi sistere detur,
In mare lassatis volucris vaga decidit alis.

inhabitants thereof, visible and invisible, whose name is alone wonderful, and to be celebrated with the highest praise, as it is indeed above all praise and admiration. Let the heavens, the earth, and all the elements praise thee. Let darkness, light, all the returns of days and years, and all the varieties and vicissitudes of things, praise thee. Let the angels praise thee, the archangels, and all the blessed court of heaven, whose very happiness it is, that they are constantly employed in celebrating thy praises. We confess, O Lord, that we are of all creatures the most unworthy to praise thee, yet, of all others, we are under the greatest obligations to do it: nay, the more unworthy we are, our obligation is so much the greater. From this duty, however unqualified we may be, we can by no means abstain, nor, indeed, ought we. Let our souls bless thee, and all that is within us praise thy holy name, who forgive all our sins, and healest all our diseases; who deliverest our souls from destruction, and crownest them with bounty and tender mercies. Thou searchest the heart, O Lord, and perfectly knowest the most intimate recesses of it: reject not those prayers which thou perceivest to be the voice and the wishes of the heart. Now, it is the great request of our hearts, unless they always deceive us, that they may be weaned from all earthly and perishing enjoyments; and if there is anything to which they cleave with more than ordinary force, may they be pulled away from it by thy Almighty hand, that they may be joined to thee for ever in an inseparable marriage-covenant. And in our own behalf, we have nothing more to ask. We only add, in behalf of thy church, that it may be protected under the shadow of thy wings, and everywhere, throughout the world, watered by thy heavenly dew, that the spirit and heat of worldly hatred against it may be cooled, and its intestine divisions, whereby it is much more grievously scorched, extinguished; bless this nation, this city, and this university, in which we beg thou wouldst be pleased to reside, as a garden dedicated to thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

EXHORTATION II.

Would you have me to speak the truth with freedom and brevity? The whole world is a kind of stage, and its inhabitants mere actors. As to this little farce of yours, it is now very near a conclusion, and you are upon the point of applying to the spectators for their applause. Should any superciliously decline paying this small tribute [ἔρανον], you surely may, with great ease, retort their contempt upon themselves, merely by saying, Let your severity fall heavy on those who admire their own performances: as to this affair of ours, we know it is nothing at all.

For I will not allow myself to doubt but you are very sensible, that there is indeed nothing in it.

It would, to be sure, be very improper, especially as the evening approaches, to detain you, and my other hearers, with a long and tedious discourse, when you are already more than enough fatigued, and almost quite tired out with hearing. I shall therefore only put you in mind of one thing, and that in a few words. Let not this solemn τοῦ [ἔμπαιγμα], however agreeable to youthful minds, so far impose upon you, as to set you a dreaming of great advantages and pleasures to be met with in this new period of life you are entering upon. Look round you, if you please, and take a near and exact survey of all the different stations of life that are set before you. If you enter upon any of the stations of active life, what is this but jumping into a bush of thorns, where you can have no hope of enjoying quiet, and yet can not easily get out again? But if you rather choose to enter upon some new branch of science, alas! what a small measure of knowledge is to be thus obtained, with what vast labor is even that little to be purchased, and how often, after immense toil and difficulty, will it be found that Truth is still at a distance, and not yet extracted out of the well.* We indeed believe that the soul breathed into man, when he was first made, was pure, full of light, and every way worthy of its divine original. But ah! the Father of mankind, how soon, and how much was he changed from what he was at first! He foolishly gave ear to the fatal seducer, and that very moment was seized upon by death, whereby he at once lost his purity, his light, or truth, and together with himself, ruined us also.

Now, since that period, what do you commonly meet with among men of wisdom and learning, as they would wish to be accounted, but fighting and bickering in the dark? And while they dispute, with the greatest heat, but at random, concerning the truth, that truth escapes out of their hands, and instead of it, both parties are put up with vain shadows or phantoms of it, and, according to the proverb, embrace a cloud instead of Juno.

But since we are forced to own, that even the most contemptible and minutest things in nature, often put all our philosophical subtlety to a nonplus, what ignorance and foolish presumption is it for us to aim at ransacking the most hidden recesses of Divine things, and boldly attempt to scan the Divine decrees, and the other most profound mysteries of religion, by the imperfect and scanty measures of our understandings! Whither would the presumption of man hurry him, while it prompts him to pry into every secret and hidden thing, and leave nothing at all untempted!

As for you, young gentlemen, especially those of you that intend to devote yourselves to theological studies, it is my earnest advice and request to you, that you fly far from that infectious curiosity which would lead you into the depths of that controversial, contentious theology, which if any doctrine at all deserves the name, may truly be termed, science falsely so called. And that you may not, in this respect, be imposed upon by the common reputation of acuteness and learning, I confidently affirm, that to understand and be master of those trifling disputes that prevail in the schools, is an evidence of a very mean understanding; while, on the contrary, it is an argument of a genius truly great, entirely to slight and despise them, and to walk in the light of pure and peaceable truth, which is far above the dark and cloudy region of controversial disputes. But you will say, It is necessary, in order to the defence of truth, to oppose errors, and blunt the weapons of sophists. Be it so: but our disputes ought to be managed with few words, for naked truth is most effectual for its own defence, and when it is once well understood, its natural light dispels all the darkness of error. For all things that are reprov'd, are made manifest by the light, saith the apostle. Your favorite philosopher has told us, that "what is straight discovers both rectitude and obliquity." And Clemens Alexandrinus has very justly observed, that "the ancient philosophers were not greatly disposed to disputes or doubting; but the latter philosophers among the Greeks, out of a vain desire to enhance their reputation, engaged so far in wrangling and contention, that their works became quite useless and trifling."*

* Ἐκ τοῦ βυθοῦ ἡ ἀληθεια.

There is but one useful controversy or dispute, one sort of war, most noble in its nature, and most worthy of a Christian, and this, not to be carried on against enemies at a great distance, but such as are bred within our own breasts: against those, it is most reasonable to wage an endless war, and them it is our duty to persecute to death. Let us all, children, young men, and old, exert ourselves vigorously in this warfare. Let our vices die before us, that death may not find us indolent, defiled, and wallowing in the mire; for then it will be most truly, and to our great misery, death to us: whereas, to those sanctified souls who are conformed to Christ, and conquerors by his means, it rather is to be called life, as it delivers them from their wanderings and vices, from all kinds of evils, and from that death which is final and eternal.

Let us pray.

ETERNAL GOD, who art constantly adored by thrones and powers, by seraphims and

* Ὅτι δι' ἀλαστοτατοῦ των φιλοσοφῶν οὐδέ ἐπὶ τῷ ἀμοιβητέν καὶ ἀπορεῖν ἐφέροντο ἀλλ' οἱ τῶν παρ' Ἑλλήσι νεώτεροι, ὑπὸ φιλοτιμίας κενῆς καὶ ἀτελοῦς πλεκτικῶς ἄμα καὶ ἐριστικῶς, εἰς τὴν ἀχρηστον νύζαγοντα φιλαναιαν.

cherubims, we confess that thou art most worthy to be praised; but we, of all others, are the most unworthy to be employed in showing forth thy praise. How can polluted bodies, and impure souls, which, taken together, are nothing but mere sinks of sin, praise thee, the pure and holy majesty of heaven? Yet, how can these bodies which thou hast wonderfully formed, and these souls which thou hast inspired, which owe entirely to thine unmerited favor, all that they are, all that they possess, and all they hope for, forbear praising thee, their wise and bountiful Creator and Father? Let our souls, therefore, and all that is within us, bless thy holy name: yea, let all our bones say, O Lord, who is like unto thee; who is like unto thee? Far be it, most gracious Father, from our hearts, to harbor anything that is displeasing to thee: let them be, as it were, temples dedicated to thy service, thoroughly purged from every idol and image, from every object of impure love and earthly affection. Let our most gracious King and Redeemer dwell and reign within us. May he take full possession of us by his Spirit, and govern all our actions. May he extend his peaceable and saving kingdom throughout the whole habitable world, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof. Let the nations acknowledge their King, and the isles be glad in him: and particularly, that which we inhabit, with those in its neighborhood. And, that they may be truly blessed in him, may they daily submit more perfectly and dutifully to his golden sceptre, and the holy laws of his gospel! Bless this nation and city, and this our University; may it be continually watered with the dew of thy Spirit, and plentifully produce fruit acceptable in thy sight, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

EXHORTATION III.

This day, which has been the object of your earnest wishes throughout the course of four whole years, is now almost over, and hastening to a close. What has it produced for your advantage? Can he that has reaped most successfully of you all, say, he has filled his arms with sheaves? Though possibly you would excuse me to express myself with great freedom on this occasion, yet I will not take the liberty to depreciate too much your past studies, the specimens you have given to-day of your abilities, and the degree that has been conferred upon you. This, at least, I imagine, I may say, without offence, the most of those things we greedily catch at, and labor most earnestly to obtain, and consequently, even your philosophy is a real and demonstrative truth of that great paradox, that there is a vacuity in the nature of things. And, in truth, how great is that vacuity, seeing even the human race is no inconsiderable part of it! Though this day is marked with more than ordinary solemnity, it is, after all, but the conclusion and period of a number of days that have been idly spent, and is itself elapsing to little or no purpose, as well as the rest. But O! how glorious must that blessed day be, which all purified souls, and such as are dear to God, earnestly long for, throughout the whole of this perishing life, and constantly wait, with a kind of impatience, until it dawn, and the shadows fly away.

I am, indeed, of opinion, that those of you who think most justly, will readily own, your attainments, hitherto, are of no great moment. But possibly, henceforth you intend to begin life, as it were, anew: you aspire to greater matters, and entertain views worthy of human nature; you already begin to live, and to be wise; you form desires, and conceive hopes of rising to arts, riches, and honors. All this is very well. Yet, there is one consideration I would have you to admit among these ingenious projects and designs. What if death should come upon you, and, looking with an envious eye upon this towering prospect, put a stop to a project that extends itself so far into futurity, and, like a spider's web, entirely destroy it with a gentle breath of wind? Nor would this be any prodigy, or indeed an extraordinary event, but the common fate of almost all mankind. "We are always resolving to live, and yet never set about life in good earnest."* Archimedes was not singular in his fate; but a great part of mankind die unexpectedly, while they are poring upon the figures they have described in the sand. O wretched mortals! who, having condemned themselves, as it were, to the mines, seem to make it their chief study to prevent their ever regaining their liberty. Hence, new employments are assumed in the place of old ones; and, as the Roman philosopher truly expresses it, "one hope succeeds another, one instance of ambition makes way for another; and we never desire an end of our misery, but only that it may change its outward form."† When we cease to be candidates, and to fatigue ourselves in soliciting interest, we begin to give our votes and interest to those who solicit us in their turn. When we are wearied of the trouble of prosecuting crimes at the bar, we commence judges ourselves; and he who is grown old in the management of other men's affairs for money, is at last employed in improving his own wealth. At the age of fifty, says one, I will retire, and take my ease; or the sixtieth year of my life shall entirely disengage me from public offices and business. Fool! art thou not ashamed to reserve to thyself the last remains and dregs of life? Who will stand surety that thou shalt live so long? And what immense folly is it, so far to forget mortality, as to think of beginning to live at that period of years to which a few only attain!

As for you, young gentlemen, I heartily wish you may think more justly. Let your souls, as it were, retire into themselves, and dwell at home; and having shaken off the trifles that make a bustle and noise around you, consider seriously that the remaining part of your life is long only in one respect (and in this, indeed, its length may be justly complained of), that it is fraught with every sort of misery and affliction, and has nothing agreeable in it, but the study of heavenly wisdom alone; for everything else is vanity. Look about you, and see whether there is anything worthy of your affection, and whether everything you see does not rather excite your indignation and aversion. At home, are contentions and disputes; abroad in the fields, robbers; clamor and noise at the bar; wickedness in the camp; hypocrisy in the church; and vexation or lamentable mistakes everywhere. Among the rich and great, there are false and inconstant friendships, bitter enmities, envy, fraud, and falsehood; and cares, in great numbers, flutter round the most stately and sumptuous palaces.

What a considerable part of mankind are struggling with open and sharp afflictions! To whatever side you turn yourself, what do you commonly hear but lamentation and mourning? How many complaints of the poor, that are distressed for want of daily bread, or drag a most wretched life under the grievous oppression of powerful tyrants! How frequent are the groans of the sick and languishing! How great the multitude of those who lament their friends and relations carried off by death, and will themselves, in a short time, and for the same reason, be lamented by others! And, to conclude, how innumerable are the miseries and afflictions of various kinds, that seem alternately to re-echo to one another! Can it be any wonder, then, that a life of this kind should sometimes force, even from a wise man, such expressions of sorrow and concern as the following: "O mother, why didst thou bring me forth to be oppressed with afflictions and sorrows? Why didst thou introduce me into a life full of briars and thorns?"*

But you are now philosophers, and amid these dismal calamities, you comfort yourselves with the inward and hidden riches of wisdom, and the sciences you have acquired. The sciences! Tell us in what part of the earth they are to be found. Let us know, pray, where they dwell, that we may flock thither in great numbers. I know, indeed, where there is abundance of noise, with vain and idle words, and a jarring of opinions between contending disputants; I know where ignorance, under the disguise of a gown and a beard, has obtained the title of science; but where true knowledge is to be found I know not. We grope in the dark, and though it is truth only we are in quest of, we fall into innumerable errors. But whatever may be our case with respect to the knowledge of nature, as to that of heavenly and Divine things, let us cheerfully embrace that rich present which Infinite Goodness has made us, and be thankful that the day-spring from on high hath visited us. "Because there was no wisdom on the earth," says Lactantius, "He sent a teacher from heaven."* Him let us follow as our guide: for he who follows his direction shall not walk in darkness.

* Victuros agimus semper, nec vivimus unquam.

† Spes spem excipit, ambitionem ambitio, et miseriarum non quaritur finis sed schema tantum mutatur.

* Μητέρα, ἐμὴν μὲν ἔτικτες ἐπει πολέμοιστον ἔτικτες, τίπτε μὲν τῶδε βίω ἵδκας ἀκαθοφόρου.

Let us pray.

INFINITE, Eternal Creator and King of heaven and earth, bodies and spirits, who, being unmoved thyself, movest all things, and changest them at thy pleasure, while thou remainest thyself altogether unchangeable; who supportest all things by thy powerful hand, and governest them by thy nod, the greatest as well as the least; so that the greatest are no burden to thee, nor dost thou contemn the least. Behold! the nations before thee are as the drop of the bucket, and like the small dust of the balance; and these isles of ours, with all the rest in the world, are, in thy sight, but a very little thing. Yet thou deignest to be present in our assemblies, and take notice of our affairs, which are very inconsiderable. Let our souls adore thee, and fall down, with the greatest humility, at the footstool of thy throne, continually entreating thy grace, and constantly offering thee glory. Our praises add nothing to thee; but they exalt ourselves, enhance our happiness, and unite us with the society of angels; yet thou receivest them with a gracious hand, as most acceptable sacrifices, and incense of a sweet-smelling savor. Let us celebrate thee, O Lord, who art great, and greatly to be praised. Let all nations praise thee, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof. Set our hearts on fire with the flames of thy Divine love, that they may wholly ascend to thee as burnt-offerings, and nothing of ours may remain with us. O blessed transmigration, where the blind confidence of the flesh is transformed into a lively and pure faith, that has no dependance but upon thee alone; where self-love, and the love of the world, are exchanged for the love of thy infinite beauty; when our will shall centre in thine, and be altogether absorbed by it. Let this change, O bountiful Father, be brought about, for it is a change only to be effected by the power of thy hand; and as soon as our souls are made sensible of it, thy praise shall be for ever sounded within us, as in temples devoted to thy service.

Let thy whole church, O Lord, flourish and rejoice in the light of thy favor. Be favorable to this our university, city, and nation. Dispel, we pray thee, the thick clouds, and quiet the winds and storms; for, when they rage most, and make the greatest noise, they know thy voice, and obey it. Thou art the only God of peace, who createst it with a word, and makest righteousness and peace mutually to kiss one another. We depend upon thee only; and to thee alone we render praise and glory, as far as we can, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

* Cum nulla in terris esset sapientia, è cælo misit doctorem.

EXHORTATION IV.

OUR life is but a point, and even less than a point; but as it is not a mathematical point, as they call it, not quite indivisible, when we divide it into minute parts, it appears something considerable, and assumes the imaginary appearance of a large space of time; nay, according to Aristotle's notion, it appears divisible in infinitum. Besides those common and idle divisions of human life, into the four stages of childhood, youth, manhood, and old age, and into periods of ten years, which suppose the yet smaller divisions of years and months; men have many various ways of distributing the periods of their life, according to the different occupations and studies they have been engaged in, the remarkable events that have happened to them, and the several alterations and revolutions in the course of their lives. And I doubt not but you, young gentlemen, look upon this present instant of time as the beginning of a new period of your life. You have my leave to do so, provided you seriously consider, at the same time, that the whole of the life we live in this world is of a frail and fleeting nature, and, in some respect, nothing at all. And into whatever parts or periods we divide it, if we consider the miseries and lamentable calamities with which it is fraught, the life even of a child may seem too long; but, if we consider the time only, we must conclude the life of the oldest man to be exceeding short and fleeting.

A great part of mankind no sooner look upon themselves to be capable of worldly affairs, and think on entering upon some profession suitable to manhood, but they are cut off, in the very beginning of their course, by an unforeseen and untimely death. And, to be sure, this is the great distemper of young, and even of old men, that, by their desires and designs, they launch out a great way into futurity, and form a series of projects for many years to come; while, in the meantime, they rarely, or at least very superficially, consider, how foolish and precarious it is to depend upon to-morrow, and how soon this present form of ours may disappear; how soon we may return to our original dust; and that very day, as the royal prophet warns us, our thoughts, even the wisest and best-concerted thoughts of the greatest men, and most exalted princes, perish. And this I take particular notice of, that no such illusion may get possession of your minds. For it is not the common sort of mankind only, that impose upon themselves in this respect, but the generality of those who desire to be accounted, not only men of learning, but also adepts in wisdom, and actually pass for such. Not that I would prohibit your making an early and prudent choice, under the Divine direction, of the employment and profession of life you intend to pursue; nay, I would use every argument to persuade you to make use of such a choice, and when you have made it, to prosecute the intention of it with the greatest diligence and activity. I only put you upon your guard, not to entertain many and towering hopes in this world, nor to form a long series of connected projects; because you will find them all more vain and fleeting than illusions of the night! Some necessary means will fail, some favorable opportunity be missed; after all industry, the expected event may not happen, or the thread of your life may be cut, and thereby all your projects be rendered abortive. And though your life should be drawn out to ever so great a length, and success constantly answer your expectations, yet, you know, and I wish you would remember it, the fatal day will come at last, perhaps when it is least expected; that fatal and final day, I say, will at last come, when we must leave all our enjoyments, and all our schemes, those we are now carrying on, and those we have brought to perfection, as well as those that are only begun, and those that subsist only in hopes and ideas.

And these very arguments, which have been used to confine your minds from indulging themselves in too remote prospects, will also serve to persuade you, in another sense, to look much further: not with regard to worldly enjoyments, for such prospects, strictly speaking, can not be called long; but to look far beyond all earthly and perishing things, to those that are heavenly and eternal. And those that will not raise their eyes to such objects, as the Apostle Peter expresses it, are blind, and can not see afar off.

But of you, my dear youths, I expect better things. I need not, I imagine, use many words to persuade you to industry, and a continual progress in human studies and philosophical learning. If the violence and infelicity of the times have deprived you of any part of that period of years usually employed in these studies at this university, you will surely repair that loss, as soon as possible, by your subsequent reading and application. But if no such misfortune had happened, you are not, I believe, ignorant, that our schools are only intended for laying the foundations of those studies upon which years, and indefatigable industry, are to raise the superstructure of more complete erudition: which, by the accession of the Divine Spirit, may be consecrated into a temple for God. And this is what I would recommend to your esteem, and your earnest desires, beyond any other study whatever, That you may be holy, because our God is holy; that, when you leave this university, those with whom you converse, may not find you puffed up with pride, on account of a little superficial learning, nor bigoted, talkative, or fond of entering into unseasonable disputes; but consider you all as patterns and examples of piety, purity, temperance, modesty, and all Christian virtues; particularly that humility which shone so brightly in Christ himself, and which he earnestly exhorts all his disciples to learn from him. I will not suspect that any of you will turn out to be an immodest person, a glutton, or drunkard, or in any shape impious and profane; but I earnestly exhort and beseech you, my dear young men, to make it, above all other things, your principal study, to have your hearts purged from all impure and ignoble love of the world and the flesh, that in this earth you may live to God only; and then, to be sure, when you remove out of it, you will live with him for ever in heaven.

May the honorary title you have this day received be happy and auspicious! But I earnestly pray the Father of lights that he would deign to bestow on you a title more solid and exalted than it is in the power of man to give, that you may be called the sons of God, and that your conversation may be suitable to so great a name, and so glorious a Father.

Let us pray.

ETERNAL KING! Thy throne is established and immovable from everlasting, and will continue so throughout all the ages of eternity. Before thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God. All things that exist, whether visible or invisible, derive from thee their being, and all that they possess: and they all, from the least to the greatest, are subservient to thy purposes, who art their supreme King and Father. Many of them, indeed, act without knowledge or design, yet serve thee with a constant and unerring obedience; others pay thy homage from principles of reason and inclination; and all the rest are forced to promote thy intentions, though by constraint and against their wills. Thou art great, O Lord, thou art great, and greatly to be praised, and of thy greatness there is no end. The heavens are far raised from the earth, but thy majesty is much farther exalted above all our thoughts and conceptions. Impress, we pray thee, on our hearts, most bountiful Father, a profound sense of our meanness and insignificance; and make us acceptable to thee, through thy grace, in thy beloved Jesus, blotting out all our sins by the blood of his cross, and purifying our hearts by the effusion of thy Spirit from on high. Illuminate, most gracious God, this assembly of ours, by the light of thy Divine favor, and let thy effectual blessing, we pray thee, attend the work we are now employed about, by thy approbation, and the gracious disposition of thy providence, and may the result of all be to the glory of thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

EXHORTATION V.

THE complaint with regard to the vanity of all perishing and transitory enjoyments, which has been long general among mankind, is indeed just and well-founded; but it is no less true, that the vanity which resides in the heart of man himself, exceeds every thing of that kind we observe in the other parts of the visible creation; for, among all the creatures that we see around us, we can find nothing so fleeting and inconstant; it flutters hither and thither, and forsaking that only perfect good which is truly suited to its nature and circumstances, grasps at phantoms and shadows of happiness, which it pursues with a folly more than childish.

Man wanders about on this earth; he hopes, he wishes, he seeks, he gropes and feels about him; he desires, he is hot, he is cold, he is blind, and complains that evil abounds everywhere; yet, he is himself the cause of those evils which rage in the world, but most of all in his own breast; and therefore, being tossed between the waves thereof, that roll continually within and without him, he leads a restless and disordered life, until he be at last swallowed up in the unavoidable gulf of death. It is, moreover, the shame and folly of the human race, that the greatest part of them do not resolve upon any fixed and settled method of life, but, like the brute creatures, live and die without design, and without proposing any reasonable end. For how few are there, who seriously and frequently consider with themselves, whence they come, whither they are going, and what is the purpose of their life: who are daily reviewing the state of their own minds, and often descend into themselves, that they may as frequently ascend, by their thoughts and meditations, to their exalted Father, and their heavenly country; who take their station upon temporal things, and view those that are eternal! Yet, these are the only men that can be truly said to live, and they alone can be accounted wise.

And to this it is, my dear youths, that I would willingly engage your souls; nay, I heartily wish they were carried thither, by the fiery chariots of celestial wisdom. Let the common sort of mankind admire mean things; let them place their hopes on riches, honors, and arts, and spend their lives in the pursuit of them; but let your souls be inflamed with a far higher ambition. Yet I would not altogether prohibit you these pursuits: I only desire you to be moderate in them. These enjoyments are neither great in themselves, nor permanent; but it is surprising, how much vanity is inflated by them. What a conceited, vain nothing is the creature we call man! For, because few are capable to discern true blessings, which are solid and intrinsically beautiful, therefore the superficial ones, and such as are of no value at all, are caught at; and those who in any measure attain to the possession of them, are puffed up and elated thereby.

If we consider things as they are, it is an evidence of a very wrong turn of mind, to boast of titles and fame; as they are no part of ourselves, nor can we depend upon them. But he that is elevated with a fond conceit of his own knowledge, is a stranger to the nature of things, and particularly to himself; since he knows not that the highest pitch of human knowledge ought, in reality, rather to be called ignorance. How small and inconsiderable is the extent of knowledge! Even the most contemptible things in nature, are sufficient to expose the greatness of our ignorance. And with respect to Divine things, who dares to deny, that the knowledge mankind has of them is next to nothing? Because the weak eyes of our understanding, confined, as they are, within such narrow houses of clay, can not bear the piercing light of divine things; therefore, the Fountain of all wisdom hath thought proper to communicate such imperfect discoveries of himself, as are barely sufficient to direct our steps to the superior regions of perfect light. And whoever believes this truth, will, doubtless, make it his chief care and principal study, constantly to follow this lamp of divine light that shines in darkness, and not to deviate from it either to the right hand or the left. It is, indeed, my opinion, that no man of ingenuity ought to despise the study of philosophy, or the knowledge of languages, or grammar itself: though to be sure a more expeditious and successful method of teaching them were much to be wished. But what I would recommend with the greatest earnestness, and persuade you to, if possible, is, that you would inseparably unite with such measures of learning and improvement of your minds as you can attain, purity of religion, Divine love, moderation of soul, and an agreeable, inoffensive behavior. For you are not ignorant what a low and empty figure the highest attainments in human sciences must make, if they be compared with the dignity and duration of the soul of man: for, however considerable they may be in themselves, yet, with regard to their use, and their whole design, they are confined within the short space of this perishing life. But the soul which reasons, which is employed in learning and teaching, in a few days will for ever bid farewell to all these things, and remove to another country. O, how inconsiderable are all arts and sciences, all eloquence and philosophy, when compared with a cautious concern that our last exit out of this world may be happy and auspicious, and that we may depart out of this life candidates for immortality, at which we can never arrive but by the beautiful way of holiness.

Let us pray.

INFINITE and Eternal God! who inhabitest thick darkness and light inaccessible, whom no mortal hath seen, or can see; yet all thy works evidently declare and proclaim thy wisdom, thy power, and thy infinite goodness: And, when we contemplate these thy perfections, what is it our souls can desire, but that they may love thee, worship thee, serve thee, for ever proclaim thy praise, and celebrate thy exalted name, which is above all praises, and all admiration? Thy throne is constantly surrounded by thousands and ten thousands of glorified spirits, who continually adore thee and cry out without ceasing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, who was, who is, and who is to come. Let others seek what they will, and find and embrace what they can: may we have always this one fixed and settled purpose, that it is good for us to draw near to God. Let the seas roar, the earth be shaken, and all things go to ruin and confusion; yet, the soul that adheres to God, will remain safe and quiet, and shall not be moved for ever. O blessed soul that has thee for its rest, and all its salvation! It shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water; it shall not fear when heat cometh, nor shall it be uneasy in a year of drought. It is our earnest petition and prayer, O Father, that thy hands may loosen all our chains, and effectually deliver our souls from all the snares and allurements of the world and the flesh; and that, by that same bountiful and most powerful hand of thine, they may be for ever united to thee through thy only begotten Son, who is our union and our peace. Be favorably present, most gracious God, with this assembly of ours, that whatever we undertake, in obedience to thy will, may be carried to perfection by the aid of thy grace, and tend to the glory of thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

EXHORTATION VI.

I AM not ignorant, that it is one of the common arts of life, to set off our own things with all the pomp we can; and, if there is any worth in them, by no means to depreciate it, but rather to endeavor, with all our might, to enhance their value as much as possible: nay, those of them which are quite vain and worthless, we use to magnify with pompous expressions, and daub with false colors, and to do otherwise is reckoned a kind of rustic simplicity. But you, young gentlemen, who are acquainted with my manner, will, I imagine, easily forgive this indifference of mine; and, therefore, I say, if there are any who despise these performances of ours, we leave them at full liberty, for we ourselves held them in contempt before: but to speak freely, together with them we undervalued all worldly things; they are all made of the same mean materials [Παντα μία κτίσις] O life, short with regard to duration, long in consideration of thy miseries, involved in darkness, beset with snares, still fluctuating between false joys and real torments, groundless hopes and fears equally imaginary, yet foolishly, and even to distraction, loved by most! We will not die, and yet, we know not how to live. Our present possessions are loathsome as food to a man in a fever, and we greedily catch at future enjoyments, which, when they come to be present, will be received with the same indifference: for, among the advantages of this fleeting life, nothing is equally agreeable to those who have it in possession, and those who have it only in desire and hope.

We are all in general of such a nature, that we are weary of ourselves, and, what we lately preferred to everything else, upon experience we reject. This inconstancy is undoubtedly a sign of a mind distempered, forcibly drawn away from its centre, and separated from its only durable rest. Nor need you go far, young gentlemen, to look for an instance of this distemper: let any of you descend into himself (which very few do, and even they but rarely), he will find it within him; upon a very slight inquiry, he will surely be sensible of it. For passing other considerations, with what fervent wishes have you, in your hearts, longed for this day! Yet I forewarn you, that all your pleasure will either die with the day itself, which is now fast drawing to a close, or but for a very short time survive it. And, as commonly happens, it will be succeeded by the anxious cares of beginning life, as it were, anew; or which is much more grievous and unhappy, and from which I earnestly pray you may be all effectually preserved, by those temptations and allurements of vice, which tend to debauch and ruin you. For these allurements, after the manner of some robbers, attack the unwary and inexperienced with blandishments and caresses, that thereby they may have an opportunity to undo them. If therefore, as soon as ye enter upon a life of freedom, those deceitful and deadly pleasures of sense tempt you with their delusive smiles, I would put you in mind, how unworthy it is of a free and generous mind, especially that of a Christian, to become an abject slave, and submit to the most shameful bondage; how disgraceful and wretched a choice it is, to become the slave of a mad, distracted master;* and how much more generous and exalted is the pleasure of despising them all, and trampling them under foot, when they come in competition with the pure and permanent delights of Divine love.

As to exalted degrees of honor, and heaps of riches, the idols of all ranks of mankind which they worship with the rage of enthusiasm and madness, we may not only apply to them what was observed of old concerning Hercules's statue, and say, "They have nothing Divine in them;"* but also; that they are entirely void of real goodness. Even those who have the greatest experience of them, are at last obliged to own this: the force of truth extorts the confession, though they make it with regret and against their will. All the beauty and brightness of these idols resemble the decorations of a stage, that dazzle the eyes of the vulgar; and the enjoyment of them is, in reality, but a splendid kind of slavery, and gilded misery. It is a pathetic expression of St. Bernard, "O ambition, the torture of the ambitious, how happens it, that though thou tormentest all, thou yet makest thyself agreeable to all?"† O how easily does even the least glimpse of eternal and infinite beauty rise out of the mind all the impressions made upon it by the objects we daily converse with on this earth, and turn its admiration of them into contempt and disdain.

* Δούλον γίνεσθαι παραφρονούντος δεσπότου.

But if any one, having thoroughly examined and despised these shadows, resolves solely to pursue a more complete knowledge of things, and follow the streams of learning, we can not deny, that he judges most justly; yet, after all, he must know, if he is wise, or at least he ought to know, that he may be wise, what vanity and superfluity is to be met with even here:‡ for often, when one has applied himself to his books and studies with the greatest assiduity, and almost spent his life upon them, all his pains evaporate into smoke, and the labor of years is entirely lost. And, what is most of all to be lamented, this is sometimes the case with respect to theology, which is the chief of all arts and sciences, as so large a portion of that vineyard is still possessed with briars and thorns. How many are the disputes and controversies, how many the trifling arguments and cavils, which possibly may have something of the sharpness of thorns, but undoubtedly a great deal of their barrenness and their hurtful quality! A philosopher of old, severely reproves the sophisters of his time in these words: "What was formerly the love of wisdom, is now become the love of words."|| We, to be sure, may substitute in place of this, a complaint still more bitter, that what was theology before, is now become foolish talking; and that many of our divines, though they serve one God, and that the God of peace, yet split into parties upon the lightest occasions, and with great impiety divide the whole world into factions. And I am much afraid, this evil, in a great measure, derives its original from the education of youth in schools and colleges. For the most part of men manage this business, as if disputing was the end of learning, as fighting is the design of going to war: hence the youth when they enter the school, begin disputing, which never ends but with their life. Death imposes silence, and so, at last, "these fierce passions of their minds and these inveterate contentions, are composed to rest, by the weight of a little dust thrown upon them."

As for you, young gentlemen, if my earnest wishes and sincere advice can have any weight with you, you will early extricate yourselves out of these flames of contention, that your minds, being lighted up by the pure and celestial fire of the Divine Spirit, may shine forth in holiness, and burn with the most fervent charity.

Let us pray.

Honor and praise is due to thee, O infinite God. This is the universal voice of all the blessed spirits on high, and all the saints on earth: worthy art thou, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power, because thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are. We, here before thee, with united hearts and affections offer thee, as we can, the sacrifice of gratitude, love and praise. How much are we indebted to thee, for ourselves, and for all that we possess! For in thee we live, move, and have our being. Thou hast redeemed us from our sins, having given the Son of thy love as a sacrifice and ransom for our souls: the chastisement of our peace fell upon him, and by his stripes we are healed. On this consideration, we acknowledge we are no longer at our own disposal, since we are bought with a price, and so very great a price, that we may glorify thee, O Father, and thy Son, in our souls and our bodies, which are so justly thine. May we devote ourselves to thee, through the whole remaining part of our life, and disdain the impure and ignoble slavery of sin, the world and the flesh, that in all things we may demean ourselves as becomes the sons of God, and the heirs of thy celestial kingdom, and make daily greater progress in our journey toward the happy possession thereof.

Bless thy church, and our nation, and this our university: may it be thine, we pray thee. We entreat that thou wouldst become our father, our protector, and our supreme teacher, who hast thy chair in heaven, and teachest the hearts of men on this earth. May the youth flourish under thy instruction, that they may be not only learned, but especially upright, pious, and true Christians, entirely devoted to the honor of thy name, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

* Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta Pulveris exigui jactu compressa quiescunt.

VIRGIL., Geor. iv., 8, l. 6.

* Ὡς οὐδὲν εἰσι θεῶν.

† O! ambitio, ambientium crux, quomodo omnes torquens omnibus places?

‡ Πολλά ἐστὶ κενὰ καὶ ὠστρογὰ.

|| Quæ philosophia fuit, facta philologia est.

EXHORTATION VII.

THESE academical exercises of ours are, to be sure, no great matter, nor do we make any high account of them; yet, after all, we set no higher, perhaps even a less value upon the bustling affairs of mankind, which make a much greater noise, and the farces that are acted upon the more exalted theatres of the world: which, to speak my sentiments in a few words, are for the most part outwardly more pompous than these of ours, but inwardly equally vain, and more insignificant than the busy amusements of "children playing on the sands, and eagerly building little houses, which, with giddy levity, they instantly pull down again."* Or, if you chose to be more severe upon the fruitless labors of mankind, and their busy and irregular motions backward, and forward, and from one place to another, you may, with a great man, who knew all these by experience, compare them to the fluttering of frightened flies, the toilsome hurry of the ants, and the motions of puppets.† But he that, amid all the confusions and commotions which happen in human affairs here below, has recourse to Divine contemplation and the hopes of eternity, as the lofty impregnable tower of true wisdom, "is the only person that enjoys uninterrupted ease and tranquillity, like the heavenly bodies, which constantly move on in their orbits, and are never, by any violence, diverted from their course."‡

And indeed, what wonder is it, that he can easily view all the dreadful appearances of this wretched life with a resolute and steady countenance, who, by frequent interviews and daily conversation with death itself, which we call the king of terrors, has rendered it familiar to him, and thereby not only divested it of its terrors, but also placed in it a beautiful, pleasant, and quite amiable light. By this means, he dies daily; and doubtless, before he suffers a natural death, he dies in a more exalted sense of the word, by withdrawing, as far as is possible, his mind from the encumbrance of earthly things, and even while it lodges in the body, weaning it from all the worldly objects that are placed about him. And, in this very sense, philosophy of old was most properly called the meditation of death,§ which the Roman orator has, in my opinion, explained with great propriety, and the precision of a philosopher. "What is it we do," say he, "when we withdraw the mind from pleasure, that is, the body, from our means and substance that is the servant of the body, that provides for its wants from the commonwealth, and every kind of business: what is it we then do, I say, but recall it to itself, and oblige it to stay at home? Now to withdraw the mind from the body, is nothing else but to learn to die."* Let us, therefore, reason thus, if you will take my advice, and separate ourselves from our bodies; that is, let us accustom ourselves to die: this even while we sojourn on this earth, will be to the soul a life like to that which it will enjoy in heaven; and, being delivered from these fetters, we shall move at a better rate, the course of our souls will be less retarded in our journey to that happy place, at which when we arrive, we can then, and then only, be truly said to live. For this life is but a kind of death, the miseries whereof I could paint, if it were seasonable; but, to be sure, it was most justly called a life of the greatest misery† by Dionysius the Areopagite, or whoever was the author of that book which goes under his name.

And indeed, young gentlemen, I am of opinion, that such a view and meditation of death, will not be unsuitable, or improper, even for you, though you are in the prime of life, and your minds in their full vigor: nay, I would gladly hope, you yourselves will not imagine it would, nor be at all offended at me, as if, by mentioning that inauspicious word unseasonably, I disturbed your present joy, drew a kind of black cloud over this bright day of festivity, or seem to mix among your laurels a branch of the hated cypress. For a wise man would not willingly owe his joy to madness, nor think it a pleasure foolishly to forget the situation of his affairs.

The wise man alone feels true joy: and real wisdom is the attainment of a Christian only, who bears with life, but hopes for death, and passes through all the storms and tempests of the former with an undauntedness of mind, but with the most fervent wishes looks for the latter as the secure port and the fair haven‡ in the highest sense of the expression; whose mind is humble, and, at the same time, exalted, neither depending upon foreign, that is, external advantages, nor puffed up with his own; and neither elevated nor depressed by any turns or vicissitudes of fortune.

He is the wise man, who relinquishes things as they really are; who is not, with the common sort of mankind, that are always children, terrified by bug-bears, nor pleased with painted rattles: who has a greatness of soul, vastly superior to all fading and perishing things; who judges of his im-

* Ὅς ὅτε τις ψάμαθον συνάγη παῖς ἄγχυ θάλαττῃ, Ὅς ἔπει οὖν ποίησεν ἀθύρματα, νηπιείοισιν

* Ἀψ αἰθῆς συνέχευσε ποῖν καὶ χερσὶν ἀθύροιν.

† Μυθῶν ἐπὶ ῥημῶν διαστροφῆς μυθικῶν ταλιπιόρις καὶ ἀγχοφορίας καὶ σιγῶν νευροπαστούμενα.

‡ Otia solus agit, sicut cœlestia semper Inconcuſsa suo volvunt sidera lapsu. Luc., lib. ii.

§ Μελέτη θανάτου.

§ Φρικωδέστατην ἔικονα.

* Quid aliud agimus, cum a voluptate, id est a corpore, cum familiaribus quæ ministra est et famula corporis, cum a republica cum a negotio omni severamus animum, quid tum agimus (inquam) nisi illum ad seipsum advocamus, et secum esse cogimus? Secernerem autem a corpore animum, nec quicquam aliud est quam emori discere.

† Πολυπαθεστάτην ζωὴν.

‡ Καλοῦς λιμένας.

provements by his life, and thinks he knows everything he does not covet, and everything he does not fear. The only thing he desires, is the favor and countenance of the Supreme King; the only thing he fears, is his displeasure. And, without doubt, a mind of this cast must, of necessity, be the habitation of constant serenity, exalted joy, and gladness springing from on high. And this is the man, that is truly possessed of that ἔσθμιαν, και γαληνη—tranquillity and happy disposition of mind, which the philosophers boast of, the divines recommend, but few attain. And though he will neither willingly suffer himself to be called a philosopher, nor a philologist, yet he is, in reality, Θεόσοφος, well versed in the things of God, and, by a kind of Divine influence and instruction, has attained to the light of pure and peaceable truth: where he passes his days in the greatest quietness and serenity, far above the cloudy and stormy regions of controversy and disputation.

If any one of you has been thus instructed, he has certainly attained the highest of all arts, and has entered upon the most glorious liberty, even before he hath received any university degree. But the rest, though they are presently to have the title of master of arts, still continue a silly, servile set of men, under a heavy yoke of bondage, whereby even their minds will be cramped with oppressive laws, far more intolerable than any discipline, however severe. None of you, I imagine, is so excessively blinded with self-conceit, so ignorant of the nature of things, and unacquainted with himself, as to dream that he is already a philosopher, or be puffed up with an extravagant opinion of his own knowledge, because he has gone through the ordinary exercises at the university; though, to speak the truth, the philosophy which prevails in the schools, is of a vain, airy nature, and more apt to inspire the mind with pride, than to improve it. As it is my earnest prayer, so it is also the object of my hope, that you will retire from this seminary, with your minds excited to a keen and wholesome thirst after true erudition, rather than blown up with the wildfire of science, falsely so called; and what, above all other attainments, is of greatest consequence, that you will leave us, deeply affected with the most ardent love of heavenly wisdom. Whatever may be your fate with respect to other things, it is my earnest request, that it be your highest ambition, and your principal study, to be true Christians; that is, to be humble, meek, pure, holy, and followers of your most auspicious Captain, the Lamb, wherever he goeth. For he that followeth him shall not walk in darkness, but be conducted, through the morning light of Divine grace to the meridian and never-ending brightness of glory.

Let us pray.

ETERNAL Father of mercies and of lights, the only rest of the immortal souls which thou hast created, and their never-failing consolation. Into what by-paths of error do our souls divert, and to what dangers are they exposed on every hand, when they stray away from thee! But while they keep within thy hiding-place, O Most High, they are safe under the shadow of thy wings. O how happy are they, and how well do they live, who pass their whole lives in that secret abode, where they may continually refresh themselves with the delicious fruits of thy love, and show forth thy praise! where they may taste and see that thou art good, O Lord, and be thoroughly persuaded of the immense riches of thy bounty, which all our miseries can not exceed, nor our poverty exhaust; nay, which the constant effusion of them upon the whole universe, and all its parts, can not in the least diminish. As for us who are before thee, the most unworthy of all thy creatures, yet, at the same time, the most excessively loaded with all the instances of thy goodness, can we avoid crying out with the united voices of our hearts, Let praise be ascribed to the Lord, because he is good, and his mercy endureth for ever. Who shall declare the great and wonderful works of God? Who shall show forth his praise? Who ruleth by his power for ever, and his eyes observe the nations, that the rebellious may not exalt themselves. Who restores our souls to life, and suffers not our feet to be moved? But, on the other hand, alas! how justly may our songs be interrupted with bitter lamentations, that, under such strong and constant rays of his bounty, our hearts are so cold toward him! O how faint and languid is our love to him! How very little, or near to nothing, is the whole of that flame which we feel within us! And, as that love fails within us, we misplace our affections upon the things around us; and, as we follow vanity, we become vain and miserable at the same time. But may thy Spirit, O Lord, whom we humbly and earnestly beg of thee, descending into our hearts, inspire us thoroughly with life, vigor, and celestial purity!

Please to enlighten thy church throughout the whole habitable world, and particularly in these islands, with the continued light of thy countenance. If thou apply thy healing hand, we shall presently be whole: nor need we look to any quarter for other remedies than those we have always found to be more powerful than our most obstinate distempers. Bless this city, and this celebrated university. Grant, most gracious Father, that the numbers of youth we send out from it this day, and every year, may, by thy effectual grace, be consecrated and devoted to thy service. Forbid, we pray thee, that they should either be the means of spreading pollution among thy people, or suffer themselves to be tainted with the infection of a wicked world; but let this fountain of learning be continually enriched with thy heavenly influences, that it may constantly supply pure and limpid streams for the welfare and improvement of thy church and people, to the glory of thy exalted name, through our Lord Jesus Christ; to whom, with thee, and the Holy Spirit, be honor, praise, and glory, world without end. Amen.

EXHORTATION VIII.

AMID these amusements, we are unhappily losing a day. Yet, some part of the weight of this complaint is removed when we consider, that, while the greatest part of mankind are busting in crowds and places of traffic, or, as they would have us believe, in affairs of great importance, we are trifling our time more innocently than they. But what should hinder us from closing this last scene in a serious manner, that is, from turning our eyes to more Divine objects, whereby, though we are fatigued with other matters, we may terminate the work of this day, and the day itself, agreeably: as the beams of the sun use to give more than ordinary delight when he is near his setting?

You are now initiated into the philosophy, such as it is, that prevails in the schools, and, I imagine, intend, with all possible despatch, to apply to higher studies. But O! how pitiful and scanty are all those things which be set us before, behind, and on every side! The busting we observe, is nothing but the hurrying of ants eagerly engaged in their little labors. The mind must surely have degenerated, and forgotten its original as effectually as if it had drank of the river Lethe, if, extricating itself out of all these mean concerns and designs, as so many snares laid for it, and rising above the whole of this visible world, it does not return to its Father's bosom, where it may contemplate his eternal beauty, where contemplation will inflame love, and love be crowned with the possession of the beloved object. But, in the contemplation of this glorious object, how great caution and moderation of mind is necessary, that, by prying presumptuously into his secret councils or his nature, and rashly breaking into the sanctuary of light,* we be not quite involved in darkness! And, with regard to what the infinite, independent, and necessarily existent Being has thought proper to communicate to us concerning himself, and we are concerned to know, even that is by no means to be obscured with curious, impertinent questions, nor perplexed with the arrogance of disputation; because, by such means, instead of enlarging our knowledge, we are in the fair way to know nothing at all; but readily to be received by humble faith, and entertained with meek and pious affections. And if, in these notices of him that are communicated to us, we meet with anything obscure and hard to be understood, such difficulties would be happily got over, not by perplexed controversies, but by constant and fervent prayer. "He will come to understand," says admirably well the famous bishop of Hippo [Augustine], "who knocks by prayer: not he who, by quarrelling, makes a noise at the gate of truth."* But what can we, who are mortal creatures, understand with regard to the inexpressible Being we now speak of, especially while we sojourn in these dark prisons of clay, but only this, that we can by no means comprehend him? For though, in thinking of him, we remove from our idea all sort of imperfection, and collect together every perceivable perfection, and adorn the whole with the highest titles, we must, after all, acknowledge that we have said nothing, and that our conceptions are nothing to the purpose. Let us, therefore, in general acknowledge him to be the immoveable Being that moveth everything, the immutable God that changeth all things at his pleasure, the infinite and eternal Fountain of all good and of all existence, and the Lord and sole Ruler of the world.

If you, then, my dear youths, aspire to genuine Christianity, that is, the knowledge of God and Divine things, I would have you consider that the mind must first be recalled and engaged to turn in upon itself, before it can be raised up toward God: according to that expression of St. Bernard, "May I return from external things, to those that are within myself, and from these again rise to those that are of a more exalted nature."† But the greatest part of men live abroad, and are truly strangers at home; you may sooner find them anywhere than with themselves. Now, is this not real madness, and the highest degree of insensibility? Yet, after all, they seem to have some reason in their madness, when they thus stray away from themselves, since they can see nothing within them that by its promising aspect can give them pleasure or delight. Everything there is ugly, frightful, and full of nastiness, which they would rather be ignorant of, than be at the pains to purge away; and therefore prefer a slothful forgetfulness of their misery, to the trouble and labor of regaining happiness. But how preposterous is the most diligent study, and the highest knowledge, when we neglect that of ourselves! The Roman philosopher, ridiculing the grammarians of his time, observes, that "they inquired narrowly into the misfortunes of Ulysses, but were quite ignorant of their own."‡ The sentiments of a wise and pious man are quite different, and I wish you may adopt them. It is his principal care to be thoroughly acquainted with himself;—he watches over his own ways, he improves and cultivates his heart as a garden consecrated

* Intelliget qui orando pulsat, non qui rixando obstrepat ad ostium veritatis.

† Ab exterioribus ad interiora, ab interioribus ad superiora ascendam.

‡ Ulyssis mala expeorant, ignorant sua.

* Εἰς τὰ τοῦ φωτός ἄδρα.

to the King of kings, who takes particular delight in it ; he carefully nurses the heavenly plants and flowers, and roots up all the wild and noxious weeds, that he may be able to say with the greater confidence, Let my beloved come into his own garden, and be pleased to eat of his fruits. And when, upon this invitation, the great King, in the fulness of his goodness, descends into the mind, the soul may then easily ascend with him, as it were, in a chariot of fire, and look down upon the earth, and all earthly things, with contempt and disdain. "Then rising above the rainy regions, it sees the storms falling beneath its feet, and tramples upon the hidden thunder."*

Let us pray.

WHATEVER satisfaction we look for without thee, O heavenly Father, is mere delusion and vanity. Yet, though we have so often experienced this, we have not, to this day, learned to renounce this vain and fruitless labor, that we may depend upon thee, who alone canst give full and complete satisfaction to the souls of men. We pray, therefore, that, by thy Almighty hand, thou wouldst so effectually join and unite our hearts to thee, that they may never be separated any more. How unhappy are they who forsake thee, and whose hearts depart from thy ways ! They shall be like shrubs in the desert ; they shall not see when good cometh, but dwell in a parched and barren land. Blessed, on the contrary, is he who hath placed his confidence in thee : he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water ; he shall not be afraid when heat cometh, nor be uneasy in the time of drought. Take from us, O Lord, whatever earthly enjoyments thou shalt think proper : there is one thing will abundantly make up all our losses ; let Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, and the rays of thy favor continually refresh us in the face of thine anointed ; in this event, we have nothing to ask, but with grateful minds shall for ever celebrate thy bounty, and all our bones shall say, "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, who is like unto thee ?"

Let thy church be glad in thee, and all in this nation, and everywhere throughout the world who regard and love thy name. By the power and efficacy of the gospel, may their number be daily augmented, and let the gifts of thy grace be also increased in them all. Bless this university ; let it be like a garden watered by thy heavenly hand, that thy tender shoots may grow, and in due time produce abundant fruits, to the eternal honor of thy most glorious name, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

VALEDICTORY ORATION.

THOUGH this, I imagine, is the last address I shall ever have occasion to make to you, I will not detain you long from your studies, nor encroach on the time allowed you for recreation. This is, to be sure, the first time that some of you have heard me ; but I have a great many others to bear witness of the constant design of all my dissertations in this place. They will testify that the intention of all my discourses was, that the form of sound words, that is, the Christian doctrine, and consequently the fear and love of God, might not only be impressed, but also engraven upon your hearts in lasting and indelible characters : and that you might not only admit as a truth, but also pay the highest regard to this indisputable maxim, that "piety and religion is the only real good among men."† Moreover, that your minds might be the less encumbered in their application to this grand study of religion, and the more expeditious in their progress therein, I constantly endeavored, with all possible warmth, to divert you from those barren and thorny questions and disputes that have infected the whole of theology ; and this at a time when the greatest part of divines and professors, and those of no small reputation, engaging furiously in such controversies, have split into parties, and unhappily divided the whole world. It was my constant practice to establish those great and uncontroverted articles of our holy religion, which are but few and clear ; some part whereof are confirmed by the common consent of nations, and of all the human race ; and all the rest, by the unanimous voice of the whole Christian world. Of the first sort are those we have often advanced in treating of the being and perfections of the One Supreme and Eternal principle, and the production of all things by him ; the continual preservation and government of the world by his providence ; the law of God given to mankind, and the rewards and punishments annexed to it. The other class of the grand articles of religion are indeed peculiar to Christian philosophy, but believed in common by all the professors of that religion. These are the great foundations of our faith, and of all our hope and joy, with regard to the incarnation of the Son of God, his death and resurrection for the destruction of sin, and consequently of death ; his ascension into the

* Celsior exurgens pluviis nimbosque cadentes, Sub pedibus cernens, et cæca tonitrua calcans.

† Ὅτι ἐν καὶ μόνον ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀγαθὸν ἢ ἐυσεβεῖα.

highest heavens with that same flesh of ours in which he died, and his exaltation there above all ranks of angels, dominions, and thrones, &c.; whence we expect he will return in great glory in that day, when he will be glorious in all his saints, and admired in those that believe. As many, therefore, as desire to receive him in this last manifestation, with joy and exultation, must of necessity be holy, and, in conformity to their most perfect and glorious Head, sober, pious, upright, and live in full contempt of this perishing, transitory world, their own mortal flesh, and the sordid pleasures of both: in a word, all the enjoyments which the mean and servile admire, they must trample under foot and despise. For, whoever will strive for this victory, and strive so as at last to obtain it, the Lord will own for his servant, and the great Master will acknowledge him for his disciple. He will attain a likeness to God in this earth, and, after a short conflict, will triumph in the Divine presence for ever. These are the doctrines which it is our interest to know, and in the observation of which our happiness will be secured. To these you will turn your thoughts, young gentlemen, if you are wise; nay, to these you ought to give due attention, that you may be wise. Those phantoms we catch at, fly away; this shadow of a life we now live, is likewise on the wing. Those things that are without the verge of sense, and above its reach, are the only solid and lasting enjoyments. "Why are ye fond of these earthly things," says St. Bernard, "which are neither true riches, nor are they yours? If they are yours," continues he, "take them with you."* And Lactantius admirably well observes, that "Whoever prefers the life of the soul, must of necessity despise that of the body; nor can he aspire to the highest good, unless he despise advantages of an inferior kind. For the all-wise God did not choose that we should attain to immortality in a soft, indolent way, but that we should gain that inexpressible reward of eternal life, with the highest difficulty and severest labor."† And that you may not be discouraged, remember the great Redeemer of souls, your exalted Captain, hath gone before you, and we have to do with an enemy already conquered. Let us only follow him with courage and activity, and we have no ground to doubt of victory. And indeed it is a victory truly worthy of a Christian, to subdue the barbarous train of our appetites, and subject them to the empire of reason and religion; while, on the other hand, it is the most shameful bondage, to have the more Divine part of our composition meanly subjected to an ignoble, earthly body. Now, this victory can only be secured by steadfast believing, vigorous opposition to our spiritual enemies, unwearied watching, and incessant prayer. Let prayer be not only the key that opens the day, and the lock that shuts out the night; but let it be also, from morning to night, our staff and stay in all our labors, and enable us to go cheerfully up into the mount of God. Prayer brings consolation to the languishing soul, drives away the devil, and is the great medium whereby all grace and peace is communicated to us. With regard to your reading, let it be your particular care to be familiarly acquainted with the sacred Scriptures above all other books whatever; for thence you will truly derive light for your direction, and sacred provisions for your support on your journey. In subordination to these, you may also use the writings of pious men that are agreeable to them, for these also you may improve to your advantage; and particularly that little book of à Kempis, "De Imitatione Christi," since the sum and substance of religion consists in imitating the Being that is the object of your worship.

May our dear Redeemer Jesus impress upon your minds a lively representation of his own meek and immaculate heart, that, in that great and last day, he may, by this mark, know you to be his; and, together with all the rest of his sealed and redeemed ones, admit you into the mansions of eternal bliss! Amen.

Let us pray.

ETERNAL Creator and supreme Governor of the world, songs of praise are due to thee in Zion: nay, as thou art infinitely superior to all our songs and hymns, even silence in Zion redounds to thy praise. Let the societies of angels be rather employed in singing thy praises; but let us with silence and astonishment fall down at the footstool of thy throne, while they are taken up in the repetition of their celebrated doxology, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, who fillest the heaven and the earth with thy glory! But O that we had within us proper powers for exalting that most sacred Name! that name which, according to their measure, is celebrated by all the parts of this visible world which surrounds us, the heavens, the stars, the winds, the rivers, the earth, the ocean, and all the creatures therein. Thou surely didst at first implant in us souls and powers, for this purpose, superior to the rest of the visible creation: as we were then not only qualified to offer thee praises founded on the rational conviction of our minds, and animated by the affections of our hearts, but also capable of pronouncing more articulately even the praises that result from all the rest of thy visible works. But, alas! these heavenly souls, these principles proceeding from a Divine original, we have most deeply immersed in mire and dirt; nor is any hand able to extricate them out of this mud, or cleanse them from their pollution, but thine. O most exalted and bountiful Father, if thou wilt graciously please to grant us this grace and favor, we shall then offer thee new songs of praise as incense, and ourselves thus renewed as a burnt offering: and all the rest of our time in this world we shall live, not to ourselves, but wholly to Him who died for us.

* Quid terrena hæc amplectimini, quæ nec veræ divitiæ sunt, nec vestræ? Si vestræ sunt, tollite vobiscum.

† Quisquis animæ vitam maluerit, corporis vitam contemnât necesse est, nec aliter aspirare ad summum poterit bonum, nisi quæ sunt ina despererit. Noluit enim sapientissimus Deus, nos immortalitatem delicate ac molliter assequi, sed ad illud vitæ æternæ inenarrabile præmium summa cum difficultate et magnis laboribus pervenire.

May thy church throughout the whole earth, and especially in these islands, be supported by thy most powerful hand, and continually be made to rejoice in the light of thy gracious countenance. Let our king be joyful in thee; as he depends on thy bounty, let him never be moved; let his throne be established in piety and righteousness, and let peace, and the gospel of peace, be the constant blessings of these kingdoms, through Jesus Christ our Lord; to whom, with thee, and the Holy Spirit, be praise, honor, and glory, now, and for evermore. Amen.

A MODEST DEFENCE OF MODERATE EPISCOPACY,

AS ESTABLISHED IN SCOTLAND AT THE RESTORATION OF KING CHARLES II.

EPISCOPAL government, managed in conjunction with presbyters, presbyteries, and synods, is not contrary to the rule of Scripture, or the example of the primitive church, but most agreeable to both.

Yea, it is not contrary to that new covenant, which is pretended by so many as the main, if not the only, reason of their scrupling; and for their sakes it is necessary to add this: for notwithstanding the many irregularities both in the matter and form of that covenant, and in the illegal and violent ways of pressing and prosecuting of it, yet, to them who still remain under the conscience of its full force and obligation, and in that some are convincibly persuaded, it is certainly most pertinent, if it be true, to declare the consistence of the present government even with that obligation.

And as both of these assertions, I believe, upon the exactest (if impartial and impassionate) inquiry, will be found to be in themselves true, so they are owned by the generality of the presbyterians in England, as themselves have published their opinions in print, with this title, Two papers of proposals, humbly presented to his majesty, by the reverend ministers of the presbyterian persuasion. Printed at London, anno 1661.

Besides other passages in those papers to the same purpose, in pages 11 and 12, are these words: "And as these are our general ends and motives, so we are induced to insist upon the form of a synodical government, conjunct with a fixed presidency or episcopacy; for these reasons:

"1. We have reason to believe that no other terms will be so generally agreed on, &c.

"2. It being agreeable to the Scripture and the primitive government, is likeliest to be the way of a more universal concord, if ever the churches on earth arrive at such a blessing; however, it will be most acceptable to God and well-informed consciences.

"3. It will promote the practice of discipline and godliness without discord, and promote order without hindering discipline and godliness.

"4. And it is not to be silenced (though in some respects we are loath to mention it), that it will save the nations from the violation of the solemn vow and covenant, without wronging the church at all, or breaking any other oath," &c.

And a little after, they add, that "the prelacy disclaimed in that covenant, was the engrossing the sole power of ordination and jurisdiction, and exercising of the whole discipline, absolutely by bishops themselves, and their delegates, chancellors, surrogates, and officials, &c., excluding wholly the pastors of particular churches from all share in it."

And there is one of prime note among them, who, in a large treatise of church government, does clearly evidence, that this was the mind both of the parliament of England, and of the assembly of divines at Westminster, as they themselves did expressly declare it in the admitting of the covenant, that "they understood it not to be against all episcopacy, but only against that particular frame," as it is worded in the article itself.* As for our present model in Scotland, and the way of managing it, whatsoever is amiss (and it can be no wrong to make that supposition concerning any church on earth), the brethren that are dissatisfied had possibly better acquitted their duty, by free admonitions and significations of their own sense in all things, than by leaving their stations, which is the only thing that has made the breach, I fear, very hard to cure, and, in human appearance, near to incurable. But there is much charity due to those following their own consciences; and they owe, and I hope they pay, the same back again to those that do the same another way. And whatsoever may be the readiest and happiest way of reuniting those that are naturally so minded, the Lord reveal it to them in due time.

* Baxter of Church Government, P. III., c. 1, tit., page 275. "An episcopacy desirable for the reformation, preservation, and peace of the churches, a fixed president, durante vita." See pp. 297, and 330, ibid.

This one word I shall add: that this difference should arise to a great height, may seem somewhat strange to any man that calmly considers, that there is in this church no change at all, neither in the doctrine nor worship: no, nor in the substance of the discipline itself. But when it falls on matter easily inflammable, a little spark how great a fire it will kindle!

Oh! who would not long for the shadows of the evening, from all these poor childish contests!

But some will say, that we are engaged against prelacy by covenant, and therefore can not yield to so much as you do, without perjury.

Ans. That this is wholly untrue I thus demonstrate: I. When that covenant was presented to the assembly with the bare name of prelacy joined to popery, many contrary and reverend divines desired that the word (prelacy) might be explained, because it was not all episcopacy they were against; and thereupon the following clause, in the parenthesis, was given by way of explication, in these words: (That the church government by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors, and commissaries, deans, and chapters, archdeacons, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy.) By which it appears, that it was only the English hierarchy or frame, that was covenanted against; and that which was then existent, that was taken down.

II. When the house of lords took the covenant, Mr. Thomas Coleman, that gave it them, did so explain it, and profess that it was not their intent to covenant against all episcopacy; and upon this explication it was taken; and certainly the parliament was most capable of giving the due sense of it, seeing it was they that did impose it.

III. And it could not be all episcopacy that was excluded, because a parochial episcopacy was at that same time used and approved commonly in England.

IV. And in Scotland they had used the help of visiters, for the reformation of their churches, committing the care of a country or circuit to some one man, which was as high a sort of episcopacy at least as any I am pleading for: besides that they had moderators in all their synods, which were temporary bishops.

V. Also, the chief divines of the late assembly at Westminster, that recommended that covenant to the nations, have professed their own judgment for such a moderate episcopacy as I am here defending, and therefore they never intended the exclusion of this by covenant.

After the same author saith, "As we have prelacy to be aware of, so we have the contrary extreme to avoid; and the church's peace, if it may be so procured; and as we must not take down the ministry lest it prepare men for episcopacy, so neither must we be against any profitable use and exercise of the ministry, or desirable order among them, for fear of introducing prelacy," &c.

There is another that has wrote a treatise on purpose, and that zealous enough, concerning the obligation of the league and covenant, under the name of Theophilus Timericus, and yet therein it is expressly asserted, that however at first view it might appear, that the parliament had renounced all episcopacy, yet, upon exacter inquiry, it was evident to the author that that very scruple was made by some members in parliament, and resolved, with the consent of their brethren in Scotland, that the covenant was only intended against prelacy as it was then in being in England, leaving a latitude for episcopacy, &c.

It would be noted, that when that covenant was framed, there was no episcopacy at all in being in Scotland, but in England only; so that the extirpation of that frame only could then be merely intended.

Likewise, it would be considered of, though there is in Scotland at present the name of dean and chapter and commissaries, yet, that none of these do exercise at all any part of the discipline under that name, neither any other, as chancellor, or surrogate, &c., by delegation from bishops, with total exclusion of the community of presbyters from all power and share in it; which is the greatest point of difference between that model and this with us, and imports so much as to the main of discipline.

I do not deny that the generality of the people, even of ministers in Scotland, when they took the covenant, did understand that article as against all episcopacy whatsoever, even the most moderate: especially if it should be restored under the express name of bishops and archbishops; never considering how different the nature and model, and way of exercising it, might be thought on under these names, and that the due regulating of the thing is much more to be regarded than either the returning or altering the name. But though they did not then consider any such thing, yet certainly it concerns them now to consider it, when it is represented to them that not only the words of the oath itself do very genuinely consist with such a qualified and distinctive sense, but that the very composers and imposers of it, or a considerable part of them, did so understand and intend it. And unless they can make it appear that the episcopacy now in question with us in Scotland is either contrary to the word of God, or to that mitigated sense of their own oath, it would seem more suitable to Christian charity and moderation, rather to yield to it, as tolerable at least, than to continue so inflexibly to their first mistakes, and excessive zeal for love of it, as to divide from the church, and break the bond of peace.

It may likewise be granted, that some learned men in England, who have refused to take the covenant, did possibly except against that article of it, as signifying the total renunciation and abolition of episcopacy, and seeing that it was the real event and consequence of it, and they having many other strong and weighty reasons for refusing it, it is no wonder that they were little curious to inquire what passed among the contrivers of it, and what distinction, or different senses, either the words of that article might admit, or those contrivers might intend by them.

And the truth is, that, besides many other evils, the iniquity and unhappiness of such oaths and covenants lie much in this, that being commonly framed by persons that, even among themselves, are not fully of one mind, but have their different opinions and interests to serve (and it was so even in this), they commonly patch up so many several articles and clauses, and those, too, of so versatile and ambiguous terms, that they prove most wretched snares and thickets of briars and thorns to the consciences of those who are engaged in them, and matter of endless contentions and disputes among them, about the true sense and intentment, and the ties and obligations of those doubtful clauses: especially in such alterations and revolutions of affairs as always may, and often do, even within few years, follow after them; for the models and productions of such devices are not usually long-lived. And whatsoever may be said for their excuse in whole or in part, who, in yielding to the power that pressed it, and the general opinion of this church at that time, did take that covenant in the most moderate and least schismatical sense that the terms can admit; yet I know not what can be said to clear them of a very great sin, that not only framed such an engine, but violently imposed it upon all ranks of men; not ministers and other public persons only, but the whole body and community, to such a hodge-podge of things of various concernments, religious and civil, as church discipline and government, the privileges of parliaments, and liberties of subjects, and condign punishment of malignants—things hard enough for the wisest and learnedest to draw the just lines of, and to give plain definitions and decisions of them, and therefore certainly as far off from the reach of poor country people's understanding, as from the true interest of their souls. And yet to tie them by a religious oath, either to know all, or to contend for them blindfold, without knowing of them where will there be instanced a greater oppression and tyranny over consciences than this? Certainly, they that now govern in this church can not be charged with anything near or like unto it; for whatsoever they require of intrants to the ministry, they require neither subscriptions nor oaths of ministers already entered, and far less of the whole body of the people. And it were ingenuously done to take some notice of any point of moderation, or whatsoever else is really commendable, even in those we account our greatest enemies, and not to take any party in the world for the absolute standard and unfailing rule of truth and righteousness in all things.

A FRAGMENT ON EZRA IX.

Our joys and griefs are the pulse of our hearts, and tell the temper of them. Earthly joy and sorrow take deep with an earthly heart, but little affect that which is spiritual and heavenly; and in this, those prayers and griefs are strong that arise from spiritual causes, which most of men scarcely feel at all: yea, a holy heart stays not in its own interest, in its mourning or rejoicing, but hath more sense even of other men's sins, than commonly they themselves who are guilty. Rivers of waters, says David, run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law. Psalm cxix. 136. Of this same temper was this holy man. Oh! how would a few, how would one such person in a congregation, advance the work of a public fast, more than hundreds of us! And such an one's silence speaks more than all our noises; his sitting astonished till the evening sacrifice. Little, shallow griefs find the tongue more readily, but the greater are not of so easy vent, but stop awhile though pressing to be out, as a full vessel with a narrow mouth. It was so with Ezra's sorrow for the people's sin; but when it gets out, it springs upward with the greater force, even up to heaven. I fell on my knees, and spread out my hands to the Lord my God, and said, Oh! my God, I am ashamed, our iniquities are increased over our heads:—q. d., These cover me with shame, and I blush to lift up my face to those heavens whither our iniquities are gone up before: when I would look to thee, I spy our horrible transgressions got thither first, and mutiny of the people, thereby engaging such droves of poor ignorant persons to they know not what, and (to speak freely) standing before thee and accusing us. Our transgression is grown up to heaven. It hath had a long time to grow in, and all that time hath been incessantly growing, and therefore grown so high. Since the days of our fathers we have been in this trespass. Generations pass, but yet your sins abide. When the succeeding generation follows on in it, the former sins are reserved, and the latter added to them, and so they are kept alive. Thus they grow. This fills up the measure, and ripens a people for judgment, that is filling and growing all the while suitable to the sin, till it be poured out. Hence public calamities and long-lasting judgments on people.

Now these two things aggravate: great judgments inflicted, and great deliverances granted. Yet after both, this people had forsaken God's commandments. And after all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve, and hast given us such deliverance as this. Is not this just our case? Have we not been sharply scourged, though indeed far less than our iniquities, and have we not been seasonably and wonderfully delivered in our extremities? And yet have we not again broken his commandments? And do we not still generally and grossly continue so doing! Oh! what shall we say to our God? We can not stand before him, because of this. Let us, therefore, fall down before him, and confess, and supplicate; and there is yet hope that he will be gracious.

C H A R G E S

TO THE CLERGY OF THE DIOCESAN SYNOD OF DUNBLANE.

I. Bishop Leighton's Charge to his Clergy, Sept. 1662.

FOR DISCIPLINE.

FIRST, That all diligence be used for the repressing of profaneness, and for the advancement of solid piety.

Secondly, That not only scandals of unchastity, but drunkenness, swearing, cursing, filthy speaking, and mocking of religion, and all other gross offences, be brought under church censure.

Thirdly, That scandalous offenders be not absolved till there appear in them very probable signs of true repentance.

Fourthly, That inquiry be made by the minister, not only into the knowledge, but the practice and track of life, of those who are to be admitted to the holy communion; and all profane and evidently impenitent persons be secluded till their better conversation and obedience to the gospel be more apparent.

Fifthly, That family prayer be inquired after; and they that can, be exhorted to join with it reading of the Scriptures.

FOR WORSHIP.

First, That instead of lecturing and preaching both at one meeting, larger portions of the Holy Scriptures, one whole chapter at least of each Testament, and Psalms withal, be constantly read; and this not as a by-work, while they are convening, but after the people are well convened, and the worship solemnly begun with confession of sins and prayer, either by the minister or some fit person by him appointed.

Secondly, That the Lord's Prayer be restored to more frequent use; likewise the doxology and the creed.

Thirdly, That daily public prayer, in churches, morning and evening, with reading of the Scriptures, be used where it can be had conveniently, and the people be exhorted to frequent them; not so as to think that this should excuse them from daily private prayer in their families and in secret, but rather as a help to enable them and dispose them the more for both these: and let the constant use of secret prayer be recommended to all persons, as the great instrument of sanctifying the soul, and of entertaining and increasing it in the love of God.

Fourthly, That the younger sort and the ignorant be diligently catechised, at fit times, all the year through; and that work not wholly laid over on some days or weeks before the celebration of the communion; but that the inquiry, at that time, be rather of their good conversation, and due disposition for partaking of that holy ordinance, as was said before in an article touching discipline.

Fifthly, That ministers use some short form of catechism, such as they may require account of, till a common form be agreed on.

Sixthly, That preaching be plain and useful for all capacities; not entangled with useless questions and disputes, nor continued to a wearisome length; the great and most necessary principles of religion, most frequently treated upon: and oftentime larger portions of Scripture explained, and suitable instructions and exhortations thence deduced; and let that be the sermon at that time; which will doubtless be as truly preaching, and as useful, if not more so, than insisting, for a whole sermon or more, upon one short verse or sentence.

The bishop propounded to the brethren, that it was to be remembered, by himself and them both, to how eminent degrees of purity of heart and life their holy calling doth engage them; to how great contempt of this present world, and inflamed affections toward heaven, springing from deep persuasions within them of those things they preach to others, and from the daily meditation of them, and fervent prayer: and that they consider how ill it becomes them to be much in the trivial conversation of the world; but, when their duty or necessity involves them in company, that their speech and deportment be exemplarily holy, ministering grace to those with whom they converse: and (to add but this one thing, so suitable to ministers of the gospel of peace) that they be meek and gentle, and lovers and exhorters of peace, private and public, among all ranks of men; endeavoring rather to quench than to increase the useless debates and contentions that abound in the world; and that they be always more studious of pacific than polemic divinity, that certainly being much diviner than this, for the students of it are called the sons of God. Matt. v. 9.

II. The Bishop's Address after the business was over, October, 1665.

AFTER the affairs of the synod were ended, the bishop showed the brethren he had somewhat to impart to them that concerned himself, which, though it imported little or nothing, either to them or the church, yet he judged it his duty to acquaint them with; and it was, the resolution he had taken of retiring from this public charge; and that all the account he could give of the reasons moving him to it, was briefly this: the sense he had of his own unworthiness of so high a station in the church, and his weariness of the contentions of this church, which seemed rather to be growing than abating, and, by their growth, did make so great abatements of that Christian meekness and mutual charity, that is so much more worth than the whole sum of all that we contend about. He thanked the brethren for all their undeserved respect and kindness manifested to himself all along;

and desired their good construction of the poor endeavors he had used to serve them, and to assist them in promoting the work of the ministry, and the great designs of the gospel, in their bounds; and if, in anything, in word or deed, he had offended them, or any of them, he very earnestly and humbly craved their pardon; and having recommended to them to continue in the study of peace and holiness, and of ardent love to our great Lord and Master, and to the souls he hath so dearly bought, he closed with these words of the apostle: "Finally, brethren, farewell: be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, and live in peace; and the God of peace and love shall be with you."

III. The Bishop's Charge, October, 1666.

1. It was enacted, that all the ministers do endeavor to bring their people to a high esteem of the Holy Scriptures, and of the reading of them in public; and to give evidence thereof, by reverent and attentive hearing, none being permitted to stand about the doors, or lie in the kirkyard, during the time of reading; and if, after warning given them of this, any shall be found to continue in the same disorder, they are, by due rebukes and censures, to be brought to obedience.

2. That the ministers be careful to direct the readers what parts of the Scriptures are most frequently to be read: as, the histories of the gospel, and the epistles; and of the Old Testament, the most intelligible and practicable parts, particularly large portions of the Psalms at all times, being both so excellently instructive, and withal so divine forms of prayers and praises, and therefore have been so much used by the Christian churches in all ages, and always made so great a part of their public service.

3. That no readers be permitted, but such as are tried and approved by the presbytery.

4. That, besides the reading between the second and third bell, which is but as in the interval for those that are come, till the rest do convene, some part of the Scriptures be read after the last bell is rung out, and the congregation more fully met, and the minister is come in: either by himself, or by the reader at his appointment; one chapter at least, together with some of the Psalms, one or more, as they are of length, and of which some part afterward may be sung, and so the people shall the better understand what they sing. Thus shall this so useful ordinance of public reading of the Scriptures be performed with more solemnity, and brought into greater respect and veneration, and the people be more universally and plentifully edified by it. But, together with this, the reciting of the ten commandments, the belief, according to the acts of former synods, is no Lord's day to be omitted. Nor is this only or mainly meant as a help to the people's learning the words of them, and so being able to repeat them, but as a solemn publication of the law of God, as the rule of our life, and a solemn profession of our believing the articles of our Christian faith, and for the quickening of our affections toward both.

And as to that exercise of reading the Scriptures, it can not be imagined that any well-instructed and solid-minded Christian can question the great expediency and usefulness of it for all ranks of people: for, besides that many of our commons can not read, and so can not use the Scriptures in private, and too many that can, yet do neglect it; even they that use them most in private, will not only no whit the less, but so much the more, be well satisfied and edified with hearing them read in public, and will more reverently and religiously attend to them, and, with the blessing of God upon them so doing, not fail to find (what others can say they have often found) divers passages and sentences falling frequently in upon their hearts in public reading, with particular warmth and Divine force, nothing below, if not sometimes beyond, what they usually find in private.

If the minister think fit to make his sermon for the time, upon some part of what, by himself, or by his appointment, hath been read, it may do well; and possibly so much the better, the longer the text be, and the shorter the sermon be; for it is greatly to be suspected that our usual way of very short texts, and very long sermons, is apt to weary people more, and profit them less.

But, whatsoever they do in this, they should beware of returning to their long expositions, besides their sermon, at one and the same meeting; which, besides the tediousness and other inconveniences, is apt to foment in people's minds the foolish prejudice and proud disdain they have taken against the Scriptures read without a superadded discourse: in which conceit, for all their zeal against popery, they seem to be too much of the Romish opinion, as accounting the Holy Scriptures so obscure in themselves, that it is someway dangerous, or at least altogether unprofitable, to intrust the common people either with reading or hearing any part of them at any time, unless they be backed with continual expositions.

5. That ministers do endeavor to reduce the people from the irreverent deportment they have generally contracted in the public worship; particularly from their most indecent sitting at prayer, to kneel or stand, as conveniently they may, that we may worship, both with our bodies and with our souls, Him that made both, and made them for that very end. Oh! how needful is that invitatory to be often rung in our ears, that seem wholly to have forgot it! "Oh! come, and let us worship and bow down, and kneel before the Lord our Maker."

6. That people be frequently and earnestly exhorted to morning and evening prayer in their families, especially the prime families in parishes, as most exemplary.

7. That the way of catechising be more adapted to the capacity of our rude and ignorant people; and that our sermons, particularly those of the afternoon, may be more frequently bestowed on the most plain and intelligible way of explaining some point of catechetical doctrine.

8. It was recommended, that convenient utensils be provided in every kirk, for the administration of the holy sacraments.

9. That, according to our great and standing duty, we be still more and more zealous and careful, by doctrine and discipline, to purge out all profaneness; particularly the most common and crying sins, as drunkenness, cursing, swearings, railing, and bitter speaking, and rotten, filthy speaking, so usual among the common sort, in their house or field labor together, particularly in harvest: and that it be by all ministers recommended to the owners of the crops, and overseers of the reapers, to range them so to their work, and in such divisions, as may give least occasion to anything of that kind.

10. That, as we ourselves should be exemplary in holiness, we should endeavor that our seniores plebis, or elders of the people, be so too; and, for that end, rather to have them well chosen, though fewer, than a great number of such as too often they are.

11. That the presbyteries do inquire of each one of their number concerning the celebration of the communion, that at least our usual returns of it be neglected by none; for it is one of the great defects and reproaches of our church, that that great ordinance, being so useful for the increase of holiness, should be so seldom administered, as with us it is, even where it is oftenest. For the way of examination in order to it, somewhat is set down in our first synod, which may be looked at, if possibly it may prove to be of any use.

IV. Paper given in by the Bishop to the Synod, April, 1667.

I CONFESS that my own inactive and unmeddling temper may be too apt to prevail against the known duty of my station, and may incline me rather to inquire too little than too much into the deportment of others; and rather to be deficient, than to exceed in admonitions and advices to my brethren, in matters of their duty: and, besides this natural aversion, the sense of my own great unworthiness and filthiness, may give me check, and be a very strong curb upon me, in censuring others for what may be amiss, or in offering any rules for the redress of it. And there is yet another consideration, that bends still further that way; for I am so desirous to keep far off from the reach of that prejudice that abounds in these parts against the very name of my sacred function, as apt to command and domineer too much, that I may possibly err on the other hand, and scarcely perform the duty of the lowest and most moderate kind of moderator ; so that I am forced to spur and drive up myself against all these retardments, to suggest anything, how useful soever, beyond our road or accustomed way, especially finding how little anything of that kind takes, and prevails to any real effect.

However, when anything appears to me of evident reason and usefulness, and that easily joins in, and paceth with, our standing customs, I judge it my duty to offer it to you ; and I hope, if that ye shall find it of any use, ye will not reject it, but rather improve it to somewhat better, that by occasion of it may arise in your own thoughts.

Something of this kind I have formerly moved, concerning the way of dealing with persons fallen into scandalous sin : frequent speaking with them in private, to the convincing and awakening their consciences to a lively sense of sin, and directing them in the exercises of repentance, and exhorting them to set apart some time for the solid humbling of their souls in fasting and prayer ; and not to admit them to public confession, until they have, to our best discerning, some real heart-sense of sin, and remorse for it, and serious purposes of newness of life.

Likewise, I suggested somewhat touching the way of examining of all persons, toward their admission to the holy communion, besides the ordinary way of catechising the younger and more ignorant sort ; and some other particulars much like these, that now I will not repeat.

That which I would recommend at this time, relates to the business of privy trials (as they are called) of ministers in their presbyteries, toward the time of the synod ; in which I have perceived, in some places (if I may be pardoned that free word), very much of superficial, empty form ; for the help of which, besides other ways which might be thought on, that which occurs to me at present, is this : That some certain questions be asked of every minister before he withdraws ; and these be much the same with those that usually are, or filly may be, propounded to the elders and people concerning their ministers, at the visitation of particular kirks. For though, in the case we now speak of, we can have nothing but every man's own word concerning himself, yet this does not render it a useless thing : for, besides that divers of the questions will be of things so obvious to public knowledge, that no man will readily adventure to give an untrue answer, where it may be so readily traced, there is much to be given to the presumed ingenuity and vivacity of a minister, especially in what is solemnly and punctually inquired of him ; and whatsoever, formerly, hath been, or hath not been, his former degree of diligence in the particulars, the very inquiry and asking concerning them, will be apt to awake, in every man, a more serious reflection upon himself touching each point ; and the drawing forth such an express answer to each before his brethren, will probably excite and engage him to higher exactness in all of them for the time to come.

The particulars I conceive may be these, and such others like them, as may be further thought fit.

1. Whether he be constantly assiduous in plain and profitable preaching, instructing, and exhorting, and reproof, most expressly and frequently, those sins that abound most among his people ; and in all things, to his best skill, fitting his doctrine to the capacities, necessities, and edification of all sorts within his charge ?

2. Whether he be diligent in catechising, employing throughout the year such seasons and times for it, as may be easiest and fittest for the people to attend it, and not wholly casting it over upon some few days or weeks near the time of the communion.

3. How often in the year he celebrates the holy communion ? For I am ashamed to say, whether, at least, once every year ?

4. Whether he does faithfully and impartially exercise discipline, and bring all known scandals to due censure ; and does speak privately, and that oftener than once, with the persons convicted, and admits them not to public acknowledgment, till he sees in them some probable signs of true repentance ?

5. Whether he be diligent, by himself and his elders, in all convenient ways, to know the department of the several families and persons of his flock : and do frequently visit the families, and not only ask, but do his best certainly to inform himself, whether they constantly use morning and evening prayer, together with reading of the Scriptures, if they have any that can do it ; and whether this point of family exercise be specially provided for in the choice families in the parish ?

6. Whether he be careful of the relief of the poor, and of visiting the sick, whensoever he knows of any, even though they neglect to send for him ; and for this end make inquiry, and the rather prevent their sending, because they commonly defer that, till it can be of little or no use to them ?

7. Whether he does in private plainly and freely admonish those he knows, or hath cause to suspect, to be given to uncleanness, or drunkenness, or swearing, or any kind of inordinate walking, especially if they be of that quality that engages him frequently to converse with them ; and if they continue such, leaves off that converse ; and if their miscarriage be public, brings them to public censure ?

8. Whether he watches exactly over his own conversation in all things, that he not only give no offence, but be an example to the flock, and preach by living ?

9. Whether he spend the greatest portions of his time in private, in reading, and prayer, and meditation—a thing so necessary to enable him for all the other parts of his duty ?

10. Whether he makes it the great business, and withal the great pleasure of his life, to fulfil the work of his ministry, in the several parts and duties of it, out of love to God, and to the souls of his people ?

11. If he does not only avoid gross offences (which, in a guide of souls were intolerable), but studies daily to mortify pride, and rash anger, and vain-glory, and covetousness, and love of this world and of sensual pleasures, and self-love, and all inordinate passions and affections, even in those instances wherein they are subtlest and least discernible by others, and commonly too little discerned by ourselves ?

12. If he not only lives in peace with his brethren and flock, and withal as much as is possible, but is an ardent lover, and promoter of it, reconciling differences, and preserving good agreement, all he can, amongst his people ?

It hath not escaped my thoughts, that some of these questions, being of things more inward, may seem less fit to be publicly propounded to any ; and that the best observers of them will, both out of modesty, and real humility, and severe judging of themselves, be aptest to charge themselves with deficiency in them, and will only own, at most, sincere desires and endeavor, which, likewise, they that practise and mind them least may in general profess : neither is there any more particular and punctual account to be expected of such things of any man in public : but the main intent in these (as was said before), is, serious reflection, and that each of us may be stirred up to ask ourselves over again these and more of the like questions, in our most private trials, and our secret scrutinies of our own hearts and lives, and may redouble our diligence in purging ourselves, that we may be in the house of God vessels of honor, sanctified and meet for the Master's use, and prepared to every good work. And, for those other things more exposed to the knowledge of others, if any brother hears of the faultiness in any of the number, he shall not do well to think rudely to vent it in the meeting, till first he have made all due inquiry after the truth of it ; yea, though he hath it upon inquiry to be true, yet ought he not, even then, to make his first essay of rectifying his brother, by a declaration to the full meeting, without having formerly admonished him, first alone, and then (according to our Savior's rule) in the presence of one or two more ; but having done so, if neither of these reclaim him, then follows of necessity to tell the church : but that is likewise to be done with great singleness of heart, and charity and compassion ; and the whole procedure of the whole company, with the person so delated, is to be managed with the same temper, according to the excellent advice of the apostle, " My brethren, if any man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted." Gal. vi. 2.

V. Paper given in by the Bishop to the Synod, October 1667, containing Proposals touching the following things :

1. Solemn reading of the Scriptures.
2. Reducing the people to a reverend gesture in prayer.
3. Plain, and practical, and catechetical preaching.
4. A weekly day for catechising, and the reading of the Scriptures joined with it.
5. A short and plain form of catechism.
6. A more exact and spiritual way of dealing with public penitents.
7. As likewise of preparing people for the communion ; more frequent celebration whereof is so much to be wished, but so little, or scarce at all, to be hoped in this church.
8. That, in preaching, the most abounding and crying sins be more sharply and frequently reprov'd, particularly cursing and swearing ; and the worship of God in families more urged.
9. The due educating and moulding the minds of young students in presbyteries.
10. More frequent and more exact visitation of churches : and the visiting of families by each minister in his own charge.

The words of the paper were as follow :—

1. That the reading of the Holy Scriptures in our public meetings, when they are solemnest and fullest, be constantly used, and that we endeavor to bring our people to a reverend and affectionate esteem of that ordinance, and attention to it.
2. That both by our own example, and by frequent instruction and exhortation, we study to reform that extreme irreverence and indecency that hath generally prevailed in people's deportment in time of public worship, and particularly in prayer : and that they be reduced to such a gesture, as may signify that we are acknowledging and adoring the great Majesty of God.
3. That we endeavor to adopt our way of preaching, with all evidence and plainness, to the informing of the people's minds, and quickening their affections, and raising in them renewed purposes of a Christian life : and that some part of our sermons be designed for the plain and practical explication of the great principles of religion.
4. That we fix some certain times, at least one day in the week, throughout the year, for catechising, and that, withal, there be reading of the Scriptures and prayer at the same time ; to which, besides that part of the people that are for each time particularly warned to be present, those others that are near the church and at leisure may resort. For the work of the ministry is a husbandry of more continual labor and attendance than that of our country people that labor the ground, and therefore can not well be duly discharged if it be wholly cast over upon the Lord's day, without ever meeting with them, or bringing any considerable part of them together, all the week long.

5. It seems absolutely necessary, that each minister should resolve on some short and plain form of catechism, for the use of his people: for it is not, I think, to be imagined, that ever people will have any fixed knowledge of the articles of religion, by lax and continually varied discourses and forms, or by catechisms too long and too hard for them. And would some person draw up several short forms, they might be revised at the next synod, and possibly one framed out of them, which, by consent, might be appointed for the use of this diocese, for the interim, till one shall be published for the whole church.

6. That which hath been formerly proposed, should be reminded, of a more exact and spiritual way of dealing with public offenders, that their reception might be both more apt to recover the penitents themselves, and to edify the church.

7. For more frequent communion (if it could be had), or however, for the better improving it when we have it, seldom as it is, what hath been formerly suggested touching the way of examining and preparing people to it, and other particulars relating thereto, need not be repeated but need very much to be really practised, if they can be of any use.

8. Likewise, enough hath been formerly said (it were well if anything might once appear to be done), touching the worship of God in families, especially the prime ones within our bounds: as likewise touching the exercise of discipline for the repressing of swearing and drunkenness, and all profaneness, so much abounding everywhere; and that our doctrine be likewise more particularly and frequently applied to that purpose.

9. Something hath likewise been said concerning the training up of such young men among us as intend the ministry, not only as to their strain of preaching, but the moulding of their minds to more inward thoughts, and the study of a devout life, and more acquaintance with the exercises of mortification and purging of their own hearts by those Divine truths which they are to preach to others for the same purpose: for how shall they teach what they have not learned?

10. That churches be more frequently and exactly visited, and, by each minister, the families of his congregation.

This paper being publicly read, and consented to, and approved by the unanimous vote of the synod, conformably to it was framed the following act.

The bishop and synod having seriously considered the height of profaneness and gross sins abounding among their people, particularly drunkenness and uncleanness, and most universally the heinous sin of cursing and swearing, and that which fomented and increases those and all sins, the great contempt of the Lord's holy day and ordinances, and the gross and almost incredible ignorance of the common sort, under so much assiduous preaching and catechising; for the more effectual redress of all these evils, have agreed and resolved, through the Lord's help, each one within himself, to stir the grace and zeal of God that is within him, to renewed vigor and fervor, and more earnest endeavors in the use of all due means for that effect; and particularly,

1. The applying of their sermons and doctrines more expressly and frequently to the reproof of those wickednesses, especially of that horrible sin which almost all ranks of men do more easily and frequently commit than they can possibly do other gross sins, and that with less sense and remorse—cursing and swearing: and that they will, by God's assistance, not only use short and frequent reproofs of this and other sins, but at sometimes more largely insist in representing the exceeding sinfulness and vileness of such a particular sin, and the great danger of the Lord's wrath and heaviest judgments upon those that persist in it.

2. That with this they will join constant private inspection over the lives of their people, and, by all due means, particularly inquire into them; and when they find any one guilty of any gross sin, privately to admonish him, meekly and affectionately, but yet with all freedom and plainness; and if upon that they mend not, to proceed in the regular way of discipline and censure within their own charge; and if they be not by that reclaimed, but prove obstinate, then to delate them to the highest judicature, in the usual order of this church.

3. To use more frequent catechising, and that in so plain a method and way as may be most apt both to inform the minds of the most ignorant, and, through the blessing of God, to make more deep impression upon their hearts.

4. That, as much as is competent for ministers; they will endeavor to procure the executing of those penal laws made against cursing and swearing, and other scandalous offences, in such a way as may be most convenient and feasible in each of their respective parishes.

5. That they will endeavor, both by exhortation, and, where need is, by use of discipline, to bring their people to more careful and constant attendance on all the ordinances of God at all times of the accustomed public meetings, and to a more religious and reverend deportment in them throughout the whole, but particularly in time of prayer.

6. That they be particularly careful to inquire after the daily performance of the worship of God in families, and, where they find it wanting, to enjoin it, and make inquiry again after it; and this should be especially provided for in the choice and most eminent families in the several congregations, as exemplary to all the rest.

VI. Concluding Paragraph, April, 1668.

The bishop, having commended the brethren for their unity, and concord, and good conversation, exhorted them to continue therein, and to be more and more exemplary in holiness, and in modesty and gravity, even in the externals of their hair and habit, and their whole deportment; and to the regulating of their children, and their whole families, to be patterns of religion and sobriety to all about them; and that they themselves aspire daily to greater abstraction from the world, and contempt of things below; giving themselves wholly to their great work of watching over souls, for which they must give account; and to reading and meditation; and to prayer, that draws continual fresh supplies from heaven, to enable them for all these duties.

VII. Paragraph respecting Baptismal Vows, October, 1668.

That which had been sometime spoke of before, the bishop now again recommended to the brethren, that, at their set times of catechising and examining their people, they would take particular notice of young persons, toward their first admission to the holy communion; and, having before taken account of their knowledge of the grounds of religion, would then cause them, each one particularly and expressly to declare their belief of the Christian faith, into which, in their infancy, they were baptized; and, reminding them of that their baptismal vow, and the great engagements it lays upon them to a holy and Christian life, would require of them an explicit owning of that vow and engagement, and their solemn promise accordingly, to endeavor the observing and performance of it, in the whole course of their following life: and then, in their prayer with which they use to conclude those meetings, would recommend the said young persons, now thus engaged, to the effectual blessing of God, beseeching him to own them for his, and to bestow on them the sanctifying and strengthening grace of his Holy Spirit, as his signature upon them, sealing them to the day of redemption.

And this practice, as it hath nothing in it that can offend any, even the most scrupulous minds, so it may be a very fit suppletory of that defect in infant baptism, which the enemies of it do mainly object against it, and may, through the blessing of God, make a lasting impression of religion upon the hearts of those young persons toward whom it is used, and effectually engage them to a Christian life; and, if they swerve from it, make them the more inexcusable and clearly convincible of their unfaithfulness and breach of that great promise and sacred vow, they have so renewed to God before his people. And for authority of divines, if we regard it, it hath the general approbation of the most famous reformers, and of the most pious and learned that have followed them since their time; and, being performed in that evangelical simplicity as it is here propounded, they do not only allow it as lawful, but desire it, and advise it as laudable and profitable, and of very good use, in all Christian churches.

RULES AND INSTRUCTIONS FOR A HOLY LIFE.

For disposing you the better to observe these rules, and profit by them, be pleased to take the following advices:—

1. Put all your trust in the special and singular mercy of God, that he for his mercy's sake, and of his only goodness, will help and bring you to perfection. Not that absolute perfection is attainable here, but the meaning is, to high degrees of that spiritual and divine life, which is always growing and tending toward the absolute perfection above; but in some persons comes nearer to that and riseth higher, even here, than in the most. If you with hearty and fervent desires do continually wish and long for it, and with most humble devotion daily pray unto God and call for it, and with all diligence do busily labor and travail to come to it, undoubtedly it shall be given you. For you must not think it sufficient to use exercises, as though they had such virtues in them, that of themselves alone, they could make such as do use them perfect; for neither those nor any other, whatever they be, can of themselves (by their use only) bring unto perfection. But our merciful Lord God, of his own goodness, when you seek with hearty desires and fervent sighings, maketh you to find it. When you ask daily with devout prayer, then he giveth it to you; and when you continually, with unwearied labor and travail, knock perseveringly, then he doth mercifully open unto you. And because those exercises do teach you to seek, ask, and knock, yea, they are none other than very devout petitions, seekings, and spiritual pulsations for the merciful help of God; therefore they are very profitable means to come to perfection by God's grace.

2. Let no particular exercise hinder your public and standing duties to God and your neighbors : but for these, rather intermit the other for a time, and then return to it as soon as you can.

3. If, in time of your spiritual exercise, you find yourself drawn to any better, or to as good a contemplation as that is, follow the track of that good motion so long as it shall last.

4. Always take care to follow such exercises of devout thoughts, withal putting in practice such lessons as they contain and excite to.

5. Though at first ye feel no sweetness in such exercises, yet be not discouraged, nor induced to leave them, but continue in them faithfully, whatsoever pain or spiritual trouble ye feel ; for, doing them for God and his honor, and finding none other present fruit, yet you shall have an excellent reward for your diligent labor and your pure intentions. And let not your falling short of these models and rules, nor your daily manifold imperfections and faults, dishearten you ; but continue steadfast in your desires, purposes, and endeavors ; and ever ask the best, aim at the best, and hope the best, being sorry that you can do no better ; and they shall be a most acceptable sacrifice in the sight of God, and in due time you shall reap if you faint not. And of all such instructions let your rule be, to follow them as much as you can ; but not too scrupulously thinking your labor lost if you do not exactly and strictly answer them in everything. Purpose still better, and by God's grace all shall be well.

SECTION I.

Rule 1. Exercise thyself in the knowledge and deep consideration of our Lord God, calling humbly to mind how excellent and incomprehensible he is ; and this knowledge shalt thou rather endeavor to obtain by fervent desire and devout prayer, than by high study and outward labor. It is the singular gift of God, and certainly very precarious.

2. Pray, then, " Most gracious Lord, whom to know is the very bliss and felicity of man's soul, and yet none can know thee, unless thou wilt open and show thyself unto him ; vouchsafe, of thy infinite mercy, now and ever, to enlighten my heart and mind to know thee, and thy most holy and perfect will, to the honor and glory of thy name. Amen."

3. Then lift up thy heart to consider (not with too great violence, but soberly) the eternal and infinite power of God, who has created all things by his excellent wisdom ; his unmeasurable goodness, and incomprehensible love ; for he is very and only God, most excellent, most high, most glorious, the everlasting and unchangeable goodness, an eternal substance, a charity infinite, so excellent and ineffable in himself, that all dignity, perfection, and goodness, that is possible to be spoken or thought of, can not sufficiently express the smallest part thereof.

4. Consider that he is the natural place, the centre and rest of thy soul. If thou then think of the most blessed Trinity, muse not too much thereon, but with devout and obedient faith, meekly and lowly adore and worship.

5. Consider Jesus the Redeemer and Husband of thy soul, and walk with him as becomes a chaste spouse, with reverence and lowly shamefulness, obedience and submission.

6. Then turn to the deep, profound consideration of thyself, thine own nothingness, and thy extreme defilement and pollution, thy natural aversion from God, and that thou must, by conversion to him again, and union with him, be made happy.

7. Consider thyself and all creatures as nothing, in comparison of thy Lord ; that so thou mayest not only be content, but desirous to be unknown, or being known, to be contemned and despised of all men, yet without thy faults or deservings, as much as thou canst.

8. Pray : " O God, infuse into my heart thy heavenly light and blessed charity, that I may know and love thee above all things ; and above all things loath and abhor myself. Grant that I may be so ravished in the wonder and love of thee, that I may forget myself and all things ; feel neither prosperity nor adversity ; may not fear to suffer all the pains of this world, rather than to be parted and pulled away from thee, whose perfections infinitely exceed all thought and understanding. O ! let me find thee more inwardly and verily present with me, than I am with myself ; and make me most circumspect how I do use myself in the presence of thee, my holy Lord.

" Cause me always to remember how everlasting and constant is the love thou bearest toward me, and such a charity and continual care, as though thou hadst no more creatures in heaven or earth besides me. What am I ? A vile worm and filth."

9. Then aspire to a great contrition for thy sins, and hatred of them, an abhorring of thyself for them ; then crave pardon in the blood of Jesus Christ ; and then offer up thyself, soul and body, an oblation or sacrifice, in and through him : as they did of old, laying wood on the altar, and then burning up all : so this shall be a sacrifice of sweet savor, and very acceptable to God.

10. Offer all that thou hast, to be nothing, to use nothing of all that thou hast about thee and is called thine, but to his honor and glory : and resolve through his grace to use all the powers of thy soul, and every member of thy body, to his service, as formerly thou hast done to sin.

11. Consider the passion of thy Lord, how he was buffeted, scourged, reviled, stretched with nails on the cross, and hung on it three long hours ; suffered all the contempt and shame, and all the inconceivable pain of it, for thy sake.

12. Then turn thy heart to him, humbly saying, "Lord Jesus, whereas I daily fall, and am ready to sin, vouchsafe me grace as oft as I shall, to rise again; let me never presume, but always most meekly and humbly acknowledge my wretchedness and frailty, and repent, with a firm purpose to amend; and let me not despair because of my great frailty, but ever trust in thy most loving mercy and readiness to forgive."

SECTION II.

1. Thou shalt have much to do in mortifying of thy five senses, which must be all shut up in the crucified humility of Jesus Christ, and be as they were plainly dead.

2. Thou must now learn to have a continued eye inwardly to thy soul and spiritual life, as thou hast used heretofore to have all thy mind and regard to outward pleasure and worldly things.

3. Thou must submit and give thyself up unto the discipline of Jesus, and become his scholar, resigning and compelling thyself altogether to obey him in all things; so that thy willing and nilling thou utterly and perfectly do cast away from thee, and do nothing without his license: at every word thou wilt speak, at every morsel thou wilt eat, at every stirring or moving of every article or member of thy body, thou must ask leave of him in thy heart, and ask thyself whether, having so done, that be according to his will and holy example, and with sincere intention of his glory. Hence,

4. Even the most necessary actions of thy life, though lawful, yet must thus be offered up with a true intention unto God, in the union of the most holy works, and blessed merits of Christ; saying, "Lord Jesus, bind up in the merits of thy blessed senses, all my feeling and sensation, and all my wits and senses, that I never hereafter use them to any sensuality."

5. Thus labor to come to this union and knitting up of thy senses, in God and thy Lord Jesus, and remain so fast to the cross, that thou never part from it, and still behave thy body and all thy senses as in the presence of thy Lord God, and commit all things to the most trusty providence of thy loving Lord, who will then order all things delectably and sweetly for thee. Reckon all things besides for right naught; and thus mayest thou come unto wonderful illuminations and spiritual influence from the Lord thy God.

6. If, for his love, thou canst crucify, renounce, and forsake perfectly thyself and all things, and love and desire God only, with thy care and whole heart, that in this most steadfast and strong knot and union unto the will of God, if he would create hell in thee here, thou mightst be ready to offer thyself, by his grace, for his eternal honor and glory, to suffer it, and that purely for his will and pleasure.

7. Thou must keep thy memory clean and pure, as it were a wedlock-chamber, from all strange thoughts, fancies, and imaginations; and it must be trimmed and adorned with holy meditations and virtues of Christ's life and passion, that God may continually and ever rest therein.

A PRAYER.

8. "Lord, instead of knowing thee, I have sought to know wickedness and sin; and whereas my will and desire were created to love thee, I have lost that love, and declined to the creatures. While my memory ought to be filled with thee, I have painted it with the imagery of innumerable fancies, not only of all creatures, but of all sinful wickedness. Oh! blot out these by thy blood, and imprint thy own blessed image in my soul, blessed Jesus, by that blood that issued out from thy most loving heart, when thou hangedst on the cross. So knit my will to thy most holy will, that I may have no other will but thine, and may be most heartily and fully content with whatsoever thou wouldst do to me in this world; yea, if thou wilt, so that I hate thee not, nor sin against thee, but retain thy love, make me suffer the greatest pains."

SECTION III.

Rule 1. Exercise thyself to the perfect abnegation of all things which may let or impede this union. Mortify in thee everything that is not of God, nor for God, or which he willet and loveth not. Resigning and yielding up to the high pleasure of God all love and affection for transitory things, desire neither to have nor hold them, nor bestow nor give them, but only for the pure love and honor of God. Put away superfluous and unnecessary things, and affect not even things necessary.

2. Mortify all affection to and seeking of thyself, which is so natural to men in all the good they desire, and in all the good they do, and in all the evil they suffer: yea, by the inordinate love of the gifts and graces of God, instead of himself, they fall into spiritual pride, gluttony, and greediness.

3. Mortify all affection to, and delectation in, meat and drink, and vain thoughts and fancies, which, though they proceed not to consent, yet defile the soul, and grieve the Holy Ghost, and do great damage to the spiritual life.

4. Imprint on thy heart the image of Jesus crucified, the impressions of his humility, poverty, mildness, and all his holy virtues: let thy thoughts of him turn into affection, and thy knowledge into love. For the love of God doth most purely work in the mortification of nature: the life of the spirit, purifying the higher powers of the soul, begets the solitariness and departure from all creatures, and the influence and flowing into God.

5. Solitude, silence, and the strict keeping of the heart, are the foundations and grounds of a spiritual life.

6. Do all thy necessary and outward works without any trouble or carefulness of mind, and bear thy mind amid all always inwardly lifted up and elevated to God, following always more the inward exercise of love, than the outward acts of virtue.

7. To this can no man come, unless he be rid and delivered from all things under God, and be so swallowed up under God, that he can contemn and despise himself and all things; for the pure love of God maketh the spirit pure and simple, and so free, that, without any pain and labor, it can at all times turn and recollect itself in God.

8. Mortify all bitterness of heart toward thy neighbors, and all vain complacency in thyself, all vain glory and desire of esteem, in words and deeds, in gifts and graces. To this thou shalt come by a more clear and perfect knowledge and consideration of thy own vile-ness, and by knowing God to be the fountain of all grace and goodness.

9. Mortify all affection toward inward, sensible, spiritual delight in grace, and the following devotion with sensible sweetness in the lower faculties or powers of the soul, which are nowise real sanctity and holiness in themselves, but certain gifts of God to help our infirmity.

10. Mortify all curious investigation or search, all speculation and knowledge of unnecessary things, human or Divine; for the perfect life of a Christian consisteth not in a high knowledge, but profound meekness, in holy simplicity, and in the ardent love of God; wherein we ought to desire to die to all affection to ourselves and all things below God; yea, to sustain pain and dereliction, that we may be perfectly knit and united to God, and be perfectly swallowed up in him.

11. Mortify all undue scrupulousness of conscience, and trust in the goodness of God; for our doubting and scruples oftentimes arise from inordinate self-love, and therefore vex us; they do no good, neither work any real amendment in us; they cloud the soul, and darken faith, and cool love; and it is only the stronger beams of these that can dispel them. And the stronger that faith and Divine confidence is in us, and the hotter Divine love is, the soul is so much the more excited and enabled to all the parts of holiness, to mortifications of passions and lusts, to more patience in adversity, and to more thankfulness in all estates.

12. Mortify all impatience in all pains and troubles, whether from the hands of God or men, all desire of revenge, all resentment of injuries; and by the pure love of God, love thy very persecutors as if they were thy dearest friends.

13. Finally, mortify thy own will in all things, with full resignation of thyself to suffer all dereliction, outward and inward, all pain, and pressures, and desolations, and that for the pure love of God: for from self-love and self-will spring all sin and all pain.

A PRAYER.

14. "O Jesus, my Savior! thy blessed humility, impress it on my heart. Make me most sensible of thy infinite dignity, and of my own vileness, that I may hate myself as a thing of naught, and be willing to be despised and trodden upon by all as the vilest mire of the streets; that I may still retain these words—I AM NOTHING, I HAVE NOTHING, I CAN DO NOTHING, AND I DESIRE NOTHING BUT ONE "

SECTION IV.

1. Never do anything with propriety and singular affection, being too earnest, or too much given to it; but with continual meekness of heart and mind, lie at the foot of God, and say, "Lord, I desire nothing, neither in myself, nor in any creature, save only to know and execute thy blessed will." Saying always in thy heart, "Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do? Transform my will into thine: fill full, and swallow up, as it were, my affections with thy love, and with an insatiable desire to honor thee, and despise myself."

2. If thou aspire to attain to the perfect knitting and union with God, know that it requireth a perfect exspoliation, and denudation, or bare nakedness, and utter forsaking of all sin, yea, of all creatures, and of thyself particularly: even that thy mind and understanding, thy affections and desires, thy memory and fancy, be made bare of all things in the world, and all sensual pleasures in them, so as thou wouldst be content that the bread which thou eatest had no more savor than a stone, and yet, for his honor and glory that created bread, thou art pleased that it savoreth well: but yet, from the delectation thou feelest in it, turn thy heart to his praises and love that made it.

3. The more perfectly thou livest in the abstraction, and departure, and bare nakedness of thy mind from all creatures, the more nakedly and purely shalt thou have the fruition of the Lord thy God, and shalt live the more heavenly and angelical life. Therefore,

4. Labor above all things most exactly to forsake all for him; and chiefly to forsake and contemn thyself; purely loving him, and in a manner forgetting thyself and all things, for the vehement burning love of him; thus thy mind will run so much upon him, that thou wilt take no heed what is sweet or bitter, neither wilt thou consider time or place, nor mark one person from another, for the wonder and love of thy Lord God, and the desire of his blessed will, pleasure, and honor, in all things. And whatsoever good thou dost, know and think that God doth it, and not thou.

5. Choose always (to the best of thy skill) what is most to God's honor, and most like unto Christ and his example, and most profitable to thy neighbor, and most against thy own proper will, and least serviceable to thy own praise and exaltation.

6. If thou continue faithful in this spiritual work and travail, God at length, without doubt, will hear thy knocking, and will deliver thee from all thy spiritual trouble, from all the tumults, noise, and incumbrance of cogitations and fancies, and from all earthly affections, which thou canst by no better means put away, than by continual and fervent desire of the love of God.

7. Do not at any time let or hinder his working, by following thine own will; for behold how much thou dost the more perfectly forsake thine own will, and the love of thyself, and of all worldly things, so much the more deeply and safely shalt thou be knit unto God, and increase in his true and pure love.

SECTION V.

1. If thou still above all things seek that union, thou must transfund and pour thy whole will into the high pleasure of God; and whatsoever befalls thee, thou must be without murmuring and retraction of heart, accepting it most joyfully for his love whose will and work it is.

2. Let thy great joy and comfort evermore be, to have his pleasure done in thee, though in pains, sickness, persecutions, oppressions, or inward griefs and pressures of heart, coldness or barrenness of mind, darkening of thy will and senses, or any temptations, spiritual or bodily. And,

3. Under any of these, be always wary thou turn not to sinful delights, nor to sensual and carnal pleasures, nor set thy heart on vain things, seeking comfort thereby, nor in any wise be idle, but, always as thou canst, compel and force thyself to some good spiritual exercise or bodily work; and though they be then unsavory to thee, yet are they not the less, but the more acceptable to God.

4. Take all afflictions as tokens of God's love to thee, and trials of thy love to him, and purposes of kindness to enrich thee, and increase more plentifully in thee his blessed gifts and spiritual graces, if thou persevere faithfully unto the end; not leaving off the vehement desire of his love and thy own perfection.

5. Offer up thyself wholly to him, and fix the point of thy love upon his most blessed increased love; and there let thy soul and heart rest and delight, and be as it were resolved and melted most happily into the blessed Godhead; and then take that as a token, and be assured by it, that God will grant thy lovely and holy desire. Then shalt thou feel in a manner no difference between honor and shame, joy and sorrow; but whatsoever thou perceivest to appertain to the honor of thy Lord, be it ever so hard and unpleasant to thyself, thou wilt heartily embrace it, yea, with all thy might follow and desire it: yet, when thou wilt think thou hast done what is possible for thee, thou wilt think thou hast done nothing at all, yea, thou shalt be ashamed, and detest thyself, that thou hast so wretchedly and imperfectly served so noble and worthy a Lord; and therefore, thou wilt desire and endeavor every hour to do and suffer greater and more perfect things than hitherto thou hast done, forgetting the things that are behind, and pressing forward to those that are before.

6. If thou hast in any measure attained to love and abide in God, then mayest thou keep the power of thy soul and thy senses, as it were, shut up in God, from gadding out to any worldly thing or vanity, as much as possible, where they have so joyfully a security and safeness. Sate thy soul in him, and in all other things still see his blessed presence.

7. Whatsoever befalleth thee, receive it not from the hand of any creature, but from him alone, and render back all to him, seeking in all things his pleasure and honor, the purifying and subduing of thyself. What can harm thee, when all must first touch God, within whom thou hast enclosed thyself?

8. When thou perceivest thyself thus knit to God, and thy soul more fast and joined nearer to him than to thine own body, then shalt thou know his everlasting, and incomprehensible, and ineffable goodness, and the true nobleness of thy soul, that came from him, and was made to be reunited to him.

9. If thou wouldst ascend and come up to thy Lord God, thou must climb up by the wounds of his blessed humanity, that remain as it were, for that use; and when thou art got up there, thou wouldst rather suffer death than willingly commit any sin.

10. Entering into Jesus, thou castest thyself into an infinite sea of Goodness, that more easily drowns and happily swallows thee up, than the ocean does a drop of water. Then shalt thou be hid and transformed in him, and shalt often be as thinking without thought, and knowing without knowledge, and loving without love, comprehended of him whom thou canst not comprehend.

SECTION VI.

1. Too much desire to please men, mightily prejudiceth the pleasing of God.

2. Too great earnestness and vehemency, and too greedy delight in bodily work and external doings scattereth and loseth the tranquillity and calmness of the mind.

3. Cast all thy care on God, and commit all to his good pleasure: laud, and praise, and applaud him in all things, small and great. Forsake thy own will, and deliver up thyself freely and cheerfully to the will of God, without reserve or exception, in prosperity and adversity, sweet or sour, to have or to want, to live or to die.

4. Disunite thy heart from all things, and unite it only to God.

5. Remember often, and devoutly, the life and passion, the death and resurrection, of our Savior Jesus.

6. Descant not on other men's deeds, but consider thine own : forget other men's faults, and remember thine own.

7. Never think highly of thyself, nor despise any other man.

8. Keep silence and retirement as much as thou canst, and through God's grace, they will keep thee from snares and offences.

9. Lift up thy heart often to God, and desire in all things his assistance.

10. Let thy heart be filled and wholly taken up with the love of God, and of thy neighbor ; and do all that thou dost, in that sincere charity and love.

The sum is :

1. Remember always the presence of God.
2. Rejoice always in the will of God. And,
3. Direct all to the glory of God.

SECTION VII.

1. Little love, little trust ; but a great love brings a great confidence.

2. That is a blessed hope that doth not slacken us in our duty, nor maketh us secure, but increaseth both a cheerful will, and gives greater strength to mortification and all obedience.

3. What needest thou, or why travailest thou about so many things ? Think upon one, desire and love one, and thou shalt find great rest. Therefore,

4. Wherever thou be, let this voice of God be still in thine ear : My son, return inwardly to thy heart, abstract thyself from all things, and mind me only. Thus,

5. With a pure mind in God, clean and bare from the memory of all things, remaining unmoveably in him, thou shalt think and desire nothing but him alone ; as though there were nothing else in the world but he and thou only together : that all thy faculties and powers being thus re-collected into God, thou mayest become one spirit with him.

6. Fix thy mind on thy crucified Savior, and remember continually his great meekness, love, and obedience, his pure chastity, his unspeakable patience, and all the holy virtues of his humanity.

7. Think on his mighty power and infinite goodness ; how he created and redeemed thee ; how he justifieth thee, and worketh in thee all virtues, graces, and goodness : and thus remember him, until thy memory turn into love and affection. Therefore,

8. Draw thy mind thus from all creatures, unto a certain silence and rest from the jangling and company of all things below God ; and when thou canst come to this, then is thy heart a place meet and ready for thy Lord God to abide in, there to talk with thy soul.

9. True humility gaineth and overcometh God Almighty, and maketh thee also apt and meet to receive all graces and gifts. But alas ! who can say that he hath this blessed meekness, it being so hard, so uncertain, so secret and unknown a thing, to forsake and mortify perfectly and exactly thyself, and that most venomous worm of all goodness, vanity ?

10. Commit all to the high providence of God, and suffer nothing to rest or enter into thy heart save only God. All things in the earth are too base to take up thy love or care, or to trouble thy noble heart, thy immortal and heavenly mind. Let them care and sorrow, or rejoice about these things, who are of the world, for whom Christ would not pray.

11. Thou canst not please nor serve two masters at once : thou canst not love divers and contrary things ; if, then, thou wouldst know what thou lovest, mark well what thou thinkest most upon. Leave earth, and have heaven ; leave the world and have God.

12. All sin and vice spring from the propriety of our own will ; all virtue and perfection come and grow from the mortifying of it, and the resigning of it wholly to the pleasure and will of God.

APPENDIX.

LIFE OF ARCHBISHOP LEIGHTON:*

BY JAMES AIKMAN.

IN an age when the study of Theology was the universal and leading pursuit, and amounted almost to a passion, ROBERT LEIGHTON was a pre-eminent theologian; not so much from his acquirements in that species of literature, in which, however, he was deeply skilled, as from the delightful example he exhibited, in his life and writings, of a religion he cordially believed, and, as far as his apprehensions extended, faithfully copied. He was not free in his conduct from the errors of humanity, but he was one of the very few who err on the lovelier side; his amiability of temper, and purity of principle, led him to carry, among men of sterner stuff, the proposals of Charity which he professed, farther than either accorded with the situation he held, the rights that were in peril, or the temper of the times. It therefore happened to him, as must happen to all placed in similar circumstances, that his character was viewed by his contemporaries, in extremes; and as posterity do not easily get rid of the feelings of their ancestors, it has, even in our days, been looked at in very different lights.

Men have no right to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, yet it is no indefensible propensity to esteem the seed of the righteous, to feel grief for them when they leave the paths of their progenitors, and if they have descended from persecuted parents, and join their persecutors, to address them as the prophet did Jehoshaphat, "Shouldst thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord? therefore there is wrath upon thee from before the Lord: nevertheless, there are good things found about thee."

That such sentiments should have been entertained, respecting the subject of this memoir, by many excellent men in Scotland, will not appear strange when the cruel infliction his father, Dr. Alexander Leighton, underwent, is considered; and however his own mind might have felt justified in the change, it was not to be expected that presbyterians, who were themselves suffering for the same cause, which they were fully persuaded was for righteousness' sake, could be easily convinced of the strength of those reasons, that influenced the son of such a father, to leave their ranks, and join their opponents.

* An edition of Leighton's Works has been recently published in Edinburgh, to which is prefixed a "Life of the Author," by James Aikman. As this Life contains some memorials and letters not incorporated in Pearson's Life prefixed to this volume, the publisher has thought it advisable to insert them in the form of an Appendix.

Dr. Alexander Leighton was descended, it is said, of an ancient family in Forfarshire, whose chief seat was Ulys-haven, or Usen, but the fact is as obscure as it is unimportant; it is certain that he was one of the numerous host of confessors who bore testimony against the enormous abuse of prelatric power in his day, and suffered severely for it.

As was not uncommon in these times of persecution, although a minister of the gospel, he had also studied medicine, and afterward practised it in London during the reign of James I. and early in that of Charles I., where he also exercised his ministry, but whether to any stated congregation does not appear. Warmly attached to presbyterian principles, he took part in the violent and dangerous controversies then agitating England, and published a work entitled: "An Appeal to the Parliament, or Zion's Plea against the Prelacie: the summe whereof is delivered in a Decade of Positions. In the handling whereof the Lord Bishops and their appurtenances are manifestly proved, both by divine and humane lawes, to be intruders upon the priviledges of Christ, of the King, and of the Commonweal: and therefore upon good evidence given, she hartelie desireth a judgment and execution—printed in the year and moneth wherein Rochelle was lost, 1628." The style of the book is in perfect accordance with what unhappily is the general style of polemics, and such as we have seen exemplified, even in our own day, when men allow their passions to intermingle with their controversies: yet it was not more virulent, if it was as much so, as many of those which appeared on the opposite side.

For this work he was brought to trial, and the arguments of the book, which plainly proved that an overgrown, ambitious, and tyrannical prelacy, was not the ministry appointed by Christ in his church, were, it seems, aggravated by the imprint, as marking his dissatisfaction to government—it being the general belief, that if England had interfered in behalf of the French protestants, Rochelle would have been saved from the hands of the Papists; and by the book being also decorated, according to the fashion of the day, with two hieroglyphical cuts explanatory of the subject, the first a burning lamp, supported by a book and two armed men guarding it; the legend, not remarkably elegant, explained the meaning :

Prevailing prelates strive to quench our light, Except your sacred power quash their might.

The other represented an elder bush growing out of a ruinous tower, from whose branches a parcel of bishops were tumbling, one of them with a strong box in his hand—the legend,

The tottering prelates with their trumpety all,
Shall moulder down like elder from a wall.

These, which were grating subjects in the days of Charles to the members of the English Hierarchy, and not over-pleasant in the days of George IV.,* will scarcely be deemed any palliation of the conduct of the Star Chamber, in their treatment of the author, even although it was under the influence of the bishops.

He was arrested early in 1629, hurried to a wretched cell in Newgate, low, damp, and without light, except what was admitted, along with the rain, from an aperture in the roof, overrun with rats and other vermin. Here he lay from Tuesday night till Thursday at noon, without food, and for fourteen days endured solitary confinement in this miserable hole; while his house, in his absence, was rifled, his books destroyed, and his papers carried off. After sixteen weeks' captivity, he was served with an information of the crimes with which he was charged, but he was sick and unable to attend, and from the nature of his disorder, a fitter object of compassion than punishment, for the skin and hair had almost wholly come off his body.

Yet though thus afflicted, this aged, infirm divine, was condemned to a punishment the stoutest ruffian could hardly have endured, which some of the lords of court conceived could never be inflicted on a dying man, and was only held out as a terror to others: it was—to be degraded as a minister, to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, to be branded in the face, to stand in the pillory, to be whipped at a post, to pay a fine of £1000, and to suffer imprisonment till it was paid; the which when Archbishop Laud heard pronounced, he pulled off his hat, and holding up his hands, gave thanks to God, who had given the church victory over her enemies! And it was mercilessly inflicted. On the twenty-ninth of November, in a cold, frosty day, he was stripped, and received thirty-six lashes with a triple cord, after which he stood during a snow-storm two hours half-naked on the pillory at Westminster, was branded on one cheek with a red-hot iron, had one ear cut off, and one side of his nose slit. On that day se'ennight, ere his sores were healed, he was taken to the pillory at Cheapside, and underwent the remainder of his sentence. He was then carried back to prison, and shut in for upward of ten years until the meeting of the Long Parliament: when released from his miserable confinement, he could hardly walk, see, or hear. The Parliament reversed all the proceedings against him, and voted him £6000 for his great sufferings and damages, and in 1642 gave him an appointment. He died about 1649.

Dr. Leighton had two sons, the eldest Robert, the second Elisha; and two daughters, the eldest Sapphira, the other Mrs. Rathband, of whom nothing more is known. ROBERT was born in the year 1611, in London, and Burnet tells us, "he was sent to his father to be bred in Scotland." The year when he was sent thither, or how his education was conducted till he became a student in the university of Edinburgh, in 1627, forms a blank in his life, which can not now be filled up. He attended the different classes till 1631, when he took the degree of Master of Arts; and it deserves to be noticed, that the professors during that period were chiefly men who were attached to the mongrel, semi-episcopal, semi-presbyterian latitudinarianism, which was the court religion of the time in Scotland. He had early imbibed a decided aversion for the whole frame of the church of England—and no wonder! but the mixed system of episcopacy then taught in the Scottish school, which allowed of a synod of presbyters with a permanent presiding bishop, similar to what Mosheim thinks was early introduced into the Christian church, appears to have been the pivot on which his young mind rested the balance between the opposing systems, for it does not appear he had then decided. The circumstances of his family not permitting him to apply to the ecclesiastical courts for license, he went abroad.

Burnet, to whose brief notices we are chiefly indebted for any account of young Leighton, says, "From Scotland his father sent him to travel." How his father, who was previously immured in his miserable habitation, found the means to do so, we are left to conjecture. He travelled several years in France, and resided some time at Douay, where he had relatives; he is here reported or supposed to have fallen in with some religionists, "whose lives were framed on the strictest model of primitive piety;" but as in his writings he has repeatedly declared his opinion to be, that the church of Rome is utterly anti-Christian, it is not at all probable, that the practice of the monks there had much, if any, influence in abating his veneration for the "presbyterian platform;" at least, he embraced the first opportunity of returning to Scotland, and accepting a presbyterian charge.

* Pearson's Life of Archbishop Leighton, prefixed to this edition of his works. The following references are to that Memoir.

During his absence on the continent, a series of events had taken place in Scotland, that had entirely overturned the pseudo-prelacy, which he had left in power, and covenanted presbyterianism, in the strictest sense that it ever was professed, was established instead, by the laws of the land, and in the affections of the people. Leighton was a man of peace, and when the struggle was at its height, he did not choose to mingle in the fray, but when the religious community were rejoicing in the acquisition of their freedom, and their favorite form of church-government, he came home to swell the triumph, and enjoy the gale. Accordingly, on his return to Scotland, having been unanimously called by the congregation of Newbottle, a parish in the presbytery of Dalkeith, after passing through the usual course of trial for the ministry to the great satisfaction of his judges, he was ordained there on the sixteenth of December, 1641, being then in the thirtieth year of his age. The parish is delightfully situated on the banks of the Esk, among whose romantic scenery Leighton could enjoy the retirement he so much loved; and the residence of the Earl of Lothian in the abbey within his bounds, a nobleman attached to the cause of religion, in whose family he might cultivate the advantages of elevated society, would add considerably to its charms. To the manner in which he fulfilled the duties of a parochial minister, perhaps the obscurity in which this is involved may be considered the highest testimony. A person who afterward arrived at such distinguished eminence in such turbulent times, must have acted with more than ordinary diligence and circumspection, to have escaped blame, from such critical scrutinizers as he was exposed to. These duties were what men of modern times would shrink from, for they were the entire business of a minister's life, what the word of God and the rules of his church enjoined, what his people expected, and what his co-presbyters practised themselves, and enforced on their brethren. Besides the services of the Sabbath, there were usually one or more lectures or sermons preached during the week; the parishioners were regularly visited from house to house, the whole as punctually examined, particularly the young, the instruction of whom it was an important part of the ministerial function to superintend; both by inspecting the schools, and inquiring into their progress in religious and useful learning, and by their visitations at their homes to watch over their moral training—a species of education, the last especially, the fruits of which were abundantly manifest in the next generation, which was destined to bear the fiery trial of a twenty-eight years' furnace. Leighton, whose delight was in his work, it may be easily imagined, would not abridge any of these necessary duties; and all his biographers concur in stating, that he was most assiduous in discharging the various branches of his sacred office. "He diligently visited the poor of the flock, was ever to be found in the chambers of the afflicted, and at the beds of the sick or the dying. He promoted personal, domestic, social, and public religion, to the utmost of his power, by precept, example, and prayer." One solitary anecdote remains of this interval.

It was the practice of the presbytery, to inquire of their members twice a year, whether they preached to the times? that is, whether they improved the serious and alarming circumstances by which they were surrounded, and at a period, when the pulpit was almost the only medium through which the people could be informed of the state of public affairs—directed in the duty which they were required to pursue—whether the ministers acted as faithful watchmen?—Leighton acknowledged the omission, but adroitly apologized for it, by saying, "If all the brethren have preached to the times, may not one poor brother be allowed to preach for eternity?" a question which, had his co-presbyters been the zealots of a party, would have been received by anything but approbation. And it is exceedingly doubtful, in times of dread import, like those in which he lived, when the wheels of Providence seem moving onward with accelerated motion, laden with events to which the mysterious voice of prophecy calls our attention—it seems more than doubtful whether the ministers of God are not liable to the rebuke, "Ye can discern the face of the heavens, but can ye not discern the signs of the times?" when they keep silence, and do not "preach to the times."

Two very different testimonies respecting the nature of Leighton's pulpit oratory have come down to us. "His preaching," says Burnet, "had a sublimity both of thought and expression in it. The grace and gravity was such, that few heard him without a sensible emotion. I am sure I never did. His style was rather too fine, but there was a majesty and beauty in it, that left so deep an impression, that I can not yet forget the sermon I heard him preach thirty years ago. And yet with this he seemed to look on himself as so ordinary a preacher that while he had a cure, he was ready to employ all others; and when he was a bishop, he chose to preach to small auditories, and would never give notice beforehand; he had indeed a very low voice, and so could not be heard by a great crowd." Baillie, in speaking of Andrew Gray, one of the most extraordinary young ministers that has appeared in the church of Scotland, whose memory is yet fresh in the west, and whose sermons, published under every possible disadvantage, evince that it deserves to be so, thus obliquely gives the opinion he and his moderate brethren held of Leighton's ministerial instructions. "He has the new guise of preaching, which Mr. Hugh Binning and Mr. Robert Leighton began, containing the ordinary way of expounding and dividing a text, of raising doctrines and uses; but runs out a discourse on some common head, in a high romancing and inscriptural style, tickling the ear for the present, and moving the affections in some, but leaving little or naught to the memory and understanding."

That Gray and Binning were amazingly popular, is well attested; that Leighton deserved to be equally or more so, will appear evident from a comparison of the remains they have left behind them; for all have written specimens of their sermons, and respecting the merit of our author's, we shall afterward speak. But those only who heard the living preachers, could tell us of their eloquence. They who know—and what clown does not know?—the power of the keen language of the eye, the emphasis of countenance, the varied tone and energy of voice, even the influence of grave appropriate action, can note the difference between the living and the dead. In the church of Scotland when in her glory, reading was unknown, and would not have been tolerated. The ministers were too much alive to the importance of their subjects to waste much time upon the "conning of nice phrases," and depended more upon the vigor than the polish of their language; yet were they not inelegant or careless, as the posthumous works of all these eminent three bear ample evidence: but their usual method appears to have been, first they studied their subject fully, then wrote a few notes, in modern terms made a skeleton of their discourse, and left the filling up to the fulness of their heart at the time of the delivery. This appears to have been the case especially with Andrew Gray, but in some instances the sermons appear to have been fully written out, although not slavishly delivered, as in the case of Hugh Binning. And it is a curious fact, that the whole of Durham's elaborate commentary on the Revelations, forming a folio volume, containing many calculations, and several profound disquisitions, was delivered without having been committed to paper, but taken down as he delivered it, was copied out afterward, and brought to himself for correction, except a very few of the last sheets. Indeed, it appears strange, that the reading of sermons should ever have found practitioners or advocates, except among the indolent or imbecile; and I apprehend with scarcely an exception it will be found, that either want of capacity or want of diligence is at the root of the practice, and in either case, such a person ought not to be a public speaker.

Where God has withheld the talents for public speaking from a man, it needs no revelation to tell us that that man was never intended for a public speaker. If God have bestowed the talents, and he refuse to cultivate them, it is as clear that that man is unworthy of exercising the office of a gospel minister. If, after a man has been duly called to his office, and if, after having exercised it faithfully, it has pleased the inscrutable wisdom of Heaven to deprive him of any of his faculties, it becomes then a question whether he ought to retire. And if this be impossible or improper, say that merely memory has failed, and there be no funds for his support, and his people be unwilling to dispense with his services; the case is altered—let him read. But I believe it will in general be found in the cases of conversion, that often comparatively weak discourses have been blessed, while the most elaborately composed discourses, and the most beautifully read, have been merely listened to as elegant essays, or praised as the lovely works of art. And it is natural that it should be so; God is the God of means, as well as of grace, and he has appointed the living voice, the "foolishness of preaching," whereby to save them that believe; and his approbation, not the applause of elegant or crowded auditories, ought to be the grand end and aim of a minister. Leighton was an enemy to reading. "I know," he said, "that weakness of memory is pleaded in excuse for this custom, but better minds would make better memories. Such an excuse is unworthy of a man, and much more of a father, who may want vent indeed in addressing his children, but ought never to want matter. Like Elihu, he should be refreshed by speaking."

If the remark hold true of private, as of public affairs, that the years which afford fewest materials for the historian are generally those that have been the happiest, the years which Leighton spent at Newbottle must have been among the most pleasant of his life; but toward their close, the political state of the country invaded even his peaceful retirement. It is well known that the troubles of Scotland, from the Reformation till the final expulsion of the Stuarts, arose from contests for religious and civil liberty on the part of the people, and for priestly power and absolute despotism on the part of the crown. By treachery and deceit, the British Solomon, styled king-craft, James the I. had during a long reign attempted, and nearly accomplished, the overthrow of the constitution of his native land—the task of completing the destruction of his people's rights, he left as a legacy to his son; this Charles rashly endeavored to accomplish, while his hands were fully occupied with his English subjects, and, by introducing the liturgy among a people who detested it, he put the match to a train that lay ready for explosion—the consequence was, that after an idle parade of royal weakness, when opposed to the universal wish of a people, he was forced to give a free and fair constitution, securing the rights of his subjects from princely or prelatic invasion. Of this constitution the covenant was the cause, and on every infringement, it was renewed as the guaranty. In it the king and people swore to the performance of their various duties, and among others, to preserve the religion as then established, and to resist all innovations tending to reintroduce the prelacy.

A multiplication of oaths to men in public life, besides being one of the slenderest of all ties to unprincipled men, is one of the worst in Christian nations, as it uniformly involves them in varied and multiplied iniquity; it distresses, binds, and debilitates, the minds of the conscientious, while it is frail as Sampson's green withs to the sturdy politician. But if ever there was a time, when a solemn declaration of principles, and an explicit promise or vow to observe them, were called for, it was just about the period when Leighton entered upon the pastoral office at Newbattle; and I think it plain from his own writings, that he conscientiously viewed the covenant in this light, and subscribed it at his ordination without scruple. Had Charles I. been sincere when he ratified the acts of the Scottish parliament, he might have reigned a powerful monarch, and died a better man; but his duplicity led to the great civil war, and forced Scotland and England to join together for mutual preservation from threatened tyranny. They did so, in an agreement known by the name of the Solemn League and Covenant, in which they pledged themselves to endeavor uniformity in religion according to the word of God, and the extirpation of prelacy; and this, in the form of an oath, was forced upon almost every inhabitant of Scotland. But it deserves especial notice, that the zealots who were most forward in pressing this oath, were the political presbyterians, men whose exuberance of fire, like that of all violent partisans, was exactly in proportion to their lack of principle; and they who were then the chief instruments of covenanting oppression, were the very persons who turned apostates, and were the chief instruments of prelatical persecution.

Leighton, whose aversion to the lordly pomp of the English hierarchy was undoubtedly as sincere as it was well founded, unhesitatingly subscribed this bond himself, and afterward administered it to the students in Edinburgh university. He thus explains the reason of his facility: "For it would be noted, that when the covenant was framed, there was no episcopacy at all in being in Scotland, but in England only, so that the extirpation of that frame only could then be merely intended." It may be difficult, however, to exculpate him from the error of having first vowed and then made inquiry; nor, when he attempts it himself, is he very successful—but great allowance must be made for the gentleness of his natural disposition, and his most amiable desire for peace, especially when his whole life evinced that he was neither actuated by motives of covetousness or ambition; and whether we agree with him or not, we must agree, that as his life was holy, there can be little doubt but his motives were pure. Let us however hear himself, though in this case he appears to have lost something of his sweetness of temper.

"The truth is, that besides many other evils, the iniquity and unhappiness of such oaths and covenants lie much in this, that, being commonly framed by persons, that even amongst themselves are not fully of one mind, but have their different opinions and interests to serve—and it was so even in this—they commonly patched up so many articles and clauses, and these too of so versatile and ambiguous terms, that they prove most wretched snares, and thickets of briers and thorns to the consciences of those who are engaged in them, and matter of endless contentions and disputes among them, about the true sense and intendment, and the ties and obligations of those doubtful clauses, especially in such alterations and revolutions of affairs, as always may, and often do, even within few years, follow after them, for the models and productions of such devices are not usually long-lived. And whatsoever may be said for their excuse, in whole or in part, who, in yielding to the power that pressed it, and the general opinion of this church at that time, did take that covenant in the most moderate and least schismatical sense that the terms can admit; yet I know not what can be said to clear them of a very great sin, that not only framed such an engine, but violently imposed it upon all ranks of men, not ministers and public persons only, but the whole body and community of the people, thereby engaging such droves of poor ignorant persons, to they know not what; and, to speak freely, to such a hodge-podge of things of various concerns, religious and civil, as church discipline and government, the privileges of parliaments, and liberties of subjects, and condign punishment of malignants, things hard enough for the wisest and learnedest to draw the just lines of, and to give plain definitions and decisions of them, and therefore certainly as far off from the reach of poor country people's understanding, as from the true interest of their souls, and yet to tie them by a religious oath, either to know all, or to contend for them blindfold, without knowing of them."

These sentiments are contained in his "Modest Defence of Moderate Episcopacy," written after he was a bishop, and considering the cause he had to defend, might pass without much observation, although, if carried their proper length, they would exclude the people from any voice in the choice or conduct of their rulers, civil and ecclesiastical, and lead to the quietude of a settled despotism in the church and state. But it is a painful example of how far partiality for a side, or the supposed necessity of advocating a bad cause, may carry a good man, when we hear him in the next sentence asking, "Where will be instanced a greater oppression and tyranny over consciences than this?" and replying, "Certainly they that now govern in this church, can not be charged with anything near or like unto it, for whatsoever they require of intrants to the ministry, they require neither subscriptions nor oaths of ministers already entered, and far less of the whole body of the people." Yet at this very time, had the whole ministry been required to acknowledge the royal supremacy in matters ecclesiastical, and own a power in the church, which they understood to be subversive of that of her head and king: still there is no divine more clear upon the character of Christ, as the sole lawgiver and ruler of his people, than our author.

While Leighton's mind was hurt by the manner in which the Solemn League and Covenant was pressed, he naturally associated with those whose sentiments on this subject accorded with his own. Among them was the father of Gilbert Burnet, of the episcopalian persuasion, and particularly attached to the Hamilton family, with whose fortunes Leighton had almost associated his own. After the providence of God had declared against Charles, and he was a captive in the hands of his opponents, still he might have returned to his throne with honor, could he have submitted to be honest, but he wished to reascend it uncontrolled, and played a double game that led him to the scaffold. Unfortunately, the Duke of Hamilton was induced to second his efforts, by breaking the Solemn League and Covenant with England, and entering into an engagement with the captive monarch. This engagement—which, if successful, would have laid the kingdoms prostrate at the feet of an incensed sovereign, who would give them no security for all they had been fighting for, except "the word of a prince," and that had been forfeited at least a score of times—divided Scotland; part resolving to maintain the covenant, and part entering into the engagement. Among those who favored the latter, were all who had any leaning toward episcopacy, and Leighton, who had hitherto kept aloof from the politics of the day, was most unfortunately induced by his new associates, to declare in favor of an engagement, the terms of which were not fully known at the time, and which we would in charity hope were misrepresented to him, as they were to others: like every effort in favor of the unhappy Charles, the project failed, and involved himself and his adherents in deeper ruin.

The high character of Leighton, and the friendship of the Earl of Lothian, saved him from any very serious consequences of his conduct, while the dominant party showed their liberality, by sparing so conspicuous an opponent from any other punishment than appointing him to rebuke those of his parishioners who had accompanied the duke in his disastrous expedition. There is more of policy than of godly simplicity in the manner in which he extricated himself from a dilemma that could not fail of being extremely irksome to an ingenuous mind; and when parties run so high, and the times were so perilous, it says a great deal for the forbearance of the presbytery, that such an evasion of their injunctions was overlooked. When the parties ordered to make public profession of their repentance came before him, he told them they had been in an expedition in which he believed they had neglected their duty to God; and had been guilty of injustice and violence, of drunkenness and other immoralities, and he charged them to repent of these very seriously, without meddling with the quarrel or the ground of that war. This lesson seems to have cured Leighton of meddling with politics, as we hear no more upon this head till after the restoration; but from the slight notices in Baillie's Letters, it would appear that he associated with the high-flyers in the church, who were evangelical in their preaching, and suspected of favoring the sectaries, a predilection which naturally arose from the inferior weight he gave to differences upon matters of church-government when put in competition with personal piety; and perhaps his laxness on that point, might be not a little increased by observing the pertinacity with which many contended for the form, who cared very little about the power of godliness, who were more anxious about the cut of their vestments than the conduct of their lives. The numerous sects and varieties of opinion which sprung up at this time, grievously unhinged men's minds on these subjects, and the bitterness with which the sections of the same party often treated each other, made the quiet of the land wish for the wings of the dove, that they might fly thence and be at rest.

From whatsoever cause, in the year 1652, after the arrival of the second Charles among the Scots had raised their dissensions to a height, and brought their affairs to a crisis, and when his defeat had strengthened the distractions in the church, and spread a wider desolation in the country, Leighton tendered his resignation to the presbytery; this they declined accepting, and he was persuaded to remain; but when there appeared little prospect of settlement among the divided presbyterians, and increasing bitterness of spirit between those who wished and prayed for the restoration of their king, and those who deprecated such an event from the specimen they had already received of his conduct and disposition, he again renewed his request, and on the 3d of February, 1653, was released from his ministerial connexion with Newbottle, after having labored eleven years diligently among them.

Nothing tries a man's principles better than touching his purse, and were we to judge from the conduct of many who bear the name of Christian, we should be apt to imagine that the injunction, "Love not the world, nor the things of the world," ought to be inverted; but wisdom is justified of her children, and sometimes there do appear men, whose actions corresponding to their profession, evince, that setting the affections on things that are above, and not on things below, is, though a rare, yet a real attainment. Leighton was one; and a circumstance occurred about this time, which places his estimate of the uncertain riches of time, in a striking point of view, and which, although it possesses an appearance of carelessness, and might possibly mark him out as a fit prey for pecuniary plunderers, was not by himself looked back upon during his life with much pain; and that he got so far above the world before he got out of it, will not be now to his holy spirit any cause of regret.

His father, who had acquired some property after his sufferings, having died, left him about one thousand pounds: this, which was all his patrimony, his brother-in-law, Mr. Lightmaker, had advised him to come to London and get placed in proper security. Before a month had elapsed, he had occasion to acknowledge the propriety of his brother's advice, for the merchant in whose hands the money was placed became bankrupt, and he lost all; but as his heart was not with the treasure that had perished, he was not affected beyond what a Christian ought.

When the Scottish religious parties could not agree among themselves, and each were anxious to obtain an ascendancy, the English parliament, now paramount, appointed sequestrators, with an ample commission to superintend the setting aside, or planting churches or universities. These uniformly supported what would now be styled the evangelical party, then called the remonstrants, to which Leighton had always adhered, although he had differed on the political question of the engagement; and from among these the sequestrators filled up all the vacancies that occurred—for they were men of superior talents, and generally reported of superior sanctity. And it is here deserving of especial notice, that the parliament first, and Cromwell afterward, filled the public situations in the church and universities of Scotland, solely with men of acknowledged abilities and good conduct, and in the civil courts with judges of strict integrity and worth.

In the search after persons capable of filling eminent stations, Leighton was not overlooked; he was called to the highly responsible office of principal in the university of Edinburgh. William Colville, minister of the Scottish church at Utrecht, had been previously elected, but as he was a known enemy to the existing government, he was set aside, and the magistrates of the capital, who have always shown a due submission to the powers that be, joined in presenting Mr. Robert Leighton, "who was prevailed with to accept of it, because in it he was wholly separated from all church matters." The ministers were joint patrons, but refused to vote, "because, though they were content with Mr. Robert Leighton, they were not clear in the manner of the call." This event took place early in 1653, and in the month of July following, the general assembly was conducted by Lieut. Col. Cotterell, under a guard of foot-musqueteers and dragoons, a mile beyond Edinburgh, where they were dismissed and commanded never more to assemble; government conceiving that they assumed a civil power inconsistent with the peace of the realm. Synods and inferior judicatories were allowed to meet, but from this time all coercive power was removed from the church, and she was left to wield her own proper arms. Whether the English parliament interfered to enforce the covenant or not, is uncertain, though shortly after it was positively forbidden. Leighton, however, both took it himself, and enforced it upon others during this period, so that he can not be considered as having withdrawn from presbyterian communion till afterward, as indeed there was no other form of religion professed publicly, till the independents gave a free toleration to all, when several sects sprung up, to none of which could he, as principal of the university, have joined himself.

His labors in this office were abundant. He delivered a theological lecture in Latin once a week to the students, and at stated intervals preached to them in the college church. These prelections attracted crowds, who were charmed with the elegance of his style, and the animation of his delivery. He did not, however, confine his attention to his public duties; in his private conversation with the young men, he labored to form their minds to the practice of virtue, and his instructions were happily enforced by his own example; indeed, in public or private, religion was the vital principle of his soul, the element in which he breathed.

For eight years Scotland enjoyed under the commonwealth a degree of prosperity and quiet, such as that country had scarcely ever known; and Kirkton and other contemporary writers bear testimony to its being a time in which religion flourished more than almost at any period upon record; and so widely diffused had been the benefits of common education in the lowlands, particularly the west and the south, that there was hardly a family which could not read, and which had not a bible. For these benefits Scotland was partly indebted to the establishment of parish schools by the act of 1633, but chiefly to the assiduity of the parochial clergy, who had always shown the deepest interest in the education of the peasantry. The unwearied pains they took, and the good effects which followed, may be judged of from the caricature which Bishop Burnet draws of a faithful ministry and a godly people, and making the necessary deductions for his episcopalian prejudices, it in the most material points confirms the perhaps too flattering picture of Kirkton: "The former incumbents," are his words, "were a grave, solemn sort of people; their spirits were eager, and their tempers sour; but they had an appearance that created respect. They were related to the chief families in the country, either by blood or marriage, and had lived in so decent a manner that the gentry paid great respect to them. They used to visit their parishes much and were so full of the Scriptures, and so ready at extempore prayer, that from that time, they grew to practise extempore sermons; for the custom in Scotland then was, after dinner or supper, to read a chapter in the Scripture, and where they happened to come, if it was acceptable, they on the sudden expounded the chapter. They had brought the people to such a degree of knowledge, that cottagers and servants would have prayed extempore. I have often overheard them at it; and though there was a large mixture of odd stuff, yet I have been astonished to hear how copious and ready they were in it. Their ministers generally brought them about them on the Sunday nights, when the sermons were talked over; and every one, woman as well as man, was desired to speak their sense and their experience, and by these means they had a comprehension of matters of religion, greater than I have seen among people of that sort anywhere." "And as they [the ministers] lived in great familiarity with their people, and used to pray and to talk oft with them in private, so it can hardly be imagined to what a degree they were loved and revered by them. They kept scandalous persons under a severe discipline; for breach of sabbath, for an oath, or the least disorder in drunkenness, persons were cited before the church-sessions, that consisted of ten or twelve of the chief of the parish, who with the minister had this care upon them, and were solemnly reproved for it." "These things had a grave appearance, their faults and defects were not so conspicuous." Leighton, who well knew that the preservation of such a system depended, humanely speaking, upon the education of the ministers themselves, and the providing suitable teachers, set himself to promote both these objects, and he obtained an annuity of £200 from the protector to aid his beneficent plans, but the death of that great man caused a universal stagnation of every praiseworthy project, and the restoration threw the country half a century back in the progress of improvement.

During the vacations he frequently made excursions to London and to the Continent. In his visits to the capital he was an occasional attendant at Cromwell's court, of whose clergymen Burnet makes him give a very contemptuous character: "They were men of inquiet and meddling tempers: and their discourses and sermons were dry and unsavory, full of airy cant, or of bombast swellings." Had the bishop been kind enough to have given the names of these worthies that he employs the venerated shade of Leighton to stigmatize, it might have been possible to judge of the justice of the charge, at least to discriminate, for never did England produce a body of abler divines, freer from "bombast or swellings"—unless the overflowing of hearts earnest in the cause of God were such—than what assembled in the court and enjoyed the countenance of the protector; but as a general charge can only be met by a general answer, I would refer those who wish to see a fuller account of some of these traduced ministers, to Orme's Life of Owen, a work which contains a great deal of not common information respecting the ecclesiastical literature of "the sectaries," among whom were men in whose society Leighton would have met neither disgust nor degradation.

According to the same authority, however, the principal found himself more at home among the Romanists at Douay, and derived much advantage during his frequent visits to that college, from the pious lives of some of these religionists; but Leighton himself has declared his own opinion of the Roman catholic system, and of its opposition to Christianity in its fundamental articles, distinctly and repeatedly. Now, if a system be wrong in the foundation, what does it signify how fair the structure! if a man build on sand, the more precious the materials of his house, the more terrible the ruin; and if the Roman catholics have, as Leighton affirms, vide remarks on 1 Peter, chap. ii. 6, despised that stone which God hath made the head of the corner, would any of the Lord's people wish to take a pattern from their mode of moulding for polishing other living stones of their temple! The Romish system is designated in Scripture, Mystery, Babylon, the mother of abominations; and instead of learning from her children, the command is, "Come out from among them, be ye separated from them; come out of her, that ye be not partakers of her plagues."

With regard to monkish seclusion, to which some of his friends allege he was partial, he thus speaks: "This is, among many others, a misconception in the Romish church, that they seem to make holiness a kind of inappropriate good, that the common sort can have little share in almost all piety, being shut up within cloister walls as its only fit dwelling. Yet it hath not liked their lodging it seems, but is flown over the walls away from them, for there is little of it even there to be found; but, however, their opinion places it there as having little to do abroad in the world, whereas the truth is, that all Christians have this for their common task, though some are under more peculiar obligations [alluding to ministers] to study this one copy."—Remarks on 1 Peter iii. 13.

I should not have said so much on a subject in which our author is so explicit, had it not been that some of his former biographers seemed anxious to exalt the papists at the expense of the presbyterians and independents, by representing the amiable prelate as deriving so much advantage from his intercourse with them, while he was forced almost to flee the world, to get rid of the contention and bombast of the others.

At this time in Scotland, as at all times when a form and profession of religion is fashionable, a number of formalists and hypocrites mingled in the crowd, and as hollow vessels sound loudest, they were generally the most noisy. To such as these Leighton seems to allude in an epistle, supposed to have been written about the same time.*

During the troublous period of the civil war, the parties, and sects, and sections of sects, were probably not so numerous as in the present day, but they were more violent, inasmuch as religion then was more the occupation of a man than it is now, and the public attention was more undividedly directed toward that subject, as general knowledge was neither widely spread, nor much cultivated by the community at large. Good men, however of all parties, deplored the spirit of strife and debate which in too many instances was allowed to corrode the vitals of Christianity, and destroy that spirit of love without which the purest orthodoxy is of little consequence in promoting the cause of Christ. Among these Leighton was conspicuous, and incessant in inculcating the doctrine of peace and charity, and this he did by directing the minds of his hearers to the more important matters of the law, and not by indifference to any fundamental truth. The manner in which he fulfilled his duty toward his pupils while principal of Edinburgh university, he explains in a beautiful valedictory oration which he delivered to the students before he retired.†

With that admirable address, Leighton appears to have closed his university labors; a new scene now began to open upon him, one for which he suffered much in his reputation and usefulness among his contemporaries, and which his admirers, even now, find it hard to do more than excuse—his abandoning the presbyterians, and accepting a bishopric from Charles II. Had Leighton merely exchanged the presbyterial form for the episcopalian, his conduct would have admitted of an easy justification; his earliest sentiments appear to have been in favor of a modified episcopacy, unconnected with temporal power, or lordly state; and the power of a presbytery, when tyrannically exerted, he considered as more oppressive than that of a prelate—in which opinion he entirely coincided with Owen; besides, he considered church-government as a matter of comparatively little moment, when put in competition with personal holiness, and his meek soul was daily harassed by angry controversialists who surrounded him, of many of whom he thought justly, that, while they contended fiercely for the form, they felt little of the power of religion. Changing, therefore, merely from the one profession to the other, under such circumstances, and holding such opinions upon these matters, would have been comparatively, if at all, a venial error. But to join hands with such a set of men as those with whom he associated, and lend the sanction of his name to as foul a usurpation of the supreme kingship of Christ in his church, and as unblushing an invasion of the rights of Christian people, as ever was attempted, since the day when temporal potentates first assumed an unholy influence within her pale, was a proceeding which it is extremely difficult to account for.

Presbyterian church-government, and civil liberty, had been solemnly sanctioned by Charles II. at his coronation at Scoone, and ratified by the most sacred oaths, and most awful engagements known among men; and an immense majority of the nation were strongly attached to it; and he had promised, in a written communication to the ministers at Edinburgh, after his restoration, to preserve it. But the profligate advisers by whom he was surrounded, had determined to establish a civil despotism, to which, from early education, and his residence abroad, he was mightily inclined; and the constitution of the Scottish church being esteemed a barrier, it was resolved that it should be swept away; besides, the king, and several of the leading men, had found the strictness of presbyterian discipline, and the decent morality which it required, totally inconsistent with the licentiousness they loved, and the conduct they intended to pursue.

Sharpe, who should have defended, allured by the primacy, betrayed his church, and a crowd of sycophants, who hastened to London to secure their private interests, were easily persuaded to join in the false representation that a majority in Scotland detested the covenant, and desired its overthrow. Episcopacy, therefore, was resolved upon, and the hated fabric of prelacy, which had been so triumphantly levelled, was once more to be reared. Sydeserf, the old bishop of Galloway, was the only fragment of the former hierarchy that remained. He had been deposed by the assembly 1638, for erroneous doctrine, but was now nominated to the bishopric of Orkney, a much better living. The others were named chiefly by Sharpe, and promoted on account of their subserviency to the cause, rather than from any fitness for the office

* Life, page 38.

† Works, pages 721, 722.

Wiseheart, formerly chaplain to Montrose, and accused of a military freedom of manners, had Edinburgh, and Fairfoul, a person of no good fame, got Glasgow; nor were any of the rest men of much reputation, either for learning or sanctity. Leighton alone formed one exception, and Kirkton, who is not very willing to praise whoever accepted the prelatial dignity, thus notices his appointment: "Mr. Robert Leighton, then principal of Edinburgh college, was made bishop of Dumblane; thus he choised to demonstrate to the world, avarice was not his principle, it being the smallest revenue; a man of good learning, excellent utterance, and very grave abstract conversation, but almost altogether destitute of a doctrinal principle, being almost indifferent, among all the professions that are called by the name of Christ." We are indebted to Burnet for an account of the manner in which the bishopric was offered, and he was induced to accept of the nomination.

His brother Elisha had devoted himself to the court, and in order to serve his ambitious purposes, had changed his religion; in this he appears to have succeeded, for he became at once a papist, a knight, and secretary to the duke of York; he was a person of considerable talents and vivacity, loved to talk of great sublimities in religion—yet very immoral. Living in terms of close intimacy with Lord Aubigny, a brother of the duke of Richmond, a great favorite at court, who had also changed his religion, and though a priest, was likewise "a very vicious man," he brought Mr. Robert Leighton and him together. Aubigny, who was acquainted with the then secret of the king's religion, which was popish, and with his design to establish it if possible, was induced by the representations of Sir Elisha, and by the mild manners of Leighton himself, to suppose that he might be rendered subservient to the scheme, and mentioned him to King Charles, who had sufficient penetration to perceive that the accession of such a man to the Scottish prelacy would be of immense importance, named him himself as one of the number. Leighton was exceedingly averse at first to the proposal, but the entreaties of royalty, and the urgency of his brother, who expected to rise still higher through his means, with some faint expectation that he might be instrumental in moderating or healing the differences of the truly devout of the two persuasions, overcame his reluctance, and he at last accepted, yet not without a struggle, as the letter, which is supposed to have been written while he was deliberating, evinces. It was addressed to the Rev. Mr. Aird.*

If this letter was written after the first parliament in which the king's supremacy was established, and by which Argyle and Guthrie were condemned, it shows how much Leighton had abstracted himself from the occurrences of the day, and how little he was acquainted with the politico-therological state of the country, that he should entertain even the slightest hope of advancing the interest either of peace or religion, by accepting a bishopric in Scotland, and connecting himself with a band of apostates, who had so iniquitously commenced their atrocious career. His whole life proved, that Leighton was wholly uninfluenced by sordid or secular motives; but while we acknowledge his principles to be pure, and his personal behavior exemplary, it may fairly be questioned how far in this instance his conduct was justifiable, in holding fellowship with those who framed mischief by a law, who gathered themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemned innocent blood; but as he foresaw, it proved to him a life of suffering, and he was, after years of mental anguish, forced to withdraw from the scene, and from all participation in measures, of which he left a strong condemnatory sentence in his affirmation to Charles, that "he would not consent to propagate Christianity itself by such means."

* Life, page 16.

The following letter appears to have been written about this time:—

"Dear Friend: I did receive your letter, which I would have known to be yours, though it had no other sign but the piety and affectionate kindness expressed in it. I will offer you no apology, nor I hope I need not, for not writing since that to you. I will confess, that if the surprising and unexpected occasion of the bearer had not drawn it from me, I should hardly for a long time to come, have done what I am now doing, and yet still love you more than they do one another that interchange letters even of kindness, as often as the gazettes come forth, and as long as they are too. And now I have begun, I would end just here: for I have nothing to say, nothing of affairs to be sure, private nor public; and to strike up to discourses of devotion, alas! what is there to be said, but what you sufficiently know, and daily read, and daily think, and, I am confident, daily endeavor to do; and I am beaten back, if I had a great mind to speak of such things, by the sense of so great deficiency in doing these things, that the most ignorant among Christians can not choose but know. Instead of all fine notions to fly to κναιε ελεησον χειρι ελεησον, I think them the great heroes and excellent persons of the world, that attain to high degrees of pure contemplation and Divine love; but next to these, them that, in aspiring to that, and falling short of it, fall down into deep humiliation and self-contempt, and a real desire to be despised and trampled on by all the world. And I believe that they that sink lowest into that depth, stand nearest to advancement to those other heights: for the great King who is the fountain of that honor, hath given us this character of himself, that he resists the proud, and gives grace to the humble. Farewell, my dear friend, and be so charitable as sometimes in your addresses upward to remember a poor caitiff who no day forgets you. R. L. 13th Dec., 1676."

Sydserf, the withered twig of the old stem, not being sufficient to communicate the undefinable sacredness of the prelatial character to a new generation, four of the bishops elect were summoned to the English capital, to receive from the fathers of London and Worcester such gifts as they could bestow by the imposition of their "holy" hands. Sharpe and Leighton having received presbyterian ordination, they hesitated about being reordained, but as it was determined that presbytery should be destroyed root and branch, that was declared invalid, and after some short disputation, they submitted to receive the orders of deacon and priest, previously to their consecration as bishops. Hamilton and Fairfoul had previously in 1638 received the orders from the abrogated Scottish hierarchy, which were held good. To this act, which desecrated the whole of the Scottish ministers, even had they been inclined to conform, Leighton is said to have reconciled his mind by an evasion—that the new ceremony was only declaratory of his admission into a new communion, but did not destroy the sanctity of his former ordination; a distinction which presbyterians would not readily be brought to comprehend.

Consecrated, however, they all were at Westminster, on the 12th December, 1661, with much clerical splendor, and a series of feasting between the nobles and the bishops followed, which grieved Leighton's pious soul, and gave plain augury of what kind of church they were about to establish. It is perfectly clear there was no community of soul between them; Sharpe hated and opposed him, and even Sheldon "did not much like his great strictness, in which he had no mind to imitate him," though both he and the rest of the English clergy greatly preferred him before his brethren, whom he excelled, not more in the extent of his learning, than in the uprightness of his walk and conversation. His trials began almost immediately.

When the revelry had ceased, he endeavored to prevail upon Sharpe to settle some plan for their future procedure, and proposed for his consideration—first, his favorite project of attempting to bring about a union between the presbyterians and them; next, the best means for promoting the growth of piety; and then a method for gradually assimilating the mode of worship among the two persuasions. But he was sorely disappointed to find that the primate had formed no plan, and was unwilling to hear of any. He only looked forward to coercive measures; episcopacy he knew would be established in the next parliament, and when once they were legally settled in their dioceses, then he said every bishop must do the best he could to get the people and clergy to submit to his authority; which once effected, it would be sufficient time to proceed to regulate other matters. Fairfoul had always "a merry tale ready at hand to divert him" whenever the subject was started, so that he found it impossible to hold any serious conversation with him, of which indeed he did not seem capable. "By these means," adds Burnet, "Leighton quickly lost all heart and hope; and said often to me upon it, that in the whole progress of that affair, there appeared such gross characters of an angry providence, that how fully soever he was satisfied in his own mind as to episcopacy itself, yet it seemed that God was against them, and that they were not like to be the men that should build up his church so that the struggling about it seemed to him like a fighting against God. He who had the greatest hand in it, Sharpe, proceeded with so much dissimulation, and the rest of the order were so mean and so selfish, and the earl of Middleton, with the other secular men that conducted it, were so impious and vicious, that it did cast a reproach or everything relating to religion, to see it managed by such instruments." About the middle of next year they set out for Scotland, but Leighton, understanding that they meant to make a grand entry into Edinburgh, left them at Morpeth, and proceeded forward alone; the rest were received by the magistrates in their robes, with sound of trumpet, or, as was sarcastically remarked, "with the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music," at the hearing of which, the people were to fall down, and worship the prelates whom the king had made. Leighton proceeded directly to Dumblane, and not only declined sharing in these pageantries, but even requested that his friends would not give him the title of "lord," a request which, however consonant with the injunctions of his heavenly Master, was by no means agreeable to his earthly brethren.

Episcopacy was set up by proclamation, the meetings of synods and presbyteries were forbid by the same authority, but it required an act of parliament to restore the bishops to their jurisdiction and their seats. This was done the first of the session in 1662, in the most ample manner, and as soon as it was passed, the prelates, who were in waiting, were invited by a deputation from each estate to resume their places in the house, which they immediately did among the earls on the right hand of the commissioner, Leighton on this occasion also forming the only solitary exception. He was not, however, long suffered to enjoy his retirement, and the occasion which called him from it is highly honorable to his memory. Several ministers, John Carstairs, James Nasmyth, James Veitch, and some others, were accused of using seditious language in their sermons, but the accusations could not be substantiated: as was the custom, however, in these times, if a charge was brought against a presbyterian, and could not be proved, instead of being set free, the oath of allegiance, in which the king's supremacy in all affairs civil and ecclesiastical was asserted, was offered them, and they were required to take it as a mark of loyalty. In this case the ministers were brought before parliament, and had the oath tendered. They required time to consider it, and after some days' serious deliberation, gave in an explanation, in which they declared, "they believed the king was supreme governor over all persons, and in all causes, not only civil but ecclesiastic; but that the power of the king is, in its own nature, only civil and extrinsic as to causes ecclesiastical." This explanation the commission refused, upon which a debate arose, whether an act explanatory of the oath should be offered to parliament or not; Leighton strongly urged the propriety of its being done: the land, he said, mourned by reason of the multiplicity of oaths, and the words of the present were certainly susceptible of a bad sense; the papists in England had been allowed this privilege of explaining, and he thought a like tenderness should be shown to protestants, especially in a case where their scruples appeared to be just, otherwise it would look like laying snares for the people, by making men offenders for a word. Sharpe replied with great bitterness: he said that it was beneath the dignity of a government to frame acts to satisfy the scruples of peevish men, and it ill became them who had forced their covenant on all ranks, without distinction or explanation, to come forward now, and ask such a license for themselves."—"For that very reason," retorted Leighton, "it ought to be granted, that the world may perceive the difference between the present mild government, and their severity; nor does it become persons who complain of that rigor, to resort to similar harshness, lest thus it might be said, the world goes mad by turns." But his arguments were of no avail; the ministers were required to take the oath or undergo the penalty, imprisonment or exile; they refused to subscribe, and preferred to suffer: and Leighton had only the consolation of having attempted in vain to avert their oppression.

For several years we do not meet with the bishop's name in any of the political transactions of the times, but we find from his charges to his clergy, and some few letters which have been preserved, that he was far more honorably employed, in fulfilling the spiritual duties of his office. Of the difficulties with which he had to contend, some idea may be formed, from the character of the clergy over whom he was called to preside; this we are enabled to give from an episcopal writer, and therefore the less liable to objection. At the close of the year 1662, about two hundred faithful ministers of Christ, rather than violate their consciences, gave up their livings in the west of Scotland; and of these a number belonged to the diocese of Dumblane, of which an imperfect list is given in Wodrow's Appendix. To fill their places, Burnet says, "there was a sort of an invitation sent over the kingdom, like a hue and cry, to all persons, to accept of benefices in the west; the livings were generally well endowed, and the parsonage-houses were well built and in good repair, and this drew many very worthless persons thither, who had little learning, less piety, and no sort of discretion." "They were the worst preachers I ever heard, they were ignorant to a reproach, and many of them were openly vicious, they were a disgrace to their order and the sacred function, and were indeed the dregs and refuse of their northern parts. Those of them who arose above contempt or scandal, were men of such violent tempers, that they were as much hated as the others were despised. This was the fatal beginning of restoring episcopacy in Scotland, of which few of the bishops seemed to have any sense." Only two non-conformists' names appear in the roll of the presbytery of Dumblane, which formed that part of the diocese more immediately under the bishop's eye; whether this was owing to the influence and persuasion of Leighton, or whether the list be incomplete, it is impossible now to determine; but I should be rather apt to suppose the latter, as Wodrow affirms, that the clergy of the diocese formed no exception to the general character of these west country brethren.

No blame, however, can attach to Leighton for this; he has left us his recorded opinion of the manner in which he thought a people should be treated, with regard to spiritual teachers, in a letter he wrote to the heritors of Straiton, and which it would be well did the present patrons of presbyterian churches imitate.*

The person here recommended was Mr. James Aird, who had been a minister at Ingrat in Northumberland, and was then residing in Edinburgh; he was afterward minister at Torrey, so that it would appear the heritors at Straiton had not taken the bishop's advice. The following letter to the same gentleman, was probably written upon this occasion; it is without date. "Dear Friend: I trust you enjoy that same calm of mind touching your present concernment, that I do in your behalf. I dare not promise to see you at Edinburgh at this time, but it is possible I may. I know you will endeavor to set yourself on as strong a guard as you can, against the assaults you may meet with there from diverse well-meaning persons, but of weak understandings and strong passions, and will maintain the liberty of your own mind, both firmly and meekly. Our business is the study of sincerity and pure intention, and then, certainly our blessed guide will not suffer us to lose our way for want of light ; we have his promise, that if in all our ways we acknowledge him, he will direct our paths. While we are consulting about the turns and new motions of life, it is sliding away, but if our great work in it be going on, all is well. Pray for your poor friend, R. L. Dumblane, Jan. 13th."

* Life, page 20.

We have, in a beautiful epistle—without date or address—his views of the temper and disposition he thought those should cultivate, whom he wished to introduce into the ministry.*

Part of the diocese in Dumblane in the vicinity of the Highlands, was at this period among the ruder portions of Scotland, and from the state of restlessness and contention in which they were kept up by their neighbors, labored under the demoralizing influence of border customs; the bishop therefore, in his charge, September, 1662, expresses his anxious desire, that "all diligence be used for the repressing of profaneness, and for the advancement of solid piety, and that not only scandals of unchastity, but drunkenness, swearing, cursing, filthy speaking, and mocking of religion, and all other gross offences be brought under church-censure, and that scandalous offenders should not be absolved, till there appeared in them probable signs of true repentance." Although he does not mention the discipline of the presbyterians, he urges upon his clergy the exercise of the most commendable parts of their practice—catechising, visiting, and frequent expounding of the Scriptures. At the Reformation, and before the commonalty could read for themselves, there were public readers appointed in the church, and the hour between the second and third ringing of the kirk bell on the Sabbath, was usually employed in reading portions of the Old and New Testaments to the people; this practice, which had fallen into disuse as education became more diffused, Leighton wished to revive, and urged upon his curates the advantage of making their people well acquainted with the pure word of God, by carefully reverting to this good old custom. He also strongly recommended their taking large portions of Scripture, and lecturing from them, rather than raising a theme from a single text, for he thought a number of short practical observations from a series of verses, preferable to a long dissertation from one.

He wished likewise to establish daily public prayer, and reading the Scriptures morning and evening in churches, in as far as these did not interfere with the private or family worship of the people; which duties he was extremely anxious to promote: as he was also of a more frequent celebration of the Lord's supper; but, above all, he propounded to the brethren, that it was to be reminded by himself and them, both to how eminent degrees of purity of heart and life their holy calling did engage them, and to how great contempt of this present world, and inflamed affections toward heaven, springing from deep persuasions within them of those things they preached to others; and that they should be meek and gentle, and lovers and exhorters of peace private and public, among all ranks of men; endeavoring rather to quench than to increase, the useless debates and contentions that abounded in the world, and be always more studious of pacific, than polemic divinity.

* Life, page 20.

While this excellent prelate was assiduously, but calmly, endeavoring to alleviate the evils by which he was environed, the furious and insane council, dogged by the unprincipled crew of bishops and curates, who were determined to force upon the nation a hierarchy they universally detested, proceeded with the most cruel and inconsiderate rashness, to desolate the church and the country by measures to which no conscientious and enlightened people could ever submit. Oaths opposed to every principle which had been recognised as sacred for nearly thirty years in Scotland, were proposed to men who feared an oath, and those who sincerely believed in the divine institution of presbytery, were required to renounce it, merely because their rulers deemed it expedient that they should do so, and to join a church whose form they considered unscriptural; and whose clergy they viewed, and if Burnet's description be true, justly viewed, as children of the devil.

Had the people been like their priests or their rulers, indifferent at once to the reality and the form of religion, whatever guilt might have attached to compliance, there would have been little hardship: but educated as they had been, and well informed and well grounded as they were in their principles, numbers chose rather to suffer than to sin, and counted not their lives dear unto the death, that they might hold fast their integrity; the consequence was, that the land, like the prophet's scroll, from one end to the other, was lamentation, and mourning, and wo. Leighton, placed in the most trying of all possible situations, wept over what he could not prevent; and, after a sickening struggle of about three years, resolved to withdraw from a situation as painful as it was unprofitable. In October, 1665, after the business was over, he communicated his intention to the synod. In a short address, he told them that all the account he could give of the reasons moving him to it, was briefly the sense he had of his own unworthiness of so high a station in the church, and his weariness of their contentions, which seemed rather to be growing than abating; and by their growth, to make so great abatements of that Christian meekness and mutual charity, that is so much more worth than the whole sum of all they contended about. He then thanked the brethren for all their undeserved respect and kindness manifested to himself, and desired their good construction of the poor endeavors he had used, to serve and to assist them in promoting the work of the ministry, and the great designs of the gospel in their bounds; and if in anything, in word or deed, he had offended them, or any of them, he very earnestly and humbly craved their pardon; and having recommended them to continue in the study of peace and holiness, and of ardent love to our great Lord and master, and to the souls he hath so dearly bought, he closed with these words of the apostle: "Finally, brethren, farewell; be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, and live in peace, and the God of peace and love shall be with you."

He was however prevailed upon, first to proceed to court, to give a faithful representation of the miseries of the country, which he the more willingly did, as it was then supposed that the king's easy, careless good nature, imposed upon by Sharpe, would, when undeceived, sympathize with the sufferers, and consent to more moderate methods. But Charles was an accomplished profligate, and one of the most selfish of mortals; his own enjoyment was the sole end of his existence, to that he sacrificed honor, veracity, and friendship, and everything that an honest man would have held estimable; he had however a plausibility of manner, that imposed on the guileless or superficial observer. Leighton was imposed upon. When introduced to the king, he told him freely that the proceedings in Scotland were so violent, that he would not concur in planting the Christian religion itself in such a manner, much less a form of church government; and he therefore begged leave to quit his bishopric, and retire, for while he retained it, he thought he was in some manner accessory to the violence of the ecclesiastics with whom he was associated; as it was given out that all these outrages were intended to establish their order. The king seemed touched with the statements when he heard them, and promised that more lenient measures should be pursued; laid the blame chiefly on Sharpe, and insisted upon the bishop's resuming his labors. According to Burnet, the consequence of these representations was an order from Charles to discontinue the ecclesiastical commission, and perhaps the king might claim some little merit with Leighton for this, but the Scottish historians assert, that that court had already become contemptible with all ranks and parties; and, no longer able to carry its own oppressive decrees into execution, was, if not defunct, at least on the point of expiring.

Leighton however returned with renewed expectations, but it was only to meet with renewed disappointment. Sharpe at the head of the council managed all as he chose—persecution continued to increase—and religious men were confined, imprisoned, and banished, because they would not consent to attend the ministrations of those curates whose character we have quoted above from an eyewitness, and an episcopalian. Leighton could only sigh, like the prophet, "Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men, that I might leave my people, and go from them!" His letters in general want dates, and of course can not be accurately arranged, but a fragment quoted by Jerment may not improperly be placed about this time: "Thorns grow everywhere, and from all things below, but to a soul transplanted out of itself into the root of Jesse, peace grows everywhere too, from him who is called our peace, and whom we still find the more to be so, the more entirely we live in him, being dead to this world and self, and all things beside him. O when shall it be! Well! Let all the world go as it will, let this be our only pursuit and ambition, and to all other things, Fiat voluntas tua, Domine, 'Lord, thy will be done!'"

In the political arrangements respecting the church, he had never taken much part, but in the meetings of his synod he appears to have been more interested, though, from a wish not to appear haughty or domineering, he had suffered irregularities to pass unnoticed, which it would have required a stronger hand to repress. "I confess," says he, in his address to them, April, 1667, "I confess that my own inactive and unmeddling temper may be too apt to prevail against the known duty of my station, and may incline me rather to inquire too little than too much into the department of others; and rather to be deficient, than to exceed in admonitions and advices to my brethren in matters of their duty; and besides this natural aversion, the sense of my own great unworthiness and filthiness may give me check, and be a very strong curb upon me, in censuring others for what may be amiss, or in offering any rules for the redress of it. And there is yet another consideration that bends still further that way, for I am so desirous to keep far off from the reach of that prejudice that abounds in these parts against the very name of my sacred function, as apt to command and domineer too much, that I may possibly err on the other hand, and scarce perform the duty of the lowest and most moderate kind of moderator, so that I am forced to spur and drive myself against all these retardments, to suggest anything, how useful soever, beyond our road or accustomed way, especially finding how little anything of that kind takes and prevails to any real effect."

This humble and mild introduction was prefixed to a charge intended to remind them of their inattention to former instructions and admonitions, and to recommend particularly the "privy trials" of ministers in their presbyteries: these were examinations by the presbytery into the doctrine their members preached, the manner in which they fulfilled the duties of their office, and their moral and Christian conduct as ministers of the gospel; in which he said he had perceived in some places very much of superficial and empty form. He therefore proposed a series of queries for their consideration, which he thought might be useful: "For though," he remarks, "we can have nothing but every man's own word concerning himself, yet this does not render it a useless thing, for besides that divers of the questions will be of things so obvious to public knowledge, that no man will readily adventure to give an untrue answer where it may be so easily traced, there is much to be given to the presumed ingenuity and veracity of a minister, especially in what is solemnly and punctually inquired of him—and whatsoever formerly hath been or hath not been, his former degree of diligence in the particulars, the very inquiry and asking concerning them will be apt to awake in every man a more serious reflection upon himself touching each point."

These questions were—whether he were assiduous in plain and profitable preaching? diligent in catechising? frequent in celebrating the communion? faithful in the exercise of discipline? attentive in visiting his flock? careful of the relief of the poor? and plain and free in admonishing open transgressors? Then, as the personal conduct of the clergyman was what could alone give weight and efficacy to his reproofs and instructions, more pointed queries followed: whether he watched exactly over his own conversation, not only giving no offence, but being an example to his flock, and preaching by his living? whether it be the great pleasure of his life to fulfil the work of his ministry? if he does not only avoid gross offences, intolerable in a guide of souls, but studies daily to mortify pride, rash anger, vain glory, covetousness, and love of this world, and sensual pleasures, &c., and finally, whether he be at peace with his brethren, and be an ardent lover and promoter of it among the people?

From his pastoral charges it will be perceived that Leighton prized highly some of the characteristic features of presbytery, and it redounds greatly to his honor, that he not only did not persecute the profession he had forsaken, or behave harshly toward his former fellow-laborers, but he retained as much of the form as he legally could, and as much of the practice as was attainable, while he treated the "outed" ministers as his brethren. He thought, however, that the mode of conducting public worship admitted of improvement, especially with regard to reading the scriptures when the congregation was assembled, these he recommended to be read in larger portions, and also that the Lord's prayer, the ten commandments, and the creed, should be more frequently repeated; a practice for which he had the authority of the earlier reformers. How far Dumblane profited by his unwearied exertions and pious example, it is impossible to say; but as he is still held in grateful remembrance in that quarter, it is reasonable to suppose that his labors were not altogether in vain.

Among his fellow prelates his conduct had only the effect of deepening the shade of their turpitude by the purity of its lustre. "I observed," says Burnet, "the deportment of our bishops was in all points so different from what became their function, that I had a more than ordinary zeal kindled within me upon it. They were not only furious against all that stood out against them, but were very remiss in all the parts of their function. Some did not live within their dioceses, and those who did, seemed to take no care of them. They showed no zeal against vice; the most eminently wicked in the country were their particular confidants, they took no pains to keep their clergy strictly to rules and to their duty; on the contrary, there was a levity and a carnal way of living about them, that very much scandalized me." And he tells us, that in a memorial which he wrote upon this occasion, he showed how they had departed from the primitive church, by neglecting their dioceses, meddling so much in secular affairs, raising their families out of the revenues of the church, and above all, by their violent persecuting of those who differed from them. While Leighton was pursuing his peaceful and holy avocations, the primate was revelling in the blood of the unfortunate covenanters, whom oppression had driven to resistance, and who had been scattered at Pentland, and the whole west and south were filled with prelatic vengeance, and legal and military executions.

Political events, 1667, which for a short time terrified Charles from his despotic projects, transferred the management of Scottish affairs into the hands of Lord Tweeddale, who, together with Lauderdale, by whom he was supported, was disgusted with the violence of Sharpe and his associates, and wished to restore his suffering country to some kind of tranquillity. Ecclesiastical grievances being the chief source of all the distractions, he entered into a close communication with the bishop of Dumblane, who was again prevailed upon to go to London, where he had two audiences of the king; in these, he represented with honest freedom the madness of the former administration of church affairs, and the necessity of more moderate councils: Charles listened, and promised, and did nothing. Leighton returned to his charge, where he remained, till in 1669 he was again called upon by Tweeddale to make a new effort for restoring peace to the church. Ever anxious to promote this object, the dearest to his heart, he hastened to lend what assistance he could. He proposed that a treaty of accommodation should be attempted with the presbyterians, for the purpose of setting the differences completely at rest, by each party yielding somewhat of their alleged rights and mutual demands. His plan was somewhat similar to that species of episcopacy under which he had been trained, and on which he acted in his own diocese; he proposed that the church courts should be retained, and that the bishops and ministers should act together in them, the bishops being ex-officio perpetual presidents, or moderators—that the presbyterians should be allowed, when they first sat down in these judicatories, to declare, that their sitting under a bishop was submitted to by them only for peace' sake, with a reservation of their opinion with relation to any such presidency—and that no negative vote should be claimed by the bishop: that bishops should go to the churches, in which such as were to be ordained were to serve, and hear and discuss any exceptions that were made to them, and ordain them with the concurrence of the presbytery: that such as were to be ordained, should have leave to declare their opinion, if they thought the bishop was only the head of the presbyters. And he also proposed, that there should be provincial synods to sit every third year, or oftener if the king should summon them, in which complaints of the bishops should be received, and they censured if deserving. Burnet's expression is amusing, "and they should be censured accordingly," implying perhaps unintentionally, what was really the fact, that if their conduct were ever brought before a church, censure must be the inevitable consequence. The same writer alleges, that Leighton, in making these concessions, acted upon the same policy that James VI. did, only let the bishops, however loosely, be peaceably acknowledged, and they will gradually and eventually acquire a complete power in the church. This, for the sake of Leighton's character, I am willing to believe a misconception of his views. It is not improbable that the statesmen with whom he associated might have used such arguments to influence the episcopalians to comply with propositions which went to reduce their antichristian domination, but that Leighton ever held out any such inducements, is not at all likely, especially as in the above propositions he seems only to have embodied his earliest principles. The Earl of Kincardine, one of the leaders in the council, was not averse to concessions being granted to the presbyterians; but he was of opinion that these concessions ought to be legalized by an act of parliament, and then it was probable they would submit to what they could not help, while, if proposed beforehand, they would set themselves to state objections, and render an agreement more hopeless than ever. Leighton coincided with him in opinion, and Burnet was despatched to sound Mr. Hutchison, a cousin-german of his own, and in high repute among the presbyterians, but he was of opinion it would not meet the wishes of either party. Lauderdale objected because, being the chief manager of Scottish affairs, and suspected of favoring the presbyterians, he was afraid lest the English bishops should think he was sacrificing the cause of episcopacy to their enemies. The idea of an accommodation between the parties was therefore given up at this time.

Yet the state of the country required that something should be done. The people would not attend the places where the curates, "a set of men so ignorant and so scandalous," officiated, while they flocked to hear the zealous and able presbyterian, or, as they were then called, "outed" ministers, who now were forced to betake themselves to the fields, and beneath the wide canopy of heaven, proclaim the truths of the everlasting gospel. It was in consequences suggested, that a number of these ministers should be allowed to serve in the vacant parishes under certain restrictions, a fettered liberty, in opposition to the standing law of the country, which was granted by the king under the ironical name of an "indulgence," and which was followed by one of the most oppressive acts that ever was framed for burdening the consciences of men, whose highest crime was contending for the headship of Christ in his church.

This was the first of the parliament 1669, asserting his majesty's supremacy over all persons, and in all cases ecclesiastical, by virtue whereof, the ordering and disposal of the external government and policy of the church was declared properly to belong to the king, and his successors, as an inherent right of the crown. This, which was an ex post facto legalizing of the king's stretch of power in granting an indulgence,* was not agreeable to Leighton, yet he voted for it, although he afterward expressed his regret at having allowed himself to be betrayed into such a compliance. Burnet, archbishop of Glasgow, and all "his set," who allowed the king every exorbitant prerogative that he chose to claim, when the object was to crush presbytery, now complained loudly when the prerogative was exerted to favor it. His majesty's supremacy asserted by the act, was immediately applied to chastise such insolence, and his grace of Glasgow, rather than dispute the point, took the hint, and retired for a time upon a pension.

No one of the worldly, ambitious, and detested prelates, possessed either the esteem of the people, or the confidence of the government; Leighton in these respects stood alone, and his pre-eminence pointed him out as the only fit person to fill the arch-episcopate Burnet had been forced to resign. "It was easily found," Sir George Mackenzie remarks, "that the bishop of Dumblane was the most proper and fit person to serve the state in the church according to the present platform of government now resolved upon : for he was in much esteem for his piety and moderation among the people, and as to which the presbyterians themselves could neither reproach nor equal him. Albeit they hated him most of all his fraternity, in respect he drew many into a kindness for episcopacy by his exemplary life, rather than debates. His great principle was, that devotion was the great affair about which churchmen should employ themselves, and that the gaining of souls, and not the external government, was their proper task ; nor did he esteem it fit, and scarce lawful to churchmen to sit in councils and judicatories, these being diversions from the main. And albeit his judgment did lead him to believe the church of England the best modelled of all others, both for doctrine and discipline : yet did he easily conform with the practice of the Christians among whom he lived, and therefore lived peaceably under presbytery till it was abolished. And when he undertook to be a bishop himself, he opposed all violent courses, whereby men were forced to comply with the present worship beyond their persuasions ; and he had granted a latitude and indulgence to those of his own diocese, before the king had allowed any by his letter. This made the world believe that he was author to his majesty of that public indulgence, and the statesmen who were unwilling to be authors of an innovation, which some there thought might prove dangerous, were well satisfied to have it so believed ; but however, these principles rendered him a fit instrument in their present undertaking." The earls of Lauderdale and Tweeddale therefore urged him to accept the see, but he was strongly averse, and for some time so resolutely declined, that Gilbert Burnet, professor of divinity in Glasgow, and all his friends, became exceedingly uneasy, and it was only the hope of being able to achieve an accommodation that at length induced him to consent to the proposal ; though only to hold the see in commendam, that is, administer the affairs without being ordained to the office.

* Burnet says the words "ecclesiastical matters" were interpolated after Leighton had seen the act; but this is a very lame justification—the very title of the bill implied them, and the whole bill, not a very long one, asserts in the most unqualified manner the ecclesiastical supremacy of the king. Leighton's easiness of temper is the only excuse.

As soon as he had agreed to accept, the king commanded his attendance at court, and on his way thither he called upon the professor, with whom he had a long consultation, but received poor encouragement, for Burnet says, he told him that he expected little good, only he thought an accommodation not altogether impracticable. Upon his arrival in London, he found Lauderdale strangely altered in his temper, for having triumphed over all his rivals, he was become fierce and intractable ; the scheme of accommodation was judged improper, and toleration by royal authority, was deemed the preferable mode for conciliating the country, and exalting his majesty's prerogative. Yet the archbishop's arguments prevailed with the king, and his plan, corrected by Sir George Murray, was turned into instructions for Lauderdale, the lord high commissioner, with authority to legalize all the concessions ; but from what afterward appeared, there was every reason to believe that Charles had, with his usual duplicity, given secret directions that the whole should be frustrated.

Being fully occupied with his new charge, the archbishop found it impracticable to attend the meeting of the Dumblane synod this year, but he still was careful for their welfare, and sent them a truly pastoral letter.*

He was not less anxious about the good conduct of the clergy in his new charge. He found the whole country filled with reports to their disadvantage, which, as we have seen by Burnet's account, were far from being ill founded. The archbishop therefore appointed a committee, consisting, not of the members of his own synod alone, who were too notorious themselves to be trusted with any such delicate task, but comprising those who stood fairest in the episcopal church, Mr. Charters, Mr. Nairn, and Mr. Aird, to take cognizance of the complaints that might be lodged against them. So soon, however, as the council were apprized of the measure, under pretext of countenancing and assisting the committee in discharge of their duty, they nominated Sir John Cochrane, of Ochiltree, Sir Thomas Wallace, Sir John Cunningham, Sir John Harper, the provost of Glasgow and Air, to attend and act along with them, but in reality to prevent too rigid an exercise of discipline, for they knew the west country curates could not bear even the mild inspection of Leighton ; and the consequence was, that the good intentions of the archbishop were rendered almost entirely abortive.

The committee met in September, when the parishioners were invited to lodge their complaints, but their first acts went to narrow as much as possible the avenues to redress ; they required, that whoever did not fully substantiate by legal proof any complaint he brought forward against a minister, should stand before the congregation clothed in sackcloth as a slanderer. This effectually prevented many, who were aware of the difficulty of proving what they knew to be true, from coming forward ; but there were some cases so flagrant, that the curates rather preferred to take a little money and retire, than stand trial, with all these advantages ; of the accusations that came before them, the result was—one deposed, and four removed to other charges ; what the crimes were that they visited thus heavily, we are not informed, but if we may judge from one case which they dismissed without reproof, they were no trifles.

It is thus recorded by Kirkton, who was no friend of Leighton, and reflects not more discredit on the unworthiness of the committee, than honor on the zeal of Leighton: "One Jeffray, curat of Maybole, sometime before alledged he had been assaulted for his life by his parishioners, and this he proved by producing a book which had been contused by a pistoll ball, and this book he alledged had saved his life; for he said he hade it upon his breast betwix his uppercoat and his doublet, but his uppercoat was neither pierced nor contused. However, he brought his complaint against his people, before the committee that sat at Air about that time. This he did in hopes to get his paroch fyned in 100 lib. English, and the money to himself; but because he not only failed in his evidence, but by the circumstance of the action made all Scotland say he hade contused the book with his own pistoll, no money he got, but the hatred of the people. These thinking they may now have justice before this goodly purging committee, accuse him there, and prove him guilty of many gross scandals, such as swearing, strikeing, fighting, and drunkenness, notwithstanding all which, the committee absolved him, which made Leighton so much ashamed, that out of the plentitude of his power, he thought fit to forbid him the exercise of his ministry."

* Life, page 32.

For some time Leighton continued to reside partly at Dumblane, and partly at Glasgow, but being consecrated in the month of October, he took full possession of the archbishopric, and went to reside in the city of Glasgow. His predecessor had used every violent method to force the people to attend the ministrations of the vile, immoral, and illiterate crew of curates who filled the pulpits in the west, and when the soldiers left his diocese, lamented that they had carried the gospel along with them! He proceeded upon a very different plan. Soon after his settlement he held a synod of his clergy. As was to be expected, their churches were deserted, and themselves despised; and never considering that their own conduct, and want of ministerial talents, were the true reasons of their being treated with contempt by a well-informed and a religious people, they had expected that their new right reverend father would, like the former, collect their scattered flocks by the aid of military evangelists:—He preached to them, and in his discourses, both public and private, exhorted them to look up more to God, to consider themselves as the ministers of the cross of Christ, to bear the contempt and ill usage they met with, as a cross laid on them for the exercise of their faith and patience; to lay aside all the appetites of revenge, to humble themselves before God, to have many days for frequent fasting and prayer, and to meet often together, that they might quicken and assist one another in holy exercises, and then they might expect blessings from Heaven upon their labors: "This," adds Burnet, "was a new strain to the clergy—they had nothing to say against it, but it was a comfortless doctrine to them!" There was no quartering of soldiers, and no levying of fines—so they went home as little edified with their new bishop, as he was with them.

Grieved at the low state of his episcopal clergy, the good man looked with an eye of longing regard to his former esteemed and pious co-presbyters, and visited several of the indulged ministers, for the purpose of persuading them to listen to propositions of peace, but he found the truth of Solomon's observation, that "a brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, and their contentions are like the bars of a castle." He told them that some of their number would quickly be sent for to Edinburgh, where conciliatory terms would be offered them—that they would be met in sincerity, and without artifice, and if they in return would cordially acquiesce, the concessions would be turned into laws, and all the vacancies would be filled up with their brethren. The ministers who had suffered severely, and were well acquainted with the character of the Scottish rulers, both civil and ecclesiastical, whose whole conduct toward them had been a uniform system of oppression and deceit, received the archbishop's communications with great coolness; they suspected the proffer to be, what we now know it to have been, upon the part of the government, a snare to entrap and to divide them; and they answered with prudent caution, that it was a matter of general concern to the whole body, in which they as individuals could do nothing.

Although it might have been anticipated, yet the reception he met with grieved and discouraged Leighton, who began to lose heart in a negotiation where he had to struggle with so many difficulties, tyranny, and insincerity, on the part of the government, and well-grounded suspicion and conscientious scruples on the part of the sufferers. He did not, however, give up his endeavors; with him it was a labor of love, and however much mistaken in his views, he was without doubt sincerely aiming at the blessing pronounced on the peacemakers. At his request, Lauderdale wrote to some of the most eminent of the indulged ministers in his diocese, among whom were Mr. Hutchison, Mr. Wedderburn, and Mr. Baird, requiring them to attend a conference before himself, Tweeddale, and Kincardine, at Edinburgh, August 9, 1670. Sharpe would not appear, but Patterson (afterward archbishop of Glasgow) was present along with Leighton. The latter opened the business by deploring the divisions that prevailed among them, and the mischief they had done; that souls were perishing while they were contending about matters of infinitely less importance, and entreated them to do each what lay in his power to heal so disastrous a breach: for his own part he was convinced, that from the days of the apostles, there always existed an order of bishops surior to presbyters in the church, and that complete equality among clergymen had never been heard of till the middle of the last century, when it was introduced rather by accident than design; yet in the proposition he had to make, he would not insist upon this—by his plan they would not be required to surrender their opinions on that point, while they might unite in preaching the gospel, and carrying on all the ends of their ministry. They had moderators among them, which was no divine institution, but only a matter of order; the king, therefore, might name them; and making them constant, was certainly no such encroachment on their rights, as should break the peace of the church; nor did blessing them with imposition of hands, when they entered upon their office, imply any invalidity in their former ordination—they were still ministers. Some imagined that a new authority was conferred, but they would be required to submit to nothing more than to their presidency, and even as to that would be allowed to exonerate themselves, by protesting as formally and publicly as they chose. Hutchison replied: he said their opinion, respecting a parity among ministers, was well known—that the presidency now proposed, had formerly served to introduce a lordly dominion in the church, and however inconsiderable their present pretensions might be, they would serve to pave the way for future higher demands, and therefore requested time to consider and consult with his brethren.

A second meeting was accordingly appointed in November, when the whole dined together by the Lord High Commissioner Lauderdale's invitation. After dinner his lordship joined them, in hopes that his presence might awe the parties into mutual concession; but when he found that the presbyterians were not prepared to surrender their principles, he was with difficulty restrained from bursting out into one of his outrageous fits of passion, by which he had latterly been accustomed to overawe his political adversaries. Leighton, who knew how vain it would be, persuaded him to rest quietly, and hear the ministers' objections. They were the same as stated at the former meeting, in which they had been confirmed by reflection and intercourse with the other presbyterians, who all coincided in opinion, that the accommodation was merely a scheme to lull their vigilance asleep, and render them subservient to the triumphant establishment of episcopacy, when the present supporters of presbyterianism should be laid in the grave.

Thus the conference ended without being productive of any advantage to the archbishop's wished-for conciliation; but the presbyterians were not the only enemies to an adjustment, although perhaps the only conscientious ones. Sharpe was violently against the accommodation. "Episcopacy," he exclaimed, "was undermined;" and the inferior clergy, Burnet tells us, hated the whole thing, "for they thought, if the presbyterians were admitted into churches, they would be neglected."

When the conference ended, Leighton did not despair: he knew the aversion the people had to come to any terms with the profligate clergy of a persecuting church, and he also knew the influence which their decided opinions in this matter had upon the ministers. He therefore adopted another method for attaining his darling object, and endeavored to engage them upon his side; he could get no assistance from his own diocese. "The episcopal clergy in the west could not argue much for anything, and would not at all argue in favor of a proposition they hated;" but he employed six divines of that persuasion, of a higher character, and from a different quarter—Messrs. Burnet, Charters, Nairn, Aird, Cook, and Patterson—to perambulate the country, preach in the vacant churches, and explain to their hearers the grounds of the accommodation. They were tolerably, not numerous attended, and they had little success in the object of their mission; they had to do with a people who understood the subject, and who seem to have astonished the episcopalians. "We were indeed amazed to see a poor commonalty," says one of their number, "so capable to argue upon points of government, and on the bounds to be set to the power of princes in matters of religion; upon all these topics they had texts of scripture at hand, and were ready with their answers to anything that was said to them. This measure of knowledge was spread even among the meanest of them, their cottagers and their servants. They were indeed vain of their knowledge, much conceited of themselves, and were full of a most entangled scrupulosity, so that they found and made difficulties to everything that could be laid before them."

Another attempt was yet again made by Leighton for accommodation. But at the very moment when he was holding out proffers of friendship, the parliament were enacting statutes of blood! Can it be at all wonderful in such a case, that the negotiations terminated unfortunately? His opponents knew, that however they might be disposed to trust him, not the smallest confidence could be placed in his associates. They notwithstanding met him, first at Paisley, where twenty-six or thirty presbyterian ministers were present. There some small alteration was made in his overtures, but Messrs. Hutchison, Wedderburn, Baird, and their companions, still perceived the horns of the mitre, and, with the old fathers of presbytery, refused to accept them, even when "basket ever sae bonnily."

Two meetings upon the 11th and 26th of January, 1671, at Holyrood-house, closed the conferences. In one of these, Leighton offered to dispute for episcopacy against presbytery; but this being illegal, and what might have subjected his opponent to a capital punishment, Mr. Hutchison refused. On which Burnet, who was present, appearing to triumph, Mr. Wedderburn declared he would accept the challenge, if the lord chancellor would authorize him; but his lordship declining, no more was said upon the subject.

Finding all his endeavors to promote peace and concord ineffectual, and his plans either thwarted, or at least not seconded by those from whom he might have expected support, he resolved, as infirmities were beginning to threaten him, to retire from a field in which there was no prospect of usefulness. He was suspected by the high episcopalian party, and had no influence with the presbyterians; and in reply to the arguments of Burnet for his continuing in that station, he said, "his work seemed to be at an end; he had no more to do, unless he had a mind to please himself with the lazy enjoying a good revenue." A mode of spending the residue of life very different from what he contemplated. "Our joint business," said he in a letter to his sister, apparently written about this time, "is to die daily to this world and self, that what little remains of our life, we may live to Him that died for us. For myself, to what purpose is it to tell you, what the bearer can, that I grow old and sickly, and though I have here great retirement, as great, and probably greater than I could readily find anywhere else, yet I am still panting after a retreat from this place, and all public charge, and next to rest in the grave. It is the pressingest desire I have of anything I have in this world, that I might be with you or near you. But our heavenly Father, we quietly resigning all to him, both knows and will do what is best." This letter is dated from Dumblane, to which place he delighted to resort during the intervals of his archiepiscopal labors, and whence he wrote an admirable pastoral letter to his synod.*

He had found Lauderdale extremely unwilling to accept of his resignation, as that nobleman knew well the value of such a character for supporting the already almost hopeless hierarchy in Scotland; he therefore, in the summer of 1673, repaired to London, and tendered it personally to the king. Charles, too, was averse to his retirement, but the archbishop was resolute, and his majesty agreed, that if he would continue another year upon trial, he should then be allowed to resign, if still of the same mind. He returned rejoicing with the royal engagement in writing, and observed to Dr. Burnet, that "there was now but one uneasy stage between him and rest, and he would wrestle through it the best he could." His professional duties were performed with his usual zeal and assiduity during the appointed time, at the close of which he hastened to London, and cheerfully laid down his high office, which some changes in the aspect of the political affairs of Scotland occasioned to be received without more difficulty.

Various reports were spread at the time respecting this transaction, but there is no reason to suppose that the causes were other than those which he has himself left on record. They have been preserved in MS. in the university of Edinburgh.*

After he had retired from public life, he spent some time in a farewell visit to the university of Edinburgh, and his letters accord with the feelings one loves to indulge in visiting, for the last time, scenes in which the most active years of life have passed. One is to Mr. Lightmaker, his sister's husband, on the death of a beloved child; the other to a lady laboring under mental distress, but to whom he was personally unknown.†

"I am glad of your health, and the recovery of your little ones; but indeed it was a sharp stroke of a pen that told me your little Johnny was dead, and I felt it truly more, than, to my remembrance, I did the death of any child in my lifetime. Sweet thing, and is he so quickly laid to sleep? Happy he! Though we shall no more have the pleasure of his lisping and laughing, he shall have no more the pain of crying, nor of being sick, nor of dying, and hath wholly escaped the trouble of schooling and all the sufferings of boys, and the riper and deeper griefs of upper years, this poor life being, all along, nothing but a linked chain of many sorrows and of many deaths. Tell my dear sister she is now so much more akin to the other world; and this will quickly be passed to us all. John is but gone an hour or two sooner to bed as children used to do, and we are undressing to follow. And the more we put off the love of the present world and all things superfluous beforehand, we shall have the less to do when we lie down. It shall refresh me to hear from you at your leisure. Sir, your affectionate brother—R. LEIGHTON."

Finally retired from public life, he removed, after a short stay in Edinburgh, to Broadhurst, in Sussex, an estate belonging to Mr. Lightmaker, his sister's husband, and with these dear relations he remained till within a short period of his decease. Little is recorded of these years, and it would be in vain to fill with conjectural speculations a space of which we are only told that it was occupied with deeds of charity and labors of love; that he preached frequently in the pulpits to which he had access, and that here, as in all his other abodes, the poor and the ignorant were the objects of his peculiar care. The serene tenor of his course was, however, once interrupted by an unexpected call from the king to resume his high functions in Scotland. The extreme of persecution having been tried in that country, only produced its usual and natural effects, the people became more exasperated against a church to which they were thus attempted to be dragooned. And the duke of Monmouth, who had witnessed the unfeeling tyranny of the prelates, and the unmitigated misery of the people, during his residence there, influenced both by compassion and political motives, made an effort to introduce milder measures; and the consequence was the following letter from Charles: "WINDSOR, July 16, 1679. MY LORD: I am resolved to try what clemency can prevail upon such in Scotland as will not conform to the government of the church there; for effecting of which design, I desire that you may go down to Scotland with your first conveniency, and take all possible pains for persuading all you can, of both opinions, to as much mutual correspondence and concord as may be; and send me, from time to time, characters both of men and things. In order to this design, I shall send you a precept for two hundred pounds sterling upon my exchequer, till you resolve how to serve me in a stated employment. Your loving friend, CHARLES R.—For the bishop of Dumblane." But the power of Monmouth declining shortly after, the proposition fell to the ground, deliverance came to the presbyterians from another quarter, and the venerable bishop was left quietly to pursue the method of life that he loved, to meditate upon eternity, and to prepare for it. The Scriptures were daily the men of his council, and the book of Psalms was especially a portion which he perused with delight himself, and recommended to others. The sabbath was his delight, and no slight hindrance could detain him from the house of prayer. Upon one occasion, when he was indisposed, the day being stormy, his friends urged him, on account of his health, not to venture to church: "Were the weather fair," was the reply, "I would stay at home, but since it is otherwise, I must go, lest I be thought to countenance by my example the irreligious practice of allowing trivial hindrances to keep me back from public worship." But perhaps the highest eulogium that can be passed on the uniform holiness of his character, is the effect that it had on his brother-in-law, who, upon daily beholding it, exclaimed, "If none shall go to heaven but so holy a man as this, what will become of me?" and became so deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of pressing forward unto perfection, that he relinquished a profitable business, lest it should too much entangle him, and devoted his remaining years to the care of his soul.

* Life, page 36.

† Life, pages 41, 44.

* Life, page 34.

In 1684, Leighton was induced to come to London upon a visit of mercy. Lord Perth, who had participated in all the atrocities of the times, arrived in the English capital to be invested with the office of lord high chancellor of Scotland, and whether from some temporary compunctious feeling or some pretensions to it, had earnestly requested Burnet to procure him an interview: "I thought," says the bishop,* "that angelic man might have awakened in him some of those good principles which he seemed once to have, and which were now totally extinguished in him;" and at his urgent desire Leighton came to London. "I was amazed to see him," continues Burnet, "at about seventy, look so fresh and well, that age seemed as it might stand still with him; his hair was still black, and all his motions were lively: he had the same quickness of thought and strength of memory, but above all, the same heat and life of devotion, that I had ever seen in him. When I took notice to him upon my first seeing him, how well he looked, he told me he was near his end for all that, and his work and journey both were now almost done. This at that time made an impression on me. He was the next day taken with an oppression, and as it seemed with a cold and with stitches, which was indeed a pleurisy. The day after Leighton sunk so that both speech and sense went away of a sudden, and he continued panting about twelve hours, and then died without pangs or convulsions. I was by him all the while. Thus I lost him who for so many years had been the chief guide of my whole life." He died in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and was interred at Horsted Keynes, where his brother Sir Ellis had been buried only a short time before; an unostentatious inscription marks the place where his dust rests in hope: Deposuit, Robert Leightounj Archiepiscopi Glasguensis apud Scotos, qui objt xxv die Junij Anno Dm̄j 1684, Ætatis suæ 74.

Two remarkable circumstances attended his death. He used often to say, that if he were to choose a place to die in, it should be an inn, it looking so like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all as an inn. It was his opinion also, that the officious tenderness and care of friends, was an entanglement to a dying man, and that the unconcerned attendance of those who could be procured in such a place, would give less disturbance: this wish was granted; it was at the Bell inn, Warwicklane, where he expired. Another was, that while bishop in Scotland, he never harassed his people for his stipend, small as it was, not above £130 per annum at Dumblane, and only about £400 at Glasgow, but generally took what they were pleased to pay, by which means considerable arrears were due when he left, and the last remittance which he had reason to expect, arrived about six weeks before his death. His will, which had been written a short time before, shows however, that although not rich, he yet had something to leave.†

But his liberality was not deferred till he could no longer hold a grasp of his money. He allotted every penny beyond what was barely necessary for his personal expenses, to pious and benevolent purposes. When prin-

* History of his own times, anno 1684.

† Life, page 53.

cial of Edinburgh university, he founded a bursary, and for that purpose gave £150 to the city: when at Glasgow he allotted to the poor of Dumblane, a considerable sum due to him by a gentleman in that place; he appropriated £300 for three bursaries in Glasgow university, and as much for maintaining four old men in St. Nicholas hospital. During his retirement in Sussex, "he distributed," says Dr. Burnet, "all he had in charities, choosing rather to give it through other people's hands than his own: for I was his almoner in London." To enable him to be charitable, he was abstemious: his sister, we are told, once asked him to eat of some delicate dish; he declined, saying, "What is it good for but to please a wanton taste—one thing forborne is better than twenty taken." But, asked his sister, why were these things bestowed upon us? To see, he answered, how well we can forbear them—and then added, "Shall I eat of this delicacy while a poor man wants his dinner?" The same sister, upon another occasion, imagining he carried indifference to worldly things too far, remarked to him, "if you had a wife and children, you would not act thus." His reply was, "I know not how it would be, but I know how it should be—Enoch walked with God, and begat sons and daughters." Humility was one of the most distinguishing features of his character, of which many instances are given in the preceding pages, and so conspicuously did it shine, that, in order to dim its lustre, his enemies were constrained to doubt its reality, and describe it as affected; but it was too unostentatious, too general, and too consistent, to be false. Indeed, personal holiness was the main object of his life, so much so, that when he heard of any changing their profession of religion, he would ask when they became holier?

His natural temper was singularly gentle and amiable, and endeared him to all with whom he had any intercourse, and overcame in many of his opponents the prejudices his dereliction of their party inspired; though in the latter part of his life, even from the partial statements of his pupil and friend, he does not seem to have been greatly enamored of the change he had made. "He lamented oft to me the stupidity that he observed among the commons of England, who seemed to be much more insensible in matters of religion than the commons of Scotland were. He retained still a peculiar inclination to Scotland, and if he had seen any prospect of doing good there, he would have gone, and lived, and died among them." He looked on the state the church of England was in, with very melancholy reflections, and was very uneasy at an expression then used, that it was the best constituted church in the world. He thought it was truly so with relation to the doctrine, the worship, and the main part of her government. But as to the administration, both with relation to the ecclesiastical courts, and the pastoral care, he looked on it as one of the most corrupt he had ever seen. He thought we looked like the fair carcase of a body without a spirit, without that zeal, that strictness of life, and that laboriousness in the clergy that became us." His conversation is represented as having been eminently heavenly and spiritual, "and he had brought himself," says the writer so often referred to, "into so composed a gravity, that I never saw him laugh, and but seldom smile, and he kept himself in such a constant recollection, that I do not remember that I ever heard him say one idle word." Most probably the state of the country and the church, tended greatly to produce this general solemnity of manner, for he was deeply affected with public events. How he could improve little incidents is well illustrated by an answer he made to a remark of some of his friends, "you have been to hear a sermon." "I met a sermon, a sermon de facto, for I met a corpse, and rightly and profitably are the funeral rites observed, when the living lay it to heart." Bishop Leighton's stature was small, and his countenance benignant. That he was slender, we learn from an exclamation of his, when told that a corpulent person had died: "How is it that A—— has broken through these goodly brick walls, while I am kept in by a bit of flimsy deal?" He would never sit for his picture, and the engravings we have of him, were done from one taken by stealth, but which those who knew him pronounced to be not a bad likeness, though it did not do full justice to the mild expression of the original.

It only remains to notice his theological works. Their praise is in all the churches. Episcopalians, presbyterians, and independents, have concurred to express their high admiration of their unrivalled excellence.*

"Perhaps," says Mr. Orme, in his Bibliotheca Biblica, "there is no expository work in the English language equal altogether to the exposition of Peter. It is rich in evangelical sentiment and exalted devotion. The meaning is seldom missed, and often admirably illustrated. There is learning without its parade; theology divested of systematic stiffness; and eloquence in a beautiful flow of unaffected language and appropriate imagery. To say more would be unbecoming, and less could not be said with justice."

Jerment, in his life of Leighton, thus writes:—"The modesty of Leighton was the more comely and ornamental, that it was joined to high intellectual capacity and attainments, and to the graces of elocution. His acquaintance with literature was various and profound. Of a quick and capacious understanding; of an elevated genius and refined taste; of a vigorous and elegant fancy; of a reten-tive memory—he drank deep at the springs of knowledge, by close application, and almost incessant study. Our author had perused with care and delight the Roman and the Greek classics. His Latin would do honor to the Augustan age; and is not inferior in purity and strength to the style of the learned and polished Buchanan. The Hebrew was quite familiar to him, and he possessed a critical knowledge of that concise and energetic tongue. He understood French well; and could both speak and write the language with correctness and ease. He knew philosophy in the greater part of its branches; and had read with attention and profit, history, sacred and profane, civil and ecclesiastical, ancient and modern. Divinity, however, was his principal study; and he was truly a master in Israel. Of the most of these rare and useful endowments his writings afford abundant and incontrovertible evidence.

* Doddridge's judgment is declared in his preface, and Pearson's Critique is found in the life, pp. 47, 48.

“Leighton used all his learning as a handmaid to religion, and employed it in the service of the sanctuary. He derived theological knowledge, not so much from human systems as from the sacred oracles; and that knowledge received a mellowness from his own natural and gracious placidity. At times a Boanerges in sentiment; he was usually, both in sentiment and style, a son of consolation. The cotemporary bishops of the north, compared with him, were dwarfs in mind, and wolves in disposition. There were bright constellations of divines, both in England and Scotland. But Leighton shone pre-eminent above the majority; and was a star of the first magnitude. Among the first preachers of his own day, he has never been surpassed, taking him all in all, since that period. More sententious than Reynolds, more refined than Howe, more eloquent than Baxter; less diffuse and argumentative, but more practical than Charnock; less profound, but clearer and more savory than Owen; less ingenious, but sweeter and more sublime than Hall—he will not suffer by comparison with any divine, in any age.”

LETTERS.*

I.

SIR: I see there is no place, city or country, valley nor mountain, free from that sentence so early passed upon the earth for man's cause, “thorns and briers shalt thou bring forth;” but he that is well shod walks on the safelier till he comes where there are none: but seeing that is not here, we are to use the greater coolness and deliberation in our removes. If your present company be some way irksome, a greater solitude may prove more so: only if God both sensibly fits you for it, and points clearly out the way to it, follow him; otherwise my advice should be not to hasten too much, and particularly at no hand so to hasten as to run in debt for it; for I speak it on experience, he that sets up anywhere in debt, it will keep him possibly wrestling at and under many years; but if you let your incomes do their own business, pian piano, as they come to your hand, you will find it much easier to do, and sweeter when it is done: meanwhile I know you can digest all a little longer, as hitherto you have done. To your other point touching baptism, freely my thought is, it is a weak notion taken up on trust almost generally, to consider so much, or at all, the qualifications of the parents. Either it is a benefit to infants, or it is not. If none, why then administered at all? But if it be, then why should the poor innocents be prejudged of it for the parent's cause, if he profess but so much of a Christian as to offer his child to that ordinance? For that it is the parent's faith gives the child a right to it, is neither clear from Scripture, nor any sound reason; yet in that I heartily approve your thoughts that you would make it, as it most fitly may be, an active inducement to the parents to know him and his doctrine, and live conformed to it, unto whose name they desire their children to be baptized. But in this, and the other business, and in all things, I am confident that good Hand, to which I know you have given up yourself, will graciously guide you they miscarry that desire to h will but his. Oh let it still entirely be so with you and your resigned friend,

R. L.

'Tis well our great journey is going on, and will quickly set us where we would be. The business you write of is to you one signal step of it, marked out by that sovereign hand which, I doubt not, will lead you in it, and all along through what remains, to whom I know you are constantly—

* The following letters exhibit Archbishop Leighton in his private intercourse, as an amiable man, and a tender, faithful friend. As his biography comprised not any circumstances to which they particularly referred, they are placed at the end of the volume.

II.

SIR: Some days ago I received some lines from you, and they were very welcome; for I know no better news can come from any corner of the earth, than of a soul attempting to overcome the world and its own self, and in any degree prevailing and resolving still onward; all the projects and conquests of the world are not to be named to it. Oh! what a weariness is it to live among men, and find so few men; and among Christians, and so few Christians; so much talk and so little action; religion turned almost to a tune and air of words; and, amid all our pretty discourses, pusillanimous and base, and so easily dragged into the mire, self and flesh, and pride and passion domineering, while we speak of being in Christ, and clothed with him, and believe it because we speak it so often and so confidently! Well, I know you are not willing to be thus gulled, and having some glances of the beauty of holiness, aim no lower than perfection, which in end we hope to attain; and in the meanwhile, the smallest advances toward it are worth more than crowns and sceptres. I believe that you often think on those words of the blessed champion Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 24, &c. There is a noble guest within us. Oh! let all our business be to entertain him honorably, and to live in celestial love within, that will make all things without be very contemptible in our eyes. I should rove on did not I stop myself, it falling out too well for that, to be hard upon the post hours, ere I thought of writing. Therefore, good-night is all I add; for whatsoever hour it comes to your hand, I believe you are as sensible as I that it is still night; but the comfort is, it draws nigh toward that bright morning that shall make amends.

Your weary fellow-pilgrim,

R. L.

It may be Mr. Ogle did not think me in earnest when I desired him to spy out a hermitage for me; but if one remote enough were offered, I know not how it might tempt me. Meanwhile, it is well; but if you say anything of this, then it will cost you withal the remembering my service to him and the rest. If you write again, I pray you load not the back of your letters with any more than this—To Mr. Robert Leighton, at Edinburgh; for by that it will not fail to find me out, and that answers the end, and you see I give you example.

III.

SIR: Though I desired you to forbear for a while the pains of sending me the book you spoke of, I know it was your kindness pressed you to send it, and I thank you. I can not say I have read it through, but divers passages of it I have; and though I approve the design of it and all such writings so far as I understand, and what I understand not, adventure not to judge of, but rather implicite think the best of it, yet I must confess, their lowest rules that are laid as the foundation of their structure, I find of most use; and, could I duly follow them, either I should insensibly be raised to those greater sublimities they speak of, if the great lover of souls saw any such thing good for me, or I should humbly and contentedly live without them, which possibly would do as well till the day come of fullest and purest intuitive life, which I live in the hopes as not far off. Meanwhile I think I have at a venture given up with the contemptible desires and designs of this present world, and must have either something beyond them all, or nothing at all; and though this βορβορωπος υλη, this base clod of earth I carry still depresses me, I am glad that even because it does so, I loathe and despise it; and would say, major sum, et ad majora genitus, quam ut mancipium sim istis corpusculis. I have sent you two little pieces of history, wherein it may be you will find small relish, but the hazard is small; and, however, I pray you do not send them back to me at all, for I have enough of that kind. The one is of a good pen, and an acquaintance and friend of yours, Paulus Noloneas, and his Life of Martin of Tours, I think you will relish, and I believe is not in your Vita Patrum. The other, Valerius Maximus, I conceived, would cloy you the less, because it is of so much variety of selected examples, and the stages are so short, you may begin and leave off where you will, without wearying. But when all is done, there is one only blessed story wherein our souls must dwell and take up their rest; for among all the rest we shall not read, Venite ad me, omnes lassii et laborantes, et ego vobis requiem prestabo; and never any yet that tried him, but found him as good as his word: to whose sweet embraces I recommend you, and desire to meet you there.

Yours,

R. L.

Oct. 24, 1659.

IV.

SIR: The answer I intended your letter was a visit, and that not en passant. Though I spoke and once had thoughts of Newcastle for some days, my last purpose was no farther than Ingram, unless it had been with you to Wittingham, to see your honest neighbor Mr. Hume; which if you think of it when you meet, it may be you will tell him. Nor was this a mere thought, for I was on my way toward you as far as Ginglekirk, whence I returned back to my lodge, finding myself not well, by reason, I think, of not scarce having been on horseback twice these many months. I am yet in a little distemper; of which, though I apprehend no great height nor long continuance, yet I am doubtful whether I shall again, this vacation, attempt any farther than Pentland Hills. But it is no matter; blessed be He in whom souls may meet and concentre in constant rest, and in renewed thoughts and desires intervisit, every day, in despite of large lumps of earth. And, in much greater matters, how little imports the defeat of our purposes as to anything without us, if it please him to shine on and advance our great business within! O! what is all the world to it, to that bright purity we aspire to, and the blessed eternity we hope for! And how great reason have we to say, non magna relinquo, magna sequor! I thank you for the notice of your capuchin; but I almost knew that he was not here before I looked. It is true the variety of his book refreshes us, and by the happy wording, the same things not only please, but sometimes profit us; but they tell us no new thing, except it may be some such thing as, I confess, I understand not, of essential unions and sleeps of the soul; which because I understand not, would rather disorder and hinder than advance me; and therefore I begin to be unwilling to look over these and such like, unless I would pick out here and there such things as I am capable of, and not meet with those steep ascents which I dare not venture on. But dear à Kempis is a way to it, and oh! that I could daily study more, and attain more sublime, humble devotion there drawn to the life most soaring treatises I have ever yet met with, find any th certain and solid use that is there not plainly and Di proque est paucis opus et paucis libris ad bona me could we once thoroughly despise our own base flesh, and the vain opinion of the world, and live in the divine will, as dead to all things beside, and gladly take the lowest room, he can, if he please, call for us to go up higher. Oh, but the misery to have sin, lust, and pride, and self-will, and self-love, and desire of esteem among men, not only living, but, alas, lively and strong; and yet, however it be, let us not faint in our minds, for in the name of the Lord we shall destroy them. And in the meantime, blessed—ever blessed—be his name, who hath called us to fight under his royal standard, and given us to resolve to live and die there. Amen.

Your fellow-soldier,
R. L.

V.

DEAR BROTHER: I wrote to you lately, and troubled you with the story of my present and daily growing unhealthiness, which can not add much, but something it does, to my wonted longings for the evening, not without hopes that it shall likewise prove a bright and sweet morning. Meanwhile it is no great matter where I pass the few hours that remain, yet I told you I had some thoughts of spending them nearer you, but have not yet resolved; but that and all shall be disposed of as is best. Mr. Aird, who gives you this, I believe, you have heard me speak of, as one acquainted with my free thoughts, and that hath himself a free, unprejudiced soul, and loves truth and devotion wheresoever he finds it, even in the greatest crowd of error or superstition about it. He hath a cell and a provision among the hills in the border of England, but is threatened with a removal upon the title of an old incumbent, who is at London or near it. If you be acquainted with Dr. Cozens, bishop of Durham, or can recommend him to him by any that is, if he himself desire it, or in any other way can assist him, I entreat it of you. Mrs. Abernethy tells me her son is in the king's life-guards: if you meet with him, and by recommending him to my lord Gerrard's favor, who commands it, or in anything else you can do him good, you will oblige both me and the honest widow. She makes often mention of you. Cher Frère, Adieu. R. L.

MARCH 5.

For Sir Ellis Leighton,
at St. James's.

VI.

DEAR FRIEND: I wish, after your resolution taken, and I think συν ὀφει, you had barred the door on all suggestions from without and within, that might have changed or in the least disturbed it. Sure I am the reason that convinced you is still the same, that what you may do, you may also promise if it be required; and I believe the design was so like to make you serviceable to God, and to souls that he hath bought, that you would never have had just reason to repent it. The like I dare not say of you now recoiling; and if I might again prevail with you, I entreat you to readvise the thing between God and your own heart, and that cleared, as much as you can, from all mist, both of the fancy of others and your own melancholy. If you would meet me at Culross or Lithgow any time the next week, and send me word what day or hour you choose, I would endeavor not to fail, or if coming to Edinburgh to speak with you, though at this time well I can not, might be likely to do any help toward dispelling the cloud that hath overcast your mind, I would not grudge the pains. All I can do at this distance, is to look up to Heaven, who alone powerfully can do it, and in his blessed hand I leave it, and you, and myself, and all that concerns us, and all the world; and whatsoever you do, never doubt the unalterable affection of

Your friend,
R. L.

VII.

SIR: What the opportunity is that may engage you where you are, seeing you express it not, I can not particularly know: but whatsoever it is, I shall be glad if it suit your mind, and if I could do you any real furtherance in any such thing, I think I need not tell you how ready the occasion would find me. Here I see nothing at present worth the thinking on for you, unless you have a mind to try a course of tilting for a regency in philosophy, as they call it, which is likely to be vacant here very shortly, Mr. Wiseman being upon the point of leaving it and going to sleep. If you find a stomach to it, all I can promise is, endeavor to see fair play; and if you make one you would be sure to win, if it depended on the wishes of

SIR,
Your Friend and Servant.

VIII.

SIR: I should please myself very much in doing anything toward your repose; but there is nothing such as I wish within my reach, nor within my view. The humanity place will either not be vacant, or if it be, I think we shall break it for some reason. Of the other I wrote to you, you can only judge whether it suits your genius and inclination; neither, if it did, have I power to promise anything but heavy endeavors if I see it feasible, having no assurance of prevailing. But one thing I am sure of, and so are you, and it is enough, that to them that fear the Lord and trust in him, no good thing shall be wanting. The choosing of some dubious steps of our way may now and then be a little troublesome, but the comfort is, the journey will be quickly done, and then we hope to be where there are no desires nor deliberations of change of quarters. I am,
Yours.

I suppose you have heard of Mr. Andrew Gray's death. He has got the start of us, but not for long. I am likely to preach tomorrow, God willing, in our own hall, where for the present meets one of the town congregations.

IX.

SIR: I think you know the reason of my forbearing to write; for you can not but know that letters sent by the post are broken open very frequently, if not constantly of late; and other way I know none. I often entreated that favor of my John to inquire at your sister's how you were, if she did hear, and if she knew any safe convey of letters to you; but he did as he uses to do in divers of the few letter services I have for him, and I am beholden to his neglects. Meanwhile, my not forgetting you, you may be assured of, while I shall continue to remember myself. When I think how little or nothing it is my letters speak other than some short word, dropped as it comes, reflecting to you some of your own thoughts, I am pained with your reckoning them anything at all. Your imparting the particulars relating to yourself, though in extrinsic things, I do very heartily thank you for; for such communications are a redoubling the pleasure in them: and seeing our great Father's love descends to the ordering of the low concerns of our life, we were very unwise and ungrateful not to observe them, who hath made flies with so much art, and is truly magnus in minimis. Courage, it shall be well: we follow a conquering general; yea, who hath conquered already; et qui semel vicit pro nobis, semper vicit in nobis. For myself at present, I am, as we use to say, that is, this little contemptible lodge of mine is, not very well; but that will pass some way or other, as it is best; and even while the indisposition lasts, oh! how much doth it heighten the sweet relish of peace within, of which I can not speak highly; for to you I speak just as it is. But methinks I find a growing contempt of all this world, and consequently some further degrees of that quiet which is only subject to disturbance by our inordinate fancies and desires, and receding from the blessed centre of our rest: for hurries of the world you know the way, Isa. xxvi. 20; and in these retiring rooms we meet and be safe and quiet. That you may speak of the shock seeming to threaten your order, I am not afraid of at all, neither for you nor myself, nor the generality of the rest; but you may be assured, that, in that case, the lot of those in my posture will be the same with yours. Sed Jehovah regnat, circuitor Gentis et cum reliquis etiam insula. Farewell, dear brother.

Yours.

X.

DEAR FRIEND: Whether you know the particular purport of the enclosed you sent to me, I know not; but it is to quit ten pounds sterling supposed due to me from the party that pleads inability: and doubtless your recommendation, together with the charity of the thing, if it shall appear to be so, would easily give law to me for a greater sum than that. But the truth is, there is a main mistake in the business, for it is not payable to me, and therefore no way in my power, for my lord Bargeny hath a lease of all my little dues in these parts for nineteen years, upon very easy terms as they inform me; yet whether he will consider that so as to make such an abatement of what is now his due and not mine, I can not tell; neither have I any power to carve upon what is his without paying it back, or some way compensing it to him myself; and yet even that I shall not decline, if, after you and I both know the more particular state of the business and the person, you shall judge it reasonable. This is all I can say to that at present; and I will not enter upon any other discourse by this; for the truth is, there is little to be said and much to be done. You and I are, I trust, upon a design that will reflect a very low estimate upon all below it, and it shall certainly succeed if we be careful to stick to our Leader, and follow him. Pray for

Your poor friend and servant,

R. L.

March, 1660.

To the Rev. Mr. AIRD.

XI.

DEAR FRIEND: I am very sorry for the indisposition you are under, but I assure you I do not value myself, nor anything I say or do either upon this or any other occasion, worth your pains of writing, far less on a journey hither; yet I should gladly enjoy your mistake in thinking otherwise, if I was in a posture capable of the pleasure others have of your abode under my roof for some longer time. The persons you mention in order to that affair, &c., I have not seen nor heard anything from any of them since my last, nor expect that I shall till the beginning of June, at Edinburgh, where I intend, God willing, to be, and desire, if it may be, to see you there. I have thoughts of going thither somewhat before that time, and therefore, if I did not signify such to you, I fear you might miss me if you came hither.

As for the business, it is very safe, with all our other interests of time and eternity, in our blessed Father's hand, of all fathers the wisest and the best. He, I am sure, can mould either your heart or theirs you have to do withal, as he thinks fit, and it shall be as it is best to be; therefore if we were together, I should not very eagerly dispute the matter with you, far less will I by scribbling. Let your heart keep near to him, and be daily purging out all that may interpose and obstruct our closest union, and we have nothing else to care for. This moment is posting away, and that blessed day is hastening forward that shall complete that union.

Pray for your lame fellow-traveller,

R. L.

I should chide you, if I could do it sharply enough, for entertaining the least thought of any such jealousy, as I think very incongruous with the strength and mutual confidence of solid friendship.

Received at Carmarthen, May 14, 1668.

XII.

SIR: Waving all other discourse till meeting, though you are possibly enamored with your vacancy, yet if you find any return of appetite to employment in the ministry, I am once again to offer you an invitation, for there is a place or two now vacant at my disposal. It is true it is by the removal of the former incumbents against their will, but you are not guilty of that by succeeding them, nor I by giving a call to any that will; for you may be sure they are not within the bounds I have charge of, but in other dioceses. There is one place indeed in my precincts now vacant, and yet undisposed of, by the voluntary remove of a young man that was in it to a better benefice, and this is likewise in my hand; but it is so wretchedly mean a provision, that I am ashamed to name it—little, I think, above five hundred marks a year. If the many instances of that kind you have read have made you in love with voluntary poverty, there you may have it; but wheresoever you are or shall be for the rest of your time, I hope you are advancing in that blessed poverty of spirit that is the only true height and greatness of spirit in all the world entitling to a crown, “for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.” Oh! what are the scraps that the great ones of this world are scrambling for compared with that pretension! I pray you, as you find an opportunity, though possibly little or no inclination to it, yet bestow one line or two upon

Your poor friend and servant,

R. L.

Edinburgh, July 5, 1662.

To Mr. JAMES AIRD.

XIII.

SIR: I long to hear how you dispose of yourself, if it be determined. If still in suspense, I still wish you the favorable impression of that hand to which I know you have delivered up yourself; if you be resolved upon a removal, and incline to the like charge here upon a fair call, I desire to know it, by the first opportunity, for I hear there is somewhat of that kind in the west likely to be at my disposal: I would not have this unsettle your pretension to stay where you are, if you find anything within you, for thorns grow everywhere, and from all things below: and to a soul transplanted out of itself into the root of Jesse, peace grows everywhere too, from Him who is called our peace, and whom we still find the more to be so, the more entirely we live to him, being dead to this world, and self, and all things besides him. Oh! when shall it be? Well, let all the world go as it will, let this be our only pursuit and ambition, and to all other things fiat voluntas tua Domine—that both is painful in some instance is the dubiousness.

XIV.

DEAR FRIEND: Being at present not well, I shall say no more but that I take these communications as a singular act of the truest kindness and friendship, and heartily thank you for them, and am glad to find that there are some souls in this world truly sick of it all; that being, in my mind, a very happy symptom and prognostic of a prevailing health—such a degree of it, at least, as may be had in the diseased, defiled cottages wherein we dwell, and may be to us a certain pledge of real beginning of that full health we look for at our removal, and therefore have so much reason to long and wish earnestly and sigh and groan for that day, and yet have no less reason to wait patiently for it. Pray for

Your poor friend,
R. L.

March 21, 1669.

XV.

DEAR FRIEND: I was refreshed by the account of your feast in your former, of which I trust I was participant as to the blessing of it, for though absent, I was heartily with you in desire. The accident your letter acquaints me with, I think concerns you little or nothing; for if there was any offence in the printing it, it rests upon him that procured it, and the printer; but for instructing your own flock in what way you judge most accommodated to them, who can blame you? However, when I meet with the archbishop, I shall, God willing, represent the business to him as it is, if I find it needful; but if you think it hath come to his knowledge, and that with some misreport and disguise, I believe it might not be amiss for you to give him the true and ingenuous account yourself by a letter, for, it may be, some weeks may pass before I see him.

But oh! how quickly will all these things be gone, and even at present a look beyond them makes them disappear! Let us manage our ways as prudently and profitably to our main end as we can, and let the world descant as they will. Blessed are the upright in heart, for their great Judge and Master sees into the heart, and can not mistake them. Pray for

Your poor friend,
R. L.

XVI.

DEAR FRIEND: I do very much commend the activeness of your charity in the journey you have taken; for the success, though I had much desire and some little hopes of better, yet I suspected how it might prove, unless this one consideration, the extreme necessity of this church at this time, did prevail with our friend to do violence to himself. I hope you both pardon me for the very reason that I moved it, and that I am but to be angry or impatient at it, I could not pardon myself. I look to Him who makes everything beautiful in its season, and remember that saying of his, "Your time is always ready, but my time is not yet." As we are to forbear forbidden fruits at all times, so not to pull the best fruit in his garden till he allows us, and some way signifies he thinks them duly ripe for use.

I do heartily thank you for the kindness of communicating the enclosed letters; for next to what is within me, the painful reflecting I have on this world is, that there is so small a part of mankind in whose breasts such thoughts are stirring, and am somewhat relieved when I meet with anything of that kind, and long to meet with more, or be gone where no such wishes are needful. O! this dark night is very long; but blessed hope of that bright morning without cloud that is hastening forward. Well, no more, but pray for

Your poor friend and servant,
R. L.

I beseech you pain me not again with so excessively canonical a superscription of your letters, for there is no need of it, though they were to pass through twenty hands. Since I wrote this, I received another of yours for Mr. Blair. The truth is, for the next year I am already engaged to one that both needs and deserves a little help, and am bespoke for another to succeed the year after, but have not absolutely promised, and I therefore am at a little more liberty to consider it against that time, if it please God to continue me here so long; for the youth you name you may be assured, if it can fall on that side, his relation to our brother, and your recommendation, will have very much weight to make it so, and that is all I can say of it at present.

For my Rev. brother Mr. AIRD, { Minister at Torriburn. }

XVII.

SIR: I wish I could punctually resolve you concerning that freedom of commencing to that excellent work which you desire; but the truth is, though I believe they are not there so straightlaced by far as here, yet you having never exercised at all in public, I am not sure they would not all inquire concerning that, but it is likely nothing would be required which, if you be not superstitious on the other hand, would trouble you. If you thought fit in the meantime to spend some weeks in that place you speak of, and to use the liberty of it in exercising, it might possibly pass for what you would avoid in the other. And if a fair invitation shall come, he to whom you have resigned yourself will direct you.

Sir,

Your very affectionate friend.

To my own motions or stay, as I am in a most quiet indifferency myself, you, I am sure, may much more easily be so. We are at sea, and can not expect still to sail within speech, no nor within sight, but we hope to arrive at the same "fair havens."

XVIII.

SIR: There is one here come from Ireland to inquire after able young men for the ministry, whom they invite thither, sending them transport-money, and assuring them of a liberal and certain provision there. He they sent hath been with me, and was desirous to know if I could recommend any. It came into my thoughts to give you notice, that if you find any inclination that way, I may know. I will not advise you, much less press you in it, but leave you wholly to the freedom of your own thoughts and choice, and to the best hand to determine them. I believe they expect of those that go, an engaging to a pastoral charge; but whether for some time they may not give a little liberty to some or to one at least in a freer posture to preach, or whether their pastoral engagement be so indissolubly fast as here, I know not. You will think on that, and if you judge it worth so much, let me hear from you how you relish it. However, I wish you as to myself much happy success and advancement in your great design.

Your friend to serve you.

XIX.

SIR; The Lords of the Council having appointed some ministers from other parts, to preach in such churches within the diocese of Glasgow as do most need their help, I desire the Reverend Mr. James Aird, minister of Torry, to bestow his pains in that circuit that lies eastward from Hamilton or thereabouts, and particularly in the kirk of Carlisle; not doubting that the minister thereof, and others in the like case, will very gladly receive and earnestly entreat what help he can do toward the bringing of their people to frequent the public ordinances, and the removing of their prejudices and calming of their passions, that they may with one heart worship that one Lord whose name we all profess to love and honor.

R. LEIGHTON.

Glasgow, Sept. 17, 1670.

This is to recommend to the kind reception and assistance of the gentlemen and ministers, to whose parishes he shall resort, for preaching of the gospel, within the diocese of Glasgow, our Reverend brother, Mr. Lawrence Charteris, Minister at Bar, being nominated and appointed by the Lords of Council, with some others from other parts for that effect.

Glasgow, Sept. 20, 1670.

To Mr. Charteris are recommended, within the presbytery of Paisley, these kirks, Neelson, Kilbarchan—vacant. Likewise, if his health permit, Killelen, and Kilmacome—though not vacant.

R. LEIGHTON.

Oct. 19, 1670.

INDEX

OF THE

TEXTS OF SCRIPTURE.

CH. VER.	GENESIS.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
i. 1.		583	xxx. 13, 14.	629	xiv. 38.	140
i. 2.		151	xxxiii. 3.	567	xxx.	372
i. 3.		382	xxxiv. 6.	268, 548	xxx. 6.	86
i. 11.		124	xxxiv. 28.	620
i. 15.	152, 171,	632	LEVITICUS.		vi. 22.	107
i. 17.		698	x. 3.	320	x. 12.	610
i. 26.		401	xvi.	192	xix. 35.	132
i., ii., iii.		670	xix. 2.	603	xxiii. 5.	535
ii. 4.		684	xix. 3, 37.	622
iii. 6.		422	xix. 17.	216, 633	I. KINGS.
iii. 15.		99	xix. 30.	629	iv. 29.	507
iii. 16.		203	xx. 7.	603	iv. 33.	199
vi.	308, 481		xxi. 8.	603	viii. 27.	601
vi. 3.	268, 269		xxi. 20.	294	xii. 31.	577
vi. 5.	194, 599		xxv. 2.	629	xv. 13.	247
viii. 21.		199	xxvi. 4-12.	565	xviii. 17.	226
xi.		542	xxvi. 41.	448	xix. 12.	362
xi. 5, 7.		267	NUMBERS.		xix. 20.	154
xii. 4.		68	xi. 44.	106	xxii.	398
xiii. 8.		117	xiii. 30.	103	xxii. 19.	233
xv. 12.		337	xxiv. 17.	460
xvii. 3.		406	DEUTERONOMY.		vi. 16.	351
xviii. 21.		267	iv. 15.	626	vi. 23.	572
xviii. 27.		595	v. 22.	620	vi. 33.	374
xx. 11.		361	v. 28.	576	x. 16.	401
xxi. 9.		319	vi. 5.	561	xvii.	452
xxii. 12.		83	vii. 6.	183	xix. 33.	493
xxv. 5.		77	vii. 7, 8.	158
xxvii. 27.	140, 218		x. 14, 15.	148	I. CHRONICLES.
xxviii. 15.		412	xi. 12.	231	xxii. 16.	343
xxix. 20.		333	xxvii. 1, 12, 24.	565	xxix. 14.	101, 427
xxx. 2.		120	xxix. 29.	620	xxix. 15.	406
xxxi. 7.		223	xxxii. 2.	120, 329
xxxii. 10.		611	xxxii. 4.	349	II. CHRONICLES.
xxxix. 9.	178, 224,	702	xxxii. 8.	642	xvi. 9.	231
xlix.		116	xxxii. 18.	684	xvii. 6.	521
xlix. 7.		227	xxxii. 21.	157	xxix. 30.	452
xlix. 10.		98	xxxiii. 29.	554
	EXODUS.		JUDGES.		EZRA.
iii. 8.		267	ix. 20.	171, 486	iv. 15.	169
iv. 22.		414	x. 14.	393	ix.	725
xv.		493	xviii. 24.	534	NEHEMIAH.
xv. 11.		592	xx. 2.	140	ix. 27.	554
xvi. 23.		629	I. SAMUEL.		JOB.
xix. 5.	150,	626	i. 11.	338	i. 6.	682
xix. 5, 6.		148	ii. 4, 5.	536	v. 6, 7.	447
xx. 1, 2.		619	ii. 30.	178, 334,	v. 7.	465
xxiii. 1.		639	iv. 21.	452	vi. 19.	573
xxiii. 12.		629	vii. 16.	626	vii. 20.	448
xxviii. 36, 38.		192
xxx. 25.		477

CR. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
viii. 7.	349	iii. 6.	466	xxiv. 7.	490
viii. 8.	524	iv.	357	xxiv. 10.	618
viii. 9.	524	iv. 1.	357	xxv.	495
viii. 13.	249	iv. 2.	359	xxv. 1.	602
viii. 14, 15.	534	iv. 3.	69, 360, 607	xxv. 7.	160, 635
ix. 13.	545	iv. 4.	361, 568	xxv. 11.	96, 592
ix. 30.	448	iv. 5.	362	xxv. 14.	98, 236
ix. 30, 31.	66, 400	iv. 6.	363, 566	xxv. 22.	600
x. 11, 12.	536	iv. 6, 7.	72	xxvi. 4.	222
x. 17.	552	iv. 7.	77, 364	xxvi. 8.	452, 462
xi. 8, 9.	523	v. 1.	232	xxvi. 9.	698
xi. 12.	523	v. 3.	607	xxvi. 11.	592
xii. 8, 9, 12.	523	v. 4.	326	xxvii. 1.	151, 245, 372, 463
xiii. 4.	244	v. 8.	167	xxvii. 4.	398, 570
xiii. 15.	372, 466	vi. 1.	567	xxvii. 8, 9.	446
xiii. 25.	395	vi. 6.	474	xxvii. 11.	319, 341
xiv. 1, 2.	122	vi. 7.	465	xxvii. 13.	86
xv. 25.	247	viii.	113, 381	xxix. 4.	154
xvi. 20.	595	viii. 3.	353	xxix. 10.	499
xvii. 14.	195	viii. 5.	550	xxx. 1.	356
xviii. 5.	153	ix. 6.	178	xxx. 5.	340
xviii. 7.	492	ix. 7, 8.	549	xxx. 7.	516, 566, 571
xix. 25.	466	ix. 13.	264	xxx. 12.	168, 223
xx.	269	x. 5.	88	xxxi. 13.	451
xx. 11.	241	x. 9.	345	xxxi. 15.	451, 549
xx. 29.	613	x. 17.	232	xxxi. 22.	143
xxii. 21.	226, 486	xi. 2.	230	xxxi. 23.	177
xxii. 25.	553	xi. 4.	601	xxxii.	357, 365
xxvi. 7.	114	xi. 5-7.	230	xxxii. 1.	92, 365, 510, 613
xxvii. 8.	534	xii. 2.	221	xxxii. 1, 5.	613
xxviii. 7.	119	xii. 5.	299	xxxii. 2.	366
xxviii. 28.	176	xiii.	269	xxxii. 3-5.	368
xxx. 24.	241	xiv. 2.	194	xxxii. 3-5.	568
xxx. 26.	460	xiv. 3.	157	xxxii. 5.	551
xxxi. 1.	195	xiv. 4.	138	xxxii. 6-11.	369
xxxi. 23.	361	xiv. 5.	224	xxxii. 9.	196
xxxi. 24.	553	xiv. 15.	119	xxxiii. 5.	132
xxxi. 27.	626	xv.	627	xxxiii. 6.	382, 672
xxxi. 29.	633	xv. 2.	222	xxxiii. 11.	342
xxxiii. 17.	536	xv. 3.	174	xxxiii. 18.	496
xxxiii. 28.	687	xvi. 2.	297, 630	xxxiii. 19.	393
xxxiv. 2.	130	xvi. 4.	395	xxxiv.	573
xxxiv. 13-15.	570	xvi. 5.	230, 349	xxxiv. 1.	76
xxxiv. 19.	109	xvi. 5, 6.	608	xxxiv. 1, 2.	629
xxxiv. 22.	229	xvi. 8.	183, 291, 486, 608	xxxiv. 2.	93, 347
xxxiv. 29.	226, 516	xvi. 11.	482	xxxiv. 5.	230, 391
xxxiv. 31.	395	xvii.	113	xxxiv. 8.	132, 360, 476, 573
xxxiv. 31, 32.	446	xvii. 1.	221	xxxiv. 8, 9.	177
xxxv. 9, 10.	53	xviii. 1.	81, 173, 300, 357	xxxiv. 13, 14.	219, 220
xxxvi. 19.	241, 536	xviii. 2.	360	xxxiv. 15.	596
xxxviii.	543	xviii. 11.	699	xxxiv. 15, 16.	227
xxxviii. 6, 7.	673	xviii. 29.	286	xxxiv. 18.	229, 327
xxxviii. 7.	682	xviii. 30.	349	xxxiv. 19.	694
xxxviii. 10, 11.	495	xviii. 32.	165	xxxiv. 19, 20.	241
xxxviii. 28.	119	xix.	173, 362	xxxiv. 19, 21.	184
xl. 9, 12.	493	xix. 1.	156, 385, 696	xxxv. 15.	318
		xix. 4.	202, 500	xxxv. 16.	167
		xix. 5.	564	xxxv. 28.	223
		xix. 9.	361	xxxvi. 5.	342, 553
		xxi. 3.	231	xxxvi. 9.	153, 689
		xxii.	98	xxxvii. 3.	579
		xxii. 2.	515	xxxvii. 4.	547
		xxii. 2-4.	235	xxxvii. 5.	553
		xxii. 4.	358, 500	xxxvii. 30, 31.	196, 221
		xxii. 6.	337	xxxviii. 3.	544
		xxiii.	245, 385	xxxviii. 4.	190
		xxiii. 2.	201	xxxviii. 9.	596
		xxiii. 3.	200	xxxviii. 12-15.	195, 223
		xxiii. 4.	467, 500	xxxviii. 24.	368
		xxiv. 1, 3, 7.	605	xxxix.	385
		xxiv. 1, 6.	148	xxxix. 1.	385
PSALMS.
i.	130
i. 2.	196, 619
i. 4.	498
i. 6.	69, 229
ii.	170, 264
ii. 1.	491
ii. 4.	602
ii. 6.	142
ii. 7.	76, 360
ii. 10.	120
ii. 11.	110, 178, 532, 601
ii. 12.	260
iii. 1.	535

CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
xxxix. 2-4	388	lxix. 9	122, 390, 463	ciii. 4	160, 680
xxxix. 4	122	lxiii. 1	468	ciii. 13	158, 215, 601
xxxix. 5	190, 389	lxiii. 3	176, 231, 468	ciii. 14	395, 545
xxxix. 6	391, 649	lxiii. 7	207	ciii. 15	122
xxxix. 7	392	lxv. 1	399	ciii. 20	608
xxxix. 8-11	394	lxv. 2	595	ciii. 22	531
xxxix. 9	83, 191, 544	lxv. 7	226	civ. 15	465
xxxix. 11	122	lxvi. 1	69	civ. 24	355, 385, 663
xxxix. 12	395	lxvi. 18	228	civ. 28	368
xxxix. 13	396	lxviii. 1	347	civ. 29	570
xl. 1	235, 550	lxviii. 13	455	civ. 31-34	673
xl. 1-4	572, 573	lxix. 9	168	civ. 34	93
xl. 2, 3	160	lxxi. 9	132	cvii. 1	354, 604
xl. 3	496	lxxi. 20	264	cvii. 42	524
xl. 6, 7	263	lxxii. 3	171, 454	cvii. 43	523
xl. 7	189, 259	lxxii. 10	87	cx. 1	587
xl. 8	564, 609	lxxiii. 1	151	cx. 2	606
xl. 8, 9	221, 222	lxxiii. 26	703	cx. 3	119, 120, 684
xl. 12	190, 191, 538, 599	lxxiii. 26	86, 465	cx. 4	148
xl. 17	231	lxxiii. 27	261, 681	cx. 10	176
xli. 10	197	lxxiii. 28	298	cxii. 1	495, 693, 695
xlii. 1	372	lxxv. 6, 7	170	cxii. 1, 7	177
xlii. 2	570	lxxvi. 7	190, 362	cxii. 3-5, 8, 13	132
xlii. 2, 4	134	lxxvi. 10	490	cxii. 7, 8	495
xlii. 5	246, 393	lxxvii. 1	466	cxiii. 8	160
xlii. 7	83	lxxvii. 10	367, 400, 466	cxiii. 7, 8	76
xlii. 8	465	lxxviii. 1	121, 568	cxiii. 7	92
xlii. 10	318	lxxviii. 9	83	cxv.	626
xlv. 2	105, 147	lxxviii. 18	611	cxvi. 1	234, 300, 573
xlv. 6	148	lxxviii. 19	583	cxvi. 7	200
xlv. 7	477	lxxviii. 38, 39	545	cxvi. 11	143
xlv. 8	477	lxxviii. 57	183	cxvi. 16	622
xlv. 10, 11	111	lxxx. 3	567	cxviii. 23	141
xlv. 13	135, 206	lxxx. 8	97	cxix.	448, 470
xlv. 16	684	lxxxiv. 5	609	cxix. 1	693
xlvi. 1	73, 362, 466, 499	lxxxiv. 6	293	cxix. 4, 5	698
xlvi. 1	351	lxxxiv. 10	236	cxix. 4, 5	609
xlvi. 2	84, 143	lxxxiv. 11	463	cxix. 5, 11, 13, 15, 16, 24, 27	130
xlvi. 2, 5	245	lxxxiv. 12	71	cxix. 6	474, 608
xlvii. 7, 9	353	lxxxv. 10	189	cxix. 6	11, 13, 16, 24, 33, 67
xlix. 5, 15	496	lxxxvi. 8	475		105, 608
xlix. 11	268	lxxxvi. 11	177	cxix. 6	137
xlix. 12	389	lxxxix. 47	392, 651	cxix. 9	702
xlix. 20	532	xc. 2	663	cxix. 11	564
l.	138, 362	xc. 3	570	cxix. 14, 16, 113	470
l. 14, 23	138	xc. 5	268	cxix. 17	218, 225
l. 15	596	xc. 8	123	cxix. 19	396
l. 19	221	xc. 11	177, 545	cxix. 20	129, 470
l. 20	220	xc. 12	122, 389	cxix. 28	243
l. 21	552	xc. 14	468	cxix. 32	165, 290, 505
l. 22	229	xc. 1	327	cxix. 44	608
l. 23	138, 518, 526	xc. 5, 6	220	cxix. 47, 48, 113, 140	470
li.	483, 527	xcii. 12, 13	335	cxix. 52	386
li. 4	544, 552	xcii. 12-14	167	cxix. 59	236
li. 5	624	xcii. 14, 15	132	cxix. 96	527
li. 8	518, 613	xciii. 1	618	cxix. 97	470
li. 10, 12	635	xciv. 12	533	cxix. 97, 102, 103	132
li. 17	139, 213	xcvi.	549	cxix. 104	563
li. 18	600	xcvi. 7, 8	354	cxix. 105	104, 178
lii. 2	220	xcvi. 9	452	cxix. 113	129
lii. 3	345	xcvii.	549	cxix. 113, 128	195
lii. 6	532	xcvii. 2	399	cxix. 120	108, 177, 361
lv. 17	234	xcvii. 10	194, 224	cxix. 127	470
lv. 22	342, 596	xcvii. 11	94, 152	cxix. 128	379
lvi. 6	251	xcviii.	549	cxix. 130	707
lvii. 7	355	xcix.	494	cxix. 136	470, 609, 725
lvii. 8	246, 627	ci. 2	323	cxix. 137	530, 544
lviii. 1	485	cii.	213	cxix. 139	471
lxi. 2	230, 392	cii. 13	499, 549	cxix. 158	471
lxii. 5, 6	245	cii. 26	78	cxix. 163	471
lxii. 8	232, 233	ciii.	606	cxix. 176	201

CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
vi. 9, 10.....	402	xlv. 9.....	178	i. 10.....	402
vi. 11, 12.....	403	xlv. 12.....	583	ii. 19.....	565
vi. 13.....	270, 404	xlv. 16.....	247	ii. 20.....	287
vii. 2.....	498	xlv. 19.....	235	ii. 22.....	66, 624
vii. 9.....	497	xlv. 24.....	341	ii. 27.....	393
vii. 10-13.....	142	xlvi. 1.....	455	ii. 28.....	228
viii. 11.....	570	xlvi. 7.....	455	ii. 32.....	516
viii. 12.....	494	xlx. 4.....	579	ii. 36.....	200
viii. 12, 13.....	109, 243	xlx. 6.....	460	iii. 1.....	548, 614, 626
viii. 13.....	244, 569, 603	xlx. 15.....	158, 215	iii. 6.....	287
viii. 17.....	569	xlx. 16.....	230	iii. 12.....	190, 548
viii. 20.....	461	l. 2.....	517	iii. 14.....	203
ix. 6.....	141	l. 4.....	578	iii. 15.....	329
ix. 7.....	141	l. 6.....	199	iv. 3.....	502
ix. 21.....	516	l. 8.....	277, 512	iv. 14.....	111, 165, 642
x. 5, 16.....	542	l. 10.....	246, 498	v. 22.....	495
x. 5, 16, 24, 25.....	324	l. 11.....	277, 512	vi. 7.....	165
x. 17, 18.....	463	li. 11.....	318	vii. 4.....	500
xi. 6.....	687	li. 12.....	583	vii. 10.....	159
xiii. 21.....	105	li. 12, 13.....	517	viii. 6.....	236
xxii. 14.....	412	li. 16.....	583	ix. 1.....	472
xxvi. 1.....	81	lii. 1.....	458	ix. 1, 2, 3.....	473
xxvi. 3.....	497, 572	lii. 10, 14, 15.....	264	ix. 4, 5.....	221
xxvi. 11.....	262, 555	lii. 15.....	66	ix. 23, 24.....	453
xxvi. 12.....	341	liii. 1.....	98	x. 7.....	605, 624
xxvi. 13.....	288	liii. 1.....	95	x. 23, 24.....	541
xxvi. 19.....	281	liii. 1-8.....	584	x. 25.....	543
xxvii. 3.....	81, 144	liii. 4.....	188, 190, 192	xii. 1.....	269
xxvii. 9.....	323, 567	liii. 5.....	259, 585	xiii. 17.....	471
xxviii. 1.....	334	liii. 6.....	538, 575	xiv. 7-9.....	550
xxviii. 5, 6.....	450	liii. 7.....	112, 186, 191, 585	xiv. 12.....	228, 519
xxviii. 16.....	140, 348, 572	liii. 8.....	584	xv. 10.....	313
xxviii. 24-29.....	549	liii. 10.....	192	xv. 19.....	293
xxix.....	362	liii. 12.....	264, 575	xv. 20.....	319
xxix. 8.....	520	liv.....	544	xvii.....	629
xxix. 15.....	229	liv. 5.....	383	xvii. 7.....	583
xxix. 7.....	546	liv. 7.....	269	xvii. 8.....	534
xxix. 9, 12.....	546	liv. 7, 8.....	215	xvii. 9.....	583
xxx. 10.....	547	liv. 13.....	95	xvii. 13.....	261
xxx. 15-18.....	545	liv. 17.....	341	xx. 9.....	388, 402
xxx. 18.....	339, 548, 572	lv. 2.....	290	xxi. 5.....	494
xxx. 20.....	329	lv. 7.....	548, 614	xxii. 19.....	545
xxxi. 2, 3.....	547	lvii. 15.....	134, 136, 229, 602	xxiii. 32.....	224
xxxi. 5, 6.....	548	lvii. 16.....	545	xxvi. 3.....	498
xxxiii. 14.....	484	lvii. 19.....	385	xxix. 11.....	323
xxxv. 3.....	341	lvii. 20.....	226, 241, 441	xxx. 11.....	545
xxxv. 6.....	508	lvii. 21.....	74	xxx. 17, 18.....	339
xxxviii. 2.....	395	lviii.....	631	xxxi.....	614
xxxviii. 5.....	397	lviii. 8.....	460	xxxi. 9.....	414
xxxix. 8.....	256	lviii. 13, 14.....	629	xxxi. 18.....	215, 548, 551
xl. 11.....	331, 342	lix. 1.....	571	xxxi. 18-20.....	548
xl. 20.....	199	lix. 1, 2.....	515	xxxi. 20.....	158
xl. 25.....	626	lix. 9.....	516	xxxi. 33.....	562
xl. 28.....	630	lix. 11.....	351	xxxi. 33, 34.....	615
xl. 29.....	341	lix. 12.....	515	xxxi. 34.....	548
xli. 12, 13.....	384	lx. 1.....	265, 459	xxxii. 17, 27, 36.....	517
xli. 14.....	517	lx. 18, 19.....	460	xxxii. 40.....	177
xli. 15.....	384	lxi. 1.....	92, 112, 172	xlii. 2.....	547
xlii. 6.....	460	lxi. 3.....	557	xlvi. 4, 5.....	612
xlii. 24.....	447	lxii. 6.....	191, 199, 200	xlvi. 15.....	547
xliii. 2.....	341	lxii. 7.....	234	l. 38.....	292
xliii. 7.....	627	lxii. 9.....	215	li. 19, 20.....	384
xliii. 10.....	189	lxiii. 9.....	213, 299
xliii. 13.....	384, 618	lxiv.....	603
xliii. 25.....	158, 350	lxiv. 1.....	403
xliv. 2.....	613	lxiv. 5.....	343
xliv. 8.....	623	lxv. 25.....	80
xliv. 20.....	111, 198, 223	lxvi. 1, 2.....	136
xliv. 24.....	384	lxvi. 9.....	119
xliv. 8.....	585	lxvi. 24.....	325

JEREMIAH.

LAMENTATIONS.

i-v.....	499
i. 14.....	447
iii.....	448
iii. 22.....	544
iii. 32, 33.....	548

CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
xvi. 22.....	366	i. 30.....	640	x. 18.....	500
xvi. 33.....	184, 240	ii. 4.....	215, 261	xi. 6.....	358
xvii.....	304, 348	ii. 5.....	101, 230	xi. 26.....	216
xvii. 1.....	191	ii. 7.....	87, 175	xi. 29.....	455
xvii. 2, 10.....	259	ii. 15.....	563	xi. 33.....	113, 147
xvii. 3.....	192, 259, 693	ii. 29.....	181	xi. 36.....	168, 312, 695
xvii. 4, 6, 8, 24.....	192	iii. 13.....	621, 640	xii. 1.....	139, 161, 192, 624
xvii. 11, 21.....	214	iv. 6.....	366	xii. 2.....	171, 225, 240, 288
xvii. 16.....	80	iv. 20.....	155	xii. 3.....	404
xvii. 17.....	68, 154, 603	v. 1.....	73	xii. 3-12.....	404
xvii. 21.....	158	v. 1, 3.....	260	xii. 4.....	212
xvii. 22, 24.....	96	v. 5.....	249, 479	xii. 4-8.....	406
xvii. 24.....	282	v. 7, 8.....	484	xii. 8.....	174
xviii. 37.....	585	v. 8.....	189	xii. 9.....	116, 407
xix. 31.....	170	vi.....	76	xii. 10.....	335
xix. 36.....	184	vi. 3.....	284	xii. 10, 11.....	408
xx. 17.....	600	vi. 4.....	197, 277	xii. 12.....	409
xx. 21.....	576	vi. 6.....	296	xii. 19.....	217
xxi.....	64	vi. 10.....	76	xii. 21.....	634
xxi. 15.....	91	vi. 11.....	286	xiii. 1.....	170
xxi. 16.....	333	vi. 17.....	145	xiii. 4.....	633
xxi. 22.....	558	vi. 20.....	172, 196	xiii. 5-8.....	484
		vi. 21.....	111	xiii. 8.....	116
		vi. 3.....	620	xiii. 9, 10.....	561
		vi. 4.....	564	xiii. 10.....	304, 562
		vi. 7.....	641	xiii. 11-14.....	519
		vi. 10.....	116	xiii. 11, 14.....	458
		vi. 12, 14.....	482	xiii. 14.....	163, 284
		vi. 14.....	641	xiv. 17.....	152, 605
		vi. 15.....	69	xv. 1.....	212
		vi. 21.....	226	xv. 5.....	351
		vi. 23.....	563, 609	xvi. 20.....	617
		vi. 24.....	654
		vii. 3.....	226, 573
		vii. 4.....	404, 519
		vii. 7.....	476, 481
		vii. 10.....	471, 482, 624
		vii. 12, 14.....	481, 563
		vii. 14.....	284
		vii. 15.....	71, 101
		vii. 21.....	600
		vii. 23.....	164, 290
		vii. 24.....	121
		viii. 1.....	177, 600
		viii. 5.....	183
		viii. 6.....	74, 536, 602
		viii. 7.....	243, 322, 409
		viii. 7, 17.....	78, 190
		viii. 9.....	599
		viii. 9, 14, 15.....	597
		viii. 13.....	68
		viii. 14.....	342, 510, 687
		viii. 15.....	68
		viii. 16, 23.....	69, 70, 117, 175, 213
		viii. 17.....	283, 316, 683
		viii. 18.....	588
		viii. 22.....	471
		viii. 26.....	587
		viii. 26, 27.....	509
		viii. 28.....	127
		viii. 28, 30.....	512
		viii. 29.....	347
		viii. 30.....	298, 315
		viii. 32.....	263
		viii. 33.....	143
		viii. 33, 34.....	513
		viii. 34.....	513
		viii. 35.....	513
		viii. 35, 38.....	513
		viii. 37.....	513
		viii. 37, 38.....	513
		viii. 37-39.....	513
		viii. 37, 39.....	513
		viii. 39.....	513
		ix.....	588
		ix. 5.....	213
		ix. 19, 20.....	70
		ix. 20.....	147
		ix. 25.....	157

ACTS.
i. 11.....	589
ii.....	88
ii. 1, 44, 47.....	212
ii. 8.....	479
ii. 9.....	65
ii. 24.....	264, 586
ii. 26.....	627
ii. 38, 41.....	92
ii. 47.....	68, 70
v. 37.....	555
v. 41.....	321
vii. 60.....	243
ix. 4.....	213
ix. 6.....	401
ix. 31.....	72
x. 33.....	211
xii. 23.....	452
xiii. 33.....	76
xiii. 48.....	68, 70
xiv. 17.....	268, 484
xiv. 22.....	184
xv. 8, 9.....	118
xv. 9.....	104, 144
xv. 18.....	69
xvi. 25.....	236, 317
xvi. 30.....	236
xvii. 7.....	169
xvii. 25.....	562
xvii. 26.....	485
xvii. 28.....	536, 600, 681
xvii. 31.....	589, 590
xvii. 32.....	109
xvii. 32, 34.....	697
xx.....	112
xx. 24.....	580
xx. 28.....	66, 259, 260, 332
xxiii. 6.....	249
xxiv. 16.....	166, 183, 253
xxv. 23.....	123, 519
xxvi. 27.....	82

ROMANS.
i. 5.....	145
i. 8.....	67
i. 20.....	698
i. 21.....	111
i. 22.....	442

I. CORINTHIANS.
i. 5.....	73
i. 13.....	73, 116
i. 18.....	125
i. 18, 30.....	152
i. 24, 30.....	443
i. 25.....	530
i. 26.....	136, 203
i. 26, 28.....	68
i. 27.....	181
i. 30.....	115, 535
ii.....	442
ii. 1.....	591
ii. 2.....	112, 125, 192, 477, 539
ii. 9.....	227
ii. 11.....	95
ii. 12.....	70
ii. 14.....	133
iii. 6.....	63, 500
iii. 12.....	161
iii. 18.....	442
iv. 1.....	577
iv. 3.....	127, 136, 168
iv. 7.....	309, 406
iv. 13.....	158
iv. 15.....	75
iv. 21.....	161
vi. 11.....	158
vi. 19.....	135, 232, 706
vi. 20.....	154
vii. 15.....	184
vii. 29-31.....	202
vii. 30.....	150, 636
vii. 31.....	303, 345
ix.....	204
ix. 20.....	579
ix. 22.....	578, 581
ix. 25.....	103

CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
ix. 27.....	99	vii. 1.....	117, 226, 444, 503	iv. 15.....	639
x. 13.....	256, 348	vii. 9.....	706	iv. 16.....	117, 135, 137
x. 22.....	625	vii. 11.....	445	iv. 17.....	111
x. 31.....	291	viii. 9.....	434	iv. 18.....	563
xi. 1.....	187, 238	viii. 23.....	463	iv. 18, 19.....	152
xi. 20.....	108	x. 4.....	504	iv. 22.....	126
xi. 28.....	704	x. 5.....	67, 146, 506	iv. 24.....	631
xi. 29.....	580	xi. 14.....	126	iv. 26.....	361
xi. 30.....	278	xi. 29.....	212	iv. 29.....	223, 635
xi. 31.....	276	xii. 4.....	638	iv. 30.....	71, 538
xi. 32.....	84, 544	xii. 7.....	351	iv. 31.....	162
xii.....	591	xii. 10.....	312, 360	iv. 32.....	134
xii. 3.....	591	xii. 21.....	471	v. 1, 2.....	239
xii. 9.....	224			v. 3-12.....	634
xii. 14-17.....	212	GALATIANS.		v. 8.....	120, 154, 462, 687, 693
xii. 15, 21.....	310	ii.....	64	v. 11.....	106, 111, 154, 224
xii. 23.....	208	ii. 9, 10.....	64	v. 13.....	461
xii. 26.....	212	ii. 20.....	197, 284	v. 14.....	456
xiii.....	90	iii. 1.....	89, 118, 330	v. 17.....	172
xiii. 1-3.....	214	iii. 3.....	386	v. 18.....	102
xiii. 4.....	132	iii. 13.....	190, 521, 680	v. 22.....	202
xiii. 5.....	156	iv. 6.....	118, 340, 600	v. 25, 26.....	197
xiii. 9.....	211	iv. 19.....	75	v. 26.....	591
xiii. 9-12.....	126	iv. 28.....	148	v. 30.....	96
xiii. 12.....	689, 693	iv. 29.....	319	v. 32.....	213
xiv. 20.....	125, 126	v. 1.....	112	vi. 2.....	631
xv. 19.....	656	v. 6.....	214	vi. 8.....	181, 182
xv. 20.....	180	v. 13.....	116	vi. 9.....	180
xv. 24-28.....	606	v. 17.....	522	vi. 16.....	346
xv. 45.....	190	v. 22.....	634	vi. 18.....	596
xv. 54.....	79	vi. 1.....	212, 307
xv. 56.....	180, 613	vi. 2.....	730	PHILIPPIANS.
xv. 58.....	235	vi. 7.....	221, 244	i. 6.....	349
		vi. 10.....	175	i. 20.....	156, 607
II. CORINTHIANS.		vi. 14.....	96, 196, 243	i. 23.....	90, 260
i. 4-6.....	421			i. 27.....	168
i. 5.....	243	EPHESIANS.		i. 29.....	95, 321
i. 9.....	377	i. 3.....	76, 218, 603	ii. 3.....	211
i. 16.....	149	i. 4.....	591	ii. 7, 8.....	281
i. 20.....	582	i. 6, 7.....	133	ii. 12.....	503
i. 24.....	210	i. 6, 12.....	155	ii. 12, 13.....	108
ii. 16.....	331	i. 10.....	117, 304	ii. 13.....	344
iii.....	149, 460	i. 11.....	669, 677	ii. 20.....	329, 333
iii. 2.....	305	i. 12.....	627	ii. 21.....	354
iii. 18.....	131, 254, 277, 522	i. 14.....	80, 197	iii. 7, 8.....	89, 480
iv. 1.....	159	i. 18.....	77	iii. 8.....	147, 471, 482
iv. 3.....	461	i. 19.....	142	iii. 10.....	112, 197, 534, 587
iv. 4.....	153, 460	i. 20, 21.....	587	iii. 11, 12.....	504
iv. 5.....	156	ii.....	88, 261	iii. 12, 15.....	227
iv. 6.....	131, 152, 154, 684	ii. 1.....	158	iii. 13.....	506, 736
iv. 10.....	186	ii. 2.....	106	iii. 14.....	226
iv. 16.....	120	ii. 2, 3.....	682	iii. 15.....	211
iv. 17.....	352	ii. 8.....	96	iii. 18.....	482
iv. 17, 18.....	498	ii. 12.....	152	iii. 19.....	163, 534, 611
iv. 18.....	89, 427	ii. 14.....	141	iii. 21.....	593
v. 1.....	79	ii. 14, 16, 18.....	518	iv. 5.....	612
v. 5.....	574	ii. 16.....	66, 261	iv. 6.....	342, 348, 596
v. 9.....	175, 574	ii. 17.....	267	iv. 6, 7.....	342
v. 10, 11.....	110	ii. 18.....	599	iv. 7.....	133
v. 11.....	177, 574	ii. 20, 21.....	135
v. 11, 18.....	574	ii. 21.....	136	COLOSSIANS.
v. 12.....	680	iii. 3.....	193	i. 10.....	705
v. 14.....	333, 574	iii. 8.....	149	i. 12.....	153, 593
v. 14, 15.....	161	iii. 10.....	309, 576	i. 13.....	152, 154
v. 17.....	75, 287	iii. 17.....	157, 161	i. 17.....	383
v. 19.....	584	iii. 19.....	478	i. 18.....	587, 593
v. 20.....	64, 484, 574	iv. 2.....	116	i. 19.....	351
v. 21.....	191, 575	iv. 11.....	99	i. 27.....	76, 250
vi. 8.....	101	iv. 11, 12.....	576	ii. 3.....	538, 680
vi. 14.....	224, 279	iv. 13.....	77	ii. 3-9.....	707
vi. 17.....	687	iv. 14.....	125	ii. 6.....	254

CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.	CH. VER.	PAGE.
ii. 7.	161
ii. 9.	234
ii. 18.	626
iii. 1.	282, 588
iii. 1, 2.	96
iii. 3.	242, 296, 317, 469, 589
iii. 3, 4.	96, 589
iii. 4.	470
iii. 5.	196, 287
iii. 14.	116, 306
iii. 24.	183
iv. 6.	400
I. THESSALONIANS.
rv. 1.	172
iv. 6.	637
iv. 7.	106, 184, 205, 521, 622, 636
iv. 17.	303
v. 5.	521, 687, 693
v. 7.	520
v. 17.	300, 649
v. 23.	226
II. THESSALONIANS.
i. 7.	590
i. 8.	443
i. 9.	230
i. 10.	81, 317
ii. 12.	227, 609
I. TIMOTHY.
i. 2.	471
i. 17.	699
ii. 19.	209
iii. 2.	444
iii. 4.	323
iii. 9.	129, 581
iii. 9, 16.	161
iii. 10.	581
iii. 16.	89, 99, 114
iv. 2.	253
iv. 8.	227, 610
iv. 12.	329, 334
iv. 13.	97
v. 8.	636
vi. 6.	612
vi. 8, 9.	611
vi. 9.	247, 340, 612
vi. 9, 10.	198
vi. 16.	618, 699
vi. 17.	87
II. TIMOTHY.
i. 10.	95
i. 12.	328
ii. 3.	257
ii. 4.	346
ii. 12.	186, 341
iii. 2.	152, 308, 561
iii. 12.	184, 241, 256
iv. 2.	307
iv. 8.	590
TITUS.
i. 15.	253
ii. 11, 12.	159
ii. 14.	112, 193
iii. 1.	170
iii. 3.	162
iii. 5.	75
HEBREWS.
i. 1.	536
i. 2, 14.	281
i. 3.	76, 105, 118, 142, 585
i. 10.	78
ii. 9.	383, 682
ii. 10.	185, 421, 683
ii. 10, 11.	537
ii. 11.	213, 258
ii. 11, 16.	191
ii. 16.	100, 281
iii. 2.	113
iii. 5.	621
iv. 2.	127
iv. 12.	123
iv. 15.	257, 421
iv. 15, 16.	213
v. 2-8.	421
v. 12.	125
v. 14.	456, 584
vi. 4.	133
vi. 10.	214
vi. 19.	250
vii. 12.	138
vii. 25.	144, 188, 588
viii. 26.	261, 461, 477
viii. 10.	562
ix.	275
ix. 12.	149, 192
ix. 12-14.	66
ix. 13, 14.	581
ix. 14.	67, 254, 259, 263
ix. 22.	66
x. 5.	189
x. 7.	575
x. 9.	188
x. 12, 14.	114
x. 20.	594
x. 21, 22.	149
x. 22.	117
x. 24.	238
x. 31.	177
x. 34.	249, 409
xi. 1.	89
xi. 3.	113, 582, 670
xi. 6.	396, 515, 582, 676
xi. 7.	270
xi. 7, 8, 19.	271
xi. 13.	397
xi. 19.	583
xi. 21.	109
xi. 26.	294, 317, 320
xi. 27.	89, 476
xi. 35.	286
xi. 36.	313, 388
xii. 1, 2.	256, 507
xii. 2.	96, 187, 225, 281, 293
xii. 3.	349, 580
xii. 2, 3.	257, 319
xii. 5.	83
xii. 6.	323
xii. 9.	600, 601, 631
xii. 11.	83, 317, 544
xii. 28.	219, 290, 379
xii. 28, 29.	177
xii. 29.	484
xiii. 4.	634
xiii. 8.	97
xiii. 15, 16.	138, 140
xiii. 16.	139
JAMES.
i. 1.	64
i. 2.	82, 441
i. 3.	86
i. 5.	204, 524, 595
i. 6.	346
i. 8.	103
i. 13.	441
i. 14.	615
i. 14, 15.	642
i. 17.	153
i. 18.	75, 113, 122, 684, 685
i. 20.	492
i. 21.	121, 124, 128, 312
i. 26, 27.	441
i. 27.	427
ii.	622
ii. 10.	563
ii. 14.	214
iii. 2.	186, 306, 388, 400, 701
iii. 5.	211, 219
iii. 6.	126, 219, 491
iii. 15.	441, 442
iii. 17.	362, 441
iii. 18.	226
iv. 1.	165
iv. 8.	642
iv. 14.	122
v. 16.	228
v. 17.	238, 373
I. PETER.
i. 1.	63
i. 2.	66, 181
i. 3.	277, 355, 587
i. 3, 4.	74
i. 5.	79, 328
i. 6.	82
i. 7.	85
i. 8, 9.	87
i. 10-12.	94
i. 13.	100
i. 13, 22.	161, 393
i. 14-16.	104
i. 15.	605
i. 17.	107
i. 18, 19.	110
i. 20.	113
i. 21.	115
i. 22.	115
i. 23.	118, 500, 685
i. 24.	121
i. 25.	123, 132
ii. 1.	295
ii. 1, 2.	124
ii. 3.	131
ii. 4, 5.	134
ii. 6.	140, 431, 573
ii. 7, 8.	145
ii. 8.	350
ii. 9.	147, 181, 453, 458, 627
ii. 10.	157
ii. 11.	160, 522
ii. 12.	164
ii. 13, 14.	169
ii. 15, 16.	171
ii. 17.	173
ii. 18-20.	178
ii. 20.	144
ii. 21-23.	183

INDEX OF SUBJECTS.

	PAGE.		PAGE
ABEN Ezra.....	366	Apologies of Christians.....	248
Abhorrence of Evil.....	407	Apostles, Eye-Witnesses of Christ.....	329
Ability for Preaching.....	312	Apostles without Successors.....	575
Ability of Christ's Preaching.....	266	Appearance of Christ.....	87
Ability of God.....	328	Appearance of the Chief Shepherd.....	334
Abimelech.....	486	Appendix.....	739
Abraham.....	68, 98	Appetite of Children.....	106
Abstinence from Lusts.....	165	Application of Redemption.....	114
Abuse of Scripture.....	422	Apprehension of Evil.....	533
Acceptance of Prayer.....	232	"Arcana imperii".....	620
Access to God in Prayer.....	229	"Arcanum imperii".....	439
Acknowledgment of God.....	532	Archimedes, death of.....	122
Action according to Divine Providence.....	524	Arising from Sleep.....	456
Activity of Christ's Preaching.....	260	Aristotle.....	293
Activity of Obedience to God.....	508	Ark of God.....	452
Admission to the Lord's Supper.....	644	Ark, the.....	270
Adoption.....	74, 682	" appointed by God.....	270
Adrian.....	464	Arming of a Christian.....	284
Adultery.....	489	Ascension of Christ.....	280, 587
Adversary, the.....	345	Assertory Act of Scotland.....	26
Affection for God.....	407	Assistance of the Holy Spirit.....	233
Affections, the.....	290	Athanasius.....	378
AFFLICTION.....	446	Atheism.....	427
" Cause of.....	565	" interpretative.....	624
" Design of God in.....	564	" practical.....	624
" Efficacy of.....	568	Athenagoras.....	362
" End of.....	564, 567	Athens, the Miser of.....	320
" Exercise in.....	569	Attainment of an enlarged Heart.....	509
" not fruitful.....	510	Attainment of Purity of Life.....	703
" of God's People.....	548	Attributes of God.....	698
" Way of.....	566	ΑΥΡΑΟΚΕΙΑ.....	642
Afflictions.....	86, 347, 446	Augustin.....	19, 94, 268, 411, 522
Agreement of Evangelists and Prophets.....	411	Authority, church.....	486
Aikman's Life of Leighton.....	739	" civil.....	485
Akal Kartza.....	167	" of Christ.....	280
Alacrity of Obedience to God.....	508	Averting of the Divine Anger.....	544
Alexander.....	507	Avoiding of too much Sleep.....	700
Alms.....	427	Avoiding of unholy Persons.....	440
Ambassadors of Christ.....	574	Awaking sounded.....	519
Ambition in Preaching.....	333	Awe of God.....	361
Ambrose.....	416	B.
Amen.....	619	Babbling in Prayer.....	428
" Amor sceleratus habendi".....	638	Babes, newborn.....	126
Anecdotes of Leighton.....	10, 39, 40, 46	Babylon, mystical.....	324
Angels.....	385	Bad Ground for the Word.....	501
Angels looking into the Mystery of Godliness.....	99	Balaam.....	460
Anger.....	424, 633	" Prophecy of.....	414
Anger of God.....	543	Baptism.....	644
" averting of.....	544	" and Preaching.....	417
Anger of the Lord.....	237	" Efficacy of.....	273
" Animalia gloriæ".....	437, 883	" End of.....	272
Answer of a good Conscience.....	275	" of Christ.....	420
Answers to Prayer.....	234	" of Fire.....	687
Antediluvians.....	303	" of the Holy Ghost and Fire.....	420
Anthony, the Hermit.....	365	" renouncing of.....	278
Ανεκαρδοκία.....	573	" resemblance of.....	277

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Baptismal Vows.....	732	Calamities interpreted.....	554
Barah Elohim.....	381	Calamity and Sin.....	518
Baseness of Men.....	436	Call of Christ.....	440
Baxter.....	723	Call of God.....	414, 417
Bearing Fruit for Christ.....	556	Calling by God.....	351
Beatific Vision of God.....	659	Calling effectual.....	66
Bedell, Life of.....	46	Calling of Believers.....	151
Beginning of spiritual Life.....	130	Calmness of Mind.....	185
Beginnings of Grace.....	125	Calumny.....	639
Being of God.....	660	Candidates, Exhortations to.....	708
Belief in Divine Providence.....	342	Candle of the Ungodly.....	464
Belief of the Promises.....	133	“Canina Fames?”.....	638
BELIEVER, a Hero	495	Cares.....	340
“ blessed.....	498	Carnal Friends.....	415
“ Faith of the.....	245	Carnal Mind.....	482
“ Fear of the.....	245	Carnal Security.....	513
“ Fears the Lord.....	498	Catechism, a short.....	643
“ Life of the.....	536	Cause of Affliction.....	565
BELIEVERS	145, 147, 150	Cause of Christ’s Sufferings.....	259
“ Anointing of.....	149	Celibacy.....	202
“ Blemishes of.....	166	Centurion, the.....	432
“ Blots of.....	167	“ Faith of.....	432
“ Calling of.....	151	“ Prayers of.....	432
“ Consecration of.....	149	Cessation from Sin.....	284
“ Garments of.....	150	Chains of Sin.....	285
“ Life of.....	150	Chambering.....	520
“ Offerings of.....	150	Chambers of Death.....	293
“ Sacrifice of.....	149	Change from Death to Life.....	194
“ Services of.....	150	“ “ Solidity of the.....	194
“ Spots of.....	167	“ “ Universality of the.....	194
“ Union of with Christ.....	191	Character of a Christian.....	218
“ Washing of.....	149	Character of Ministers.....	577
Believing Heart.....	232	Character of the Daughters of Sarah.....	207
Bernard.....	252, 376	Character of the Scriptures.....	696
Bethlehem Ephrathah.....	414	Character of the Ungodly.....	545
Bethlehem Judah.....	414	Character of those who love Christ.....	479
Bethlehem, Star of.....	413	Characters of Christ’s Temptation.....	422
Bible, Harmony of.....	411	Characters of Love—
Birth of Christ.....	412, 415, 584	“ Goodness in the Object.....	476
Blameless Way of a Christian.....	240	“ Knowledge of that Goodness....	476
Blemishes of Believers.....	166	“ Suitableness of the Object to the Blessedness of the Saints.....	70	“ Lover.....	476
Blessing of a Christian.....	218	Characters of the Royalty of Christ.....	417
Blessings of Prayer.....	232	Charges to the Clergy.....	726-728, 730, 732
Blots of Believers.....	167	Charity.....	441
Body, Resurrection of the.....	593	“ Works of.....	138
Βουλιμα	638	CHARLES II.—
Bounty of God.....	700	“ Accession of.....	12
Bread daily, Prayer for.....	610	“ Attempt by, to force Prelacy
Brevity of Life.....	389	“ upon Scotland.....	13
Brevity of Prayer.....	597	“ Letter of, to Leighton.....	45
Bride of Speech.....	222	Chastisement.....	447
Broken Heart.....	229	Chastity.....	103, 634
Brotherhood, Love of the.....	175	“ Rules for.....	635
Brotherly Love.....	115, 408	Cheerful Purpose.....	532
“ Qualifications of.....	116	Cheerfulness in the Way of God.....	508
Brutishness of Men.....	436	CHILDREN—
Burden of Sin.....	198	“ Appetite of.....	126
Burial of Jesus.....	585	“ Innocency of.....	126
Burnet, Archbishop.....	28	“ of Disobedience.....	146
Burnet, Gilbert.....	28, 46	“ of Folly.....	537
“ Character of Leighton, by.....	46, 47	“ of God, Privileges of.....	342
“ Garlands of, for Leighton.....	46, 47	“ of Wisdom.....	537
“ History of his own Times, by.....	47	Choice of Society.....	222
“ Life of Bedell, by.....	46	Chosen Generation.....	148, 453
“ Pastoral Care, by.....	47	CHRIST—
Business, Diligence in.....	408	“ Agreement of, with John the Baptist	417
Business of Christ on Earth.....	426	“ Ambassadors of.....	574
		“ Appearance of.....	87
		“ Ark, the.....	272
		“ Ascension of.....	280

	PAGE.		PAGE.
CHRIST, Authority of.....	280	CHRIST, Presence of.....	456, 457
“ Baptism of.....	420	“ Preservation of.....	414
“ Bearing of Sin by.....	190	“ Prince of Peace.....	288, 415
“ Beauty of.....	460	“ Purity of.....	443
“ Birth of.....	412	“ quickened by the Spirit.....	264
“ Bishop.....	201	“ Redemption, our.....	540
“ Business of, on Earth.....	426	“ Redemption by.....	113, 692
“ Call of.....	440	“ Rejection of.....	146
“ Calling of Matthew by.....	438	“ Reproach of.....	463
“ Chief Shepherd.....	329	“ Resurrection of.....	76, 276, 280
“ Church of.....	328	“ Revelation of.....	101
“ Coming of.....	456	“ Righteousness of.....	458, 511, 538, 540
“ Conformity to.....	283	“ Royalty of.....	417
“ Corner-Stone, the.....	140	“ Sanctification, our.....	511, 538, 540
“ Cure of Diseases by.....	424	“ Savior.....	413, 680
“ Death of.....	263	“ Shepherd.....	201
“ Desire of Nations.....	412	“ sitting of, at the right Hand of God	280
“ Disciples of.....	643	“ Spotlessness of.....	186
“ Disciples of, called.....	424	“ Stripes of.....	198
“ Diseases cured by.....	424	“ Sufferings of.....	96, 185, 188, 256
“ Doctrine of.....	424, 535	“ “ End of the.....	193
“ Earthly Condition of.....	434	“ Sun of Righteousness..	88, 413, 457, 461
“ Example of.....	185, 257	“ Temptation of.....	422
“ Excellency of.....	460, 476	“ “ Comfort from.....	422
“ Fasting of.....	421	“ “ Instruction from.....	422
“ Following of.....	434, 439, 643	“ Truth, the.....	464
“ Foundation-Stone.....	140	“ Types of.....	477
“ Genealogy of.....	411	“ Union of, with Believers.....	191
“ Glorifying of.....	243	“ Watchman of Israel.....	435
“ Glory of.....	96, 282	“ Way, the.....	464
“ “ revealed.....	316	“ Wisdom, our.....	539
“ Glory of the Lord.....	460	“ Witness to.....	413
“ Goodness of.....	436, 476	“ Wonderful, the.....	413
“ Greatness of.....	257	“ Worship of.....	413, 416
“ Guilelessness of.....	186	“ Works of.....	431
“ Harbinger of.....	417	CHRISTIAN—
“ High Priest.....	282	“ Blamelessness.....	240
“ Holiness of.....	477	“ Building.....	143
“ Homage to.....	416	“ Character of a.....	218
“ Hope of Nations.....	412	“ Comfort of a.....	420
“ Judge of the Quick and the Dead..	294	“ Constancy.....	103
“ Knowledge of.....	113, 461	“ Course.....	292
“ Lamb of God.....	102, 412	“ Excellency of.....	143
“ Life, our.....	464, 469	“ Expectation.....	100
“ Life with.....	317	“ Firmness of.....	143
“ Light of Believers.....	152	“ Happiness.....	240, 241
“ Light of the Church.....	454	“ Hope.....	75, 92
“ Loveliness of.....	476	“ Infancy.....	125
“ Love of.....	478	“ Inheritance.....	218
“ “ inseparable.....	514	“ Knowledge.....	113
“ Love to.....	243, 476	“ Life.....	115, 286
“ Lustre of the Church.....	454	“ Love.....	304, 476
“ Made to be Sin.....	575	“ “ Effects of.....	306
“ Matchless Teacher, the.....	450	“ “ to Christ.....	476
“ Mediator, the.....	66	“ Obedience.....	404
“ Meekness of.....	478	“ Patience.....	184
“ Messiah, the.....	478	“ Rejoicing.....	316
“ Mind of.....	285	“ Religion.....	690
“ Miracles of.....	424, 431	“ “ Excellency of.....	692
“ Mission of.....	440	“ “ Principles of.....	650
“ Name of.....	413, 478	“ “ the Way to Happiness	690
“ Nativity of.....	411	“ “ Truth of.....	692
“ Patience of, in Suffering.....	186	“ Shining of the.....	456
“ Persecution of.....	414	“ “ constantly.....	458
“ Person of.....	535	“ “ humbly.....	458
“ Physician, the.....	440	“ “ jointly.....	456
“ Power of.....	434	“ “ personally.....	456
“ Preaching of.....	266, 423	“ “ progressively.....	458
“ “ Ability in.....	266	“ “ publicly.....	456
“ “ Activity in.....	266	“ Spirit.....	71
“ precious.....	147	“ spiritually-minded, the.....	520

	PAGE.		PAGE.
CHRISTIAN	Suffering.....	184, 240,	319
"	the best Subject.....	484
"	Triumph.....	509,	512
CHRISTIANS,	Adoption of.....	74
"	Affections of.....	290
"	Arming of.....	284
"	Brotherly Love of.....	115
"	Calling of.....	151, 154
"	Requirements of.....	184
"	Chosen of God.....	148
"	Comfort of.....	100, 420
"	Composure of.....	315
"	Conscience of.....	251
"	Consecration of.....	149
"	contrasted with Unbelievers... 148
"	Conversation of.....	167, 251
"	Courtesy of.....	216
"	Defence of.....	248
"	Delight of.....	89
"	Desire of.....	89, 129
"	Dignities of.....	134, 182
"	Dignity of.....	536
"	Establishment of.....	348
"	Estate of.....	148
"	Expectation of.....	101
"	Experience of.....	165
"	Graces of.....	405
"	Growth of.....	130
"	Happiness of.....	241
"	Heaviness of.....	83
"	Shortness of the... 84
"	Hope of.....	75, 248
"	Inequality of.....	253
"	Infancy of.....	125
"	Inheritance of.....	74, 76
"	Joy of.....	82, 91
"	Life of.....	150
"	Love of.....	89, 214, 476
"	Obedience of.....	404
"	Patience of.....	184
"	Peace of.....	356
"	Perfection of.....	348
"	Pilgrims.....	163
"	Piety of.....	214
"	Priesthood of.....	134, 148, 149
"	Readiness of.....	250
"	Rejoicing of.....	316
"	Relation of, to God.....	109
"	Relation of, to the World.....	109
"	Service of.....	150
"	Settlement of.....	348
"	Sojourners.....	110
"	State of.....	68
"	Cause of it.....	68
"	Source of it.....	68
"	Strangers.....	110, 163
"	Strengthening of.....	348
"	Sufferings of.....	184
"	Sympathy of.....	212
"	Taste of.....	133
"	Temple, a.....	134
"	Temptations of.....	82
"	Treasure of.....	79
"	Unanimity of.....	210
Chrysostom.....		329, 527
CHURCH OF CHRIST.....		328, 591
"	Anglican, State of.....	12
"	Authority of the.....	485
"	Light of the.....	455
"	Lustre of the.....	242, 455
"	Ministers of the.....	311
CHURCH OF CHRIST, Officers in the.....		407
"	Shining of the.....	457
"	Stability of the.....	492
Civil Authority.....		485
Civil Governments, Honor to.....		178
"	Obligations of.....	170
Civil Power, Submission to.....		169
Cleansing of Ourselves.....		503
Cleaving to God.....		407
Clergy, Charges to the.....		726
"	Sermon to the.....	574
Comfort for Sinners.....		440
Comfort from Christ's Temptations.....		422
Comfort of Christians.....		100, 420
Coming of Christ.....		456
COMMANDMENTS OF GOD.....		506, 530, 560
"	Breadth of.....	530
"	Division of.....	622
"	Exposition of.....	619
"	Length of.....	530
"	Perfection of.....	531
"	Style of.....	622
Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter.. 63, 67
Committing of the Soul to God.....		316
Communing with God.....		448
COMMUNION—
"	Exhortation before the.....	704
"	of Saints.....	591
"	Preparation for.....	704
"	with Christ.....	92
"	with the Heart.....	362
Company of the Saints.....		256
Composure of Christians.....		315
Concordia Discordia.....		485
Concupiscence, Evil.....		640
Condemnation, Release from.....		509
Condition of Christ on Earth.....		434
"	of Men, sad.....	515
"	" Cause of.....	516
Confession of Guiltiness.....		613
"	of Sin.....	369
Confidence, humble.....		340
"	Manner of.....	469
"	Object of.....	467
"	of David.....	465
"	of Faith.....	531
"	Time of.....	469
Conformity to Christ.....		283, 294
CONSCIENCE—
"	defined.....	252
"	good, a.....	74, 252, 275
"	Ingredients of.....	252
"	of Christians.....	251
"	pure.....	581
"	toward God.....	181
Conscientious Obedience.....		486
Consideration of Christ's Sufferings.....		256
Constancy.....		103
"	of Obedience to God.....	508
Constrainedness in Preaching.....		333
Constraint.....		486
Contemplation of God.....		526
"	of Providence.....	524
Contempt of Mercy punished.....		545
Contingency of Events.....		593
Continuance in Prayer.....		410
Conversation, a vain.....		110
"	a holy.....	209
"	of Christians.....	251
Converse with unholly Persons.....		439
Conversion.....		75, 120, 403, 448, 486

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Conviction.....	486	Deceitfulness of the Heart.....	547
Co-Presbyter, Peter a.....	329	Deception, Self.....	431
Cord of Necessity.....	485	Decorum.....	521
Corner-Stone, Christ the.....	140	Decrees of God.....	668
Correction by God.....	543	Defence of Christians.....	248
Corruption natural.....	481	“ of moderate Episcopacy.....	723
Countenance, God’s, Light of.....	526	Deformity of Sin.....	396
Counterfeit of Grace.....	336	Delay of Religion.....	435
Courage of Saints.....	492	Delight in Christ.....	89
Course of a Christian.....	292	Delight in God.....	496
“ of the World.....	292	Delight of Prayer.....	232
Courtesy.....	216	Delight of Saints.....	525
Covering of Evil.....	306	Delightful Society.....	659
Covering of Sin.....	366	Delights of Religion.....	667
Covetousness respecting Preaching.....	334	Delights of Sense.....	528
Cowper, the Poet.....	39	Deliverance and Repentance.....	517
CREATION—		Deliverance from Evil.....	659
“ of Man.....	673	Deliverances.....	681
“ of the World.....	381, 670	Deluge, the.....	546
“ Works of.....	383	Dependance upon the Holy Spirit.....	233
Creed a, the Object of Faith.....	619	Depths, the.....	370
Creed, Exposition of the.....	581	Descent of Jesus to Hell.....	585
Crown of Glory.....	334, 452	Design of the Gospel.....	535
“ of Pride.....	453	Desire for Christ.....	89
Crucifixion of Jesus.....	585	“ for Death.....	397
Crucifixion to Sin.....	284	“ of Happiness universal.....	660
“ Curæ leves loquuntur”.....	475	“ of Life.....	397
Cure of Diseases by Christ.....	424	Destruction of the Enemies of the Church..	545
Cure of the Leper.....	432	Detraction.....	639 DEVIL, the—
D.		“ a roaring Lion.....	346
Daily Bread, Prayer for.....	610	“ cited Scripture.....	422
Dangers and Trials.....	466	“ our Adversary.....	345
Daniel.....	494	“ Resistance to.....	346
Darius.....	494	Diadem of Beauty.....	452
Dark Night.....	519	Dignities of Christians.....	134, 182
Daughters of Sarah.....	207	Dignity of Christians.....	536
DAVID.....	173	Dignity of Prayer.....	232, 236, 299, 595
“ Confidence of.....	465	Diligence in Business.....	408
“ Humility of.....	427	Directions for Prayer.....	232
“ Prayer of.....	469	Directions to praise God.....	354
“ Purpose of.....	465	Disappointed Prayer.....	228
“ Song of.....	469	Discernment, Clearness of.....	429
“ Sympathy of.....	471	Disciples of Christ, Calling of.....	440
Day of Visitation.....	169	“ “ Duty of.....	643
Days, Measure of.....	388, 389	Discipline.....	726
Days of Good.....	226	Disconformity to the World.....	294
Days of Noah.....	268	Discourse.....	223
Dead Faith.....	380	Disease of Sin.....	198
Dead Ministers.....	403	Diseases cured by Christ.....	424
Dealing unjustly, Causes of.....	637	Disguise of Grace.....	336
DEATH and Sleep.....	456	Disobedience.....	145, 267
“ Desire of.....	397	Disobedient, the.....	145, 267
“ in Sin.....	519	“ “ End of.....	325
“ in the Flesh.....	296	“ “ Folly of.....	146
“ of Christ.....	263, 585	“ “ Unhappiness of.....	146
“ Spiritual.....	456	Dispensation of the Word.....	500
“ to Sin.....	193	Disquietude vain.....	429
Debts, Payment of.....	487	Dissembling, Art of.....	442
DECALOGUE.....	619	Distress, Enlargement in.....	358
“ Preface to the.....	620	Distress in the World.....	242
“ Precept of I.....	622	Divine Attributes.....	698
“ “ II.....	625	Divine Grace.....	505
“ “ III.....	627	Divine Knowledge.....	288
“ “ IV.....	629	Divine Providence.....	450
“ “ V.....	631	“ “ Belief in.....	342
“ “ VI.....	633	Divine Purpose.....	493
“ “ VII.....	634	Divinity of the Scriptures.....	696
“ “ VIII.....	636	Divorce.....	426
“ “ IX.....	638	Docile Sufferer, the.....	446
“ “ X.....	640	DOCTRINE, Author of.....	94

	PAGE.		PAGE
DOCTRINE, Beings exercised in.....	97	Ensamples, Preachers should be.....	333
“ Matter of.....	95	Envy.....	126, 520
“ of Christ.....	431	Epictetus.....	126, 161, 498
“ of Grace.....	96	Epicureans, Notions of.....	670
“ of the Gospel.....	94	Episcopacy in Scotland.....	724
“ of the Scriptures, Divine.....	696	“ Moderate.....	725
Noddridge, Criticism by, on Leighton's Writings.....	48	“ Defence of.....	723
“ Preface by.....	59	Equity of Prayer.....	299
Dog-Hunger.....	638	Equity, Rule of.....	430
Doing Good.....	224, 307	Erroneous Opinions.....	624
Doing Good in Secrecy.....	427	Error of Man.....	100
Doom of the Hypocrite.....	428	Esau.....	164
Double-minded Man, the.....	103	Eschewing of Evil.....	224
Doubleness.....	221	Establishment of Christians.....	348
Doubtings, spiritual.....	144	Esteem of the World.....	529
Doubts and Fears.....	466	Eternal Glory.....	352
Dove-like Simplicity.....	442	Eternal Life.....	593
Doxology to the Lord's Prayer.....	617	Eternal Punishment.....	690
Drudgery of Sin.....	172	Evenness in the Ways of God.....	508
Drunkennes.....	102, 520	Events, Contingency of.....	493
Dunghill God, the.....	344	“ Liberty of.....	493
Duties of the Ministry.....	577	“ Necessity of.....	493
Duties of the People toward their Ministers	580	Evidence of Election.....	511
Duty of Christ's Disciples.....	643	Evil, Abhorrence of.....	407
Duty of Husbands and Wives.....	202	“ Concupiscence.....	642
Duty of Prayer.....	232, 235, 595	“ Deliverance from.....	616, 659
Duty, present.....	558	“ Doers.....	227, 320
Duty to Superiors.....	632	“ Heart.....	437
Duty toward God.....	489	“ Prayer for Deliverance from.....	616
Dwell at Home.....	704	“ pre-apprehended.....	534
Dwelling in God's House.....	475	“ Speaking.....	126, 219, 251
		“ “ Eschewing of.....	223
E.		“ “ Injustice of.....	251
Ears of the Lord.....	231	“ “ Remedy of.....	221
Earthliness.....	426	“ “ “ Rules for.....	251
Earthly-mindedness.....	444	“ Thoughts.....	490
Eification.....	404	“ Tongue.....	641
Effect of Example.....	240	“ Tongues of the Ungodly.....	251
Effects of Christ's Death.....	197	“ Treasure.....	441
Effectual Calling.....	66, 70	Examination, Self.....	336
Efficacy of Affliction.....	568	Example, Effect of.....	240
“ of Christ's Example.....	258	“ of Christ.....	185, 257
Egypt, Treasures of.....	463	“ Obligations from the... ..	187
Egyptian Temples.....	454	“ of the Saints.....	256
Ejaculatory Prayer.....	291	Excellency of Christ.....	476
Elders.....	328, 334	“ of the Christian Religion.....	692
Election eternal.....	66	Excess of Riot.....	292
“ Evidence of.....	511	Excuses for Delay in Religion.....	434
“ to Obedience.....	66	Exercise in Affliction.....	569
Elihu.....	448, 536	“ of Prayer.....	232
Elijah and Elisha.....	424	Exhortation before the Communion.....	704
Eliphaz.....	464	“ to Students.....	706
Encouragement to Holiness.....	503	Exhortations to Candidates.....	708, 721
End of Affliction.....	567	Experience, particular.....	491
End of all Things.....	302	Expectation of Christians.....	100
End of Christ's Sufferings.....	193	Expiation.....	66
End of Man.....	388	Exposition of the Creed.....	581
End of Preaching.....	312	“ of the Lord's Prayer.....	594
End of the Calling by God.....	155	“ of the Ten Commandments.....	619
End of the Gospel.....	427	Expository Lectures—
Enemies, Love of.....	426	“ “ on Psalm xxxix.....	385
Enemies of Religion.....	251	“ “ on Isaiah vi.....	398
Enemies of the Church, Destruction of.....	545	“ “ on Romans xii.....	404
Ευλοκίας Γαλιλαίε.....	494	External Reformation.....	253
Enlargement in Distress.....	358	“ Testimony to the Scriptures.....	696
Enlargement of Heart.....	507	Eye-Witnesses of Christ.....	329
“ Attainment of.....	509	Eyes of the Lord.....	229
Enmity against God.....	481
“ Injustice of.....	484	F.
“ Unhappiness of.....	484	Face of the Lord.....	230
		Fading Flower.....	453

	PAGE.		PAGE.
FAITH.....	63, 81, 435, 582, 644	Foolishness of Preaching.....	331
“ and Hope.....	101	Fools, Rest of.....	523, 537
“ appropriating.....	147	Forbearance of God.....	556
“ Confession of.....	550	Force of Speaking.....	431
“ Confidence of.....	531	Foreknowledge of God.....	67, 69
“ dead.....	380	Forgiveness.....	217
“ Effects of.....	197	“ from God.....	377
“ End of.....	91	“ of Iniquity.....	365
“ Excellency of.....	85	“ of Injuries.....	426
“ invincible.....	573	“ of Sin.....	437, 592
“ Mistakes concerning.....	143	“ “ Prayer for.....	614
“ Mystery of.....	581	Formal Ministers.....	403
“ Necessities of.....	145	Formality in Prayer.....	430
“ Prayer of.....	550	Foundation-Stone, Jesus Christ the.....	140
“ Pretences to.....	144	“ “ Building on the.....	142
“ purifying.....	144	“ “ Laying of the.....	141
“ Requirements of.....	698	Fountain of living Waters.....	470
“ Steadfastness in the.....	346	Fragment on Ezra ix.....	725
“ Strength of.....	571	“ on Psalm viii.....	381
“ Trial of.....	570	Fragrancy of the Name of Jesus.....	475
“ with Prayer.....	396	Frailty of Man.....	121, 389
“ Working of.....	88	Free Grace.....	418
Faithfulness of God.....	499	Freeness of the Grace of God.....	181
Fall, Letters of.....	47	Fretful Impatience.....	409, 572
False Prophets.....	431	Friends of God.....	484
False Witness.....	489	Fruitless Speech.....	220
Fasting.....	427	Fruits of Christian Love.....	306
“ of Christ.....	421	“ of Repentance.....	419
Favor of God.....	241	“ of the Spirit.....	557
FEAR OF GOD.. 107, 176, 250, 379, 486, 494,	504	Fulfilling of the Law.....	489, 560
“ Continuance of.....	110	Fulfilment of Prophecy.....	423
“ distrustful.....	435
“ filial.....	108	G.
“ Ground of.....	115	Gadarenes.....	436
“ Household of.....	117	Garments, white.....	521
“ Object of.....	115	Genealogy of Christ.....	411
“ servile.....	108	“ Genus irritabile vatum”.....	437
“ Warrant of.....	115	Germany, Sin of.....	577
Fears and Doubts.....	466	Gifts and Graces.....	309
“ within.....	325	Gladness of Heart.....	364
Feeding of the Flock of God.....	331	Glorifying of Christ.....	242
Felicity true.....	691	“ of God.....	312
Fervency in Prayer.....	234, 395, 430	Glory ascribed to God.....	353
Fervor of Spirit.....	409	“ Crown of.....	334
Festivities of the World.....	529	“ eternal.....	352
Fidelity in Preaching.....	311	“ of Christ.....	96
“ of God.....	328	“ of Man.....	122
“ of Ministers.....	578	“ of the Lord.....	459, 462
Fiery Trials.....	313	“ Partakers of.....	330
Fighting Life.....	313	“ revealed.....	331
Fightings without.....	325	Glorifying in the Lord.....	541
Filth of the Flesh.....	277	Γλοριάζειν.....	535
Filthiness.....	66	GOD—
“ Cleansing of.....	503	“ Ability of.....	328
Fire of Hell.....	126	“ altogether lovely.....	90
First Resurrection.....	125	“ Anger of.....	543
Fishers of Men.....	424	“ “ Averting of.....	544
Fishing, Art of.....	424	“ Attributes of.....	698
Fixed Heart.....	355	“ Awe of.....	361
Fleshly Lusts.....	162	“ Being of.....	660
“ “ Abstinence from.....	165	“ Bestowment of Mercy by.....	621
Flock of God.....	331	“ Bounty of.....	483, 700
Followers of Christ.....	434, 439	“ Calling of.....	154
“ of God.....	240	“ Children of.....	342
“ of Good.....	238	“ Commandments of.....	505
Following of Christ.....	434, 439, 559, 643	“ “ perfect.....	530
“ of Good.....	241	“ consuming Fire.....	484
Folly of Man.....	541	“ Contemplation of.....	526
Fool.....	127	“ Conviction by.....	543
Foolish Builders.....	404	“ Countenance of.....	526
“ Lusts.....	340	“ “ Light of.....	526

	PAGE.		PAGE.
GOD, Decrees of.....	668	GOD, Shield, the.....	463
“ Existence of.....	699	“ Sons of.....	505
“ faithful Creator.....	328	“ Sovereignty of.....	109, 622
“ Faithfulness of.....	499	“ Teaching of.....	541
“ Father.....	109, 582, 599	“ Union with.....	263
“ Father of Lights.....	153	“ Universal Sovereignty of.....	622
“ Favor of.....	241	“ unwilling to afflict his People.....	565
“ Fear of.....	176, 250, 379	“ Vision beatific of.....	660
“ Fidelity of.....	328	“ Warning by.....	269
“ Flock of.....	331	“ Will of.....	171, 287, 607
“ Followers of.....	240	“ Wisdom of.....	700
“ Forbearance of.....	556	“ Word of.....	123
“ Foreknowledge of.....	67, 69	“ “ Operation of the.....	131
“ Forgiveness from.....	377	“ Worship of.....	450, 664
“ Friends of.....	484	Godliness.....	72
“ Glorifying of.....	312	“ “ Mystery of.....	584
“ Glory of.....	450, 617	Godly Men—
“ Goodness of.....	132, 499, 515, 700	“ Preservation of the.....	271
“ Good Will of.....	342	“ Sorrow of.....	470
“ Government of.....	677	“ “ Nature of.....	472
“ Grace of.....	63, 356, 483	Godly Sorrow.....	471
“ Graciousness of.....	132	“ “God-Man”.....	412
“ Greatness of.....	617	Good—
“ “ Praise for.....	618	“ Cleaving to.....	407
“ Hand of.....	338	“ Conscience.....	275
“ Happiness in.....	695	“ “ Answer of.....	275
“ Hiding of the Face of.....	570	“ Constancy of.....	224
“ Holiness of.....	107, 700	“ Conversation.....	168
“ Holy One of Israel.....	546	“ Days.....	226
“ Ignorance of.....	624	“ Doing of.....	224
“ Image of.....	76, 519	“ done in Secret.....	427
“ Jewels of.....	136	“ Exactness of.....	224
“ Judge.....	109	“ Following of.....	241
“ Judgment of.....	108	“ Heart.....	502
“ Justice of.....	700	“ Tidings.....	680
“ King of Glory.....	618	“ Universality of.....	224
“ Kingdom of.....	605, 617	“ Will of.....	342
“ Knowledge of, Absolute and Perfect..	677	“ Will to Christ.....	89
“ Likeness to.....	521	“ Works, Merit of.....	376
“ Long-Suffering of.....	268	Goodness of Christ.....	476
“ Love of.....	157	“ “ Expression of.....	478
“ Love to.....	408, 470, 474, 489	“ of God.....	500, 700
“ Loving Kindness of.....	467, 526	“ of the Lord.....	132
“ Majesty of.....	398	Good Will to Christ.....	89
“ Marking Iniquity.....	375	“ of God.....	342
“ Mercy of.....	76, 158, 548, 700	Gospel by Matthew, Lectures on.....	411
“ “ Bestowment of.....	621	“ Design of.....	535
“ Message of.....	402	“ End of.....	427
“ Name of, hallowed.....	603, 629	“ Light of the.....	153
“ Nearness to.....	260	“ “ Marvellous.....	153
“ “ Privation of.....	261	“ Not a Doctrine of Licentiousness... ..	418
“ “ Restoration to.....	261	“ of God.....	325
“ Obligations to.....	622	“ preached.....	479
“ of all Grace.....	350	“ Preaching of the.....	294
“ of Righteousness.....	358	Government of God Universal.....	677
“ Omnipotence of.....	582	GRACE OF GOD.....	63, 556
“ our Life.....	469	“ a Divine Light.....	527
“ Patience of.....	483, 556	“ and Glory.....	71
“ People of.....	158	“ and Obedience.....	505
“ Power of.....	81, 617, 700	“ and Peace.....	71, 72
“ Praise to.....	484	“ assisting.....	72
“ Prerogative of.....	564	“ Beginnings of.....	125
“ Presence of.....	701	“ Counterfeit of.....	336
“ Protection of.....	241	“ disguised.....	336
“ Purity of.....	443	“ Doctrine of.....	96
“ Rejoicing in.....	534	“ Freeness of.....	181
“ Relation to.....	622	“ given to the Humble.....	337
“ Reverence of.....	619	“ Growth in.....	131
“ Sanctifying of, in the Heart.....	244	“ in Conflict.....	292
“ “ Effects of.....	245	“ Increase of.....	337
“ Searcher of Hearts.....	459	“ of Life.....	208

	PAGE.
GRACE, Perseverance in.....	348
“ preventing.....	72
“ Progress in.....	348
“ Riches of.....	483
“ Safety of.....	337
“ State of.....	459
“ Supernatural.....	684
“ Working of.....	72
Graces and Gifts.....	309
“ of Christians.....	405
“ of the Spirit.....	304
Gracious Discourse.....	223
Graciousness of the Lord.....	132
Grapes from Thorns.....	490
Grass, Frailty of.....	122
GRIEF—
“ Degrees of.....	472
“ generous.....	470
“ Nature of.....	473
“ Object of.....	471
“ Subject of.....	472
Ground for the Word.....	501
“ Good.....	502
“ Highway.....	501
“ Stony.....	501
“ Thorny.....	501
Growth in Grace.....	131
“ in spiritual Life.....	298
“ of Christians.....	130
Guidance of Christ.....	201
Guile.....	221
Guilelessness.....	367
“ of Christ.....	186
Guiltiness.....	66
“ of Sin.....	198, 562, 613
“ Confession of the.....	613

H.

HABAKKUK—

“ Fear of.....	532
“ Joy of.....	534
“ Prophecy of.....	532
“ Song of.....	533
“ Trust of.....	531
Haman.....	642
Hand of God.....	338
Hannibal.....	421
HAPPINESS.....	694
“ Desire for.....	649
“ “ Universal.....	650
“ in God.....	695, 698
“ Name, the.....	694
“ Nature of.....	695
“ not confined to Earth.....	696
“ not on Earth.....	653
“ of Christians.....	240, 241
“ of Man.....	650
“ of the Life to come.....	658
“ only from Holiness.....	693
“ Search after.....	652
“ Way of.....	430, 692
Harbinger of Christ.....	417
Harmony of the Scriptures.....	411
Hatred.....	639
Healing.....	403
“ of Sin.....	199
Health, Blessing of.....	433
Hearing of Prayer.....	232, 234
“ of the Word.....	502
Heart, Communion with the.....	362
“ Gladness of.....	364

	PAGE.
Heart, holy.....	229, 232
“ honest.....	502
“ humble.....	229
“ liberal.....	428
“ Murder.....	633
“ Preparation of the.....	233
“ Singleness of.....	427
“ Softness of.....	474
Heaven, Kingdom of.....	423
“ Obedience in.....	609
“ Way to.....	691
Heavenly-Mindedness of Ministers.....	578
“ Wisdom.....	441
Heaviness of Christians.....	83
“ “ Shortness of.....	84
“ “ Utility of.....	83
Heirs of Life.....	208
Heirship with Christ.....	683
Hell, Prison of.....	424
Herod the King.....	414
“ “ Anger of.....	415
“ “ Fear of.....	415
“ “ Trouble of.....	414
Herodotus.....	493
Hezekiah.....	452
Hiding of God's Face.....	570
Highway.....	501
Highways of Impiety.....	238
Hindrance to Prayer.....	209
Hoary Head.....	334
HOLINESS.....	106, 458, 631
“ Breadth of.....	503
“ Depth of.....	504
“ Image of God.....	519
“ in Preaching.....	111
“ Length of.....	503
“ Motives to.....	504
“ Of God.....	700
“ only Source of Happiness.....	693
“ Perfection of.....	106, 504
“ Rule of.....	240
Holy Diligence.....	513
“ Ghost, the.....	590
“ Heart.....	229, 232
“ Life.....	138, 732
“ “ Instructions for.....	734
“ “ Rules for.....	732
“ Obedience.....	505
“ Spirit, the.....	68
“ “ Assistance of.....	233
Holyrood House, Meeting at.....	27
Homage to Christ.....	413
Honest Heart.....	502
Honor of the World.....	529
“ to God.....	487
“ to Men.....	174
“ to Others.....	405
“ to Parents.....	631
Hope.....	75, 92, 101
“ amid Billows.....	464
“ in the Lord.....	392
“ of Christians.....	248
“ of Glory.....	107
Horace.....	363, 364, 499
Hospitality.....	308
House of God, dwelling in.....	475
“ “ Judgment in.....	322
“ of Prayer.....	395
Household of Faith.....	117
Human Liberty.....	678
Humble Confidence.....	340

	PAGE.		PAGE
Humble Heart.....	229	Invocation of Angels and Saints.....	624
Humility.....	239, 334, 395,	Irish Rebellion.....	324
" in Prayer.....	395	Isaiah, Prediction of.....	419
" of David.....	427	" vi., Expository Lectures on.....	398
" of Ministers.....	578	" Vision of.....	398
Husbands, Duty of.....	202	Israel, "the Lord's Son".....	414
" Honor from.....	208	" Watchman of.....	435
" Knowledge of.....	207	Israelites in the Wilderness.....	522
Hutchinson, George.....	25
Hypocrisy.....	128, 427,	J.
Hypocrite, Craft.....	442	Jehoshaphat.....	521
" Doom of.....	428	Jerusalem, Destruction of.....	556
		JESUS—
I.		" Appearance of.....	87
Identity of Religion.....	252	" Ascension of.....	587
Idolatry.....	287, 444,	" Author of Faith.....	507
Ignis Fatuus.....	458	" Birth of.....	412, 584
Ignorance and Sin.....	105	" Burial of.....	585
" inconsistent with Religion.....	443	" called a Nazarite.....	414
" of God.....	624	" calling his Disciples.....	424
" of the Law of God.....	474	" Crucifixion of.....	585
Illumination.....	687	" Death of.....	585
Image of God.....	76, 519, 631,	" Descent of, into Hell.....	585
Imitators of Good.....	238	" Finisher of Faith.....	507
"Immobilis".....	492	" Judge of the Quick and the Dead.....	589
Immoderate Speech.....	701	" King of the Jews.....	414
Immortality of the Soul.....	655	" looking to.....	293, 507
Impatience.....	409, 572	" Miracles of.....	424
Impenitence, Sleep of.....	456	" Name of, fragrant.....	475
Impenitency.....	269, 515	" Name illustrated.....	413, 478
Imperfect Perfection.....	67	" Pearl of great Price.....	430
Imperfection and Perfection.....	527	" Preaching of.....	423
Impiety, Highways of.....	286	" Preparation for.....	424
Importunity of Prayer.....	396	" "Primum intelligibile".....	460
Impurity.....	426	" public Calling of.....	424
" discovered.....	640	" Resurrection of.....	76, 586
Increase of Grace.....	337	" Revelation of.....	101
" of spiritual Life.....	130	" Rock of Salvation.....	431
Inequality of Christians.....	253	" Sitting at the right Hand of God.....	587
Infallibility of all Events praising God.....	493	" Son of God.....	584
Infancy of Christians.....	125	" Sufferings of.....	585
"Infelix Iolium".....	502	" Sun of Righteousness.....	88
Inheritance of Christians.....	74, 76	" Wisdom of God.....	443
" Assurance of.....	74	Jewels of God.....	136
" Cause of.....	74, 80	Job.....	435, 493
" Certainty of.....	79	JOHN THE BAPTIST.....	417
" Estate of.....	80	" Agreement of, with Christ.....	417
" Incorruptible.....	77	" Course of Life of.....	419
" Preservation of.....	80	" Doctrine of.....	419
" Possession of.....	81	" Habits of.....	419
" the Christian.....	218	" imprisoned.....	423
" Title to.....	74	" Office of.....	417
" undefiled.....	78	" Preacher of Repentance.....	418
" unwithering.....	79	" Preaching of.....	417
Iniquity, Visitation of.....	626	Jonah asleep.....	435
" Forgiveness of.....	365	Joseph, directions to, from God.....	412
" marked by God.....	376	" Doubts of.....	412
" taken away.....	400	" Dream by.....	412
Injuries.....	217	" Obedience of.....	412
Injustice in Dealing.....	637	Joshua.....	527
" of Evil-Speaking.....	251	Joy of Christians.....	82, 87, 91
Innocency of Children.....	126	" " Appropriation of.....	88
Inscription to the First Epistle of Peter.....	63	" " Causes of.....	92
Instability.....	103	" " Excellency of.....	92
Integrity of Ministers.....	576	JUDGMENT.....	269, 322
Interest in Christ.....	258	" by Christ.....	589
Internal Character of the Scriptures.....	692	" Congruity of.....	323
"Interpretatio spei".....	619	" Equity of.....	322
Interpretation of Calamities.....	554	" Foresiens of.....	324
Introduction to Theological Lectures.....	646	" in the House of God.....	322
Invincible.....	573	" Mercy of.....	323

	PAGE.		PAGE.
LEIGHTON, Pedigree of.....	7	LORD, the Eyes of.....	229
“ Piety of.....	38	“ Face of.....	230
“ Plan by, to purge the Church...	28	“ Glory of.....	462
“ Pulpit Oratory of.....	741	“ Good Providence of.....	231
“ Purity of.....	50	“ Love of.....	231
“ Refusal by, to sit in the Parlia- ment.....	19	“ of Hosts.....	450
“ Religious Abstraction of.....	38	“ Service of.....	409
“ Reordination of.....	17	“ Shield, the.....	463
“ Residence of, in his See.....	19	“ waiting for.....	380
“ Resignation of his Archbishop- ric, by.....	35, 36	Lord’s Day.....	631
“ Speech of, for Reconciliation....	29	“ Prayer.....	594
“ “ on the Oath of Su- premacy.....	19	“ “ Brevity of.....	597
“ Travels of.....	8	“ “ Doxology to.....	617
“ Treaty by, rejected.....	30	“ “ Necessity of.....	594
“ Views of, on ecclesiastical Polity	38	“ “ Order of.....	597
“ Visit of, to Lord Perth.....	45	“ “ Preface of the.....	599
“ Will of.....	53	“ “ prescribed.....	596
“ Withdrawal of, from his See	22, 35	“ Use of.....	594
“ Writings by.....	48	Lord’s Supper.....	644
Λειτουργία Θεοῦ.....	487	“ “ Admission to.....	644
Lepër, the.....	431	Loss of the Soul.....	464
“ Approach of, to Christ.....	431	Love—
“ Confidence of.....	431	“ Brotherly.....	213, 408
“ Cure of.....	432	“ “ Fervency of.....	116
“ Humility of.....	431	“ “ Purity of.....	117
“ Worship of Christ, by.....	431	“ “ Sincerity of.....	116
Letter of James Mitchell.....	11	“ Characters of.....	476
“ to Leighton from Charles II.....	45	“ Evidence of Election.....	508
Letters of Leighton.. 16, 20, 32, 34, 38, 41, 43-45	54, 57, 761-767	“ Fulfilling of the Law.....	560
Liberality of Heart.....	428	“ grows by Opposition.....	514
Liberty, human.....	678	“ Power of.....	470, 478
“ of Events.....	493	Love in Christians—
“ of the Will.....	542	“ “ Degree of.....	306, 407
LIFE—		“ “ Fruits of.....	306
“ a long.....	226	“ “ Nature of.....	300
“ Blessings of.....	654	“ “ Union of, with Prayer...	305
“ Brevity of.....	389	Love of Christ Inseparable.....	514
“ Desire of.....	397	“ of Enemies.....	426
“ Eternal.....	593	“ of God.....	157
“ holy.....	732	“ of the Brotherhood.....	175
“ Instructions for a holy.....	732	“ of Sin.....	448
“ of Believers, from God, through Christ	536	“ of Vanity.....	360
“ of Holiness.....	138	“ to Christ.....	89, 92, 197, 243, 476
“ of John Knox.....	13	“ “ Evidences of.....	480
“ Periods of.....	653	“ to God.....	408, 470, 473, 487, 561
“ Purity of.....	702	Loveliness of Christ.....	476
“ Rules for a holy.....	732	Lovers of Pleasure.....	482
“ spiritual.....	130	Loving Kindness of God.....	464, 467
“ to come.....	658	“ “ Assurance of.....	465
“ “ Happiness of.....	659	“ “ Participation of.....	468
“ to Righteousness.....	196	“ “ Time of.....	469
“ with Christ.....	317	Loving Kindness of the Lord.....	525
Light, a Representation of Christ..	461	Lucian.....	454
“ of God’s Countenance.....	526	Luke, Gospel of.....	411
“ of the Church.....	454	Lust.....	489
“ of the World.....	425	“ making Provision for.....	522
“ Likeness to God.....	521	Lustre of the Church.....	454, 459
Limits about Mount Sinai.....	619	Lusts of Men.....	105, 286
Living after the Flesh.....	686	Luther.....	240
“ Hope.....	75	“ the Schoolmasters of.....	421
“ to God.....	291, 294	Lying.....	638
“ Waters, Fountain of.....	470
Long-Suffering of God.....	268	M.
Looking to Jesus.....	293, 507	Macarii, the.....	364
LORD, the—		Mackenzie’s History of Scotland.....	23
“ Anger of.....	237	Madness of Men.....	556
“ Ears of.....	231	Magi, the.....	613

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Malice of Satan.....	436	Ministry of Reconciliation, Qualifications for
MAN—		the.....	579
" Creation of.....	673	Miraculous Works of Christ.....	431
" Dominion of.....	675	Miser of Athens.....	320
" Folly of.....	123, 541	Misery of Man's Nature.....	482
" Glory of.....	122	" of Sinners.....	157
" Image of God in.....	675	" of the Lost.....	433
" Liberty of.....	678	Mission of Christ.....	440
" on Earth a Sojourner and a Stranger..	396	Mistakes concerning Faith.....	143
" Original Dignity of.....	676	" the Sacraments.....	273
" Structure of.....	674	Mitchell, James, Letter by.....	11
" Vanity of.....	121, 390	Moderate Episcopacy, Defence of.....	723
" Vitiated Condition of.....	676	Moderation.....	429, 441
" Manhood of God".....	411	" of Mind.....	428
Manner of Prayer.....	597	Mohammed's Mountain.....	154
Man's Nature, Misery of.....	482	Morality.....	443
Mantle of Christ's Righteousness.....	458	Mordecai.....	642
" Mark of the Beast".....	40	Motives to Obedience.....	621
Marriage.....	202	Mount Sinai, Limits around.....	619
Martyr's Answer to the Emperor.....	498	Mundus immundus.....	471
Marvellous Doctrine of Christ.....	431	Murder.....	426
Masters of Arts, Exhortations to.....	708	Mutual Subjection.....	335
Matter of Prayer.....	597	Mystery of Faith.....	581
Matthew, Call of.....	438	" of Godliness.....	584
" Gospel by, Lectures on.....	411	" of the Trinity.....	582, 664
Mc'Grie's Life of John Knox.....	13	Mystical Babylon.....	445
Measure of our Days.....	389
Meditation.....	421	N.
MEDITATIONS—		Name of God, Use of.....	629
" on Psalm iv.....	357	" of Jesus, Fragrancy of.....	475
" on Psalm xxxii.....	365	Naphtali.....	11
" on Psalm cxxx.....	370	Nathaniel.....	438
Meekness.....	239, 250, 425	Natural Corruption.....	481
" of Ministers.....	578	Nature of Man, Misery of.....	483
Meeting at Holyrood-House.....	27	Nazarite.....	414
Melchisedec.....	363	Nazianzen.....	421
MEN—		Nearness to God.....	260
" base and brutish.....	436	" " Privation of.....	261
" held by God.....	416	" " Restoration to.....	261
" Madness of.....	556	Necessity and Providence.....	679
" Wickedness of.....	515	" Cord of.....	485
Mercy.....	442, 700	" of Events.....	493
" despised.....	545	" of Suffering.....	254
" of God.....	76, 158, 548, 700	Neginoth.....	357
" Seat, the.....	160	Neighbor, Love of.....	562
Merit of good Works.....	376	Nest of Fools.....	523, 537
Message from God.....	402	New Birth.....	125
Messiah, the.....	478	Newborn Babies.....	126
Meum and Tuum.....	489	New Creation.....	681
Middleton, character of.....	14	Nimbleness in the Ways of God.....	508
Milk of the Word.....	129	Noah.....	268
" pure.....	128	" Obedience of.....	270
" rational.....	130	" Saving of.....	271
Milky Way.....	459	Nourishment.....	127
Mind, Moderation of.....	428
" of Christ.....	285	O.
MINISTERS OF THE CHURCH.....	311	Oath of Supremacy in Scotland.....	19
" Fidelity of.....	578	Oaths, Multiplication of.....	743
" Friends with God.....	578	OBEDIENCE.....	63, 67, 105, 404
" humble.....	578	" and Grace.....	505
" Magnanimity of.....	579	" for Conscience' Sake.....	486
" meek.....	578	" of Faith.....	145
" not earthly-minded.....	578	Obedience of Heaven.....	607
" Piety of.....	577	" " Cheerfulness of.....	608
" privy Trials of.....	729	" flows from Reverence
" Prudence of.....	578	and Love.....	621
" righteous.....	578	" " Harmony of.....	609
" Strengthens of the Brethren..	577	" Motives to the.....	621
Ministry of Reconciliation.....	575	" on Earth, prayed for..	609
" " Duties of the... ..	577	" Unanimity of.....	609
" " Pretenders to the	576	" Universality of.....	608

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Obedience of Noah.....	270	Pestilence of 1665.....	282
“ to God.....	505	PETER—
“ “ Activity of.....	508	“ a Copresbyter.....	329
“ “ Alacrity of.....	508	“ Desire of.....	72
“ “ Constancy of.....	508	“ Inscription by.....	63
“ to Parents.....	632	“ Office of.....	64
“ to the Gospel.....	325	“ Salutation by.....	63
Object of Love.....	561	“ Title of.....	64
Objects of preaching the Gospel.....	296	“ Wife’s Mother of.....	433
Obligations from the Example of Christ.....	185	“ “ “ cure of.....	433
“ to God.....	622	Peter Martyr.....	455
Observation of Providence.....	523	Φαντασias.....	519
“ “ Character of.....	524	Pharisees, vain glory of.....	427
“ “ Privilege of.....	525	Philosopher’s Stone.....	486
“ “ Wisdom of.....	524	Φρονημα.....	481
Offering of Prayer.....	232	Piety of Ministers.....	577
Offices in the Church.....	407	Pilgrims.....	163
Ointment, precious, a Symbol of Christ.....	476	Pious Invocation.....	595
“ Old Man,” the.....	126	Pity.....	214
Olympic Games.....	507	Platonists, notions of.....	672
Operation of the Word of God.....	131, 500	Pleasure, Lovers of.....	482
Opposition to Sin.....	225	Pleasures in the World.....	529
Oracles of God.....	311	“ of Religion.....	666
Oration, valedictory.....	721	Πλεονεξια.....	638
Order of Prayer.....	597	Plutarch.....	346
Ostentation.....	442	“Polar Splendor” the.....	571
		Politian.....	365
P.		Pollution of Sin.....	66
Παλιγγενεσια.....	683	Poverty of Spirit.....	425
Palsy, the Man sick of the.....	436	POWER ascribed to God.....	354
Πανεξια.....	638	“ of God.....	81, 700
Parable of the Sower.....	500	“ of Jesus.....	436
Pardon prayed for.....	613	“ of Religion.....	686
Parents, Obedience to.....	632	“ of Sin.....	198, 562
Παροιμοι.....	518	Praise.....	138
Partakers of Glory.....	330	Praise of God.....	353, 617
Paths of Righteousness.....	236	“ “ Directions for the.....	354
PATIENCE.....	63, 184	Praises to God.....	484
“ in Suffering.....	185	PRAYER.....	209, 228, 372, 421, 427, 428, 430
“ in Tribulation.....	409	“ Acceptance of.....	232
“ of Christ.....	186	“ Answers to.....	234
“ of God.....	548, 557	“ Art of.....	541
“ of the Saints.....	492	“ Babbling in.....	428
Patient Sufferer.....	446	“ Blessings of.....	232
Payment of Debts.....	487	“ Breathing of Hope.....	619
“ of Tribute.....	486	“ Brevity in.....	597
Peace.....	71	“ Confidence in.....	602
“ Christian.....	356	“ Continuance in.....	410
“ Ecclesiastical.....	73	“ Delight in.....	232
“ Seeking of.....	226	“ Described.....	298
“ Sons of.....	314	“ Dignity of.....	232, 236, 299, 595
Pearl of Great Price.....	430	“ Disappointment in.....	228
Peculiar People.....	148	“ Duty of.....	232, 235, 595
“ Pelagus aquarum?”.....	472	“ Effects of.....	300
People of God.....	158	“ Ejaculatory.....	291
Perfect Tranquillity.....	659	“ Elevation of Soul in.....	602
Perfecting of Holiness.....	504	“ Equity of.....	299
Perfection and Imperfection.....	527	“ Exercise of.....	232
“ imperfect.....	67	“ Faith in.....	396
“ of Christians.....	348	“ Ferocity of.....	234, 395, 430
“ of Holiness.....	106	“ for Daily Bread.....	610
“ threefold.....	67	“ “ comprises Godliness, Moderation, Piety, and Soberness.....	611, 612
Performance of Redemption.....	114	“ for Deliverance from Temptation... ..	616
Peripatetic Philosophers.....	671	“ for Pardon.....	612
Perjury.....	639	“ Form of.....	596
Persecuted Christians.....	242	“ Formality in.....	430
Persecution.....	240	“ Graces of.....	234
Perseverance in Grace.....	348	“ Hearing of.....	232, 234
“ in Prayer.....	430	“ Hindrances to.....	209
Persian Soldier.....	365
Persius.....	363

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Prayer, Humble Boldness in.....	602	Precept VI.....	633
“ Humility in.....	395	“ Improvement of.....	634
“ Importunity in.....	396	“ Requisitions of.....	633
“ Manner of.....	596	“ Scope of.....	633
“ Matter of.....	597	Precept VII.....	634
“ of the Saints.....	138	“ Rules of.....	635
“ Order of.....	597	Precept VIII.....	636
“ Perseverance in.....	430	“ Requirements of.....	637
“ Precautions before.....	233	“ Sins against.....	638
“ Qualifications for.....	232	Precept IX.....	638
“ Slothfulness in.....	234	“ End of.....	638
“ Strength of.....	541	“ Offences against.....	640
“ Utility of.....	299, 595	“ Perjury condemned by.....	639
“ Wanderings in.....	233, 541	“ Prohibitions of.....	639
“ Way to offer.....	232	Precept X.....	640
Prayers... 702, 708, 709, 711, 713, 714, 716, 717,	719, 721, 722, 734, 735	“ Observance of.....	642
Preacher of Righteousness.....	268	“ Romish division of.....	640
Preachers, Ensamples.....	333	“ Subjects of.....	641
“ Reward of.....	334	“ Transgressions of.....	641
PREACHING—		Preciousness of Christ.....	147
“ Ambition in.....	333	Preface by Doddridge.....	59
“ and Baptism.....	417	“ to Theological Lectures.....	645
“ Constrainedness of.....	332	Preference of others.....	408
“ Covetousness respecting.....	333	Prelacy.....	724
“ Criticism on by Leighton.....	21	Preparation for the Communion.....	704
“ Exemplary Temper in.....	332	“ of the Ark.....	270
“ of Christ.....	266	“ of the Heart.....	233
“ of the Gospel.....	294, 311, 479	Presbyterian Eloquence displayed.....	50
“ “ Object of.....	296, 312	Presence of Christ.....	457, 459
“ Qualities of.....	311	“ God.....	701
“ Ready Mind for.....	332	Present Duty.....	558
“ Willingness for.....	332	Preservation of the Godly.....	271
Precautions before Prayer.....	233	Pretences to Faith.....	144
PRECEPTS.....	619	Pretenders to the Ministry.....	576
“ Preface to.....	620	Pride of Man.....	123
“ Division of.....	622	Priesthood, Christians a Holy.....	134, 137, 148
“ Excellency of.....	620	“ Spiritual.....	137
“ Perfection of.....	621	“ Primum visibile”.....	460
“ Profit of.....	622	Prison of Hell.....	424
“ Style of.....	622	Prison, Spirits in the.....	265, 267
Precept I.....	622	Privilege of observing Divine Providence.....	525
“ Command of.....	623	Privileges of the Children of God.....	342
“ Profaneness forbidden by.....	624	“ Spiritual.....	535
“ Prohibitions of.....	624	Privy Trials of Ministers.....	729
“ Scope of.....	623	Profanation of the Lord’s Day.....	604
“ Sense of.....	623	“ of the Name of God.....	603
“ Sins against.....	623	Profane Speech.....	220
Precept II.....	625	Profaneness.....	624
“ Commands of.....	626	Profitable Discourse.....	223
“ Enforcement of.....	627	Progress in Grace.....	348
“ Prohibitions of.....	626	Promises, Application of.....	133
“ Tenor of.....	625	“ Belief of.....	133
Precept III.....	627	“ of God.....	504
“ Commands of.....	629	“ to Holiness.....	505
“ Commination of.....	628	Prophecy, fulfilment of.....	423
“ Contents of.....	627	“ of Balaam.....	414
“ Prohibitions of.....	628	Prophets and Law.....	425
Precept IV.....	629	“ Benefits of.....	98
“ Obedience of.....	629	“ Diligence of.....	97
“ Observance of.....	631	“ Extent of.....	98
“ Reason of.....	629	“ False.....	431
“ Scope of.....	629	“ Search by.....	97
“ Violations of.....	631	“ Success in.....	98
Precept V.....	631	Propitiatory, the.....	366
“ Commands of.....	632	Prosperity of Fools.....	250
“ Meaning of.....	631	“ of the Ungodly.....	465
“ Obedience to Parents enforced by.....	632	Protection of God.....	241
“ Order of.....	631	Proud, resistance to the.....	337
“ Prohibitions of.....	632	Providence.....	450, 665
“ Promise of.....	631	“ Belief in.....	342
		“ Observation of.....	523

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Sanctification—Nature of	118	Sermons—Grapes from Thorns	490
“ Seat of	117	“ Heavenly Wisdom	441
“ Worker of	118	“ Holiness	503
Sanctifying of God in the Heart	243	“ Hope amid Billows	464
“ of God’s Name	603	“ Imperfection	527
Sarah	207	“ Law the, written upon the Heart	562
“ Daughters of	207	“ Love the fulfilling of the Law	560
Satan, a Liar	422	“ Mercy despised	545
“ Malice of	436	“ Name the, of Jesus fragrant	475
“ Slaves of	505	“ Observation of Providence	523
“ Strongholds of	504	“ Parable of the Sower	500
Saving of Noah	271	“ Patient Sufferer, the	446
Savior	680	“ Perfection	527
“ Administration of the	424	“ Prayer of Faith	550
“ Public Calling of the	423	“ Present Duty	558
Schoolmasters of Luther	421	“ Sinner the, a Rebel against God	481
Scotland, Prelacy in	724	“ Spiritual Privileges	535
“ State of	29	“ Suitable Exercise in Affliction	569
“ “ during the Commonwealth	745	“ Teaching of God	541
Scottish assertory Act	26	“ Time to Awake	519
“ Indulgence	26	“ To the Clergy	574
“ League and Covenant	31	“ True Christian a, the best Subject	484
“ Oath of Supremacy	19	“ Wickedness of Man	515
“ Prelacy, Scheme of	18	Serpentine Wisdom	442
“ Presbyterian Eloquence displayed	50	Servants	178
Scribes, cavils of	437	“ Duty of	179
SCRIPTURE—Abuse of	423	“ “ extent of	180
“ Character of	697	“ “ Principle of	181
“ Cited by the Devil	422	“ of God	172
“ Divinity of	696	Service of the Lord	409
“ Doctrine of	697	“ of the World	428
“ Evidences of	696	“ “ fruitless	429
“ Harmony of	411	“ “ impossible for a Christian	428
“ Reading of	730	“ “ needless	428
“ Style of	697	“ “ Unworthiness of	428
“ Sublimity of	697	Servile Fear	177
“ Testimony to	697	Settling of Christians	348
“ Use of	423	Shadow of Death	423
“ Word of God	460	Sharp, Character of	14
Secrecy in doing good	427	Shechem, Men of	486
Secret of State	439	Shechinah	539
Seed of the Word	500	Shining of the Church	457
Seeking of Peace	226	“ “ Constancy of	458
“ the Kingdom of God	429	“ “ Humbleness of	458
Seers	444	“ “ Progression of	458
Self-cleansing	503	Short Catechism	643
Self-deception	431	“ Shot Proof”	463
Self-denial	405	Signs of Christ’s Royalty	417
Self-examination	336	Simplicity	442
Self-love	305, 449	SIN—and Calamity	518
Self-righteousness	425	“ and Ignorance	105
Seneca	128, 366, 370, 498	“ and Impenitence	565
Sense of Religion universal	660	“ Bearing of by Christ	193
“ of the Law	426	“ Cessation from	284
Separation from God by Sin	518	“ Chains of	285
SERMONS	441-580	“ Confession of	369
“ Believer, the, a Hero	495	“ Covering of	366
“ Calamities Interpreted	554	“ Death to	193
“ Christ the Light and Lustre of the Church	454, 459	“ Deformity of	396
“ Christian Triumph	509, 512	“ Drudgery of	172
“ Confession of Faith	550	“ Forgiveness of	437, 440, 592
“ Confidence of Faith	531	“ Guiltiness of	562
“ Contempt Punished	545	“ Nature of	472
“ Divine Glory of Zion, the	450	“ of Germany	577
“ Docile Sufferer, the	446	“ of Rome	577
“ Folly of Man, the	541	“ of the Heart	641
“ Generous Grief	470	“ Opposition to	225
“ God’s End and Design in Affliction	564	“ Pollution of	66
“ Goodness of God	513	“ Power of	562
“ Grace and Obedience	505	“ Purged	400
		“ Stain of	66

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Sin—the Cause of Affliction.....	565	Spiritual Resurrection.....	684
“ Transfer of to Christ.....	191	Spiritual Sacrifices.....	138, 139
“ Wages of.....	172	Spiritual Sense of the Law.....	426
“ Weight of.....	190	Spiritual Wickedness.....	504
Singleness of Heart.....	427	Spotlessness of Christ.....	186
Sinner, the.....	481	Sprinkling, Use of.....	66
“ a Rebel.....	484	Stability of the Church.....	492
“ a Wandering Sheep.....	199	Stain of Sin.....	66
“ Wretched State of.....	440	Star-Chamber.....	740
Sinners, Comfort of.....	440	Star of Bethlehem.....	414
“ Dead.....	157	Stars.....	459
“ Misery of.....	157	State-secret.....	439
Sins, Forgiveness of.....	592	Steadfastness in the Faith.....	347
“ of the Tongue.....	387	Stoics, the.....	371
“ of the Ungodly.....	471	“ Notions of.....	672
Sitting of Jesus at the Right Hand of God.....	587	Stony Ground.....	501
Slaves of Satan.....	505	Strait Gate, the.....	430
Sleep and Death.....	456	Strength of Faith.....	572
“ Arising from.....	456	Strengthening of Christians.....	348
“ Avoiding of.....	700	Strife and Envy.....	520
“ Brother to Death.....	519	Strongholds of Satan.....	504
“ of Impenitence.....	456	Students, exhortations to.....	706
Slothfulness in Business.....	408	Stumblers at the Word.....	146
“ in Prayer.....	234	Style of the Scriptures.....	697
“ Small Stars”.....	458	Subject, the best.....	484
Sobriety.....	102, 301, 344, 700	Subjection, mutual.....	335
Society, Choice of.....	222	Submission to Civil Power.....	169
“ of Heaven.....	659	“ to God.....	394
Softness of Heart.....	474	Success of the Word.....	502
Solemn League and Covenant.....	31, 724	Sufferer, the.....	446
Solomon.....	449, 507	Suffering.....	184
Sons of God.....	505	Suffering of Christians.....	240, 243, 319
“ of Peace.....	314	“ Fear of.....	243
Sophocles.....	443	“ for Righteousness.....	241
Σωφροσύνη.....	701	“ Necessity of.....	254
Sorrows of Christians.....	82	“ of Jesus.....	585
“ of the Godly.....	472	Sufferings of Christ.....	96, 188, 256
Soul, the Committed to God.....	326	“ Cause of.....	259
“ Ground of.....	328	“ Consideration of.....	256
“ Immortality of.....	655	“ End of.....	193
“ Loss of.....	464	Sun of Righteousness.....	413, 457
“ Tumult of.....	416	Sun, the, a Symbol of Christ.....	461
Soul—Filthiness.....	279	Superiors, Duty to.....	632
Sower, the Parable of.....	500	Supernatural Grace.....	687
Speakers of Evil.....	251	Superstition.....	443
Speaking, force of.....	431	Supplicating of God.....	429
“ of Evil.....	219	Supreme Object of Love.....	561
Speech, Bridle of the.....	222	Swearing.....	426
“ Fruitless.....	220	“ profane.....	604, 628
“ Immoderate.....	701	Symbol of Christ.....	461
“ Profane.....	220	Sympathy.....	212
“ Uncharitable.....	220
“ Vain.....	220	T.
Spirit, Filthiness of the.....	504	Tables of the Law.....	620
Spirit, Fruits of the.....	557	“ Take heed how you hear”.....	502
Spirit, Leading by the.....	421	“ Taking heed to our Ways”.....	386
Spirit of Glory.....	321	Tasting by Christians.....	133
Spirit of God, Work of.....	69	Teaching of God.....	541
Spirit of Judgment.....	454	Tears of the Godly.....	473
Spirits in Prison.....	265, 267	Temperance.....	102, 700
Spiritual Death.....	456	Temple, Christians a.....	134
Spiritual Doubtings.....	144	Temple of God.....	395
Spiritual Knowledge.....	160	Temple, the Spiritual.....	134
Spiritual Life.....	130, 288	“ “ Foundation Stone of.....	135
Spiritual-Minded Christians.....	520	“ “ Materials of.....	135
Spiritual-Mindedness.....	291	“ “ Nature of.....	134
Spiritual Priesthood.....	137	“ “ Structure of.....	136
“ “ Office of.....	137	TEMPTATION.....	82, 422, 616
“ “ Service of.....	138	“ Deliverance from, Prayed for...	616
“ “ Success of.....	139	“ of Christ.....	421
Spiritual Privileges.....	535	“ Comfort from.....	423

	PAGE.		PAGE.
TEMPTATION, Instruction from.....	423	Truth, Reception of the.....	285
“ Places of.....	422	“ the Word of.....	68
“ Watchfulness against.....	616
Tertullian.....	368	U.
Testimony, external to the Scriptures.....	697	Unanimity.....	210
Theft.....	636	Unbelief.....	145
THEOLOGICAL LECTURES.....	645	Unbelievers, misery of.....	146
“ Authority of the Scriptures.....	694	Uncharitable Speech.....	220
“ “ Before the Communion....	704	Understanding of the Divine Law.....	620
“ “ Being of God.....	660	UNGODLY, the—
“ “ Christ the Savior.....	680	“ “ Candle of.....	464
“ “ Christian Religion, the way		“ “ Character of.....	545
“ “ to Happiness.....	690	“ “ Evil Tongues of.....	251
“ “ Creation of Man.....	674	“ “ Prospects of.....	464
“ “ Creation of the World....	670	“ “ Sins of.....	470
“ “ Decrees of God.....	668	“ “ Way of.....	255
“ “ Divine Attributes.....	698	Unholy Persons, Converse of.....	439
“ “ Eternal Punishment.....	688	Union of Believers with Christ.....	191
“ “ Happiness..... 649,	694	“ to God.....	263
“ “ Happiness in God.....	694	Universal Desire for Happiness.....	658
“ “ Happiness of Man.....	650	“ Judgment.....	589
“ “ Happiness of the Life to		“ Sense of Religion.....	660
“ “ come.....	658	Unjust Dealing, cause of.....	637
“ “ Holiness the only Happi-		Unpersuasion.....	146
“ “ ness on Earth.....	693	Use of God’s Name.....	629
“ “ Human felicity not on earth	652	Use of Scripture.....	423
“ “ Immortality of the Soul... 655		Utility of Prayer..... 236, 299,	595
“ “ Introduction.....	646	Utility of Religion.....	666
“ “ Law Given to Man.....	664
“ “ Life According to the Rules		V.
“ “ of Religion.....	700	Vain Conversation.....	110
“ “ Preface to the.....	645	“ “ Redemption from.....	112
“ “ Providence..... 664,	676	Vain Disquietude.....	428
“ “ Purity of Life.....	702	Vain Glory, desire of.....	427
“ “ Regeneration..... 682,	685	Vain Speech.....	220
“ “ Religion, Pleasure and		Vanity, Love of.....	360
“ “ Utility of.....	666	Vanity of Man..... 121,	390
“ “ Scriptures, Authority of.. 694		Valedictory Oration.....	721
“ “ True Felicity.....	688	Vigilance.....	345
“ “ True Way to Happiness.. 690		Vigor of Body and Mind.....	659
“ “ Worship of God.....	664	Virgins, the.....	479
“ “ Theology, Definition of.. 691		Vision beatific of God.....	659
Θεομαθεια.....	626	Vision of Isaiah.....	398
“ Thickets of Ignorance”.....	443	Visitation, day of.....	169
Thorny Ground.....	501	Vocation.....	70
Thoughts, Evil.....	490
“ of Sin.....	641	W.
Time to Awake.....	519	Wages of Sin.....	172
Tongue, Sins of the.....	387	Waiting for the Lord.....	350, 392
Tranquillity of Spirit.....	73	Waldenses, the..... 166,	248
“ Perfect.....	659	Walking as in the presence of God.....	701
Treasure of Christians.....	79	“ directed.....	519
Treasures of Egypt.....	463	“ honestly, as in the day.....	520
Trees of Righteousness.....	557	Wandering Sheep.....	199
Trial of Faith..... 86,	570	Wanderings in Prayer..... 233,	641
“ “ End of.....	87	Wantonness.....	520
Trials and Dangers.....	466	War against the Soul.....	164
Tribulation.....	67	Warning by God.....	269
“ Patience in.....	409	Watch-bell, the.....	519
Tribute, Payment of.....	486	Watchfulness..... 102, 345,	700
Trinity, Mystery of the.....	664	“ to Prayer.....	301
“ Tristes Ineptiæ”.....	531	Watchman of Israel.....	435
Triumph, the Christian..... 509,	512	Way of Affliction.....	566
True Christian, the best Subject.....	484	Way of God’s Commandments.....	505
True Felicity.....	688	“ “ excellency of the.....	509
Trust in God.....	495	Way of Happiness..... 430,	692
“ Assurance of.....	497	Way of Peace.....	509
“ Basis of.....	497	Way of Sin.....	259
“ Peace from.....	498	Way to Happiness by Religion.....	690
Trust in the Lord.....	363	Ways of God.....	509
Truth of the Christian Religion.....	692	“ “ Cheerfulness in..... 509,	608

	PAGE.		PAGE.
Ways of God, End of.....	509	WIVES, Subjection of.....	203, 204
“ “ Evenness in.....	508	“ “ Wonderful,” Jesus the.....	413
“ “ Nimbleness in.....	508	WORD, the.....	123
Westminster Assembly.....	723	“ “ a Light.....	417
Wheels of the Soul.....	572	“ “ Dispensation of.....	500
White Garments.....	521	“ “ Hearing of.....	502
Wickedness of Man.....	515	“ “ Nature of.....	500
Wild Ass Colt.....	523	“ “ of God.....	123
Will of God.....	171, 287, 607	“ “ of Truth.....	68
“ “ Knowledge of.....	288	“ “ Operation of.....	131, 501
“ “ Our Rule.....	289	“ “ Seed of.....	500
Willingness for Preaching.....	332	“ “ Stumbling at.....	146
WISDOM.....	108, 441	“ “ Success of.....	502
“ and Worth.....	529	“ “ Sweetness of.....	134
“ Devilish.....	442	Work of the Spirit of God.....	69
“ Earthly.....	442	Works Good, Merits of.....	376
“ Excellence of.....	442	Works of Charity.....	138
“ Gentleness of.....	442	Works of Christ.....	431
“ Heavenly.....	441	Works of God in Creation.....	383
“ Impartiality of.....	442	WORLD, the
“ in Preaching.....	311	“ “ Course of.....	292
“ Natural.....	442	“ “ Creation of.....	381, 670
“ Not Censorious.....	442	“ “ Service of.....	428
“ of God.....	700	“ “ “ Fruitless.....	429
“ Origin of.....	443	“ “ “ Impossible for a Christian.....	428
“ Peaceable.....	441	“ “ “ Needless.....	429
“ Purity of.....	441, 444	“ “ “ Unworthiness of.....	428
“ Sensual.....	442	Worship of Christ.....	413, 416
“ Serpentine.....	442	Worship of God.....	450, 454, 664, 726
“ Sincerity of.....	442	Wrath of Man.....	490, 492
“ Undissembling.....	442	“ “ Event of.....	491
“ Unostentatious.....	442	“ “ Limitation of.....	494
Witchcraft.....	624	“ “ Made to Praise God.....	492
Witness, False.....	489	Wretchedness of Sinners.....	436
WIVES.....	202	Writing of the Law of God on the Heart....	563
“ Chastity of.....	204	“ “ “ “ Necessity of it... ..	563
“ Conversation of.....	204	“ “ “ “ Writer the, of... ..	564
“ Daughters of Sarah.....	207
“ Duty of.....	202	Y.
“ Fear of.....	205	Youth.....	334
“ Guilelessness of Spirit of.....	206
“ Weakness of.....	206, 207	Z.
“ Modesty of.....	205	Zeal, Imprudent.....	429
“ Ornaments of.....	205, 206	Zion's Plea against Prelacy.....	8, 739

THE END.

